The Fruit of the Tree of your own Wickedness

by DevilsHerb

Summary

Will finds himself in Florence a year after "that night" on the trail of Hannibal. Still recovering from the psychological and emotional fall out, he seeks another, yes, psychiatrist to keep him stable. Unknown to Will, Hannibal and Bedelia have settled in Florence, too. Unknown to Hannibal, Will is in Florence with his new psychiatrist. Doctor Daniel Clayton has some empathic gifts of his own and it will be his misfortune that he bears a striking resemblance to Will. Each of them has an agenda and while Daniel and Will engage in therapy one chance encounter places them in a deadly game between Hannibal and Bedelia. But sometimes things are not always as they appear.

A viper will devour another viper. But a mongoose can be trained to temper its bite.
Whatever you are doing with Will Graham; stop.

This story is updated regularly like a serial. If Fate should gather the shattered teacup and bring Hannibal and Will together again after Mizumono, then this fic should be most appealing.

Notes

This is my first attempt at fanfic but I am so enamored with NBC's Hannibal that I was inspired to take a stab at it. I am still learning how to use this site, so be patient with the formatting.

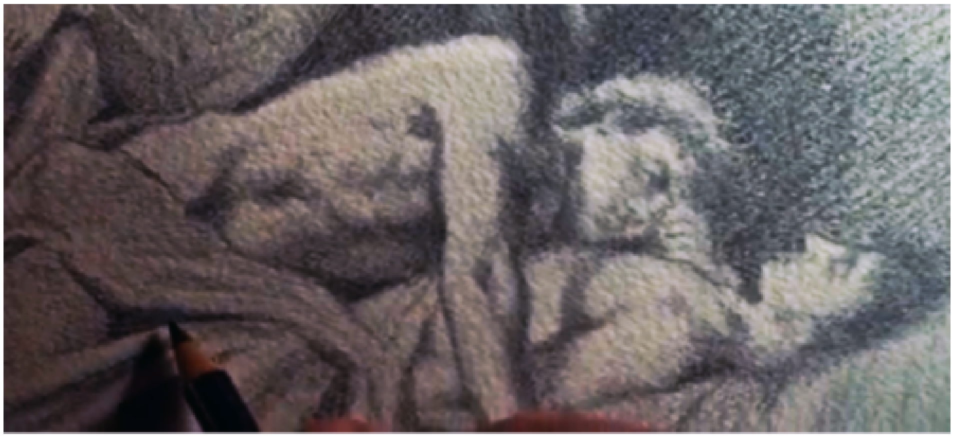
The Fruit of the Tree of your own Wickedness

Said Achilles to Patroclus as he prepared to battle the Trojans in Achilles' armor:

You must not, in the pride and fury of fighting, go on slaughtering the Trojans, and lead the way against Ilion, for fear some one of the everlasting gods on Olympus might crush you…if only not one of all the Trojans could escape destruction, not one of the Argives, but you and I could emerge from the slaughter so that we two alone could break Troy's hallowed coronal.

But Hector, when he saw high hearted Patroclus trying to get away, saw how he was wounded with sharp javelin, came close against him across the ranks, and with the spear stabbed him in the depth of the belly and drove the bronze clean through.



The Iliad, Chapter 16

Chapter 1

While searching for Hannibal in Florence, Will is having trouble coping with his usual demons…

Will sits hunched in the backseat of the taxi, clenching the small amber-colored prescription vial. He didn't want to take the dose, the pills made him nauseous, but they did a better job of keeping the headaches away than aspirin. With a resigned sigh, he finally tosses a couple in his mouth and chases them down with his cold Italian roasted coffee. He stares out the car window as people amble by; passing the cab without difficulty. He thinks maybe he should have walked.

It wouldn't be the first time he'd been duped by an Italian taxi driver, although he had found most of them to be honest most of the time…mostly. He would probably have made it here in the same amount of time had he walked. Still, he would have had to traverse from one end of the city to the other. Florence in the summer was gorgeous, but sweltering.

“How much further is it?” Will asks. He rubs his hands over his Levis again. His palms are moist despite the air conditioning and his mouth is dry, metallic, flat. He is so very, very tired of going through this charade.

“Oh, is a…not much further, we are almost there. Less than five minutes, I promise Signore.” The cab driver grins into his rearview mirror.

Will tries not to notice the grease under the man’s fingernails or the stubborn grime covering calloused hands that won’t come off no matter how much he scrubs at the residue before leaving his other job as a car mechanic to start his shift. Or the throbbing cavity in his left jaw that causes him to wince each time his tongue compulsively presses on the offending tooth due to the dental appointments he keeps skipping because his young daughter whose picture is taped to his dashboard has just graduated from high school and is off to attend a university he can’t really afford. Or the argument he had with his wife this morning after she threw his breakfast at him, coffee stain on his collar and tidbits of scrambled egg ground into his scalp visible beneath the hasty trim the man had given himself in his cluttered bathroom. Hair clipped from the razor is sticking to the adhesive of the opened envelope containing the unpaid utility bill, the one that set off the wife tucked up in the sun visor. The ripped envelope draws the cab driver’s attention relentlessly.

Will nods and smiles taking in another resigned breath. He finds himself doing that a lot.

After much prompting from Jack, Will had accepted Mason Verger’s offer to hunt down Hannibal Lecter and bring him back. Will had stood at the foot of Mason’s sumptuous bed, Margot at Mason’s side, stiffly holding his hand. Her beautiful if impassive face had seemed to float above the carnage that was her brother. Carnage that Will had not only witnessed, but had lifted not one finger to stop, his tacit approval tantamount to complicity, and his lack of regret complete and savagely satisfying.

Margot’s feelings about her brother had been abundantly clear. Her feelings about Will had not been. It was only after she had shown Will to the door that Margot allowed herself a lingering pass of her fingertips across Will’s hand and had let slip a smile as tantalizingly elusive as the Mona Lisa’s.

Mason had specific plans about taking his particular brand of revenge on the man who had ruined his face and left him paralyzed. Mason’s plans were his own affair. Jack’s plans were tied up in bureaucratic red tape. Will had plans of his own.

Will slips his hand under his loose button down shirt, traces his fingers over the scar extending like a vein beneath his ribcage. If he closed his eyes and allowed the memory to take him over he would feel the curved blade of the linoleum knife sinking into his flesh. Would see the tear rimmed eyes and rueful smile on Lecter’s lips as he twisted it tenderly into Will’s belly. He doesn’t allow it.

More than a year had passed since that night. Life for Will is a timeline of before and after. Life before Garret Jacob Hobbs. Life before Abigail, and life after, and after again… Life before Hannibal Lecter. Will does not think what life after Hannibal will look like if he should even survive it. He has no frame of reference for that scenario. Will wears his weariness like a stone around his neck and it is becoming too heavy to bear. The stone is the reason for his trip today.

Will is shaken out of his reverie by the cab driver’s voice. “Here we are, Signore…”

Will pays him in euros and tips him well. It is not his money anyway. Besides, he will likely see this driver again if he decides to continue coming here. He watches the driver ease back into traffic and turns his attention to the building in front of him. Will's Italian is getting better, but the plaque is in English. It reads Ventresca and Associate, Partners in Mental Health.

Will takes a deep breath. Perhaps the fourth try will prove the charm.

The building is centuries old and is beautifully preserved and well-maintained on the exterior. No expense was spared in the landscaping either. The interior has been fully renovated to accommodate modern amenities; old world collides with the new, before and after, combined. Will checks in with the receptionist who speaks a modicum of English and graciously provides a demitasse of espresso while he waits. He's had more than enough coffee today but he sips at it anyway.

The associate Will chose, D. B. Clayton, Ph.D., MD, had only his last name to recommend him, at least initially. It was not foreign. No more shrinks with accents he promised himself. Will had not been able to make a connection with the previous three psychiatrists with whom he had actually kept his appointments. He had stayed long enough with the previous one to refill his prescription. Among his reasons for dismissing them, language was at the top of the list. He had tired quickly of repeating himself in an effort to clarify, clarify, clarify….

Will also wanted to stay away from any shrinks connected to mental hospitals. He could only imagine how difficult it would be to get out of one in a foreign country. Besides his American name, Clayton had also been published and it had been his therapeutic focus that had caught Will's attention. His well-received research had shown the benefits of bonding with pets, especially dogs, as part of a healing process. The articles had lauded the empathic abilities of canines.

He takes another sip and finishes off the espresso. Seeking advice or referrals from home is a last resort, although he considers he might have to if this doesn't work out. He's not sure who he could ask. He has kept his contact with Frederick to a minimum. Chilton has called in prescriptions for him, but Will does not appreciate the verbal acrobatics he has to perform to get them. How Chilton can remain so chatty after having facial reconstruction is a mystery. He hopes this appointment will be different.

Will doesn't have long to wait for his answer. The receptionist instructs him to walk upstairs and take the first door on his right. She tells him he should walk right in. Will climbs the steps and stands before the door. He hesitates, his hand barely touching the brass doorknob.

Come in, Will. I have been expecting you.

He turns the knob and opens the door. The office is not what he always imagines. Not even close. It is quite the opposite of Hannibal's oppressively dim yet elegantly furnished suites in Baltimore. Will takes a step into a sea of blue. His eyes are greeted by ocean colored stucco walls and large bay windows that open onto azure sky and cypress trees. A balcony, framed by expansive French doors, opens up to more clear sky. The room is fragrant with the aroma of the flowering trees outside of the windows. Will cannot place the variety, but it doesn't really matter. He is reminded of the smell of mimosa mingled with magnolia growing around his parents' first home in Louisiana.

Will sees the psychiatrist leaning over his desk against the glare of the Tuscan sun. His peripheral vision tells him that the man is tan, brown haired, and slender. He wears wire rimmed glasses. His suit is casual, he wears a simple skinny tie and the sand colored jacket and olive green trousers are clearly tailored. Will runs his hands over his own wrinkled shirt and tries to remember if he did indeed grab a fresh one this morning or if he picked one up off the floor of his rented room.

“Dr. Clayton?” Will asks still standing in the doorway. He squints in the direction of the desk, but the bursting sunlight from the open balcony behind the desk casts the doctor in silhouette.

“Hello. You must be Mr. Graham. Please…have a seat and I’ll be right with you.”

The voice is smooth, low pitched and pleasant. Will complies walking immediately toward the pair of arm chairs facing each other by the bay window. He savors the breeze and the floral aromas as he takes his seat. His energies are focused on the task before him. He sets his book bag on the beige Berber carpet and begins to mentally prepare himself for the interview that probably won’t take very long.

Will curses under his breath thinking he should have told the cab driver to wait. He tries to relax, but gives up. He occupies his restless mind by taking in the doctor’s office, his eyes recording everything he sees. His gift is relentlessly at work filling his mind with images and sensations from the vast display of objects and their particular placement in the room.

Clayton observes Will as he clicks off his e-mail and rifles around his desk for his notebook and pen. He notes his prospective patient has completely ignored the cluster of comfortable couches and coffee table that fill the room between entrance and balcony preferring the pair of chairs facing each other off to the side. He watches the young man cataloguing the contents of his office, eyes darting around with interest but Clayton recognizes learned behavior when he sees it.

This obviously troubled young man has either been trained to take inventory or he does it to cope with new surroundings. He has certainly been conditioned to assume the defensive position in the most confrontational of seating arrangements. Clayton wonders how many mental battles the young man has fought in a similar chair.

Clayton notices Will’s agitation about his clothes. Clayton has to concede that this young man is not outfitted like his usual label conscious patients and is aware of it by the way he tugs at the collar of his pale blue cotton shirt. The agitation and the tugging indicate a certain residual discomfiture left over from a childhood spent in poverty, or close to it. Deciding to make his potential patient more relaxed, he levels the playing field by removing his jacket so that he too is wearing only a cotton shirt. He hangs his jacket on the back of his chair and walks to the center of the room.

“Interesting choice, Mr. Graham. “ Clayton nods at Will but comments no further. He gestures toward the other side of the room. “But, I generally talk with patients over here.” Clayton says as he stands where he is to greet his new patient.

Will shakes his hair out of his eyes, pushes up his glasses and brushes past Clayton to the couches. He selects the closest one and sinks into it. Will knows why he sat where he did and he silently reprimands himself. Old habits die hard. He must be slipping to fall for one of the most obvious ploys from the psychologist’s community bag of tricks. He realizes he has just informed the doctor of a multitude of things about himself without even opening his mouth. Will shakes it off; nothing he can do about it now. He came here for help, after all.

Clayton notices the sunlight is hitting Will directly and crosses to the window and adjusts the blinds before he lowers himself into the arm chair adjacent to Will’s couch. He wants no external reasons for avoidance. He suspects his prospective patient has plenty of his own.

Will focuses his attention on the other open window but steals glances at Clayton's hands while he opens his notebook to a fresh blank page. His finger nails are manicured but Will notices the skin of his knuckles and palms are a little rough and the tan is genuine. These hands know toil and the outdoors.

Will also notices the pattern of roses on the tie is hand stitched pale sand colored silk on chocolate colored satin, and the white linen shirt Clayton wears is pressed so that it lay in perfect planes against Clayton's torso. His shoes are simple leather loafers; well-made and maintained but Will figures they must be a favorite pair judging by the wear on the upturned soles Will observes as Clayton crosses his legs, calf to knee. Clayton does not scream money; his style is understated and implies his affinity for the finer things.

Clayton looks Will over for a few more seconds before he speaks. He is intrigued by Graham's appearance and not a little concerned by Will's behavior. Graham's demeanor is pensive and awkward. For being as good looking as he is, there is no evidence that he suffers from vanity, and he could use a little dose of vanity. To say Mr. Graham is unkempt would be an understatement. Clayton realizes eye contact is going to prove a challenge. He knows he will be able to read this young man without the advantage that eye contact affords him, but gazing into these eyes would yield volumes.

He watches Will flinch in response to the slamming of a car door outside and the blare of the horn as the owner apparently struck the wrong button on the key fob. Clayton takes a moment to decide on an approach that won't send this skittish young man out his door.

"Comfortable?" Clayton asks.

"More or less." Will mumbles in answer. He knows he should make the effort to be more socialized but he is just so damned tired…

"Well, uh, it is customary for patients to send ahead insurance information and referrals. And preferably some kind of…"

Will produces a folder from his book bag and waves it in the air.

"…file. Thanks." Clayton finishes and reaches for the official looking and bound folder. Will sets it down on the coffee table.

"I think I'll hold on to this a little longer." Will says.

Clayton lets his eyes linger on the file a couple seconds. It is nearly an inch thick. He raises his eyes to Will's face, a face stubbornly in profile.

Will has resumed his perusal of the office, focusing on the titles in the bookcases and the choice of art prints adorning the pleasing blue stucco walls. Recognizing avoidant behavior is not difficult for Clayton, he is used to it from patients, but he is essentially being slapped in the face with avoidance right now. Graham has to know what he is doing.

Clayton remarks simply, without judgment, "Not your first rodeo, huh?"

“There’s not as much there as you think. A lot has been…redacted.” Will is staring at the bookcases, his comments to Clayton almost an aside.

“Redacted? By whom?” Clayton sees that the folder, or more accurately the binder, has been placed face down. He rephrases his inquiry. “Why was it redacted?”

“To protect the innocent.” Will says flatly.

And the dead. We cannot forget the dead, Will. How will we honor them?

Clayton hears the unmistakable regret in the words; can feel it. “Ok.” He says, “What brings you here, then?”

Will stares at the floor. His rehearsed statement seems inappropriate suddenly. This doctor feels different than the others to him. Will keeps himself closed up pretty tightly but he can sense a calm emanating from this doctor, a calm that hovers like mist around his carefully constructed defenses rather than crashing like the usual tidal wave he instinctively braces himself for. This doctor has unleashed no tidal wave; rather his presence advances then recedes, still water lapping against the banks of the moat that surrounds his fortress. Will could invite the mist in but he is not prepared to do that just yet.

It is such a relief to not feel the relentless affront, the data stream of unwanted information that comes to him unbidden, that his curiosity remains tucked away behind his fortress.

He raises his head to finally look Clayton in the face. Before he can catch himself, his eyebrows raise and his mouth opens in a silent gasp. He shuts it quickly before he says something stupid.

Clayton eases back in his chair eyeing Will. He had been wondering how long it would take for Graham to engage in more than a cursory assessment of him. He breaks into a grin as he gazes into Will’s face.

“Yeah, I noticed it, too. We uh, look a bit alike. Weird, huh?”

Will nods slowly; pleased that he is not imagining it. “More than a bit, I’d say.”

Will touches his fingers to his lips as he stares at Clayton. Try as he might, his gift fails him. The face staring back into his own is unreadable, and Will is left to relying on nothing but his own keen powers of observation to read the young doctor facing him. Will is not able to reconcile what he sees with what he feels. He’s been assuming things about Clayton, based on a visual assessment, but he doesn’t feel anything. Oddly, he feels alone.

Clayton allows Graham all the time he needs to process. Clayton welcomes the opportunity to finally observe Graham’s face the way he wants. Graham’s eyes are as beautiful as they are illuminating. In fact, Clayton finds more in the deep wells of blue than he had hoped, and then some. Clayton is not prepared for the aching in his chest or the twinge he feels like a ribbon tightening across his abdomen.

Will notes the subtle changes of expression in Clayton’s face but he does not inquire. The physical similarities between the two men are too remarkable and at the moment these have Will’s full attention.

The psychiatrist is about his age, more or less, and appears similar in height and build as he rests comfortably in his arm chair, legs crossed, tablet across his lap, and pen poised above the pristine paper. As Will's eyes pass over his features, the similarities really kick in. He has the same brown curls, styled and clipped a little shorter, but very much the same. Will observes the line of his jaw, recognizes the same penchant for stubble, but Clayton's is meticulously trimmed like a fashion accessory, quite unlike Will's own face that hasn't felt a razor in weeks. Clayton's nose is more narrow than his own; but overall Clayton's face resembles Will's own bone structure, almost a mirror image.

Almost, but for the eyes. Though he wears glasses, his are stylish bronze rimmed glasses; not the dark framed type Will favors. Beyond that, Will sees and feels the difference immediately. Clayton's eyes are clear, open, and very green. Clayton's are also bereft of the churning sea of turmoil Will often finds reflected in his own eyes. Clayton's eyes radiate a kind of tranquility that Will has not felt in a very long time and dares not dream about. If Will were to open himself to it, would he feel some measure of that peace?

Will ponders this while examining Clayton's mouth, a most expressive part of the anatomy and often a reliable indicator of the emotions and motivations percolating just beneath the surface of the words pouring out of it. Will focuses on the lips, soft, supple and shaped like his own. The lips twist a little to one side in amusement as Will lifts his eyes to meet Clayton's.

It has been a long time since Will has devoted so much time studying a face that was not in a state of decomposition. He usually does not look at a person more than a few seconds because he does not need to. Will collects his thoughts and manages to say something conversational. "You are an American, too?"

He receives a nod and another smile. Will is encouraged by the quick smiles. They seem involuntary and far from calculating.

Are you certain, Will?

"How is it you came to practice in Italy?" Will asks, trying to ignore the voice in his head.

Clayton puts the pen and notepad on the table. He gestures about the room with one hand. "That is a valid question. This practice was inherited. I am the sole managing partner here, though I keep the name of the former partner. My professional colleagues practice at two other locations. One, about ten miles west of here, and the other offices are in Rome."

"You are the only psychiatrist here?" Will is incredulous. The structure is rather large and Will cannot begin to calculate the overhead.

"Uh-huh. Early on, right after graduation and passing my boards, I came here on a trip. I fell in love with the place. Didn't want to go back. But I did. I made some contacts, put in my time for a couple years and then applied for a VISA after receiving an invitation from Vittorio Ventresca the former resident psychologist here. This was his practice until he retired two years ago."

Will was curious as to why this particular guy. What skill set did he possess that he could rise so quickly in his profession? "Why you?" Will realizes his tone too late.

Clayton's smile doesn't falter, "His practice had a particular niche he didn't know how to fill. As it turned out, I was uniquely qualified over his other colleagues to fill that niche."

"What niche would that be?"

"Treating Americans. That is why you are here? Can't relate to the Italian doctors?"

Will laughs a little and considers his own experience in the last couple weeks. He had found Italian psychiatrists no less or no more patronizing than their American versions. He had no issues with their degree of competence; he just hadn't felt comfortable, but he never felt comfortable, especially around psychiatrists. He knew they had been ill at ease with him as well. Of course, he did view things a little differently than most.

"What's the problem exactly? You're saying Italian doctors are prejudiced against Americans?"

"I wouldn't label it prejudice; but Europeans, especially those around the Mediterranean, have a different mindset. They don't get Americans. "

Will is somewhat relieved that perhaps the doctors' seeming discomfort had not been limited to him.

"Still, I wouldn't think we are so different." Will insists, getting into the conversation, "I mean, culture is not such an insurmountable obstacle to the point that you can't relate to a human being or treat a person. The human condition is universal. Psychology is universal."

Human emotions are a gift from our animal ancestors, Will.

"Very true. But, the application of universal principles still requires context. Americans are often offended by Italian mannerisms; at the very least they misinterpret them and Italians…" Clayton pauses and pours two tall glasses of water from the ice filled terra cotta pitcher on the table. "Italians find us uptight, entitled, and…well, rude."

Will suppresses a smile at this. "So, it's about keeping patients happy, you function as the cultural buffer." He looks at the sparkling glasses of water and can't decide if he's disappointed there isn't wine…

"Yeah, a sort of goodwill ambassador. I get referrals for Americans living abroad, military personnel who don't want a military consult; you know…stuff like that."

Will nods feeling slightly more relaxed than before. He picks up a glass and gulps down half of it without hesitation. The cool tingly liquid flowing down his throat feels and tastes delicious. The coolness spreads through his entire being. He gulps down the rest of the glass and wipes his mouth.

"That…" Will says pointing to the empty glass; "is the most refreshing glass of water I have ever tasted."

Clayton can't help but grin at the enthusiastic response from his otherwise reserved patient. And Clayton has decided he very much wants this Mr. Graham as a patient.

"Thanks, but I can't really take credit for nature. This is spring water from one of Rome's still functional aqueducts. Some of the drinking fountains in Rome are supplied by it. I know there's one near the Coliseum that is. It's bottled and sold locally." Clayton reaches for the pitcher. "Refill?"

Another glass of wine, Will?

"Yes, thank you." Will says, taking the glass and staring into the clear water. He drinks deeply again marveling at the crispness. Will can't help but notice that Clayton is studying him. He feels the familiar prickle up his neck that betrays his self-consciousness at being examined yet again.

Clayton is noticing Graham's pallor, the dark circles under his eyes, and other indicators of a compromised immune system. He surmises Graham is likely suffering from dehydration and doesn't even know it. This young man is so distracted and fractured that his physical wellbeing isn't even on his radar. Or he does not care. And, that is only the tip of the iceberg.

Graham has wrapped himself in a protective blanket or wall for some reason that has the effect of dampening his entire psyche. Clayton can only receive wisps of impressions about him. Clayton has no idea how Graham is able to do this, or more importantly, why he would do this. There is one thing about which Clayton is certain. Graham's blanket is effectively blocking him out. The impressions he does receive from Graham suggest the blanket covers a deep well of pain and regret.

Trauma Clayton thinks. This guy has been traumatized, he's held together solely by sheer determination. Determination was only going to get him so far. He sees Graham glance up at him from the rim of his glass and Clayton leans forward in his chair to see what Graham will do.

As he expects, Graham stays where he is, ignoring the invitation of intimacy and worse, retreating from the tenuous rapport they had just established. Clayton sees the blue eyes becoming cloudy once more. He watches as Will returns his empty glass to the table and begins to smooth his jeans with his hands closed into fists.

Well acquainted with psychiatric tricks and methods, Will instinctively crawls back inside the comfort of his own head. He feels the atmosphere contract as he does so; edginess creeping into every muscle. He forces himself to sit still. He reminds himself it is Clayton's job to analyze him. He came here voluntarily. This guy has never met him before. His experience with Lecter continues to taint every aspect of his life.

Clayton has no idea what is causing the struggle he sees playing out across Graham's face but the young man sitting across from him is struggling to maintain his composure and struggling to even remain in the room.

"Mr. Graham?" Clayton asks quietly. He waits until Will gives him his full attention. "Are you taking any medication right now?"

"Diazepam" Wills mutters. "I have headaches and generalized anxiety."

"Did you take meds today?"

"Yeah, just before I got here. Look, I know I am the one who made the appointment but I'm beginning to think I…" Will doesn't finish. He bites into his lower lip and throws his hands up in a helpless gesture that is more revealing to Clayton than anything he has done or said since he walked through the door.

"Go ahead, finish your thought." Clayton says.

"I don't want to waste your time…"

"How would helping you be a waste of my time? I am compensated almost obscenely for my time and efforts." Clayton's signature smile teases its way onto his lips. "How many?" he asks in his quiet pleasant way.

"How many what?"

"How many shrinks have you interviewed before me? This is an audition isn't it?"

Will holds up three fingers and looks away. Will doesn't know what to make of this guy. He is at once wary of his kindness yet desperate to cling to it. And how long will that kindness remain should this strangely compelling doctor glimpse the darkness Will keeps locked up inside. The void in his psyche where Clayton's emotions should be continues to puzzle Will.

Your empathy makes you unique. You are alone because you are unique. I can help you Will.

"Why didn't they make the cut?" Clayton asks though he's pretty sure that Graham's neuroses prevented any sort of productive dialogue.

"They were Italians." Will says with a straight face.

Clayton acknowledges Graham's little joke with a rap of his fingers on the arm of his chair. "Well, nice to know I have the home court advantage. Why don't you give me some idea of what I'm auditioning for?"

Clayton keeps his tone conversational but the thought of Graham as his patient makes him smile yet again. He has no illusions. If Graham can be persuaded to commit, he will prove a tough nut to crack. Clayton almost winces at his tasteless metaphor. He looks at Will.

Will takes a shaky breath. The role Clayton is auditioning for is a tough act to follow. He is auditioning to clean up Hannibal's mess. How can Will expect anyone to fill that role?

He wants relief. He wants…clarity. Lecter is always nearby whispering in his ear like a devil on his shoulder. Lecter is chipping away at his sanity and he doesn't even have to be present to do it. Will fears he will never ever get him out of his head.

Without each other, we are alone, Will.

Clayton is still sitting quietly in his chair, his eyes looking directly at Will, no…into Will. Far from feeling threatened, Will experiences a coolness run through him not unlike the luscious ripple that coursed through him when he drank the spring water. Will feels the mist descending around him again and he wants to let it inside so badly. He wants to experience this unexpected oasis of tranquility. The longing is so…visceral. Proximity to this doctor seems to arouse emotions within him he has not felt in a long time.

Will stares at his feet. He wants to look at Clayton, but he doesn't trust himself to maintain his veneer of control. He does not want to bare more than he suspects he already has. And yet, his fortress is bathed in that quiet cool mist. He wants to preserve his fortress even as the mist beckons.

We're just alike. This gives you the capacity to deceive me and be deceived by me.

“My issues are complicated, but I came here hoping that I could get some help, some guidance managing some internal struggles. I don’t…I’m not very good at making other people comfortable.”

Clayton understands and accepts Graham’s clumsy apology. “I believe it’s my job to make people comfortable.” He is pleased at the hint of a smile his comment draws from Graham. “Let’s hear the symptoms.”

“That’s a tall order, doctor. How much time do you have?” Will asks and his jaw tightens before he can stop himself. He opens his hands in frustration and closes them again. He shuts his eyes and takes a deep breath.

Clayton can tell that Graham has just about expended his inner resources for the time being. The guy looks exhausted and he was exhausted long before he walked into his office. “Tell you what. Let’s finish the audition. Without looking at your file, let me tell you what I see.”

Tell me what you see, Will.

Will raises his brows, “This should be interesting.”

Clayton resists the urge to lean forward and close the space between them. When he speaks, he is careful not to look directly at Will, he averts his gaze so that he should appear to Will to be focused on the background behind him.

“I see a young man, too young, to be carrying around the weight that you insist on managing by yourself. No one’s shoulders are that broad. You present with all the worst symptoms of PTSD. I suspect there are other symptoms I don’t know about.” Clayton pauses, swallows once and continues. “It’s as if someone or something has wounded, no…violated your psyche so profoundly that you have insulated yourself completely. The walls you have erected are so high and so thick that you can’t get out of your own head to save yourself. You… have been cut so deeply that you trust no one, not even yourself.”

Clayton pauses, and Will is convinced his eyes are wet, but he could be imagining it. As for Clayton’s assessment Will can hardly classify it as clinical. He finds himself moved by the emotion behind the man’s words, not to mention his insight. Clayton’s careful handling of him today is not lost on Will. Will does not feel like a curiosity for a change. It’s the little things that count.

Clayton shifts in his chair, a subtle alert that he intends to speak again. He fixes his gaze somewhere above Will’s head and beyond the bay windows. “I admire your determination because you do not have much else going for you right now. Whatever compels you to get up every day must be pretty powerful. And whatever it is, it is all consuming.”

Clayton had no idea how consuming. Will looks to the windows, too. “What’s my motivation?”

Most of what we do, what we believe is motivated by death, Will.

“Fear.” Clayton says. “Fear of getting too close. Fear of other people getting too close to you. But you also fear…failure, so you found the strength to drag yourself in here and I know you do not want to be here. “

Out of the corner of his eye, Clayton watches Graham place his hands in his lap, and bow his head. Clayton's words almost catch in his throat the weight of the burden Graham carries is so evident, so palpable to him.

"I have never met anyone in as much raw emotional pain as you. And I have come across some pretty tormented souls in my line of work. You, Mr. Graham take the proverbial cake."

Clayton falls silent. Will doesn't say anything either. Clayton blinks his eyes a couple times and looks away. He knows the emotional fallout he is receiving from Graham represents the merest fraction of the tempest Graham keeps locked up inside. His own empathy is heightened to a degree that his self-control is waning in Graham's presence.

Understanding begins to dawn on the horizon of Clayton's mind. Graham does not know he is twisting Clayton up in knots. He has no idea. Graham is in lock down because he is accustomed to being overwhelmed by other people. That's why he avoids eye contact. If he looks; he sees. Graham cannot bear seeing any more than he already has.

There can be no other explanation except that Graham is empathic like himself, but his empathy is different and dangerously intense, it must be, since he spends all his energy keeping himself in lock down. Should Graham decide to drop his defenses Clayton knows he will be overwhelmed. He doubts he will be able to sustain his own defenses if Graham were to release his floodgates.

Clayton does know Graham has opened up a little since arriving, whether voluntarily or not. Clayton senses the longing in Graham for contact, for understanding, but he senses bitterness and anger as well. And there is something else about Graham that Clayton finds unsettling. Graham's entire being exudes an animal-like tension. A wild thing pacing in its cage, wary and ready to strike like the predator it is. Clayton has sensed this before; in dogs.

Why Graham feels like a ticking time bomb is anybody's guess. Clayton will need to address and allay the fear first if Graham will let him. Graham's mind opens a crack and then shuts again. Clayton needs Graham to leave open a window so he can find the source of the fear that paints everything else in a tainting of rust and rot. He is incredibly resistant and as unyielding as a brick wall, but Clayton is persistent and patient. He has sensed quite a lot already, too much for an initial consultation. He gazes back at Graham sitting stiffly in the couch, mind clearly someplace else…

Will is contemplating whether or not he should trust this doctor. His mind can be a pretty fragile thing in the wrong hands. He has entrusted it to no one and has already reaped the rewards of loaning it out.

The weeks immediately following his surgery had been the worst. The things he must have said in his drugged out state of mind. The things forensics must have found at Hannibal's house and office…

Memories of those first few weeks after awakening from one nightmare into a fresh one fill Will's mind as he sits, only vaguely aware of the couch or of Clayton. The fragrance of flowers slips away, replaced by the acrid metallic odor of blood soaked kitchen floor, of blood soaked clothes being cut away in the ambulance, of blood laden nostrils struggling to breathe, and later the reeking tinges of it from his own bandages.

He remembers so many things. His refusal to cooperate or discuss any of it with any of the doctors or investigators the FBI paraded through his hospital room, or rather his cell with the police detachment for his safety. The near tantrum he had thrown when they wouldn't let him leave. The near total meltdown upon coming home, to his house in Wolf Trap, to find his entire life had been pulled apart and rummaged through like some garage sale by the FBI. He had sobbed for hours while he had cleaned, before falling exhausted on his stripped mattress, alone, without even the company of his dogs. No one had thought to tidy up poor Will Graham's house for his homecoming.

That was because there was no one left. No one except Hannibal. And Jack. Again.

He has already spent months, lonely and exhausting months sorting through the mess of tangled emotions within in his self-imposed total isolation. The problem is his own judgment has been compromised in the wake of the battle being waged in his mind. He knows who he is, but he feels his tether to reality becoming taut, and the impulse to let it snap is strong.

Adapt…evolve…become… A place for Abigail could be made in your world… I gave you a gift Will, but you did not want it.

Clayton clears his throat. He watches Graham blink his eyes and return to the room. Where ever he went, Clayton is sure that it is never far away. Graham spends a lot of time there. Clayton resumes his analysis of Graham, his would be patient.

"You dwell in a dark place that…you cannot or dare not share with anyone and no matter how awful it is you remain trapped in it because the walls you have built keep you there. You believe you deserve to be there. I would very much like to help you climb out if you will let me." He says, his gaze directed at the open window where sunlight and warmth exist seemingly just out of reach.

I am your friend, Will. Let me help you…We are alone without each other.

Will decides he has been alone with Dr. Lecter too long. Hannibal Lecter is not sitting beside him. This is an entirely different person. Will finds him…interesting.

Will also finds himself dumbfounded. If Clayton has never met anyone like Will, Will has never met anyone like Clayton. That this doctor can read him is quite unbelievable. Will is aware of how closed off he is, how insulated he has become, yet this doctor has been able to intuit more about him in a few minutes than anyone he knows, well, almost anyone. And above all else, Clayton is correct about the singular reason he is sitting here right now. If Will cannot find a way to manage his mind, he will never find Lecter, let alone resist him.

The room seems to vibrate, the walls ripple like waves. Will feels the mist gently but persistently seeking ingress; widening a fissure in his mind he did not know was there, not to exploit, but to deliver the balm Will believes it to possess. The balm he needs to heal. Will decides to trust his instincts.

Will's fingers trace the edges of his bound file. His heartbeat is steady and his breaths are even. He is not feeling conflicted, there is no heat running up his neck or chills creeping down his spine. He feels calm as he pushes his file across the table so that it rests in front of Clayton. He rises from his seat, more steadily than he thought himself capable.

"After you read this, you may change your mind. But congratulations, you passed the audition."

Clayton looks up at him and can't hide the pleased expression he knows sits squarely on his face. He is further gratified to find Graham's somber blue eyes wide and filled with warmth. Was that hope behind the storm?

"My cell is listed there on the front." Will says as he turns to go.

"Thanks. I'll be in touch." Clayton rises from his seat, but Graham has already reached the door. Clayton watches him leave shutting the door behind him.

Later, in the taxi ride back to his rental, Will thinks about his meeting with Clayton. More specifically, he wonders how Clayton deduced so much. Will is the empath. He's the one who feels so much that people don't even need to be alive or present for him to become overwhelmed with their motives, passions, and darkest desires. The empathy transforms him; his empathy does not project onto other people. Is that even possible?

The driver left Will off hours ago yet he cannot sleep. He tosses and turns and finally gives up. It is 2:35 in the morning. He fumbles out of bed, kicking the sheet and blanket he had thrown off hours ago out of his way. It's humid even with the air conditioning so the boxers feel just fine. He wheels the chair out from the computer desk and begins to go through his files. He clicks on the evidence files he has created for the recent unsolved cases in the country. Will selected the cases because they seemed irregular in some way and he has begun the tedious process of reviewing each of them, one by one.

It takes a lot time to sort through each case file, but all Will has is time. He clicks on the next file; a photo of Winston pops up on the screen instead. Will pauses rather than clicking on the file he meant to be looking at. Will stares at the picture of his canine companion, a candid of his favorite furry stray sitting on Will's front porch in Wolf Trap, tongue hanging out, eyes trained on Will taking the picture. Will swallows and feels his heart clench in his chest. His eyes sting as he touches the image on the screen with his fingers. His nose itches suddenly and he rubs it impatiently.

He clicks the picture off and selects the file he was looking for but it sits there forgotten. Will stares out the window into the Tuscan countryside beneath the stars. Will isn't looking into the Tuscan night; he is home, in Wolf Trap, before...

Will crawls into bed before dawn, his eyes burning from staring into the computer. He falls asleep quickly, his body like lead upon the mattress. Soon, he is walking through a forest. It is misty and quiet, strangely quiet for a forest. As Will wades through the underbrush, ducking the low limbs of trees, he notices he has been here in this forest before. He knows he is nearing the stream, his stream. He slows his walk, unsure of what he will find if he keeps walking.

The mist around him is thicker. He can no longer see the trees ahead. Something moves in the mist behind him. He turns around but not quickly enough to see it although he hears the crack of branches and he's not sure, but he thinks he hears a snort, like a horse. No, not a horse, a deer…a stag.

Will freezes as a swarm of flies whirls around in a vortex, collecting itself into a ball then a shape. Will watches as the dense mass transforms into the ravenstag of his dreams. He invariably backs away, wondering why the magnificent beast has returned. Will watched it gasp its last breath on the blood drenched floor of Hannibal's kitchen. Its muscles ripple beneath the thick black fur along its back, feathers fan across its hind quarters and its neck, framing its elegant head like a mane as it waves its antlers at him in the moonlight.

The stag turns gracefully and faces Will. Rather than charge him, the stag rears up on its hind legs, its glossy fur and feathers writhe like Medusa's tendrils. From out of the mist and tangle of trees Will hears a low guttural growl. A white wolf leaps out and lands directly in front of the stag, a sleek coil of fur and teeth. It does not move though the ravenstag's hooves flail to the earth inches from its nose. The ravenstag shudders.

Light and shadow play across the ravenstag as it begins to turn white, tail first, the milky color overtaking the stag like liquid frost.

When at last the antlers are frosty white; the stag lunges at Will. Will barely has time to think before he is tumbling backward, landing in snow but freefalling through it as the ravenstag's hooves pass overhead, disintegrating into mist then snowflakes that descend upon Will as he falls deeper and deeper into the snow.

Will slams back into his bed and awakens clutching his sheet on either side. He takes a couple gulps of air and smiles. For once, his T-shirt is dry and his body and bed are not drenched in sweat. He thinks of the snow, the mist, the wolf, and the white ravenstag.

Notes:
Title: Hindu fable The Brahmin and the Mongoose illustrates the danger of acting in haste. It is a tale of mistakes, misattribution, and wrongful death. This line occurs near the end of the story, after all the unfortunate events have culminated in the death of the mongoose.
Most Italicized quotes from Hannibal that Will hears in his head are from dialogue lifted directly from the series, but I improvised when needed with the intent of keeping the spirit of the series.
All other italicized quotes remembered by characters in this story are lifted from actual dialogue when possible.
Any quotes from literary sources are identified within the text.
The name Hannibal chooses to use in Florence, Boucher, is French for butcher.
Majolica refers to highly decorated and glazed earthen ware pottery made in Italy.
Ancient Greeks portrayed Eros as a capricious god, sometimes cruel and powerful enough that even the other gods would fall under his spell. He carried both gold and lead tipped arrows. The gold bestowed love, while the lead repelled love. Later, the Romans began to portray Eros as the child Cupid we know.

_________________Chapter 2___________________

Clayton reads Will’s file and Will inadvertently inserts himself into a murder investigation. Not a good idea…

Four days later, Graham’s file still rests on Clayton’s night stand. Not because he wants it there. William Graham will not answer his phone, nor will he return his messages. Clayton does not believe he has been excessive in leaving messages. He has left only two. He checks his cell constantly, hoping he has switched it to silent by accident, but the ring is set on high.

Every evening since his encounter with Graham, Clayton has driven home to his house in Fiesole, an ancient town nestled among the hills on the outskirts of Florence, away from the crowds and unrelenting vendors. And every evening he sips coffee from atop his patio overlooking the Arno Valley and all of Florence as the last rays of sunlight pass over the gleaming cross of the dome atop the Basilica di Santa Maria del Fiore wondering why he has not heard from Graham. He finds his confidence is beginning to wane tonight. Surely there had been a connection between them. He had felt it. How could Graham ignore it?

Later, he pets his dog's ears absently, stroking behind her ears and massaging the thick black fur of her neck while she lies next to him in the bed Clayton acknowledges is more hers than his. He doesn't mind though. Cara as he calls her has been his constant companion since he brought her home from the shelter almost four years ago, almost as long as his other dog lying on the rug beside the bed. Five year old Belladonna, a black and white mutt, probably lab and collie mix, rolls her head and gazes at Clayton. He leans down to pet her as well.

"Sorry girls, it's not lights out yet." Bella yawns and Cara huffs into the blankets. He sits in bed with his laptop feeling its weight and warmth on his legs, and although he has plenty of work he could be doing, he feels no desire whatever to actually upset the screensaver.

His thoughts turn back to Graham, as they have frequently since meeting him. Clayton tries to ameliorate his misgivings about not hearing from Graham. He tells himself it's nothing personal, that Graham simply is not good at or especially particular about keeping or making contact with other people. There was a lot, however, that Clayton needed to talk to him about.

Graham had not been exaggerating about the degree of redaction in his file. There must have been an awful lot of innocents needing protecting. Still, Clayton has surmised that his initial analysis had merit. Graham is most certainly suffering from trauma complicated by a rare "gift" of pure empathy. Clayton is sure that Graham does not view his empathic ability as a gift. Clayton can identify with Graham to a degree. His own empathic gift is much more manageable.

Clayton has never met anyone with Graham's mental wiring. Graham's mind worked in ways that were impossible to catalogue let alone predict. He doubts Graham can explain it himself, but Clayton figures that Graham often finds himself wondering why other people can't see what is perfectly obvious to him.

Graham suffers from what Clayton recognizes as a heightened cognitive empathy, the ability to assume the perspective of another. Graham was evidently exceptionally “gifted”, going beyond assuming perspectives straight to adopting them. He had apparently adopted the identities of criminals and psychopaths in order to help the FBI catch them. Graham must have been a most valuable asset in the field, a profiler able to put himself in the minds of the killers he was tasked with capturing.

At least until something had gone dreadfully wrong, and the hunter identified too closely with his prey. All manner of mayhem appeared to have ensued, the details carefully obscured behind euphemisms apparently coded for the initiated few with the requisite clearance. Clayton had gathered that Graham had been granted an indefinite leave of absence, charges of accessory to entrapment and murder suspended, pending a further investigation of…whatever it was that had gone down.

The lack of information in the file did not frustrate Clayton as much as the lack of medical and psychological records on Graham. Even the evaluation that had kept Graham from becoming a proper FBI agent had been alluded to but not included. Page after page of clinical notes from his stay at the Baltimore State Hospital for the Criminally Insane had been reduced to snippets of the same redundant phrases. He dismissed Frederick Chilton’s comments on principle. Preening peacock, Clayton had rolled his eyes. The names of the other contributing psychiatrists had been redacted but their comments were all the same. Dissociative Identity, paranoia, acute generalized depression, and the list went on. Clayton sadly noted there was not even a hint of compassion in the diagnoses of the “subject”.

Clayton cannot believe the absence of medical history on Graham. There was virtually nothing from his most recent hospital stay. This particular stay had apparently been the straw that broke the FBI’s back with regard to Graham.

Graham had been stabbed in the line of duty, nearly eviscerated; organs remarkably spared though there had been a substantial amount of blood loss. He had been kept under observation for several weeks before being released. A waiver had been signed by Graham indicating that he left against the attending doctors’ instructions. Clayton remembers the sharp twinge of pain he felt at the office and understands that though the wound has healed on Graham’s body; the wound left in his mind has not.

Graham refused to participate in any psychiatric therapy and was completely uncooperative with both FBI personnel about the investigation and with attempts to engage or otherwise evaluate him in any clinical way except to treat his injury. Clayton notes this information is included as an addendum in a transparent effort to exonerate both the FBI and the mental health division of the hospital. The entire assessment of Graham is, to put it mildly, unkind.

Graham’s status as “Special Agent” had been largely fabricated by one Jack Crawford. This Jack Crawford appeared prominently in all the reports and his signature graced nearly every piece of paper in the file. As head of the BAU, he had apparently overstepped his authority on more than a few occasions, but especially where Graham was concerned, and was no doubt under investigation along with his prized profiler.

The follow up searches he had performed on the internet had not been entirely fruitless, but the pickings were meager. The FBI had effectively kept the media in the dark. There was no way Clayton could piece together events based on newspaper articles from Baltimore or D.C. Clayton was out of his element in this sort of thing. He simply did not have the time to cross reference all the articles. More to the point, he had no law enforcement background, no legal training. His formal education had supplied him with the requisite tools to excel in his field of expertise, but not in the capacity of detective or criminal profiler.

And then his search had stumbled upon some blog called Tattle Crime. Clayton had spent nearly all night reading the gossip columns of one Freddie Lounds. No redactions there and a plethora of material had been nestled in the archives; at least some of the articles. Article after article came up listed as no longer available. The FBI had essentially rendered the site worthless.

Some earlier articles remained however. The Minnesota Shrike and the Chesapeake Ripper were only the most notorious of the serial killers with whom Will Graham was familiar. Clayton had been shocked to learn that Graham had been indicted and tried for murder. The charges had been withdrawn and the details on that were murky, but the murders were related to the Shrike and the Ripper. Graham had at least been exonerated.

Graham's incarceration and trial had received special attention from Lounds. Lounds had accused Graham of being a psychopathic serial killer. She had said as much on the witness stand, along with, no surprise, Chilton. Mr. Graham had certainly rubbed her the wrong way. And Graham apparently had no affection for her either.

Clayton had laughed out loud at some of Graham's comments to her. Although Graham's favorite response had been to tell Lounds to fuck off in some fashion or other, Clayton had found one nugget especially revealing.

"It's not very smart to piss off the guy who thinks about killing people for a living."

But at some point, Lounds' articles about Graham had stopped suddenly. She had been writing a series of articles speculating on the real Chesapeake Ripper, apparently several people had been investigated, when she had disappeared and been believed dead, perhaps by the Ripper himself. Her blog had taken a hiatus of almost three months during which time her whereabouts were unknown. When her blog resumed, Lounds disclosed nothing in that regard. There had been no more mentions of the Ripper, Graham, or anyone else related to the FBI investigation.

Her book deal with Abigail Hobbs, daughter of the Minnesota Shrike, was as dead as the daughter, whose body had finally been found; the details in the report removed with surgical precision. Graham must have been affected by that outcome if only because he had saved the girl from her father, but knowing Graham, his involvement with Abigail would have been deeply emotional.

Clayton noted that visitors to the blog site had been diminishing over the last year. The site was active, Lounds still posted material and responded to questions, but Baltimore was currently a pretty dull place. Lounds' day in the sun was evidently fading fast.

Clayton had read until his eyes stung so badly he was forced to shut off the computer and go to bed. It was at that point that Clayton realized he was treating a celebrity of the darkest kind. That was two nights ago.

The last couple of days had sped by; he barely remembered talking with his patients. He had cancelled his last two appointments this afternoon because he was simply too distracted to pay attention to them. He told himself he was doing them a favor since the patient notes he had taken were filled with doodles and nearly incomprehensible. He had thrown them in the trash and hoped nothing important had come up during any of the sessions. Graham's arrival had thrown his practice into disarray in a matter of days.

Clayton picks up the file and decides to peruse it one more time. Even though it had been carefully pieced together to provide the broadest of interpretations, Clayton is hopeful he will find something inadvertently left untouched by the insidious black marker. He promises himself he will try Graham again only after he has finished reading. He glances out his bedroom window, sees the lights of Florence that shimmer across the valley below and wonders what Graham is doing on this warm Tuscan night.

Less than half a mile from the west bank of the Arno, Will circles the perimeter of what will soon be a major crime scene. He knows a police entourage when he sees one, and though the local LEOs are trying to keep their presence under wraps, it is blatantly obvious to the trained eye that any minute now this entire area is going to be cordoned off. Will chooses his vantage point and settles in among the trees and shrubs that shroud him in darkness.

Will has made a few contacts during his time in Florence, contacts that do not mind allowing him access to internal memos and communications of the Firenze Police Department. Like their American counterparts, Italian police officers were not above accepting gifts and bribes to supplement meager salaries. Will has found Italian police particularly receptive to bribes, some expecting the practice as an inevitable courtesy.

Almost any information could be obtained for the right price. Mason Verger's immense fortune and influence had been greasing Will's way for several months. Now that Will was in the Florentine Province of Tuscany, Verger's clout really kicked in. Tuscany was of course where his wonderful flesh eating pigs were nurtured and raised. Will had in his employ, two of Verger's most trusted confidents, a brother and sister who ironically, doted on each other in a way Will found just south of unhealthy.

What they did when he wasn't around was none of his business. His association with them was nominal and they were efficient. He is in this location thanks to their persistence this evening. Will had received a call from Lucia earlier about the police presence south of the Palazzo Pitti which was barely a ten minute walk from Will's rented room. According to Lucia, the body might be missing organs. She had not been able to be specific about which organs, but there was some drama attached to the corpse, some staging that seemed to indicate the killer had gone beyond the mundane.

Her brother, Luciano, had already insinuated himself back at the police precinct, to await the return of the detectives and officers once the scene had wrapped up, and the body on its way to the coroner. He would gather what information he could, and report it to Graham.

Will had been about to call Clayton when Lucia called. Will had been meaning to return his messages, but time seemed to get away from him when he was focused as he was now. What Will wanted was to get close enough to profile the crime scene, his way. He has had to resort to long range surveillance in order to observe. He prefers the risk of physically being here to look at the crime scene rather than visualize through photos. Photos are extremely difficult to procure anyway.

He sits crouched in shadow with high powered binoculars to his eyes, scanning the area while it remains relatively empty of cops and crime scene investigators. He is relieved that the police have followed protocols and the scene appears pristine. At last, he has a clear line to the victim. Will braces himself, observing each precious detail before he lets the killer into his mind.

A trail of votive candles, burnt down low now, illuminates a path through the moonless night leading to the display. Several sets of footprints denote a struggle. The body rests in rigor on a simple bench, leaning against the cement wall behind it. Freshly clipped tree branches lay upon the blood soaked ground framing the body on either side. They have fallen from their perch beneath the victim to join the pile of trimmings; the sprigs of green betray the killer's haste in making due with found objects in the area. The killer did not come fully prepared, but he came prepared enough. There is a message here.

As Will catalogues every nuance his mind begins to recreate the moments before the victim sees his killer… Will hits record, and speaks quietly into his phone.

"I have followed him to this place, this grotto hidden off the beaten path. This place shields him from prying mortal eyes so he can revel in what he does in private. I have been dreaming about this moment for a long time.

"I take him from behind so that his prize can squirm away. I do not need to tell him to leave. The prize stumbles away, I do not know where. I do not care. My eyes do not wander from my target. He knows me. And he knows why I am here.

"The killing and subsequent evisceration are brutal. I am ecstatic and highly aroused. Blood sprays against the concrete walls from the well-aimed slash that opens his neck exposing and effectively severing the carotid. I watch him bleed out in my arms. When I am satisfied that his eyes are empty of life, I gut him with one stroke.

"Viscera explode from the gaping wound; a grotesque bouquet of entrails cascades to the ground from the single incision I make from sternum to pelvis. His trousers and soiled underclothes are gathered around his feet. While this display is humiliating, I am not finished. I place tree branches beneath his arms to prop them up so that they fold across his chest in a mockery of supplication. I make sure his eyes are turned upward to the heavens and his tongue protrudes from his mouth as he awaits the communion wafer that I place on his tongue.

"This is my design…"

"Ay!" The clipped cry intrudes upon the blissful silence in Will's mind.

Will is shaken from his trance by a rough shove to his shoulder. Someone is speaking to him in Italian and he sounds angry. Will stumbles forward, catches himself and stands upright. He has the presence of mind to click off the recorder. He stands clenching the phone, unable to understand the words but he doesn't need to. The police officer has his pistol leveled at Will's head.

The cop realizes Will is not a local. The scruffy looking guy looks American considering his frumpy clothes. Americans had no fashion sense whatsoever and this guy…just when he thought American's couldn't dress any worse. He doesn't appear to be homeless. He is at least washed up and his clothes are clean. He is relieved the guy has enough sense to raise his hands in surrender. He holsters his weapon, seeing that another officer has taken position behind the odd young man holding the phone. He huffs his passable English at Will, his huge hand reaches for Will's phone.

"Give me that! And show me some identification."

Will feels the phone vibrating in his hand. He glances at the screen, sees it is Clayton calling. He ignores the outstretched hand of the cop and fingers the button that will accept the call. He places Clayton on speaker and closes his fingers around his phone.

"I am an American citizen and I do not have to give you my phone." Will says, "I have done nothing wrong."

"We'll see about that. What is your name? Let's see your American ID, and your American passport…" The cop again reaches for the phone and Will places it in the front pocket of his jeans just far enough that it won't fall out. He hopes Clayton can still hear him.

The cop throws Will a dirty look. "Ay! You think I won't take it from you there?"

"I think you'll have a tough time getting it from there."

"Little prick. ID, now!"

Will reaches around to his back pocket and produces his wallet. He slowly opens it and shows his Virginia driver's license to the irritated cop. The cop is unimpressed.

"And your passport?"

"It's in my room."

"Ok. What are you doing here, Mr. Graham? This is a crime scene and you have just become a suspect…unless you can convince me otherwise."

"I'd like to know how I'm a suspect. Given the victim over there, I should be covered in blood."

Another cop, one with a detective badge, joins them. The two Italians converse quickly, leaving Will out in the cold. Will observes another detective, a woman, dark-haired, slim, and rather attractive though she wears no make-up, not even lipstick.

The woman pauses and halts in her tracks as she approaches the other two. She looks to Will and back to her companions. Will's Italian is not good enough to follow the rapid conversation but he can tell it is not good. There seems to be some discussion about what exactly to do with him.

The woman joins the discussion, nodding at Will as she speaks. She pulls out her phone and appears to be looking up something. Will decides to use the opportunity to take Clayton's call.

"Dr. Clayton? You still there?"

"Oh yeah…" comes Clayton's voice, "It would seem I've caught you at a bad time."

Will finds the unexpected humor welcome and somehow appropriate. "Did you catch enough to know what is going on?"

"I think so. Where are the cops now?"

"About fifteen feet away from me, deciding what to do, I guess."

"Where are you?" Clayton asks.

Will gives him the location and explains that he walked there from his room. He waits for a reprimand that doesn't come. Instead, Clayton says, "I can be there in less than a half hour…"

"Oh, wait, hold on a sec…" Will watches the cops advance toward him.

"We think we would like you to take a little ride with us back to the precinct. We can talk there." The first cop says.

"Who are you talking to? Didn't he tell you to give him your phone?" The other cop, the detective, says as he reaches for the phone at Will's ear. Will steps back keeping the phone where it is.

"Will?" Clayton's use of his given name causes Will to smile for a second. Hearing it from him seems perfectly natural, as though Clayton has always addressed him this way. "Is there anything I can do to mitigate circumstances in a professional capacity?" Clayton says.

"You might, yes. What did you have in mind?"

"Tell them you have your psychiatrist on the line. Leave the rest to me."

"I don't have much of a choice do I?"

"Not really, but it's your call." Clayton's voice is calming and unhurried. Will instinctively trusts this voice.

Will offers up his phone to the detective. "It's my psychiatrist. I think you should talk to him. Would you do that, please?"

The detective takes the phone from Will's hand, keeping an eye on him as he speaks into the receiver. The conversation is in Italian, so Will looks around while the detective speaks to Clayton. Will notices the woman detective observing him while stealing glances at her phone. Will decides this is probably not a good thing. If he could kick himself, he would have done so several times by now.

The detective shuffles back over to Will. He hands Will his phone, almost kindly. "Detective D'Angelo will escort you to the van over there. You can wait with her until your psychiatrist arrives. He says he can be here in about twenty minutes. You should have said you were under supervised care."

Will wonders what Clayton said to him. He quickly decides he does not care so long as he can avoid a trip to the precinct to answer unwanted questions. D'Angelo motions for Will to follow her. She leads him away from the scene and over to the police van.

"So, you like crime scenes do you? I like them so much I follow the cases of American killers, too. America has a lot of serial killers." She says; her accent thick and her voice like syrup.

Will looks blandly at her and looks away. He is not going to have a conversation with her. But D'Angelo is not deterred by Will's lack of response.

"I have heard of you, Mr. Graham. Would you like to tell me what you were doing here at my crime scene?" She walks to stand in front of Will, looks directly into Will's eyes. She is clearly the subordinate here, but Will sees no point in antagonizing her. Will averts his eyes from her gaze, focusing on the scene in the distance but not before noticing the probing brown eyes beneath thick lashes.

“No, I would not.” He says, putting his hands in his pockets.

“Who sent you?”

“Nobody sent me.”

“What are you doing here in Florence?”

“I would rather wait until my psychiatrist arrives.”

“Of course. Being under a doctor’s care must be very familiar to you.”

Will winces but remains quiet. The minutes pass slowly and Will feels her gaze even as he steadfastly looks across the yard. The scene swarms with people and Will feels the tug of D”Angelo’s presence at his side. She resents having to stand here with him. She would rather be at the scene.

“You saw everything didn’t you?” she asks.

Will does not answer. He shifts his weight, rolls his shoulders. He checks his watch. It has been close to twenty minutes already.

“Tell me what you think.” She prods him with her voice. “What did you see?”

Will looks at her sideways. She is looking up at the night sky, her fingers play with the necklace at her throat. The gleam of a silver cross catches the light of the street lamp and the glow of the lights from the crime scene. She’s Italian; of course she is wearing a crucifix. He feels her eyes upon him again.

“I’ll keep what you say between us.” she says. “What are you looking for?”

“I think my psychiatrist is here.” Will says.

Will watches a burgundy Mercedes pull up; a very classy coupe. Clayton emerges from the vehicle after shutting off the ignition. He is wearing loafers without socks, jeans, and a black Polo shirt. He walks briskly toward Will and D’Angelo.

He offers his hand and she takes it, dropping it almost instantly. D’Angelo stares him up and down. Clayton ignores her and turns to Will. “Hey, I’m so glad I got a hold of you. You don’t remember how you got here, do you?”

Will understands immediately that he should agree. He rolls his eyes as though thinking and then shakes his head.

“You…are his psychiatrist?” D’Angelo asks, looking first at Clayton, then back to Will. Her eyebrows furrow in a way that suggest she is more than a little doubtful.

“What else would I be?” Clayton smiles at her, thumbs in his belt loops and head cocked to one side. Will stands quietly, tongue between his teeth so he doesn’t smile at Clayton’s handling of the detective.

She opens her mouth to speak, but is interrupted by her partner, the detective who had talked to Clayton earlier. He takes Clayton's outstretched hand and shakes it vigorously. "Buonasera!" he says.

"Detective Ruggerio." Clayton says. It is clear the two men know each other. Will does not miss the roll of D'Angelo's eyes or the tightness around her mouth.

"Dr. Clayton. How good to see you again. So, Mr. Graham is your patient?" He takes Clayton's arm and begins to lead him away from the van, and D'Angelo. Will sees her stiffen and hears the unmistakable sigh of irritation at being left out. Will figures being a woman detective in Italy must be challenging if not incredibly frustrating.

The rest of Clayton's conversation with the detective is in Italian. Clayton smiles and nods and the two of them walk a little further away. After a few moments, the two men are shaking hands again and Will notices that Clayton has fished his wallet from his jeans and slipped something to the detective who has palmed it quickly, his hand disappearing into the inside of his blazer.

Clayton and Ruggerio rejoin Will and the clearly annoyed D'Angelo back at the van. Clayton gives D'Angelo a cursory nod and looks to Will. Ruggerio's hands smooth his jacket as he also looks at Will.

"You are free to go, Mr. Graham. Let's be more careful about our meds in the future. Your doctor states your change of medication has caused you some disorientation." Ruggerio says.

Will runs his hand through his hair absently. "I suppose that's one way of putting it." Will looks to Clayton then back to Ruggerio. "I apologize for my intrusion…"

"Forget it, this time. Don't let me see you poking around crime scenes again. This isn't the U.S., or the FBI." Ruggerio turns to Clayton. "Take him out of here and get his meds straight. I've got work to do and this is going to be a long night…"

Ruggerio looks to D'Angelo. "What are you waiting for? Let's go."

D'Angelo takes one more long and penetrating look at Clayton and Will before turning on her heels and falling in with Ruggerio. Clayton watches them for a couple seconds.

Clayton glances at his watch. "Well, it's nearly ten, did you eat today?"

Will is caught off-guard by the question. He tries to remember when he last ate something.

"You didn't, did you?" Clayton shakes his head. "I know a place near here. We can get something and you can tell me about your adventure this evening. How about that?"

Will concedes he owes Clayton and was planning on talking to him anyway. He is not tired even though the hour is late and he could definitely eat something. As they climb into Clayton's car, Will asks, "Did you bribe him just now?"

"Sure did. That's how we do business, at least until we don't. I'm sure you can appreciate that if there is a next time, money will not do the trick."

"How much…" Will pauses, considering the awkwardness of the situation.

"Don't worry about it. I'll put it on your bill if it makes you feel better." Clayton flashes another of his signature smiles. Will feels his lips curl into a smile as he clicks his safety belt into place. His sigh this time is not so much in resignation as it is relief.

Chapter End Notes

Dr. Clayton's offices are in Florence. He lives in Fiesole, a small town north east of Florence located in the hills so that you can actually look down on the entire city of Florence. Fiesole is beautiful and even has ruins and a museum. It is less than ten miles from Florence in Tuscany.

Will's temporary residence is southwest of Clayton's residence. The crime scene is located off the west bank of the Arno near the Palazzo Pitti.

Firenze is Italian for Florence

____________________Chapter 3_______________________

Will and Dr. Clayton establish some boundaries.

Less than an hour later, Will sits across from Clayton in downtown Florence. They are dining al fresco, and though the daytime crowds have thinned considerably, flocks of tourists still pass them by eating gelato and sipping cappuccino.

Clayton is finishing off his veal Piccata while Will stares at his empty plate of shrimp scampi. He barely remembers eating it. He had somehow managed to fill his empty stomach without wolfing down the entire meal in one gulp. He tells himself he has to stop skipping meals. He pours himself a few swallows from the bottle of Pinot Grigio and offers the remainder to Clayton. Clayton nods as Will empties the wine into his glass.

Will knows their conversation about Italian cuisine and wine has run its course. Any second now, Clayton will start grilling him about this evening. Will does not want to talk about it, but he knows he must. He had recorded himself for Clayton's benefit, but is now reconsidering if he should share his methods with his psychiatrist. And Clayton is his psychiatrist. The events of this evening have pretty much sealed the deal.

And yet, Will still has his reservations. He has not discussed the recent events to anyone outside the close knit circle of his former colleagues, not one word. Freddy Lounds does not count. He feels like he is breaking some confidence, some secret oath in revealing the details of this nightmare that has eclipsed everything else in his life to an outsider. Will does not remember being so indecisive and he does not like how often he finds himself second guessing his own decisions.

Clayton has been watching Will stare into his wine glass. He feels the anxiety coming off Will in waves as he weighs and ponders what he is about to discuss. He knows he must be careful with Graham so that their conversation does not become an interrogation, or at least feel that way to his patient.

“I’m going to order some coffee since I have to drive back to Fiesole, but I understand if you don’t want to be up all night.”

“Fiesole is not that far. Why would you order coffee? It’s nearly eleven now.”

“Because I’m not leaving yet. And neither are you.” Clayton leans back in his chair and pushes his plate away.

“No, I guess I’m not. I’ll have coffee, too.” Will swirls his wine around, watching the pale liquid catch the light from the scented candle. “Where would you like to begin?”

“With the most obvious question. But, Will, we’re just having a conversation. This is not a formal session. I am not taking notes; we just shared a pleasant meal…”

“You just bribed a cop to scuttle me away from a crime scene…” Will says, like it happened every day.

“I probably just saved your ass from a visit to a sanitarium. You can’t be doing this. You at least have to tell me what is going on. What were you doing there?”

Will places his hands on the table, folds them together and hangs his head. Clayton is right about the sanitarium. He’d have been lucky with a seventy-two hour observation and plane ticket home. And to top it off, as far as Will had been able to tell, no organs had been missing from the victim. The gutting had left the organs to spill out all over the ground, but Will is certain no trophies had been taken. The man had been left more or less whole to meet his maker, albeit without the original wrapping intact. Clayton is waiting for an answer.

“You read my file, didn’t you? Then you know what I was doing there.” Will stares at his napkin, at the stains upon the white crumpled surface. His mind is still at the crime scene…processing. Something about the wafer is familiar.

“All right. Why were you profiling that crime scene? You weren’t consulting, so what are you investigating…on your own?” Clayton holds up two fingers to the waiter who is clearing their plates. The waiter gathers up the clutter and asks if they want cappuccino. After checking with Will, Clayton nods.

“I am looking for a serial killer who fled the U.S. I needed to know if tonight’s homicide was one of his.”

“The Chesapeake Ripper.” Clayton pauses, and Will nods.

“You supplemented your reading.” Will says.

“Uh-huh.” Clayton asks, “Have the Italian authorities been alerted to this Ripper?”

“Yes and no. Not by me. The locals and Interpol have access to the FBI’s most wanted list same as in the states. Their databases will get an alert if anything they put in matches. I tracked him here, to Italy anyway. I am thinking he could be in Florence itself.”

“Why Florence?”

“I follow the evidence, analyze patterns, extrapolate, deduce. I have contacts with access to data bases, other agencies…”

“You must have some great contacts. That kind of digging is not cheap nor is it readily available to civilians. And you are not currently working for the FBI, are you?”

“No, I’m not. You read I am on indefinite leave, and without my salary. I have a private benefactor if you will.”

“This private benefactor knows about your uh, file?”

Will stifles a laugh. “Oh, Dr. Clayton, he’s one of those redacted names in the file. He considers me a perfect fit for the job and he won’t question the expense if that’s what you mean.”

“It wasn’t; but never mind. I guess you answered my question. Is the FBI still looking for the Ripper?”

“Not as actively as they were. As you’ve likely surmised, things got ugly, people made mistakes, and he managed to escape the country. The dust still hasn’t settled…”

Ashes to ashes, dust to dust… God is beyond measure in wonton malice and matchless in his irony, Will.

“This is personal, isn’t it?” Clayton asks thinking of the wound Graham sustained in the attempt.

“For me or for my benefactor?”

“Probably both of you. The Ripper did something to him and he ripped your stomach open, didn’t he? Did you approach the benefactor, or did he approach you?”

“We have a mutual interest in catching the Ripper.” Will agrees, as he keeps his eyes trained on the greasy napkins and table. “My benefactor does not want to work with the FBI.”

“What is it he hired you to do, exactly?” Clayton realizes this smacks of a private vendetta.

“I don’t think that information is relevant to my therapy.” Will glances up to see the waiter approaching balancing the tray on his fingertips.

“Really. And I don’t think I should let you decide what is relevant to your therapy. You are aware of the concept of confidentiality.” Clayton removes his hands from the table so the waiter can serve their cappuccinos. Both men fall silent until the waiter has finished and walked away.

Clayton lifts his cup to his nose and sniffs at the generous dusting of cinnamon on the froth. “Will, why are you reluctant to be honest with me?”

“Withholding things is not the same as lying, Dr. Clayton.”

Clayton chuckles and shakes his head, “Splitting hairs now, huh? I did not accuse you of lying. Lying is specific, dishonesty can take many forms. And we were doing so well.” Clayton sips at his beverage and looks out into the street.

Will rubs at his face. Clayton is right, of course, but Clayton is also blissfully ignorant of this twisted tale of torture and death. Explaining any one part of it will only lead to explaining more, and then more. Will looks at Clayton as he watches the people walking past. Will is aware Clayton is giving him time to rethink his position.

Will is also aware that this young doctor is woefully unacquainted with the world Will exists in. He has probably treated some sick and deranged people, but Will is certain that nothing Clayton has encountered so far could possibly prepare him for the multiple pathologies presented by the Vergers, Hobbs, Gideon, Lecter, or even Will himself. Will does not even know where he would begin should he begin.

Will shifts his feet beneath the table. What he needs is to get out of his own head. He needs to throw his ball of crazy against a solid and trustworthy wall, one that won't crumble with the first salvo, or the subsequent ones. He feels like Clayton could be this wall.

Clayton may be innocent, but he is strong minded and smart. Will can sense that. Will was innocent once, too. But once those scales fall from Clayton's eyes he will never see the world, or Will, the same way again. Bringing Clayton into Will's vortex of depravity and dysfunction will shatter his innocence. Will can't protect him and Will does not know if he can live with that. But for now, they are just talking.

"Dr. Clayton." Will says as he stares into his cup.

"Mr. Graham." Clayton says giving Will his full attention and gracing him with another of his smiles. There is so much confidence in that smile. Will hopes that confidence is as warranted as he wants to believe it is.

Will grins at Clayton despite the mad thoughts running around his head. Will thinks he has smiled more at this table this evening than he has in months and the thought scatters his remaining doubts about bringing Clayton into his confidence. Clayton will just have to agree to Will's terms.

"I have very good reasons for not disclosing certain things to you. There's a reason that file is redacted. And you have every reason to expect that I disclose the information regardless. I will make a deal with you." Quid pro quos always seem to appeal to psychiatrists…

"I'm listening." Clayton says as his fingers trace the lip of his cup.

"I will answer all of your questions…eventually. There has to be an order, a sequence. You will not be able to digest all of it at once. I hardly know where to start."

"The beginning is where I would start. Your first contact with the Ripper."

"Well, that was a complicated encounter and requires context. You should know a little more about me first. My benefactor came late to the party so, this question about him…it can wait, trust me."

Clayton looks at Will in silence for a long moment. He knows Graham's offer is genuine. At his core, Graham is a decent and honorable man. But, a lot has happened to him and Clayton recognizes that qualities like decency and honor have been cast aside or at least suspended occasionally to allow him to do his job, and he has had to live with his actions. Clayton decides that allowing Graham to create his own framework will help him to recall, restructure, and re-evaluate the events that have led him here. This approach will also foster the trust Clayton knows is so difficult for Graham to give.

"I do trust you, Will. Like I said before, in my office, I know you do not want to be here…in therapy, but you understand that you need some help. I need to know what you have been through so that together, we can ascertain what it is that you need and…if I am qualified to provide it. So, I accept your judgment about how to present information to me. This is good, establishing boundaries and rules. Since I have no idea what the sequence should be, I will understand if you choose not to answer a question. I will write it down and save it for another time. Sound fair?"

"So far, so good." Will feels like a child making deals with his dad, but he does need to control the flow of information somehow. Once Clayton begins to understand the horrible scope of the devastated landscape Will has to describe to him, Will is confident that Clayton will appreciate his approach. "Any burning questions right now?"

"Since it is late, and I did say this was not a formal session, I have two questions for you this evening, then, I'll take you to your place."

"Ok."

"First question, which may have follow up questions, and they don't count because they would be related. Right?" A hint of a smile tugs at Clayton's lips. His tone is serious, but his eyes are playful, seeking confirmation from Will while teasing him at the same time.

Will smiles broadly, laughs and ducks his head. Conversation with Clayton doesn't feel like the chore it often is, the onerous task he must engage in to keep up the appearance of being socialized. There is no mouse and no cat. Talking with Clayton is actually pleasant. He settles in his chair and faces Clayton once again.

"As long as the questions are intended to clarify; they don't count." Will says evenly. "Carefully covering your bases, aren't you, doctor?"

"With you? Absolutely. I get the feeling you have played this game many times, and played it well."

"Are we playing a game?"

"For most of my patients, therapy is not a game. But for you…yes, it is very much a game. Your knowledge base about psychology is so vast yet your interaction with the psychiatric community has been so…clumsy I think is the word I would use, that you compulsively pick apart the process and undermine the therapist, and ultimately the therapy."

"Ouch." Will says. "You don't mince words do you?"

"Not with you. You don't strike me as the type who wants or needs ice cream with his cake."

"No, I don't. I don't really like cake."

"You are very meat and potatoes." Clayton lifts his head and his smile disappears. "I can only imagine how many times you have been poked and prodded in the patient's chair. I would be lying if I told you I did not find you fascinating, but I have no intention of publishing any papers about you. I only need to get inside your head as a healer."

"I appreciate the words, I really do."

"But you've been screwed before, I get it. I know of Dr. Chilton and his methods. I've actually met him. His name was one of the few in the file if you were wondering, but I know he works in the Baltimore area and he would have been drawn to you like a bee to honey. Even I wouldn't let that moron near my head."

If Will didn't already like Clayton, he did now. Unfortunately, Chilton was not the psychiatrist whose screwing had caused Will to become unhinged. The topic of Lecter was indefinitely on hold. Will turns his attention back to Clayton.

"I agree Chilton shouldn't be allowed anywhere near living things. The man can wilt a flower with his charm alone. And I am not surprised you did a little homework." Will pauses, wondering how much homework Clayton has had time for. His failure to mention Chilton's brief notoriety as the Chesapeake Ripper is strange.

"I believe you mean well, Dr. Clayton. I wouldn't be sitting here otherwise. Rest assured I do not think that your intentions are…self-aggrandizing. "

"Even though I've written exclusively about empathy? I'm sure you did some homework, too."

Will smiles. "Empathy with animals. Your saving grace."

Clayton allows a broad grin to spread across his face. He should have recognized Graham would have an affinity for pets. He could revisit that topic later. He found his thoughts meandering when he spoke with Graham and he was not used to allowing his patients so much latitude at this stage. He did want to make certain that Graham understood his intentions and expectations regarding his tenure as his attending therapist.

"Hopefully, I have more than one saving grace with you. I have not, and I will not lie to you. I will never engage in any treatment without your knowledge or consent. My primary goals at this stage of your therapy are to establish boundaries, which we are doing, and to create a climate of trust. Without those two things, nothing else we do will be productive."

"Can I get that in writing?" Will says with a straight face.

Clayton laughs again. It is a throaty warm sound and Will decides he enjoys making Clayton laugh. Clayton gulps down the last of his cappuccino. "I like you, Will, despite yourself. I'll have it framed if you want."

"Oh, just notarized will be sufficient." Will says as Clayton chuckles again. Will turns his cup around on the saucer a few times. "Ok. We cleared the air, so get on with your question. I'd like to get back sometime tonight."

"I want to understand how your empathy works. Use tonight's crime scene as a specific example. How do you know, without any forensic evidence to speak of, how can you possibly know if the homicide you looked at earlier is or is not your killer?"

"It's that gift of pure empathy you read about in the file. I can think like the killer."

"Yes, that would be the short answer. How does that work at a crime scene? How does it help you think like someone?"

"You did read the file?" Wills asks again. "How does it say I do it?"

“The file gives a very generic description; and it was written by someone who can only guess how your mind works. Your empathy operates on a level beyond anything I have encountered. If you essentially can become these killers, see things the way they do then you allow yourself to be transformed by your own empathy. And you do it knowing full well how traumatic it is for you to do so.”

“I did, yes.” Will says feeling vaguely annoyed by Clayton’s scolding.

“And despite how damaging it is to your mind, you did it again this evening.” Clayton ignores the twisting of lips and the blank stare.

“Yes.” Hands open in a helpless gesture as Will reclines further into his seat. Will wonders how Clayton will feel when Will tells him that this evening’s crime scene did not bother him at all. He empathized with the killer; he did not sympathize with the victim.

“Was it worth it? Is the homicide this evening the work of your Ripper?”

“No. It is someone else. Probably a one-time thing. This was…very specific rage directed at an individual in a very specific way.”

“I don’t understand. Every murder is specific, isn’t it? How do you see the killer in the method?”

Clayton is asking all the right questions. He demonstrates an intuitive logic toward forensic analysis. Will is not surprised that Clayton is intuitive and intelligent. He does not doubt that Clayton is far more intuitive and intelligent than he lets on. Will attributes this to modesty rather than manipulation. Although, Will knows that Clayton must be capable of that, too.

“I’ll try to explain. Even to someone without the arguable benefits of my gift, there are certain attributes of any crime that point to motive, method, and means. A trained profiler can read these attributes, these accidental or not so accidental mementoes like personality traits…and they are as revealing as the physical evidence from the lab.”

“But attributes are more open to interpretation than the evidence in the lab.”

“Very much so. You understand what a killer’s signature is?”

“Yes. It’s his peculiar thing. Something he compulsively does, each and every time.”

“And signatures can be faked, or copied. I have been able so far to tell the difference.”

“No wonder you are such an asset. The FBI’s bloodhound. You still haven’t explained how you do it. You are describing standard procedures.”

Will nods; pushes his napkin around the table. “Many profilers are instinctive and very good at their jobs. I don’t just identify his signature, I understand it, too. Understand its expression within the context of the crime; see the intended meaning…the irony or the beauty of it. See the entire scene, the tableau as it were, as the work of art or theatre he means it to be.” Will swallows, but his throat is dry. He quickly locates his glass of melted ice and takes a gulp.

“You are able to reimagine the crime. You can re-enact every detail. You become the killer for a few minutes.” Clayton is staring at Will across the table. He is chilled by thought that this seemingly disconnected and aloof young man has essentially killed many, many times and in many, many cruel and inventive ways. Never mind that the killing was all in his head. Yet, here he sits quietly describing his ability as though discussing a composition. In a way, Clayton supposes he is.

“Did you see the body this evening?” Will asks him abruptly.

“No… The area was all blocked off by the time I arrived. You must have watched them cover everything up.”

“I guess I did. I was looking, but I was lost in my own thoughts.” Will stares into his empty cup. “Anyway, it’s probably better that you didn’t actually see it. That sort of thing really sticks with you.”

Clayton nods in agreement. Will Graham is testament enough to that statement. “If I had seen the body, seen it as you do; what would I have seen?”

“How did I know it wasn’t the Ripper? It didn’t fit the profile I already have of him. This murder was done by someone with deeply religious convictions despite their act of murder. The killer may have believed he was acting in God’s name. At any rate, it was done in deference to God. The Ripper emulates God, is adept at evoking the idea of God, but he operates independent from God, never as a supplicant.”

I don’t pray. I’ve not been bothered by any considerations of deity other than to recognize my own modest actions pale beside those of god.

“You know him very well, don’t you? How many crime scenes of his did you…profile?”

Will meets Clayton’s eyes. “Too many.” Will knows the file contains no names. Neither does it disclose Hannibal Lecter’s profession or hobbies… Will decides that information can also wait. He also decides to volunteer his recording.

“I did record myself tonight. I haven’t had a chance to play it back…”

“You recorded your profiling routine?” Clayton asks leaning forward.

Will likes the term routine. He had never thought of his ability as a routine, but the process was the same every time; a routine he performed as compulsively as any other disorder.

“Yeah, it’s saved on my phone.” Will pauses, “Would you like me to send it to you or wait?”

“Good question. What do you want to do?”

“I think listening to it in your office would be best. Is tomorrow ok? I know I haven’t set up any regular appointments.”

“In your case, I am amenable to a more fluid arrangement. We can schedule a regular weekly session, but I will accommodate you as my calendar allows should that be insufficient.

“Very gracious of you.”

“You suspect my motives, don’t you?”

“Can’t help it. But that’s on me, not you. I am fine with that arrangement. Seems I have a history of unorthodox relationships with psychiatrists.” Will mentally kicks himself.

Clayton feels the alarm rising in Graham. Clayton figures something he just said has triggered it. He makes a mental note and does not comment. “If you want to come by my office tomorrow, four o’clock would work. My last appointment is at three.” Clayton leans in a little closer. “You won’t erase it, or otherwise…lose it between now and tomorrow?”

“Here, I’ll send it now. You promise not to listen until I arrive. Deal?”

“Deal. And thank you, Will.”

Will shrugs off the sudden warmth Clayton’s voice engenders. “What is your other question? That is, if I have sufficiently answered your first question.”

Clayton glances at his watch. “This should be an easy one. What do you think you need from me?”

“I’ll give you a basic answer for now. My fear of failure as you astutely called it; is the main reason for seeking your services. My various neuroses and conditions can cause periods of instability. I can’t afford to become unstable while I work in a foreign country. I need…a counterweight, an anchor, and you have agreed to be my anchor.”

“That is very basic.” Clayton agrees. “But, I think you are being as honest as you can, for now.”

Will returns his gaze but says nothing. His challenge is a gentle one, but a challenge nonetheless. Clayton is satisfied with the progress this evening.

“I guess we’re done here, if you are ready to go. And thank you for a very interesting evening.”

Will rubs his nose and pushes up his glasses. “It was educational wasn’t it?”

“Oh, I just got my feet wet tonight. I imagine I’ll be swimming in your pool soon enough.”

Clayton smiles and walks to the bar where the register and their waiter await. The restaurant is clearly empty and the kitchen is dark.

“Bring your life jacket.” Will mutters as he watches Clayton settle up with the waiter.

__________________________Chapter 4___________________________

Hannibal and Bedelia have a date by the fountain. Will shows Dr. Clayton how an empathic profiler sees a crime scene.

The Fountain of Neptune is not as grand as it seems in photographs, yet Bedelia Du Maurier sits enrapt of the smooth marble figures surrounding her, classically nude, wet and perfect as they have been for centuries. She sips at her iced coffee in the Piazza della Signoria, and considers feeding the pigeons the rest of her pastry, but decides her fingers will get sticky and she has no more napkins.

"Dr. Du Maurier, the Tuscan sun agrees with you." A familiar voice speaks to her as his shadow covers her discarded indulgence.

Bedelia lifts her head so she can peer at Hannibal Lecter from beneath the stone washed grey sun hat that sits primly but fashionably to the side. Her blonde hair sweeps her shoulders and tumbles down her back as she leans away from the glare of afternoon sun to have a better look. Hannibal's person suit is in fine form today. He hardly looks like the man he was a year ago.

The flaxen locks are now brown, a honey brown that compliments his complexion, bronzed by the sun. He is trimmer though his upper body swells with the muscle concealed beneath the crisp white shirt and pale yellow linen blazer, perfectly pressed as are the cocoa colored trousers that fit snugly accentuating equally muscular legs. His expression however, is unreadable as always. The sunglasses do not help.

Hannibal never tires of Du Maurier's mannequin like facial expressions. She presents as a fragile porcelain doll but she is anything but. Her eyes sweep over him and Hannibal notices her appraisal is favorable. Du Maurier is nothing if not a sensualist, very much like himself.

"How nice to see you, Hannibal, or should I say, Victor. The sun appears to agree with you, as well. Have you taken to swimming outside?"

"I have. The climate this time of year warms the swimming pool to the perfect temperature. And of course, the aroma of a gym cannot compare to my botanical garden. I trust you find your current residence as much a sanctuary as I find mine?"

"Sanctuary is a curious choice of metaphor for a home."

"Could another word be more appropriate?"

"Not at all. Your choice suggests retreat. Have you finally retreated, Hannibal?"

"We have both retreated from the world we knew and created a new life here. My home has become a sanctuary of sorts, hasn't yours?"

"Sanctuary is derived from sanctuarium and is a place or container for keeping things. Are you keeping things in or keeping things out?"

"An interesting question. One we can discuss over dinner. Do we have a reservation today?"

"Our reservation is for four o'clock. I know you prefer evening meals, and I appreciate that you arranged your schedule to accommodate mine. We have plenty of time to walk to Via Ghebellina."

"Ah, an exquisite choice. I have not been to Enotecha Pinchiorri since we arrived. Is this a special occasion?"

"An anniversary of sorts. Can you guess which one?"

"There are so many. Let me think."

Hannibal tilts his chin up as he walks, Du Maurier walks beside him and he takes her arm in his. He allows the aroma of her perfume to infiltrate his senses and he knows instantly what she is celebrating today. He is touched and somewhat surprised that she would choose to commemorate this particular anniversary after all this time.

"You were wearing that same fragrance when we met. You wore it later…in the guest house."

"And I wore it every day thereafter." Du Maurier says; her voice more seductive than usual.

"Until the day you did not." The words are spoken softly, almost wistfully, if one did not know him better.

Du Maurier does know him better and marvels at how convincing he is.

"Well, that is an anniversary of another kind. I have rediscovered a certain…fondness for this fragrance and…" there is a tremulous quiver in the exhale of her breath, "…for the memories it summons."

Hannibal is quiet. He wonders what prompted her rediscovery and her fondness. He is certain she will tell him over dinner, whether she intends to, or not. In the meantime, they will enjoy wine from one of the finest cellars in Europe. He lifts her hand to his lips as they walk arm in arm, just another lovely couple in a lovely Tuscan city, on a lovely summer day.

Wills sits with one leg leaning against the coffee table in Clayton's office. He is wearing fresh clothes today, jeans again and a thin pin striped lavender and white shirt. He slept in this morning, and feels better for it. He has even eaten lunch today. He doesn't want to be chided by Clayton, even though he sort of likes it.

Clayton is dressed casually professional, beige trousers, slim leather belt, pea green shirt and a silk paisley tie complete the relaxed retro look he seems to embody quite effortlessly. Clayton showed his last patient the door several minutes ago. Clayton is telling his receptionist and the rest of his staff downstairs that they can leave for the day.

Clayton noticed Will's improved appearance immediately, but did not comment on it thinking it might embarrass him. Will seemed to have a confused reaction to kindness when it was extended and until Clayton can identify the reason for that, he prefers to keep compliments to a minimum. Will's expressive blue eyes give Clayton pause often enough as it is without having to worry about the other less than professional responses those eyes and that face arouse in him.

"Doesn't she usually work until six?" Will asks. "Don't they all?"

Clayton loosens his tie as he speaks, "Yes, but I don't know what to expect once we get into this. We will be discussing crime scenes and your involvement in them. I think privacy is warranted, don't you?"

"I guess so. I'm not really the usual day at the office sort of patient am I?" Will watches Clayton remove his tie; toss it across the leather chair behind his desk, and cross the room while unbuttoning the top buttons of his shirt. He has once again adjusted his attire to convey equivalence rather than disparity.

Clayton smiles and eases into the couch adjacent to Will's. He would like to sit beside Will but he knows Will is not ready for that much intimacy yet.

"What am I about to listen to?" Clayton has set his notepad and pen on the table, preferring to write his observations rather than record. He has always taken his own notes, finding that listening to recorded sessions is not only tedious but redundant. His impressions while the person is sitting in the room with him have proven much more reliable.

Will takes a deep breath and lets it out slowly. "I have just observed the scene, taking it in as any profiler would. I look at all the physical evidence before me." Will describes the scene to Clayton who remains silent the entire time.

"Ok." Clayton says, "I think I have a pretty good picture of the scene and the deceased. Now what happens?"

"I close my eyes and allow all the images to kind of rearrange themselves in my mind. It's like I am transported into another plane of existence. I remove the evidence of the crime piece by piece until I can visualize the crime from the beginning. At that point I can see the scene clean, as it was before the crime. "You have assumed the perspective of the killer."

"Yes. What you are about to listen to, is what I feel and see from that perspective." Will clicks a button on his phone and listens to a voice that he recognizes as his own, but he hears a tremor of excitement and satisfaction to it that Will does not recall having at the time. He does not dare look into Clayton's expectant face.

Clayton feels a shudder of anticipation as the sound of Will's voice fills the quiet of the room. Clayton is aware of nothing else as he listens to a killer speak through the mind of the man seated next to him.

He glances at Will. He is leaning forward, elbows on knees, chin on hands, his eyes closed. Clayton continues to watch him as he listens.

Clayton is astonished by both the casual disregard for life and by the preciseness of the violent imagery Will has chosen to employ in his description. Clayton realizes that the killer's intentions and feelings are being filtered through Will. There is eloquence in the narration. Will is translating for the killer, and in doing so, is elevating his act of violence to callous and sparse poetry. Will has given voice to the unspoken intent of the killer.

Clayton wonders if each memory haunts him. Clayton cannot imagine how many ghosts roam around his fortress, assaulting him even in his dreams.

"This is my design…Ay! Como…"

Will shuts off the phone. Clayton shakes himself into the present. "You didn't think about that, compose or edit that in any way?"

Will shakes his head. "I usually just think it to myself. I've only recorded myself once before, partly to see if I could talk out loud during… and partly to make sure that what I saw, what I felt was real."

"Do you still have that one?"

"No. I didn't want to keep it. It was a long time ago it seems…" Will drifts off into his head again. Time is something Will can never get back. So many things he would do differently given the chance…If he had known about Abigail, would he even be here now?

Should the universe contract, should time reverse…

"Will?" Clayton speaks gently and with a blink of his eyes, Will is back in the moment. "Do the killers leave once you let them in?"

"Leave?"

"Yeah, leave your head. Is your mind a revolving door or a repository?"

"I can think about several crime scenes and profiles at the same time. But, there's usually only one killer at a time…"

"You know that's not what I mean. Can you get them out or are they always with you once you let them in? Like the killer the other night…is he still in there?"

"No. Oh, no. I guess that would concern you."

"A little.

"Dr. Clayton, I only think like them, I do not become them." Will feels shame at his lie. His half-truth. Deceit has become so easy for him. But honesty, pure honesty is so difficult, and costly.

Adapt…evolve…become. You are becoming, Will…

"But you do." Clayton insists. "For a very short duration, your empathy…it allows you to assume their perspective. You speak in first person, Will. It's like a demonic possession."

"You're saying I need an exorcism now?" Will laughs. Clayton actually feels foolish.

"That did sound ridiculous, but you know what I mean. You knowingly adopt the persona. You identify so closely that even your narrative reflects the killer's mindset."

"His feelings; my vocabulary. I don't channel them like some medium with a crystal ball. What's the big deal?" The clipped retort spills out before Will can edit it.

Clayton has already resigned himself to ignoring Will's abrasive tone and paying attention to the actual words instead. This is how Will expresses himself and it is not going to change. It is who he is. One of Will's defense mechanisms is rudeness. It likely works most of the time.

"It's not like putting on a hat and then taking it off, right? I just listened to you talk as the killer, but you see it, too. You see it through his eyes; you act it out in your mind like an actor in a play only this is much more visceral. You can't tell me there isn't some residual…"

it harder imagining the thrill somebody else feels killing now that you've done it yourself?

"There is." Will says cutting him off. "I can empathize so completely that I have a difficult time differentiating my emotions from theirs."

"And has that always been the case, or just since the Ripper?"

"That's a curious question, Dr. Clayton."

"Questions are the expression of curiosity. I don't play softball, Will. I don't need to be a shrink to figure out whose ballpark you are playing in. Your empathy has always had an emotional cost attached to it, but it is the Ripper who has caused you to question yourself. Caused you to question who you are."

"You're not playing hardball either." Will manages a weak smile. "I've been subjected to much worse, believe me."

Clayton returns the smile. "At least you are playing ball. It's a start."

Clayton does not doubt Will has been subjected to much worse. After reading what Graham has been through, he has reached the conclusion that Will Graham is a surprisingly resourceful and resilient man. He is far from frail, either physically or mentally. If there is anything fragile about him, Clayton imagines it would be his soul.

"Will, you understand your own mind better than anyone else. You have survived this long on your own and you are resilient in light of what you have exposed yourself to. In spite of what has been done to you. In order for me to help, I need to separate what's been done with what naturally occurs."

Wills nods. Clayton makes a good point. "I get into the minds of killers as easily as I get into anyone's head. What I find, what I extrapolate with my empathy is ugly, dark, and though I used to feel repulsed and upset by it, my experience with the Ripper has changed me."

"What upsets you now?"

"That I can identify with the darkness. It frightens me that I understand it. There were events that triggered feelings and knowledge I didn't know I had, or refused to acknowledge. I don't know anymore."

"This is good. This is the reason you are here, isn't it?"

"Partly." Will looks around the room, his expression grim. "It is the reason from which all the other reasons spring."

"You've never allowed anyone to analyze you about this, have you?"

Will thinks the word allow is inaccurate, at best. He knows Clayton means in a professional capacity. In that context, he can freely omit Lecter.

"Never, except by Dr. Chilton. I know…Frederick of all people. But there were circumstances that caused me to make a deal. I agreed to be examined by him, take any and all the evaluations and tests he wanted in exchange for a favor."

"This was during your, uh, stay at the Baltimore State Hospital."

"My incarceration at the Hospital for the Criminally Insane. You can say it."

Clayton's eyes falter for a second but Will tracks his gaze and pulls him back into his sea of churning blue. Clayton licks his lips and presses on. Will can clearly engage when he wants to.

"What was the diagnosis?" Clayton maintains the eye contact with Will for as long as Will can stand it. Will drops his eyes, looks aside.

"We started some tests but we never finished. He never delivered on the favor. I was released soon after." Will picks at a stray fiber on the arm of the couch.

"So, any results were inconclusive?"

"Oh, results were very conclusive, for him." Will says with unrestrained sarcasm.

"This is one of those questions that can wait, huh?"

Will raises his eyebrows and nods his head. Memories of his sodium amytal induced session with Chilton flood his consciousness. Will remembers listening to music amidst a barrage of flashing light in Lecter's office. The vision spills into Clayton's office, superimposed over the blue walls and Berber carpet.

Hannibal is pressing a notebook into his hands. Will holds a pen awkwardly as he draws a clock, disoriented by the soft clicking sound of the light that flashes relentlessly into his retinas. Hannibal's face looms closer and thin soft lips touch his own. He feels warm moist breath as Hannibal speaks to him. Will lets the notebook slide from his fingers. He feels Hannibal's fingers slip over his scalp gently twining around locks of his hair.

Will opens his eyes, blinks several times.

Clayton is staring at him. "You weren't here just now, were you?"

Will shakes his head. "Repeat your question." He says simply. To his relief, Clayton lets his lapse of consciousness go without comment. He does notice that Clayton has written extensively in his notepad.

"When you profile a crime scene, you are essentially alone?" Clayton asks him.

We are, each of us alone without the other…

"Right. Everyone clears out so I can…do my thing…" Will rolls his arms in the air as though he has just finished a performance.

Clayton sees Will is trying to make light but his awareness of being different is painfully apparent. He must feel like a walking talking freak show even among his colleagues. A twinge tightens within Clayton's chest again as though the bitter smile on Will's face had sent it there.

Will feels the mist enveloping him again. The mist descends upon his fortress in a shroud of snowflakes. Will sits upright, his memory grasping at images from a dream. Mist and snowflakes, wolf and stag…

"Will?" Clayton's voice interrupts his thoughts. "Will…where did you go just now?"

"I uh…doesn't matter." The white stag leaping over him in a sea of snowflakes plays over in his mind joined by swirling glasses of wine in Lecter's office and the most recent missive from Jack while the crime scene of last night has been simmering just beneath all that. Something about the wafer…

Will's mind feels more scrambled than usual. His inability to profile Clayton is puzzling. Will pushes an errant lock of hair impatiently from his forehead. It falls back into his eyes almost immediately. Will makes a mental note to get a haircut. He wonders how long it will grow before he is annoyed enough to actually follow through.

Talking with Will makes Clayton feel like tossing the mental roadmap he had in mind for today out the window. It seems like they keep taking detours and Clayton gets the feeling that Will is light years ahead of him. He imagines Will processes a multitude of impressions, ideas, and memories all at once and is restricted by Clayton's ability to ask but one question at time. Will's responses cause Clayton to keep changing lanes and direction. He's not sure of the destination anymore.

“We’ve been talking a while. I need a break. Are you ok or have you had enough for today?”

Will looks at his watch, considers Clayton’s question. There is nowhere he has to be. He likes talking to Clayton. He likes being with Clayton which is a first. Will hasn’t particularly liked being with anyone in a while. He not only likes being with Clayton, he wants to be here. The alternative is going back to his place, alone. And he knows he does not want to do that.

Yet, he feels edgy. He does not want Clayton’s office to feel like a cage and though he has been comfortable with Clayton, he would not characterize his feelings as enjoyment, a break actually sounds good.

“Sounds good. I will leave my four o’clock open for you if that works for you.”

“It does.” Will does not associate therapy with daylight, but change has to be good.

“Can we talk tomorrow then?” Clayton asks, sounding hopeful.

“Sure. Maybe you should write your questions down first and then you wouldn’t get off track so easily.” Will smiles as he shuts the door behind him leaving Clayton reclining in his couch, fingers to lips deep in thought.

Chapter 5

Chapter Summary

Hannibal and Du Maurier take their positions on the chess board while Will discovers his psychiatrist is also empathic. He's not sure if this is a good thing...

Will's thoughts are piling on top of each other and he walks around the room, his hands gesturing as quickly as the words flow. "I am not bombarded with images from you at all. In fact, you barely register. You're not… readable like other people."
"You can't profile me." Clayton says.
"No, I can't. It's like you have forts of your own." Will keeps his distance from Clayton's couch. Will senses that mist hovering nearby. It has been there the entire time, lingering just beyond his reach.

Chapter 5

Hannibal plays chess with Du Maurier and Will learns his psychiatrist also has empathy issues.

Hannibal wipes the rich rose colored satin napkin delicately across his sensitive lips savoring the luxuriousness of the sensation as the coating of wine disappears into the fabric. He notes he can barely see the stain upon the napkin. Clever, he thinks.

Du Maurier has just returned from the ladies' room and is ruffling through her sequined Versace clutch. Their decadent repast has already been cleared from the tastefully decorated table. Only the hand dipped candles, the amphora containing fragrant buds of sweet pea, and their crystal wine goblets remain. The placement of the pair of wine goblets upon the pale pink tablecloth reminds Hannibal of chess pieces facing off. Which pieces precisely, he is not sure.

As his eyes roam over Du Maurier's carefully drawn features, he supposes chess pieces are exactly what the two of them have become. And most of the other pieces have already been removed from the board. Of all the varied topics and couched innuendo the two of them have discussed, dissected and exchanged over their leisurely meal, none has provided Hannibal with a clue as to the source of her sudden desire to resuscitate their former partnership.

Except for the things left unspoken. Hannibal smiles at Du Maurier across the table as he lifts his goblet to his lips and silently thinks one word: check. She has exposed herself as Hannibal knew she would. The question remains if the exposure is deliberate or accidental.

One singular thing left unspoken screams volumes to Hannibal in its absence. The subject of one Will Graham has been curiously absent from conversation all afternoon. Du Maurier has not directly spoken of him, nor alluded to him. Her implied warnings, embedded in the metaphors that characterize her speech, regarding the disastrous consequences of Hannibal's unresolved and unrequited preoccupations with his former protégé are constant. She has picked at the scab left by Will's betrayal relentlessly. But Will has escaped mention today. A most telling omission considering she is usually unfailingly circumspect in their games of chess.

Hannibal thinks that perhaps the omission of Graham is deliberate. This is yet another method to assess the depths of his obsession, as she refers to Graham. She is far too familiar with Hannibal not to notice his frequent retreats into his memory palace and Hannibal has become annoyed of her knowing glances and half smiles. He is more annoyed with himself however. The ennui that has descended is all pervasive, even his appetite has been affected and that has never happened before.

Hannibal considers it is entirely possible that she has tired of pressing him on the matter and has decided to make amends by offering a reprieve from her constant scrutiny. She clearly desires to alter their current arrangement, to rekindle their former and more intimate arrangement. But to what end?

Du Maurier's handling of Hannibal is warm yet calculating in its seduction. And Hannibal has no doubts that this is a seduction. Her outfit is breathtaking, and she wears it flawlessly, shamelessly and sensually. She is a vision of sophistication, vulnerability, and loveliness. Her meticulously choreographed performance this afternoon has included literature, poetry, opera, even history but she has deftly abjured from her usual recriminations. Usually, Du Maurier cannot resist veering into Hannibal's sacred temple where his beloved Will resides.

Hannibal cannot believe she has given up. It is possible she has grown tired of competing with a memory for Hannibal's attention. If she is sincere about rediscovering her latent fondness and the clearly romantic aspirations she has been intimating all afternoon, avoiding the topic of Will Graham would be in her best interest. Of all the things Du Maurier has become, she remains a woman. His interest in Graham must…Hannibal nearly lets slip a smile…drive her nuts.

Hannibal had lost tabs on Will some time ago. Will had been released from the psychiatric care facility, observations and evaluations had been imposed by the FBI, but ultimately even their hold on Graham had scattered like insects under the microscope of official scrutiny. His residence in Wolf Trap was still registered in his name, taxes paid, utilities and grounds cared for, but Graham himself had slid off the grid, his whereabouts unknown.

That Jack had not bled to death had been a surprise to Hannibal. Death had come knocking and Jack must have decided something was worth living for. Jack Crawford was busily rehabilitating his career, but he might have had enough remaining clout to get Will into some sort of protective custody arrangement, to keep him close. To keep him safe. Then again, Uncle Jack might very well be as mystified as to Will's whereabouts as Hannibal.

Jack had recovered in time to bury his dear departed Bella earlier this year. Will Graham had not attended her funeral. How ironic that Hannibal had ended up in the very place Jack had wanted to take Bella before she succumbed to her cancer. God could be very cruel.

But where was Will? His precious Will might have become unraveled in the wake of the devastating aftermath of their last encounter. So many pieces to pick up from the shattered tea cup.

The image of Will; bloodied and pale, his body racked with sobs, his wonderful beautiful mind unable to absorb the shock of the carnage wrought by Hannibal's own hand and his own misguided betrayal was a recurring and bittersweet memory. A shameful waste of what could have been. And yet, Hannibal held out hope that his pupil could still learn from his hard won survival lesson.

One thing was perfectly clear to Hannibal. Du Maurier believed that Hannibal's interest in Will Graham was unwise; that his obsession with Graham would be his undoing. But the undoing would be Will's and it was Hannibal's to relish, not hers. Will held the promise of a perfect ruination, an opportunity for destruction, and out of that destruction; creation, another becoming. He had torn Will down before. It was necessary to break him again so his instincts, urges and true nature could at last be untethered from his teetering pillar of morality, a tether he clung to even as it unraveled in his hands.

Hannibal imagined Will, his Will, finally transformed through this last and most brutal fall from grace; emerging as either a worthy adversary, exquisite and awful in his majesty or a companion, equally exquisite and awful. If an adversary Hannibal would see Will vanquished, devoured, and enshrined. But, as a companion, and this Hannibal wanted above all else…Will would be loved as Hannibal had loved no other.

Du Maurier sits observing Hannibal closely, allows her eyes to soften as she rolls the magnificent ruby encrusted gold ring around her slender finger.

"Penny for your thoughts?" she says softly, leaning forward just a little to infer deference.

Hannibal smiles slowly as he gestures to the nearly empty wine goblets. "I was considering another bottle; or perhaps cognac if you prefer?"

"It's a bit warm for cognac, but…" Du Maurier's perfectly French manicured nails circle the rim of her goblet, "another bottle of this sublime chianti would be most welcome, beside a pool and a garden?"

"You have somehow managed to fit a swimsuit in there?" He nods at the clutch on the table.

"I should think a suit superfluous at this juncture." she purrs.

Hannibal is amused by the double entendre and intrigued by the flirting. He is happy to extend their game of chess a little longer, especially if it provides such an enjoyable distraction. Distraction is clearly Du Maurier's game, but precisely what is he being distracted from?

"Shall I call a cab?" Hannibal says motioning for the waiter standing attentively nearby.

Du Maurier signs the tab and gracefully slides from beneath the table, sundress slipping over sensuously shaped thighs and calves. Du Maurier is counting on her charms. She has spent many hours at the gym and the spa refining her assets. She is certain Hannibal will not refuse such an appetizing offering of flesh to satiate his carnal desires.

This evening could be the first of many, a declaration of her willingness to resume a life together, a future, freed of their respective pasts if only Hannibal will let his past fade away. She cannot allow Hannibal to indulge his sentimental notions about his obsession, no matter how unspeakably beautiful and damaged he is. To allow Hannibal a consummation of this dangerous liaison will mean the end for at least one of them, perhaps both. Du Maurier would prefer Hannibal at her side, but she wants her Hannibal, not the one still pining for Will Graham.

Will arrives to his four o'clock appointment on time. This afternoon, the receptionist waves him up the stairs and Will climbs the steps in a good mood. He wears a pale yellow shirt and brown Levis that hang off his hips a little despite the leather belt.

He greets Clayton as he enters the sunlit room. The fragrance of perfume fills his nose. Will deduces his last patient must have just left through the back stairs. Not being a connoisseur of women's perfumes, the name of the scent escapes him, but Will does find this fragrance familiar although he cannot place on exactly who it was he remembers wearing it.

Clayton has already informed his staff they could leave for the day. He prefers to leave Will's sessions open ended and uninterrupted. His staff can also be nosey, and Will invites a lot of speculation.

"How are you feeling today, Will."

"I feel ok, Dr. Clayton." Will says, stretching his arms over his head.

"There's a fridge over there," Clayton gestures across the room indicating a small faux wood mini-fridge recessed in the wall. "We can start whenever you are ready."

He selects an iced tea and walks over to the wall of bookcases as Clayton settles on the couches. The remains of Clayton's iced cappuccino and his notepad sit on the coffee table. Clayton crosses his legs and observes Will allowing him to take his time and look around. Clayton takes it as a good sign that Will is curious rather than sit with downcast eyes completely closed off.

Will sips at the can of iced tea as he admires the collection of Greek plates in the bookcase he stands before. The plates are fine hand painted replicas in the red figure style, illustrating scenes from the Fall of Troy. His eyes are drawn to the death of Patroclus. He winces as he touches his shirt, fleeting shades of the wounded Patroclus bending to the triumphant Hector's spear.

Will half turns to Clayton. "Ready when you are."

"Carpe Diem." Clayton says. "I took your advice. Made a list…"

It is Will's turn to laugh. "I imagine I am pretty frustrating for you…"

"Talking to you about how your mind works makes me feel many things, but frustration is not one of them." Clayton assures him.

Clayton wants to transition the conversation so he can tell Will about his own brand of empathy, but he can't seem to create the right segue. He had not wanted to bring it up at the restaurant, but the longer he waits, the more difficult it will be to tell him. Clayton has been in this situation before and it never goes well.

"So, are we good?" Clayton asks.

"We're good." Will says, and he means it. "We can continue if you like." He continues to gaze at the plates, recalling each of the scenes as the figures come alive in his mind while Clayton resumes his questions.

"I would like that. I was asking if you could get the killers out of your head when your profile is done. And you said that you only think like them, you don't become them."

"Right." Will responds feeling guilty as all hell. It would appear that Clayton intends to pluck at this particular note until he hears a true pitch.

"Then, you must have lots of forts." Clayton grabs his notebook and begins to write. "Have you ever had any difficulty shutting them down in your mind once the case is over? How much is left behind to influence who you are at any moment, Will?"

Will's mind goes into hyper-drive at Clayton's prompt. His question strikes again at the heart of why Will is here. Will's mind erupts and Clayton is replaced by Garett Jacob Hobbs' corpse slumped in the corner staring at Will as his daughter, Abigail, chokes on her own blood beneath Will's fingers. The corpse tells Will to let Clayton see. Will knows what Clayton will see.

Who you were yesterday is laid waste to give rise to who you are today, Will.

Will realizes his eyes are closed. He opens them to find himself staring at his hands in his lap. He looks to Clayton, who acknowledges Will's attention with a slight lift of his chin.

"Back from your little trip, now?" Clayton says.

"I thought I drifted off…I do that sometimes."

"Good, seems like you are getting better at detecting that about yourself. I will tell you when you do it, you know. It would be pretty shitty of me not to."

Will laughs. He's not sure if he's amused or relieved. Probably both.

"Thanks. To answer your question, I honestly don't know how much I'm influenced, but I am definitely affected by it. "

If you followed the urges you kept down for so long, cultivated them, left the inspirations as they are, you would have become someone other than yourself.

"I admit it can be upsetting at times, some crime scenes more than others. I have nightmares… But, once I uh…profile them, I continue to refine my understanding during the course of the investigation as more evidence is uncovered. I don't get the big picture all at once."

Adapt…evolve…become…

"After you catch them, the killers; you can turn them off in your mind? Forget, compartmentalize?"

Jack had wanted to believe the same thing and Will had not corrected his misperception. But, Will needs to be truthful to Clayton.

"Not completely. Their profiles fade, or at least retreat from my consciousness, sometimes manifesting when something I see triggers a memory. But my dreams are very vivid and often…unpleasant." Will sucks in a breath and decides to bring Clayton on board with Hobbs. He has to start somewhere. He continues to walk around, the couches still too confining and close.

"There was one exception. Garret Jacob Hobbs."

"The Minnesota Shrike." Clayton is familiar with this one and the subsequent unpleasantness.

"Yeah. You know about that case?"

"I read up on what I could find. I know what he did. I know why you had to shoot him. I know about the daughter's disappearance and your trial."

Will nods to himself, rolls his eyes, swallows hard and lifts his eyes to Clayton's. "Anything else you think you know?" Will asks, suddenly wary.

Images of Abigail on Hannibal's kitchen floor flood his consciousness. He remembers clutching at her, unable to differentiate between the quaking of his own body or the spasms in hers as blood spilled and bubbled from both in shared agony. He clenches his fists until he can push the sounds and visions away, back…back…

"No…but I take it there is something else." Clayton raises his head, looks at Will expectantly, "I'll let you decide when you want to elaborate on that." Clayton begins to write again in his notebook. The Hobbs case has clearly struck a nerve, a very tender one.

"Do you need to stop?" Clayton asks Will, not wanting to push him too hard.

"No…I find some things more difficult to talk about than others."

"As long as you're sure. Go ahead; you were saying Hobbs was an exception."

Will sighs. The descent down the slippery slope is becoming harder to avoid. He resumes their original train of thought with difficulty. "Even after I shot and killed him, I kept seeing him, but I was sick, with encephalitis so I hallucinated a lot of that among other things. I was pretty messed up at the time, highly suggestible."

Draw me a clock, Will…what time is it?

Will is tempted to massage his temples but resists knowing that will signal his fatigue to Clayton. He imagines Clayton has already surmised quite a lot and is seeking confirmation from Will. Will squints as the sunlight filled room seems to quake with the pulse of a strobe light and he feels warm hands and moistened lips across his face.

He blinks the sensations away and forces his eyes to widen in response to Clayton's voice.

Clayton senses Will has checked out again, if only for a minute. At least his questions are probing enough to cause impressions or memories to stir deep in his subconscious and rise to the surface. If he aware of them, he will invariably analyze them, either now or later.

"I read about the illness, at least that it was, would have been part of your defense strategy had the case not been dismissed. Hobbs was the first person you killed, wasn't he?"

"He was." Will finds Clayton's phrasing of the question odd. He emphasized the word first as though indicating the first in a series, not the first person ever. Will wonders again what Clayton might be keeping to himself.

"I imagine that experience had an effect on you." Clayton says.

“That kind of experience would affect anyone.”

“Yes, but not everyone thinks like you. I asked you before how much of the killer is left behind to influence who you are, but once you killed someone, your own feelings come into play. That had to have changed things for you. So, before Hobbs you imagined what a killer felt, after Hobbs, you found yourself contending with your imagination and your own feelings about killing.”

“Your point?” Clayton’s trenchant questions rankle. The prick of spines breaking through skin along his back is so real that his shirt has become damp.

“Can you tell the difference between your emotions and the killer’s?” Clayton asks and Will’s mind freezes. He feels the caress of sharp talon across his cheek, scraping to rest beneath his chin. He tries not to look at the bone colored antlers growing up from the couch like a briar patch.

Is it harder imagining the thrill somebody else feels killing now that you’ve done it yourself?

“Will?” Clayton says, “Is there a difference between your emotions and the killer’s?”

“Of course there is. I was deeply affected by shooting Hobbs, but it was justified.”

Clayton would like to ask Will his definition of his chosen rationale, not the legal one. He can see that Will is being evasive, but Clayton also discerns Will wants to talk through it. It is as though he is speaking to two Will Grahams.

“But Hobbs is not the only person you have killed, is he?”

“How much do you know Dr. Clayton? I know what is in that file…”

“I extrapolated and deduced. Give me some credit, Will. I may not know the answers to the questions I throw at you, but often, your responses answer them for me. And, hopefully, for you.

“And raise new ones.”

“That’s the idea... Let’s leave the question of influence for later. You are not ready to discuss this yet.”

“Fine with me.” Will says.

Clayton glances at his watch. Will is tired. He has been retreating into himself off and on during their session together and Clayton does not want him to burn out. At least Will is aware of going into his mind.

“How about if we call it a day. I believe you have enough rolling around in your head. Roll it around on your own for a while. I do not have a four o’clock tomorrow if you would like to meet again.”

Will looks at his own watch. It is nearly five fifteen. They have been chatting for over an hour and Will has no sense of the passage of that time. He feels like time was suspended somehow.

“Yeah. I can do four again.” He walks to his couch and gathers up his book bag. “I’ll just see myself out?”

"The staff has already gone, so I'll lock up behind you. Take care, Will."

Will slings his bag over his shoulder and before long he is standing outside waiting for his taxi in the hot Tuscan sun.

****

Will tosses and turns in his bed that evening. He could not bring himself to focus on his computer files. The images and memories of the afternoon's session intrude into his consciousness constantly. He tries to recall his conversation with Clayton, allowing his imagination to slip around phrases, hopeful that the evocative sensations connect and grow into something more recognizable and less fractured.

He awakens hours later in a cold sweat. He can't shake the image of blood stained snow or the fangs and antlers that tear across his skin, each vying for the tender space between his ribs where his heart hammers and his lungs swell in fright, unable to exhale.

****

"Do you still see Hobbs?" Clayton asks at their session the next afternoon.

Clayton watches Will resume his pacing around his office, this time halting in front of a photographic print of a beach. It is Clayton's most favorite print in the room. He took the photo himself. He watches Will scrutinizing the print as he speaks.

"No…" Will corrects himself. "Yes, I still see him in my mind sometimes and he says things, but his function now is more symbolic. It's my subconscious talking to me if that makes sense." He turns around to face Clayton once again. His expression is subdued and absent is the storm of a moment ago.

Clayton is amazed at Will's ability to analyze himself, and to recognize that he is essentially just having a conversation with himself, like everyone does, but because of his empathy, his subconscious mind spills into his conscious mind.

"It makes perfect sense." Clayton says. "Most of us simply can't do that or don't recognize it. It's kind of like trying to analyze a dream, but a waking dream for you, huh?"

"That's as good an analogy as any." Will is relieved Clayton can grasp what he is talking about. He is so receptive and quick at making connections, filling in the blanks.

"What does Hobbs symbolize for you, Will?"

Will thinks about his answer before he offers it. "I killed him because he was a serial killer who had his daughter as a hostage, a knife at her throat. It was justified not only in my mind, but by the FBI's thinking as well.

"His death led me to the Ripper. I suppose when Hobbs brings a message from my subconscious, he is acting as a warning, he appears to me as a cautionary figure. I have to figure out what he is trying to tell me."

"You mean; you have to figure out what you are trying to tell yourself. Something is nagging at you in your subconscious that your conscious mind needs to know."

"Yes." Will nods in agreement. "That's how it is. When I recall conversations or when a previous conversation, event, or whatever pops in my head, I see the people, interact with them, but I know it's not real. It's just how I think."

"Wow. You never have a minute when you aren't being bombarded with images." Clayton feels the discomfort Will is experiencing at discussing himself, but Clayton also senses relief from him. Clayton knows what it is like to have no one understand you. You believe you are alone.

"How do you feel right now? Is talking about this stressful?"

"Well, it's not a walk in the park, but talking to you is not all that stressful and I want to talk to you about that."

"I'm listening." Clayton says, his face serene. Will has definitely noticed something and has been kicking it around his head for a while it seems. Clayton is learning Will never disappoints.

"You have a pretty good grasp of how my mind works, why is that?"

"You already know my area of interest is in empathy and its applications…" Clayton begins to explain.

Will's thoughts are piling on top of each other and he walks around the room, his hands gesturing as quickly as the words flow. "I am not bombarded with images from you at all. In fact, you barely register. You're not… readable like other people."

"You can't profile me." Clayton says.

"No, I can't. It's like you have forts of your own." Will keeps his distance from Clayton's couch. Will senses that mist hovering nearby. It has been there the entire time, lingering just beyond his reach.

Clayton nods. Will has saved him the trouble of introducing the topic he has wanted to discuss. "Very perceptive of you. It's less a fort and more of a shield I suppose. I am afflicted with a kind of empathy, too."

"What do you mean a kind of empathy?" Will blurts out. "And when were you going to tell me about it?"

Will isn't sure what he feels at the moment. Anger is at the top of a short list. He feels his jaw tighten and does not care if he cracks a tooth. He glares at Clayton on his couch, pen suspended in the air. He is so angry he has to turn his head so Clayton is at least spared the pained grimace he knows he is wearing. Besides being angry, he feels stung.

Will cannot believe the someone else who shares this condition or whatever it is, is his fucking psychiatrist. He wonders if he is a magnet for malpractice.

He looks to Clayton, who is now perched on the edge of his seat and Will feels that mist edging ever more close as though it was actually in the room. At that moment Will sees that Clayton's presence is not absent at all, neither is it entirely unreadable. Clayton is the mist. At least that is how Will's mind interprets his emotional presence. Clayton is able to shield others from his own emotions so that he can…sense and read their emotions? And why wouldn't he tell his new empathic patient that…

Will closes his eyes as he thinks what he would have done. He would have used his gift to gage his patient's emotional state. He would likely sense a lot about his patient. He would maybe even expect his empathic patient would have figured it out by now. He might even hope his patient trusted him enough to let his guard down. He would definitely be smart not to let his own defenses down around this particular patient. One who invites raging psychopaths to take up space in his head.

The mist continues to ebb and flow, as Clayton sits motionless, staring at his notebook. "Are you empathizing with me, right now?" Will asks.

"I'm trying. That is I can't seem to get a lot. You are leaves in the wind whereas other people are very…solid, heavy, dripping with emotion. You are really, really closed off. What do you feel?"

"Well," Will starts and then stops. This is an incredibly strange conversation. It feels very intimate all of sudden and Will's impulse is to shy away from it. Fuck it. Will thinks.

"I think in images and imagery. My mind visualizes you, your presence, your profile as it were, as a mist. A benign mist. I usually feel other people's emotional baggage hit me as soon as I look at them whether I want it to or not. It is really difficult to tune it out, but I manage most of the time. With you, there is no baggage. It's kind of nice, actually."

Clayton's face is the most serious Will has seen so far. "Will, I deeply apologize. I should have said something sooner. I just didn't know how to bring it up. I've never had a situation with a patient where I had to."

"I can see where your ability gives you an advantage with your chosen profession." Will tried to keep the sarcasm out, but failed.

Clayton ignores Will's tone, accepts he deserves it. "An advantage, yes. But, I can only sense emotions. I can't do what you do. I don't know why people feel as they do, or how they got into the mental place they are in. But it's a start so I know what questions to ask. So I know when to continue and when to back off…" Clayton pauses and looks to Will, "I can only guess with you."

"Because of my forts. You can't get past them?" Will walks back to his couch, settles in.

"I recognized them for what they were. I did not try to get past them or knock them down. Truthfully, I don't know if I can. I do know that would be a breach of your space, your privacy, a forced entry."

"Oh." Will says simply. "So, you are kind of a mirror then? You are able to mirror the emotions of others and you shut down your own so they don't get in the way?"

"That's close. I can't shut them down, but I can shield them so they don't interfere. I respond to another's emotions by feeling what he feels, much like a mirror reflecting images. You on the other hand, actually assume the perspective of the other without filters. You are aware of everyone at once and you can think like them. I can't. You avoid because you can't pick and choose. You get it all. So do I, but I have learned to adapt."

Will understands why he is so comfortable around Clayton. Both of them cursed with heightened forms of empathy and both with their own defenses, developed over years of interaction and each with their own need to protect the mind that so often works against them. Will wonders if Clayton sees it that way.

"People's emotions are difficult to shake off, aren't they?" Clayton says.

"Like dog hair on my clothes." Will agrees.

Clayton nods, "Sometimes, after leaving here and going home, I find myself standing in the shower, wishing I could rinse them off."

"What do you think would happen if we let down our defenses?" Will asks.

"I'll show you mine, if you show me yours." Clayton grins. He passes his fingers over his lips as he gazes at Will. Will is smiling at him, but Will has leaned back in his seat. His hands rest stiffly on his knees.

Will feels a faint flush up his neck. He thinks he does not want to know what would happen. In fact, he is quite certain he does not.

Clayton senses Will's reticence and says, "I think that we should keep the current emotional arrangement as it is and get comfortable with that. We are still establishing our boundaries, right?"

"Good idea." Will manages to say. A part of him would like to know Clayton better, to see him the way his empathy will reveal, but Will likes this comfort zone; needs it. It is such a relief to just be with Clayton and he is not prepared to change their dynamic just yet.

There is also the matter of Will's own baggage. He cannot simply unpack his trunk of horrors and allow Clayton to poke around without context or guidance. Clayton would be recovering from the shock for weeks… right after he had called the authorities to come take Will away in a straight-jacket.

Will understands what this shared empathy with Clayton means. Clayton knows when Will is holding back and when he is being evasive. He has known all along. There is a comfort in that. Their current arrangement includes agreed upon boundaries and rules. All Will has to do is articulate his desire to avoid and Clayton will acquiesce. This is a conditioning of sorts, but the end game is honesty and Will cannot fault Clayton for that. The method is transparent and like Clayton himself, its application is subtle, gentle.

It is inconceivable to Will that something could possibly be going right for him for a change.

Clayton is rising from the couch. Will looks up at him, watches him stretch his arms and crack his neck. "Want a drink? I could use one."

"What have you got?" Will asks.

“Bourbon. Jim Beam.”

“Perfect.” Will says. And it is. For the moment, anyway.

Chapter 6

Chapter Summary

Bedelia visits Fiesole and nearly spills her wine. Will and Clayton test boundaries and Will gets a phone call from Detective D'Angelo.

The awesome sense of power Will had felt did not eclipse the fear that accompanied the act of killing. Each act of killing brought him closer to becoming. He feared the becoming because he wasn't supposed to become, he was supposed to pretend to become.

Chapter 6

Bedelia visits Fiesole and nearly spills her wine. Will and Clayton test boundaries and Will gets a phone call from Detective D'Angelo.

Du Maurier sits outside the café with two women companions under a canopy of mint green at a small round table looking down upon the agreeable town of Fiesole. To the north she can see the archaeological zone, the ruins of the Teatro Romano and the Museo Bandini in clear sight, and to the south, the expanse of Florence in the distance; all she has to do is turn her head.

Fiesole is older even than Florence, the remnants of Etruscan civilization, long gone, evident throughout the environs. The town is a maze of terraced landscapes, crumbling walls, and winding streets that recall the days when horse drawn carts rolled along the cobbled avenues rather than cars. Even now, the pedestrian traffic far exceeds the motorized.

It takes Du Maurier over an hour to reach Fiesole from her own residence outside Siena. Du Maurier travels to Fiesole for the sole purpose of monitoring her patient, one of the women sitting at her table now. Of course, her patient does not call her Dr. Du Maurier. She has another name now, another identity as credible and finely constructed as the last. As Dr. Francesca Durant, she can continue to apply her craft and reap the financial rewards that go along with it.

Nearly all of Du Maurier's acquaintances, she would not consider them friends, are daughters of bankers, wives of bankers, or CEOs themselves. They are patrons of the arts and political puppeteers. As far as they are aware, Dr. Durant has resided in the UK for several years having recently returned Italy to resume her practice much to Lydia and her family's relief. Whatever would they do without her?

Her other companion, a friend of Lydia's and by extension, Du Maurier's friend, is the daughter of one of the local wine dynasties. Both Lydia and Nina reside in nearby estates. Nina has provided support for her friend by drinking up most of the afternoon's refreshments so that poor substance abusing Lydia will not indulge her bad habit too much. Du Maurier had neither admonished Nina, nor discouraged Lydia. She is along for the ride that the 3k a month retainer provides her.

Du Maurier has had enough of the cheese, rustic bread, and fresh fruit. She has had more than her share of the fruity aperitif they have been sharing this late afternoon. Still, she takes another polite sip of the cloyingly sweet wine and decides that Lydia is very much like this sickening beverage; easy to swallow at first but nauseating after a time. After today, Du Maurier decides she will require at least 5k to remain on call. If Lydia's father balks; Du Maurier has ample other patients in similar arrangements.

Lydia tosses her head back, laughing as Nina raises her hand in the air seeking their waiter to order yet another bottle. Du Maurier rolls her eyes, but quickly recovers and excuses herself explaining that she needs to walk and get some air before the next round.

"Are you sure, Dr. Durant?" Lydia asks with a frown. "It must be a hundred degrees out there."

"Well, then I likely won't be very long. Please, don't wait for me. Enjoy the wine chilled as soon as he brings it." Du Maurier picks up her sun hat and makes her way through the scattered tables filled with tourists and out onto the paved terraces that lead away from the café and Museo. She inhales the hot humid air and relishes every moment away from the oppressively cologne drenched atmosphere of the café.

She orders a glass of something more to her taste at the lower bar and continues her slow walk of the grounds. The dry metallic undertones of the sauvignon blanc roll over her tongue effectively cleansing her palate of the sugar water she has been choking on for the past hour and a half.

To her west, the sun is sinking in the hazy sky although darkness will not fall for several more hours. The darkness does nothing to relieve the stifling humidity, but the temperature does drop significantly. She finds a space of chipped stone wall and carefully sits down to avoid causing a pull in the fabric of her dress.

She watches the people enjoying the swath of green grass and manicured gardens. People mingle alone or in groups, some lay sprawled on blankets, others tossing Frisbees, and still others watch an impromptu game of football among some local boys, a noteworthy achievement given the heat. The boys seem unaware of the climate as they run, kick, and shove one another to claim the red and white ball they chase all over the expanse.

Her attentions wander to the young man walking his two dogs not far from where she sits perched on her wall, sipping at her wine. The dogs are not remarkable, but he is. As he approaches, Du Maurier can see the shirt clinging to his body is damp with perspiration that glistens over tanned and sculpted arms and legs. He cuts to the right advancing even closer to her position along the wall. His dogs are pulling him and he is cheerfully tagging along, content to let them wander where their noses take them.

Something in his face gives her pause as she tilts her glass to her lips. A second later she has nearly dropped her twenty dollar glass of wine, the liquid spilling from her mouth as she feels it dribble down her chin. She wipes impatiently, irritated at her lapse of decorum. Her mind cannot grasp what her eyes are most definitely seeing. Her fingers clench at the glass tightly so she does not let it shatter on the asphalt that sways unsteadily beneath her.

No…it can't be, she muses as she wipes her face with the back of her hand and then adjusts her hat so that her face is obscured. The silken stubble, the elegant jaw line, the full perfectly arched brows, and the luxurious mass of brown curls are all there; even the mouth is the same.

Du Maurier remembers the mouth. She had gazed at Will Graham behind the bars of the Baltimore State Hospital; her mouth almost touching his as she had breathed the words she knew would infuse Graham with renewed purpose. Distractingly moist lips had parted then twisted in disbelief as he had looked at her awestruck and achingly beautifully alone in his cell. She had looked into his darkly haunted blue eyes as she had retreated backward into the arms of the guards who had mussed up her suit and escorted her out.

Months later, she had gazed at him again from across the FBI interrogation table unable to tear her gaze from his placid blue eyes and that sensuous delicious mouth. He had thanked her for her words. Little had he known for what he was truly thanking her; even as she told him she had not said enough; she had in fact said too much.

This beautiful creature tugging at his dogs is not Will Graham. There is too much unadulterated contentment in his countenance and too much swagger in his walk. He is frighteningly similar, however, from the tousled locks on his head to the pout on his lips as he frowns at the larger dog who is defecating barely inches from the walkway. She watches him praise his dog for doing what it was going to do anyway and then produce a plastic bag from the pocket of his cut-offs. He removes the pile from the ground in one swoop. He deftly turns the bag inside out and ties it off.

He's American. His accent is difficult to identify. Eastern seaboard, Du Maurier thinks. Not New Jersey, but not as far south as Virginia. Somewhere urban and close to…Philadelphia. Du Maurier listens more closely.

He lets them off their leash and watches his dogs chase each other for a few minutes. His attention is focused on the dogs; he doesn't seem to notice Du Maurier at all. Finally, he re-attaches leashes to collars and is soon beckoning the dogs to follow him.

"Where's the trash, girls? Where is it?" he says to the dogs. They look around, hesitate, and then pull him away in the direction of the nearest public waste receptacle. Du Maurier watches him for several minutes, watching Will Graham's twin as it were, as opportunity begins to register in the recesses of her mind.

She must learn everything about him. This will take some time but not terribly much. Du Maurier glances back toward the café where Lydia and Nina await her return. She will not seek to alter her current arrangement until she has ensured that multiple visits per week are warranted. Poor Lydia is about to have a relapse. An ugly and upsetting melt down is imminent and its implications painfully tragic for one so young, so pretty, and so unfortunate as to rely on Du Maurier for a bright future.

This adorable doppelganger may yet provide Hannibal a much needed respite from the boredom plaguing him. Boredom and Hannibal are an undesirable combination. The danger is that instead of soothing the wound dealt by Graham, the very likeness of this beguiling young man to Graham might open it up again. The flames of unspoken desires would again rage within Hannibal.

Unless Du Maurier can serve him up not as a surrogate; Hannibal would never be satisfied no matter how pretty he is, but as a bag of breath and bone unworthy of his resemblance to Hannibal's tortured treasure.

Her pretty gift will ingratiate her into Hannibal's good graces and place Hannibal firmly in Du Maurier's debt. Du Maurier will indulge her own feminine whims with him first, given that Hannibal, once he sees him, will invariably be quite smitten and possessive. She sighs as she begins her ascent back to the patio. Hannibal can be exasperating in his attentions. Like a toddler, he cannot resist playing with his food.

While walking his dogs along the crest of the hill overlooking the ancient amphitheater below, Clayton finds himself recalling his last meeting with Graham. He has not stopped berating himself for his lack of judgment. He can't really fault Will for something neither of them expected. It is now clear to Clayton that alcohol not only impairs judgment, it weakens emotional barriers between grown men with empathy disorders, barriers better left in place.

Clayton thinks they did not so much establish boundaries as cross them. He wishes he could remember precisely how, though.

They will be meeting at his office tomorrow for Graham's regular session and Clayton has decided to put his liquor cabinet under lock and key. And give said key to his office manager, Maria making her promise on the life her first born not to give it back to him no matter how much he begs, threatens, or cries.

Five hours after their first tumbler of Beam, Clayton had reached for the bottle of Southern Comfort and snatched it before Will could pour himself another shot. The small bottle of Beam, a token gift, had already disappeared along with half a bottle of Johnny Walker Red. Will's propensity for drink was abundantly clear. Clayton allowed that the discovery of their shared empathy warranted letting off some steam, but that had been no reason to become piss drunk.

Except that Clayton had been unable to stop himself and had matched Graham drink for drink until he realized through his stupor that he had somehow amplified Graham's emotional attachment to this particular activity. He had confused Graham's emotions with his own or his own emotions had mirrored Graham's. Either way, his brain had been quickly and effectively pickled.

"Will, I've got to lock up and get home. You can call a cab, I have to drive." Clayton had said with thick tongue that felt like sandpaper against his teeth to the half-lidded and yawning Will on the couch. Will had sat up straight, rolled his shoulders and pushed his hair out of eyes for the hundredth time. A gesture Clayton knew he would never tire of.

"Oh, Shit. You do have to get up early, don't you?" he had said, a sheepish smile on his lips.

If only Clayton had been cognizant of that hours ago. Mouth cotton dry and head throbbing behind his ears; he had weaved his way to his desk to retrieve his tie and jacket from the chair. His limbs had felt heavy and unwieldy so Will had helped him put on the jacket, and had somehow managed to fix his tie for him when Clayton's own fingers had refused to cooperate.

He had learned too late that Will had practically been weaned on whiskey, on drams of stuff harder than was in his cabinet. Clayton's preference for flaming Sambuca aside, he couldn't light a match to Graham. Nor would he have dared to last night.

"Yes, I do have to be here bright and early. I will be envying you your bed tomorrow morning." Clayton had said without mirth.

“Yeah, I’m sorry.” Will had breathed, his head bent, eyes lowered in response to Clayton’s unwavering gaze. “Didn’t mean to go through your entire stash.” Will had said, his Louisiana drawl more pronounced.

Will had not been slurring his words though. He had moved slowly, with a practiced gait, but was surprisingly lucid and at least in command of his gross motor control. Clayton had been neither, and quite sure he was destined to stumble down his own steps on the way out and break his neck.

“Oh, we put a dent in it, but there’s plenty left. You ok?” Clayton had asked him, not wanting to lay the blame solely on Will, his patient. He had been embarrassed that Will knew how tanked he was. At the time, he had been so tanked he had actually believed his shield was still up and functioning. He has since reconsidered that assumption.

“Should have asked yourself that several shots ago.” Will had laughed as he had tucked in his shirt, and smoothed his unruly and slightly damp curls.

Clayton had not returned the laugh. He had been searching through his desk for Excedrin. He had taken a mouthful before calling a cab for Will. He had leaned on Will coming down the stairs and Will had braced him without comment.

Will had offered to share the cab, “You are totally wasted.” Will had said smirking at him as the cab sat, engine running out front of his office. “You should not drive, and you should definitely not drive that car.” He had pointed to Clayton’s shiny burgundy Mercedes E 550 Coupe.

Clayton had stubbornly refused. He now had to drop off the Mercedes for a new bumper after taking out part of a low stone wall fifty feet from his house. Clayton had not remembered the drive after pulling away from the curb at his office. Even now he is forced to admit he cannot remember the entire evening. His memory is disjointed, fragments of laughter and commiseration, cigarettes and whiskey.

Clayton reprimands himself on how stupid he was to have even gotten out the stuff in the first place. Will’s file had indicated he self-medicated from time to time, a symptom of depression. Clayton should be the one having his head examined.

Bella has stopped next to the sidewalk, her backside perched over the grass. Clayton pulls out the plastic waste bag and coos to Bella what a good girl she is. He is relieved that she dropped her load in the grass and not on the walkway.

Clayton sighs, stretches his arms over his head causing the leashes to become taut. Bella and Cara strain against him and he finally gives, taking off their leashes and allowing them to roll in the grass. He watches them, smiling and knowing that their lolling tongues and soft whines are meant for him. They run around him in circles chasing one another.

The evening had turned out well though. He and Graham had bonded over those shots, more so than they would have in weeks of therapy sessions. The uninhibited conversation had allowed both of them to address the awkwardness of their shared empathy and settle into something comfortable.

At least that was the impression Clayton had awakened with this morning along with a mammoth headache. He had also retched over his toilet for half an hour before he could drag himself to his damaged car to drive into the office…late. He had not been able to eat a solid thing all day. Alka-Seltzer and breath mints had been his diet all afternoon.

Maria had not said anything, but her deep brown eyes had alternated between sympathy and rebuke. He had felt her eyes on his back every time he turned around. His office suite had been cleared of all evidence of the previous evening's revelry before he arrived, but the smell of stale liquor and cigarettes lingered much like the sour aftertaste in Clayton's throat. Clayton had offered no explanation and she had not asked.

At five o'clock, Maria had poked her head in his door and said, "Enough penance for today, why don't you lock up and go home yourself." It had taken all of a nanosecond for him to agree with her.

One of the last things Will had said before climbing into the back of the cab was to remind Clayton to make him explain about the Ripper.

"And don't let me off the hook because I will try and get out of it and I will try to antagonize you, but you shouldn't let me…put off telling you." Will had slammed the car door. Clayton had last seen him rubbing his temples in the back seat of the cab as it had pulled away.

Clayton had wanted to call and make sure he made it home, and stayed there. But, he had barely managed to stagger into his own house and into bed let alone remember to phone Will.

Surprisingly, Will had phoned him this morning, inquiring how his evening had gone after they had parted company. "You made it home? You are one lucky bastard. You were pretty trashed, Daniel."

"When did you start calling me Daniel?" Clayton had asked, his forehead flush against the cool lip of his porcelain kitchen sink. Clayton had not expected his headache could get any worse, but it could, and did.

"Right after you told me that you liked how I said your name." Will had said.

Clayton had been able to mumble something like, "Oh, ok then."

"Guess I'll see you Thursday at four, for our regular session."

"Looking forward to it. Thanks for calling." Clayton had said. He had clicked off his phone and then had felt like slamming his head repeatedly into the sink.

Clayton decides he will never, ever have a drink with Will Graham again. Ever.

He stops to let Cara take her dump. He figures he will head back down the hill now that the sun has begun to sink below the horizon. Clayton's stomach rumbles and it is a good feeling after last night. He takes the girls to a trash can to dispose of the doggy bag and guides them homeward. He'll make dinner for the three of them.

Will sips at his iced tea while staring at his computer screen. He has read and answered his few e-mails. The one from Jack had been difficult for Will to get through as they usually were these days. Jack's wording always appeared friendly the first read, but typically betrayed his remorse edged with thinly disguised reproach. The reproach was leveled at himself, not Will. Will could not decide if the reproach had more to do with his foolhardiness or his utter failure to take Lecter down. The remorse was less about Will's wounds and more about his own. And underneath all of that, like a slick acidic undercoat, there was the bile of betrayal. And this was leveled at Will.

Jack had always been incredibly difficult to be around, even though Will knew he had tried to tone down his intensity when he was with Will. Jack could be compassionate when he wanted to be, but he was more often than not insensitive to how Will transitioned from one mental state to another. At crime scenes, Jack had been delicate with him because he had relied upon his gift, at least at first. He had said he wanted to borrow Will's imagination. Will wants it back.

He had apologized for his lack of faith in Will after his incarceration. He had been sincere. But Jack had never been above using Will to further his own agenda and if apologizing helped in that regard, even better.

Jack's conduct of "that night" of the dinner, as they referred to it, remained under Jack's jurisdiction. Jack's version of events had held more sway. Will had said nothing; he neither concurred nor contested. Will had let the evidence speak. Regardless, the bulk of the blame had been laid at Will's feet.

When Jack was wound up, he was a locomotive, booming through Will's mind with clanging bells and whistles. There had been instances when Will had averted Jack's anxiety inducing gaze for days at a time. Jack could and did on many occasions reduce Will to feeling like the bullied teenager he had once been: other times, the sensitive son confused by his father's embarrassment.

Jack had become a beverage Will did not want to drink anymore, a tart mixture of bitter tea and bad medicine. Will had found another beverage much more to his liking.

Will takes another gulp of his iced tea, flavored with plenty of whiskey, lemon, and just a touch of sugar. He reminisces about the other night with Dr. Clayton, with Daniel as he now thinks of him.

Daniel is a fountain of cool refreshing water. Will had not realized how parched he was or how thirsty he could be. Will cannot remember the last time he felt secure enough to invite the emotions of a living breathing person to envelope and inhabit his psyche like he had allowed Daniel's to do.

Daniel's empathy combined with Will's own allows for a rather electric and stimulating transfer of sensations, desires, and yes, urges otherwise impossible to achieve. Daniel's shield as he had referred to it had succumbed to the liquor fairly quickly and Will had had the entire evening to assimilate and allow his imagination to create a Daniel in his mind that continues to blossom and grow as Will's mind continues to recall and reorganize the various impressions relentlessly rearranging themselves in the firing synapses of his brain.

The traffic is no longer one way, either; it's a two lane highway. Daniel is capable, or would be if not intoxicated beyond reason, of seeing Will as well. Will finds the possibilities frightening yet compelling at the same time.

Will cannot lie to him.

There is relief that he does not have to. Will lies enough. Will has found someone else who understands him. Unlike Hannibal, Daniel will not use that understanding to manipulate, persuade, or coerce. Daniel nudges, invites, and reaches. Daniel does not take from Will unless Will offers.

Psychopaths develop a talent for mimicking human behavior and Hannibal is the most talented psychopath Will has ever encountered. Hannibal had taken advantage of Will's state of mind, exacerbated his illness, all while earnings Will's trust and friendship, and he had done it masterfully. In retrospect, the perfection with which Hannibal controlled his emotions should have set off warning bells, but Will had been too sick initially and much as he hates to admit it now, too self-absorbed to notice, and later…it hadn't mattered.

It hadn't mattered because Will had discovered other arousing urges primal and pure writhing inside him that Hannibal's careful manipulations released. It hadn't mattered because Hannibal had shown Will how deliciously satisfying power could be once those urges found expression. It hadn't mattered because Will had never felt alive as when he was with Hannibal. It hadn't mattered because Will had loved him for it, for all of it. He loved him still. How fucked up was that?

Daniel operates in an entirely different universe. And Will likes this universe. Daniel is warm and sweet like honey on a fresh baked biscuit. Will tasted that biscuit only last night and could swallow it whole if he let himself.

How is Will to reconcile the two universes he inhabits? If Will allows Daniel inside his head, he will see Hannibal's hand in all that Will has become and Daniel will see Will for who he truly is. But, Daniel cannot help him if Daniel cannot see him.

It was Hannibal who had taught Will how to see into the recesses of his psyche where he had dared not look. Hannibal had forced Will to kill but Hannibal had not forced Will to enjoy it. After pummeling Randall Tier with his bare hands Will had stood over the still and ruined body trembling not with fear or guilt over what he had done, but in breathless shameless exhilaration.

Will's imagination had placed Hannibal on the floor beneath him; it had not been Tier lying there on splintered glass in what remained of his living room. And when it was over, and Will had collapsed, his anger spent, his desire to kill Hannibal had been stayed.

For Hannibal, Tier had been a means to an end. Hannibal had had every confidence Will would prove the stronger predator. Tier had been yet another gateway to awareness, another step closer to becoming.

The awesome sense of power Will had felt did not eclipse the fear that accompanied the act of killing. Each act of killing brought him closer to becoming. He feared the becoming because he wasn't supposed to become, he was supposed to pretend to become.

He had used his anger at Hannibal, his hatred of him to soothe the guilt of his actions, to cloud the intoxicating and awful power he had begun to crave, but Hannibal had been aware of this, had known all along and encouraged Will to cultivate his violence, hold onto it, and release it. Hannibal had been pleased that Will used his desire to kill him as inspiration. Hannibal had known Will could only use his hatred to mask his true enjoyment for so long. And for this, Will had hated Hannibal even more.

Even Steven aside, Hannibal had been proud of Will for trying to kill him by proxy, and he had known that killing Tier would purge Will of the hate so that Will could see clearly where Hannibal had been guiding him.

Will sees it now. Hannibal had been building trust between them. The special kind of trust only intelligent psychopaths can appreciate when one is the mentor and the other his beloved pupil. Hannibal had given a test to his ardent pupil, and Will had passed with flying colors.

Later, Hannibal had looked into his eyes from across his dining room table where Will had laid out his kill, presented in all its broken glory, and he had known Will had enjoyed it. Approval and delight had flashed across his crease of a smile and glittered beneath pale lashes. Later, Hannibal had again looked into his eyes as he had cleansed Will's wounds in tender tribute and he had known Will had enjoyed those attentions, too.

Don't go inside, Will. You'll want to retreat. Stay with me.

Where would I go?

Where would he have gone? He had to stay and finish the job for Jack. All the requisite accoutrements and tools were at Hannibal's house. He could not have prepared Tier alone, and Hannibal had somehow known that as well.

His morgue or butcher shop, or both, had already been prepared; everything in its place, including towels, aprons, and piped in music. Somehow, the Brandenburg Concertos had provided the perfect ambiance for the task at hand.

As Will had worked, Hannibal had kept him in the present through word and touch, patiently helping him to absorb and process the multitude of sensations and emotions so he would not become overwhelmed. Hannibal had guided Will's preparation of Tier's body, its dismemberment, and its reconstruction, never leaving his side. The two of them had shared more honesty and intimacy than Will had ever experienced in his life.

These are the ugly truths of the monster taking shape within, sharp rusted claws scraping against his mind and slicing at his stomach, dulled by whiskey chased with guilt. When Daniel becomes intimate with the monster coiled inside will he turn away in horror? Is there enough light to absorb the dark? If Daniel cannot withstand that terrible knowing; alone and festering, the monster is going to eat Will alive from the inside out.

Perception is a tool pointed at both ends, Will.

Last evening provided Will with some idea of how much intimacy Daniel can stomach. Their first venture onto their highway has shown Will that Daniel possesses the fortitude, if not the willingness to explore the possibilities. Will smiles, remembering.

There had been a cross pollination of sorts; and this is the only way Will can account for their strange exchange of feeling, thought, and sensation.

They had seemed to feed off of each other's emotions, the alcohol loosening inhibitions so that they interacted without considering the consequences of such abandon. Will had known after three shots that some of those boundaries they had talked about would soon be nonexistent between them, but he had let go despite his reservations. It was like he opened a door for Daniel to pass through; and that is exactly what Daniel did.

Then, the empathizing had really begun. Despite Daniel's suggestion that they leave the emotional arrangement at the status quo, barriers had begun to disintegrate one by one.

Daniel had empathized with Will's attraction to spirits much to his discomfort and regret later Will was sure. He had sounded like a pale ghost of himself on the phone this morning. And Will had empathized with Daniel's apparent attraction to him. Will closes his eyes, heat snaking up his neck as he thinks of the soft brush of lips and hot flushed skin against his own. He cannot get shit faced with Daniel again.

The only thing in Will's and in retrospect, Daniel's favor as well, is that Daniel does not seem to remember much about it. Will is grateful for this. He does not want Daniel to freak and refer him out, though after last night, sending Will away is probably the last thing on Daniel's mind. Will owes it to him to tell him, if for nothing else to discover deeper implications, implications that stir restlessly beneath Will's consciousness and his trousers.

Still, Daniel is ethical above all else. Will is grateful for this, too. Will is confident that despite the lapse in judgment, Daniel would never hurt him. Each of them is guilty of indulging their demons and their curiosity and none of it would have happened except for the damned alcohol. Will smiles in spite of himself. It is gratifying to know that his psychiatrist is not infallible and in some ways is just as fucked up, lonely and human as Will is. Perhaps not as fucked up. Will is pretty certain he has Daniel beat on the fucked up part.

Will had, however, managed to keep his other remaining walls intact. The walls around the forts of his nightmares would require more than alcohol to flood them open. Those walls were better left to sober and selective targeting for demolition.

His land line phone rings and Will sees that it is a call from the Firenze Police Department. He knows he will have to deal with whatever it is eventually so he answers.

"Hello." He says noncommittally.

"Mr. Graham? This is Detective D'Angelo." The thickly accented and syrupy voice says.

Will does not bother to stifle the exasperated sigh. "How did you find me? This residence is a bit off the beaten path."

"Not easily. Please don't hang up."

"Give me a good reason not to and we'll see where that takes us." Will says.

"I read a little more about you and…I owe you an apology."

Will has heard this before. Wasn't he just thinking about Jack? "I won't ask what you read, but apology accepted."

Now she will ask him to do something he doesn't want to do. He waits for her to ask…one, two, three…

"I wanted to get your ideas about our killer the other night."

"You must be running out of leads to ask me."

"It's not like that…" D'Angelo says. "I am simply open to alternatives. Thinking outside the box."

"Still running forensics, I assume?"

"Yes. Mr. Graham, what did you see at the crime scene?"

"What did I see that you didn't?" Will pauses; then asks, "And I should play in the sandbox with you because…"

"Because I will not ask you why you are really here in Florence."

"That would be because you have already figured it out. Got anything else?"

"To save lives. The killer is still out there."

"Strike two. This is not a serial killer, but you already know that, too."

Will hears her breathing at the other end. He can practically feel her thinking. He wonders why she wasn't more prepared before she dialed his number. He realizes that she is young and new and eager to impress her superiors. She believes he can help deliver this killer for her.

"You may need a favor someday, Mr. Graham. And judging by your habits, that day may come sooner rather than later. I will have your back as you say, as much as I can. How about that?"

Will knows she really has nothing else to offer, but a cop in your pocket is better than none at all. "What is it about the crime scene that has you stumped?" Will rubs his eyes and hopes this won't take too long.

"Tell me what you think happened and I will tell you what we think."

Will smiles. She wants to make sure he's genuine before she asks her real questions. Not bad for a rookie.

"The victim was a criminal, or at least engaged in criminal behavior. He preyed on younger, weaker individuals, probably boys, probably for sex. The killer was likely a former victim and followed our dead guy to the grotto where he was found. Our killer's attack on our dead guy allowed the new victim to escape. He eviscerated our dead guy for his past sins and exposed his sinful soul to god. He also paved a way for forgiveness in his own twisted way."

There is silence at the other end. "Hello?" Will says.

"Our thinking was that the killer had an accomplice. Bait. Shit. That's why we can't work up a possible motive."

"No, it was a rescue. You have no leads on the bait, either?"

"None. It's like he disappeared. No witnesses. If what you say is true, he is probably traumatized." She says.

"And not talking to anyone. So there's no way to make a connection between the rescued and the killer or the victim. What do you know about the victim?"

"We've identified the victim as a former priest. He was an American who moved to Italy. He served many years in the clergy, most of his life. You seem to be correct about the rest."

"Did he quit the priesthood before or after he moved to Italy?"

"Before. He was active in the church here, but not as a priest. He worked in an art shop, framing and matting pictures. We ran the customer receipts but nothing popped…" D'Angelo continues to inform Will about the victim's work habits, bank accounts, and so on. Will half-listens as his mind turns.

Florence was full of many such shops. Art and prints of fine art were in great demand as were beautiful frames. Picture frames easily cost more than prints; depending on the materials the frame could cost many times the price of the reproduction. But Will did not believe any of that had anything to do with the killer. There was something about the wafer.

Images filled Will's mind as the bits of evidence lodged in his subconscious began to rearrange themselves into information he can process with his conscious mind.

"The wafer in the victim's mouth wasn't a wafer, it was a cookie." Will says.

"What?"

"A cookie. I know this sounds strange, but the deceased had a partially digested cookie in his mouth. It was meant to be a wafer, but the killer did not want to use a genuine wafer, the cookie is significant."

"Ok, we are running that but what difference does that make?"

"It's a unique cookie. It's called a Nilla Wafer, made by Nabisco."

"And…"

"And it's not the sort of item sold in local stores is it? Maybe he brought it with him from the states. But those wafers are significant because…"

"Because if it didn't matter, he would have placed any type of cookie in his mouth, whatever was available, but he didn't. And he purposely avoided a genuine wafer."

"If you can find where he got the cookies, you might find him. I would think that he is also American, here on a passport or VISA, and knew this former priest as a child. And the priest knew him, too. Maybe they both liked Nilla Wafers."

"Or that was the signature treat of a pedophile." D'Angelo says.

"Not bad, detective." Will says.

"You used to do police work, didn't you?'

"A long time ago." Will decides that the conversation has run its course. "Was there anything else, I have an appointment…"

"No, nothing else. Thank you, Mr. Graham. I owe you."

"There is one favor I would ask right now."

"What's that?'

"Would you keep this conversation between us as well as my presence at your crime scene?"

“I can do that. Well, good bye Mr. Graham and…good hunting.” D’Angelo hangs up before Will can say anything. He decides he is just grateful that D’Angelo seems like the type of cop who will keep her word.

Chapter 7

Hannibal reflects on his evening with Bedelia.

Hannibal rips the soiled bedding from the mattress nearly tearing the fabric. Du Maurier feels like a consolation prize. Will should be here. Abigail should be here. Even after a year, Hannibal cannot reconcile the loss. He accepts the aching, takes strength from the aching. And yet, what he would not give to have it stricken from his chest altogether.

Hannibal reflects on his evening with Bedelia.

Hannibal plucks a long blonde hair from his pillow, dangles it from his fingers so it catches the sunlight, watches it float on air until it lands on the hand woven rug inspired by the Majolica vases he collects. He compulsively inspects the rest of his bed as he stretches and rolls onto his side. The scent of Du Maurier's perfume has infiltrated every fiber of the satin sheets. Hannibal finds the fragrance pleasant enough; the significance not so much.

More pleasant is the memory of Du Maurier's hair fanned out over the deep merlot of the sheets, strands of gold splayed against blood. Du Maurier had seemed afloat on a sea of blood, the white of her skin stark against the satin pool beneath her. The theatricality was breathtaking as she probably intended.

More than once, his hands had pressed firmly around her throat in a vice tight against her trachea. Du Maurier had smiled between half-lidded eyes, her hand firmly clenched around his cock each time. He had enjoyed satisfying her, tenderizing the moist mound between her legs and hearing her scream with pleasure that had sent shudders through them both. She had acquiesced to his desires and yet submitting to her own was beyond her grasp. She retained her position of control, unable to relinquish it and yield it up to Hannibal.

Hannibal supposed that was to be expected. Trust was not something they shared. She would always hold herself separate, not part of him. And because she has never allowed him to be a part of her, she can never trust that his affection for her would stay the desire to end her. They are as two vipers guarding their nests. He admires this and this is why she still breathes.

Du Maurier had labeled him dangerous. She had fled. Hannibal had not appreciated the maneuver until later after he had learned she had sat in the interrogation room of the FBI, playing her role of victim with focused finesse. She had actually told Jack Crawford that if he believed he was about to catch Hannibal it was only because Hannibal wanted him to think that. How she must have wallowed in her own deviousness. It never crossed Uncle Jack's mind that Du Maurier had allowed the FBI to find her. She had brilliantly played Crawford, extracting immunity before admitting to virtually nothing. Smoke passing through Jack's fingers.

But, it was her conversations with Will over that same table that had occupied considerable space in Hannibal's mind. Whatever had been said between them, and Du Maurier was frustratingly vague, it had convinced her to purchase only two airline tickets in supreme confidence.

Discussion of Jack flowed as freely as wine; discussion of Will unfolded in layers as thin as an onion's. If Hannibal was obsessed with Will; then Du Maurier was obsessed with Hannibal's obsession. A viper will leave its nest if it believes the threat warrants the risk and so she had inserted herself into Will's awareness cloaked as an ally. First, at the Baltimore State Hospital, a fact he learned from Will, not Du Maurier. She has yet to mention it. She did discuss her visit to FBI headquarters. Hannibal has misgivings about both encounters.

Hannibal yawns and stretches, kicks the sheets aside and walks to stand in front of the open window that overlooks the courtyard below. He allows the sun to bathe his body in warmth. Each according to its nature Hannibal thinks. In bed, Du Maurier does not deny her nature, she becomes.

As sunlight had warmed the window sills and moved across the carpet, Du Maurier had slipped out of his bed, her lips caressing Hannibal's in a silent adieu. Hannibal had made no move to interrupt her as she dressed and walked out his bedroom door, checking her watch as usual.

He would see her soon enough. He always did. They lived only an hour's drive from each other, as they had done in Baltimore. In Baltimore, Du Maurier and Hannibal had kept tabs on one another, struck a balance as it were, a truce of sorts freezing all the pieces on the board. Until Will Graham.

Will had upset the chess board. Du Maurier would say Hannibal had allowed his obsession to get the better of him, that it was Hannibal who disrupted the board. Hannibal smiles. The board had become dull anyway. With barely a breath, Will had swept away the dust from its cracks and crevices, and rearranged the pieces. Hannibal will never play chess the same way again.

As for Will, Will has disappointed him; wounded him even, but Hannibal would have expected nothing less of talent such as Will Graham. Now, the wound is all Hannibal has of him and he holds it tightly, like a keepsake.

A life without regret would be no life at all. That being the case; Will should have a very full life. Hannibal often finds himself wondering what Will is doing wherever he is. Hannibal is aware the FBI was not kind to Will and they essentially washed their hands of him. Imagine that.

He does imagine Will trying to rehabilitate his mind near another fish filled stream with miles of forest and dirt road all around having abandoned his former residence. Perhaps he even found a place near the ocean as he often talked about. Wherever he is, Hannibal is sure he is tormented with whiskey soaked dreams and acrid blood stained memories. Perhaps when he thinks of Will; Will is thinking of him, too.

Hannibal's thoughts return to Du Maurier. He never thinks of her by her first name. He wonders why that is and then loses interest. What does she want? And why does she want it now? Hannibal sighs. It is a terrible thing not to be able to trust your psychiatrist.

As his psychiatrist, Du Maurier had been insightful and Hannibal had valued her insight. Even now, it is a role she does not relinquish easily despite her claims to the contrary. She does provide him ample opportunity to keep his mind sharp.

As his colleague, Hannibal's lips twist into a wry smile at the preferred euphemism, she had protected their mutual interests with a compass pointing to self-preservation. Hannibal can overlook this. Her professional practicality had facilitated his escape. Leaving the U.S. would have been much more difficult without her.

However, her professional visit to the Baltimore State Hospital to see Will Graham was an act of ruthlessness worthy of Hannibal himself. She had crossed a line and he had yet to confront her about this highly personal interference. She would claim she acted in her own best interest, she might even claim she was curious, but Hannibal knows her reasons are far more complicated. Hannibal is not certain he could conjure the requisite aloofness required for such a confrontation and is content to ruminate upon the topic a while longer.

As his lover, she has her talents; talents she has clearly refined of late. Her performance last evening almost persuades…

If Du Maurier is the sumptuous main course, Alana Bloom had been the ultimate dessert. She had been a guilty pleasure he had welcomed into his bed. She had been to Hannibal as fragrant as a blossom after the rain and as delicious as new wine. A raven-haired beauty, endowed with long gorgeous locks that fell to her breasts along with pliant mouth and legs, Hannibal had reveled in the taste of her as she had given herself over to him. She had been an entirely different animal than Du Maurier.

Ultimately, she had been a means to an end, a necessary pawn sacrificed for the psychological advantage she had afforded Hannibal over Will. Alana had graced his dinner table with her company many times and she would have provided a most succulent entrée had there been more time. He had been quite fond of Dr. Bloom, a most favorite lamb.

However, neither of them could provide the banquet Hannibal had anticipated with Will. Will was an excuse for gluttony and Hannibal could have gorged himself upon plate after plate. Hannibal had systematically encouraged the co-dependency Will accused him of fostering even as Will was falling into a prescribed pattern of behavior as familiar and comforting to him as his flannel shirts. His awareness had made no difference, in fact, his awareness worked against him since Hannibal had only to misdirect Will's attentions elsewhere.

Yes, Will would have been an eager participant in his own deflowering if not for Jack. Will would have been content to explore and experience his becoming under the guise of working for the FBI a little longer if not for Jack. After a time, Hannibal would have dispensed with Jack and Will would have thanked him for it. Or Will would have taken care of Jack himself. Hannibal muses a moment on how that scenario might have played out…

If only there had been more time, and less Jack, Will would have been his. Will had been so close after Randall and Mason, ripe and ready for the plucking. Hannibal had understood Will's need to flee from the urges that terrified him. Hannibal had understood because he remembered his own terror. He had endured the anguish that came with sloughing off his cocoon to allow his true self to emerge. Once embraced, the terror receded. Will had been almost ready to surrender to that embrace.

Hannibal's emergence had been abetted by a few but was largely his own accomplishment. He had endured alone. He would have helped Will; been the mentor and companion Hannibal had never had. But Jack had pushed, and Will had panicked. Hannibal should have remembered that terror that night in the kitchen, but he had not. Consequences…

His hatred had been festering for hours, hot like a boil on his skin. Still fresh and adrenaline flushed from his altercation with Jack and Alana, he had stood behind Will as he had faced Abigail. Will had turned slowly around to face him. Drenched from the rain with pistol hanging from limp hand to brush defeated against slim hip, eyes tightly shut as he had tried to wrap his mind around what his eyes had just seen. His words had tumbled out in a single sob that tore from his chest.

You were supposed to leave…

But Hannibal had not. He had wanted to punish Will. To cut him as deeply as Will had cut him. Show him what he had forsaken for the FBI. For Jack.

We couldn't leave without you…

Hannibal had waited while the implications of his words penetrated Will's wet skull. Without hesitation, Will had closed the space between them, had pressed his cheek in answer to Hannibal's outstretched hand. Had he even noticed the knife clenched in Hannibal's other hand? Hannibal had stroked Will's face and stared into those captivating blue eyes one last time. Hannibal remembers the anger, the hate roiling inside him. And the boil had burst. Hate prompted action, and act he had.

The first act; a quick sure cut had caused Will to shudder in shock, the second; a twisting of razor sharp linoleum in soft white flesh had sent Will into his arms, an embrace of heat, blood, and agony. Hannibal had stroked wet curls and had endured the grinding of tear stained cheeks as Will had shaken his head against his shoulder while Hannibal had spoken of teacups and time.

Hannibal had let him slip to the floor to slump against the cabinets, already smeared with Jack's blood. And he had felt a few seconds of euphoric satisfaction gazing down at Will, shirt wet and dark, mouth twisted in pain but eyes, so clear, seeing him, truly seeing Hannibal.

I let you know me, see me. I gave you a rare gift, but you didn't want it.

The hate had spewed like venom from the viper's mouth. And then Will had uttered the words that dropped like stones into the pit of his stomach.

"Didn't I?"

Will had struggled to speak, body quaking in spasms, his face pale as the blood flowed as from a fountain, his heart still beating strong in his chest and Hannibal could hear it; hears it still. Hannibal recoils from the memory but it remains causing his chest to seize up, his lips to twist. Will had spit those words from his mouth with such bitterness that Hannibal could not doubt the words were true.

Will had betrayed him. But the betrayal had been a symptom of inexperience, of fear. Will's imagination, his gift, had been unable to grapple with all the images, feelings, and possibilities. Unable to reconcile what he wanted with what he knew he was supposed to want; unable to reconcile what he needed with what those around him needed, what Jack needed. He had needed more time.

In his desire to injure the one who had injured him, Hannibal had acted without thinking it through; he had not acted in pure hate. The hate had been impure, spurred by the injury of Will's betrayal. The festering poison had guided Hannibal's hands. He had caressed Will's face gently, brought him close and then with the same hands that had loved him; had rendered the irreversible punishment.

Only Will could cause Hannibal to lose his mind like that. Only Will could cause Hannibal to feel blood stained fingers ripping through his rib cage, splitting and cracking bone to reach his heart. And having reached it, Hannibal feels Will squeezing until a chunk of beating muscle slips into Will's hand and he rips it away. Hannibal wishes Will would take the rest. Better to have no heart at all than this…

Hannibal rips the soiled bedding from the mattress nearly tearing the fabric. Du Maurier feels like a consolation prize. Will should be here. Abigail should be here. Even after a year, Hannibal cannot reconcile the loss. He accepts the aching, takes strength from the aching. And yet, what he would not give to have it stricken from his chest altogether.

Did you believe you could change me the way I changed you?

I already did…

I forgive you, Will. Can you forgive me?

Compelled to finish what he had started, Hannibal had beckoned to his adopted daughter, his beloved Abigail, and had watched Will's eyes fill with the terrible knowledge of what he was about to do. Stuttered pleas dropped from wet lips onto deaf ears as Hannibal had plunged the same slippery linoleum blade into Abigail's scarred throat, laying open wound and memory. He had watched her blood spray warm and thick across Will's face to mingle with his own.

Poor Abigail had been a victim of failed paternal love. Loved and ruined by her fathers; one father who had tried to kill her, another who did, and the one who could not save her. The tea cup shattered again.

Hannibal has never destroyed something he loved before. He reminds himself the destruction is part of the becoming but he knows he mourns this loss of innocence in particular. Events have already transformed Will. The teacher who had sat in Jack Crawford's office, indignant and annoyed at Hannibal for psychoanalyzing him is gone. Hannibal does not know the Will Graham who emerged from his blood soaked kitchen. Hannibal had been forced to leave Will to his own devices at a crucial moment in his transformation.

Hannibal snaps the fresh russet colored satin sheet in the air, watches a shimmer of the luxuriant fabric catch the sun, a faint reminder of curly brown locks, until it settles on the bed. He methodically makes the bed, first one corner at the top then, the opposite corner at the bottom, then the other bottom corner, then top for the perfect fit.

Hannibal's screaming mind is quieted in the repetitive movements of the task. Control. He can no longer control Will. He smiles and corrects himself; as if he ever could. Hannibal could never predict Will. That was the attraction.

He unfurls the top sheet, allows it to settle and methodically tucks it around the mattress, fold, tuck, fold, tuck, until the sheet sits pristine. He deftly slips pillows into the soft golden shams, evoking the rich burnished yellow of a Masaccio halo. Submission is the truest measure of power; and love is expressed in the relinquishing of that power. Du Maurier will never submit. It is not her nature. A viper will devour another viper. But a mongoose can be trained to temper its bite.

Whatever you are doing with Will Graham; stop.

Hannibal pulls the thin summer blanket across the bed, and then the maroon and gold dappled bedspread, tucking the pillows uniformly before smoothing the spread once more. Du Maurier believes she has earned the right to gloat, to remind Hannibal in countless ways of his pupil's failure. His betrayal. His ability to manipulate Hannibal like no one had ever done.

Will's manipulation of Hannibal and by extension, his betrayal is evidence of his pupil's mastery and a testament to Hannibal's skilful instruction. Will's only failure had been his inability to manage his fear and confusion, and Hannibal must take his share of the responsibility for that.

Du Maurier might very well understand this. In that case, she is intent on casting Will as inept, lacking, and thereby calling into question Hannibal's selection of him and levelling criticism at his methods. Is it her intent to sow the seeds of self-doubt to place Hannibal in her debt and to elevate herself in Hannibal's eyes?

That she, of all people, bore witness to how totally Hannibal had succumbed should be truly galling. That she had to save Hannibal from himself should be even more galling. He should be fortunate to have Du Maurier looking out for his interests.

Hannibal turns this over in his mind. Her visit to Will while he was under Chilton's care at the hospital had perhaps had multiple goals. To change the time table, encouraging Will to alter the pacing was only one. Will's resolve had taken quite a blow at that point. No one believed in him, not his accusations, and not in his innocence. Interfering with Hannibal's strategy had been engineered to vex Hannibal and firmly establish herself as another victim of Hannibal's manipulations.

And, she had not only been studying Will, but through Will, she had been studying Hannibal as well.

You spend a lot time building walls, Hannibal. It's natural to want to see if someone is clever enough to climb over them.

Hannibal was not the only one building walls. She had visited Will to give him a leg up to scale Hannibal's walls all the while defending her own.

A conversation with Will fills Hannibal's mind. It had been shortly after Margot Verger had begun her sessions and Jack and Will had interviewed Randall Tier. Will had speculated on what would happen if Hannibal's patients compared notes. He had asked how many patients had Hannibal persuaded like Tier, like him?

And, Margot and Will had no doubt shared much more than a bed. Will had mentioned Du Maurier's visit to him this same session. If Hannibal were to extrapolate from Will's train of thought, Du Maurier must have introduced a similar association to him. Planted a seed in the fertile soil of Will's imagination and then disappeared, allowing the seed to germinate in Hannibal's garden.

Hannibal opens the blinds all the way to let the morning sun bathe his bedroom in color. As the room brightens, Hannibal watches the way the sunlight reveals the tiny particles of dust that float in the air, released from his careful ministrations until they settle once again, invisible to the naked eye. He wipes a finger across his bureau and stares at the filmy substance collected on his finger. Hannibal wonders why he had not seen it before.

Quite simply, Du Maurier has been dust on his fingers. Will had not merely blown the dust away from the board, in rearranging the pieces he had unwittingly made himself the prize. Du Maurier means to deny Hannibal his prize. She is dust alighting on the entire board, invisible until captured in the light.

The viper had prompted the mongoose to bite her mate quickening the tempo of a dance to which she had not been invited. The queen was a most formidable piece, but one's position on the board was just as important. The dust has settled in the light.

How appropriate then to encourage the queen to move closer having dispensed with a few pawns. To let her believe he has been saved. That he has seen the error of his ways. He has mourned his loss for a year. That is customary, is it not?

Hannibal looks at his reflection in the full length mirror that hangs on the door of the antique armoire of wood varnished black over the centuries. He tilts his head, first one way then the other and is pleased with the visage he now presents. The blanched and pallid complexion wrought from years of enduring long, frigid winters in Baltimore has vanished and been replaced by a sun-kissed tone, more pleasing and deceptively inviting. He notes he even has a little sunburn across his nose and cheeks. He especially likes the shadow of stubble he keeps trimmed just so. The tactile stimulation of whiskers always stirs the most pleasant of associations within Hannibal. After smoothing his knuckles across his jaw, he decides he can leave it a couple more days.

Hannibal actually looks better than he has in years. He has missed Europe, especially the vibrant scenery and culture around the Mediterranean. So many places to visit, to hunt, to fish…

Let Du Maurier believe what she likes so long as it serves to reveal her true agenda to Hannibal. If she does not believe him saved, she will continue to monitor, to interfere, and to deflect. Hannibal needs only to lift an errant finger in Will's direction and Du Maurier will come running to assess the opportunity cost of remaining or fleeing him altogether. Wasn't it Machiavelli who wisely advised the Medici to keep one's friends close, but keep one's enemies closer?

He walks into the bathroom, arranges the various sundries he will use in the shower, and turns on the water to run for a bit. He steps in and begins to soap up. He washes his body and shampoos his hair the same way, in the same order each time. He is generally quick and efficient in the shower, unless there is a good reason to languish. Hannibal misses a proper soak in a tub. It has been a long while since he took a good long soak. Of course, the next best thing is watching someone else take a good long soak…

Hannibal splashes his face once more and steps out to grab the over-sized towel from the vanity. He allows an indulgent smile as he glances down at himself. He really must stop thinking about Will in the shower.

Hannibal dries off and as he stands in front of his closet, towel slung around his hips, he recalls the forecast for rain today and selects an appropriate ensemble. He dresses slowly and his thoughts turn once again to his predicament with Du Maurier. He doubts she is any more generous in her assessment of their relationship. If she thought she could kill him she would but it would seem she has decided to quite literally crawl in bed with him instead.

Hannibal finds her protestations about Graham amusing to say the least. Having finally seen him in the flesh, Hannibal has no doubt she found herself smitten with him as well. It was perhaps inevitable that Du Maurier would be curious about Graham, would have to see for herself the madness and the man who held her colleague enrapt. He had been a most singular topic of conversation between them for months.

Will had clearly made an impression and Hannibal wishes he could have been a fly on the wall. The subtle curve of her lips when she says his name now is indictment enough. Hannibal can only imagine the swell in her breasts, the quickening of blood as her heart must have pumped faster, and the dilating of her pupils as her eyes had devoured him in his dingy gray hospital suit, fingers wrapped around the bars of his dank and desolate cell.

He ties his shoes and stands to admire himself in the mirror. He looks quite handsome in his chosen attire. He wears earth tones now, foregoing the plaid, he prefers solid colors for his suits and accents them with the finest silk blends of patterned tailored shirts. No more three piece suits either. Not in this heat. He looks like a professor. Well dressed, older, polite to the point of frustration one would think him British if not for the accent.

Hannibal studies the huge finely carved Rococo-styled bed while recalling another, less ornate but infinitely more desirable bed. Du Maurier is eager to demonstrate to Hannibal that it is she who belongs here. Perhaps she does belong, in this bed. But not in the bed that exists in his memory palace.

Hannibal shuts the armoire and moves to apply a light sheen of mousse to his hair and a splash of cologne. Du Maurier could learn a few things from Will Graham. Effective manipulation requires actual feelings to be present.

Of all Hannibal's caterpillars, it is Will who captivated Hannibal. First, with his mind until Hannibal could no longer separate the beauty of the mind from the beauty of the man. Gradually, almost painfully Will had reached deep into Hannibal's being and claimed a piece for himself. Will's betrayal confirmed that unquestionably. Hannibal has not felt whole since that night.

Hannibal sees he had been blinded by his pride in Will and by his affection for Will. Will's failure was ultimately, Hannibal's failure. Though, Will had proven himself an apt pupil and had been completely convincing. Hannibal had fallen so utterly under Will's spell that he had been genuinely astounded when he discovered Will's deception. The deception could not be ignored because it had been right under his nose. Once again, Hannibal's olfactory sensitivity had alerted him of impending danger. That the danger was Will had hurt.

Even so, Hannibal had offered him one last opportunity to correct his mistake. Hannibal could be forgiving. A novice he was, everything still so new, his beautiful mind alternately processing and retreating. Had he known Abigail had been upstairs the entire time, would that have made a difference? Hannibal thinks it would have. But Hannibal wanted Will to agree to come with him. Abigail had been the surprise, the reward.

We could disappear, now tonight. Feed your dogs. Leave a note for Alana and never see her or Jack again. Almost polite…

Then this would be our last supper.

Of this life…

But, Will had refused and the hurt became poison. And Abigail had remained in her bedroom. Of all the things Will had been able to intuit, feel, and see; he had not been able to see behind Hannibal's words. He had not been able to grasp the truth embedded in the metaphors. He could not see another life for himself and so could not see Hannibal's teacup come together, until it was too late.

Hannibal glances up to see his reflection in the mirror. His eyes are wet, stinging as moisture wells up and slowly spills. He can smell the salty tear before he tastes it, lets it linger on the edge of his lip. He takes a deep breath and lets it out slowly, willing his muscles to relax. How many teacups could he shatter?

To the truth then, and all its consequences.

Consequences… The consequences had been shattering for everyone. Hannibal had had many months now to replay the events over and over in his mind. Will had entered his home with gun drawn. Had he drawn the gun for Jack or Hannibal? The only person who could answer that is Will. Hannibal wipes his lips, a quick motion, done. He blinks and begins to adjust his tie in the mirror.

Will had been careless. Had he only showered and changed his clothes after meeting with Freddie Lounds that day, Hannibal would have been none the wiser. Fortunately for Hannibal, Lounds preferred patchouli scented body sprays, most pungent and quite unforgettable, and, Hannibal notes with a sardonic curl of his lips, overbearing much like Lounds herself.

Hannibal wonders still if that slip had been subconscious sabotage on Will's part. Will had likely not even known himself. Had Hannibal's conditioning been that skillful? He would like to think so. Will had been such a perfect vessel, so receptive to whispers, so exquisitely attuned to the caress of patient fingers upon his flesh.

It remains to be seen if Will's performance had indeed been for Hannibal or Jack or to further delude himself. Hannibal suspects that Will is realizing the whispers he hears within his chrysalis are not entirely Hannibal's.

Hannibal surveys his bedroom, arranged identically to the one in Baltimore. But, the light is different here; it lends a luster to the objects and furniture, a promise perhaps of brighter days. A mantle clock chimes softly downstairs and Hannibal reminds himself he still needs to finish preparing his lecture for the board at the Uffizi Gallery.

Victor Boucher, pun intended, has an interview tomorrow. A visiting art historian, Hannibal needs their letters of intent and a contract from the board if he is to remain in Florence. He has no doubt the board will find him an acceptable replacement for his unfortunate predecessor. She had to return to London, apparently to care for a sick relative. She could not ignore the obligations of family and was comfortable in her decision; that her heart was in the right place, or so her letter had stated.

Hannibal knows the contents of her letter having composed it. But the letter did have a ring of truth to it. Her heart was in the right place. Second shelf, front and center, in the climate controlled fridge in his pantry downstairs.

Chapter 8

Chapter Summary

"You don't remember kissing me?" Will asks.
"You let me?" Daniel doubts he would have gotten close enough to kiss Will if Will had not allowed it. According to his file, Will is more than capable of handling himself.
"You caught me off guard." Will says.
"I caught an FBI agent off guard."
"Almost FBI agent." Will corrects him.

Chapter 8

Will and Daniel pick up where they left off, but without the alcohol this time.

"I see Will Graham has an appointment today." Maria says looking up from her computer.

Daniel nods and snorts a reply as he passes in front of her desk on his way to the kitchenette. This is not a conversation he wants to have with her. He retrieves a bottle of water from the fridge and moves to exit the kitchenette in favor of the lobby where the receptionist and staff are located along with a mounted TV and more comfy couches and a coffee table, for the patients. The back stairs to the upper level and his office are right by the door.

He pauses to crack open the bottle before turning to ascend the stairs and feels Maria at his back. She has now effectively cornered him in the kitchenette. She will follow him upstairs so he decides to get it over with. The rest of the staff is otherwise busy with work, but they are very good at appearing busy when they want to.

"So…will we all be leaving early again? I need to call my daughter if that's the case…"

"No. Nobody's leaving early today…unless you would like to." Daniel smiles at her. She looks up at him, purses her lips.

"You'd like that wouldn't you, Dr. Clayton." She nudges him and he nudges back. "Why don't you just invite him home? Wouldn't that be easier?" She says this in a way that means Clayton shouldn't allow Graham anywhere near his home.

"He's my patient, Maria. Stop it." Daniel raises a brow and points a finger at her. "You are overstepping…again."

"Ha! I'm not the one plying patients with liquor after hours." She has the decency to whisper but Daniel's unease is not alleviated.

"That was a mistake and I plan on remedying the mistake this afternoon. And thank you again for tidying up everything before I arrived the next morning. I am not going to discuss this as much as you would like to." He looks over her head toward the stairs, signaling their conversation is over.

Maria touches his tie, pretends to straighten it. "Look, I have known you a long time. I know you don't date patients…"

"Maria…" Daniel gives her a warning look.

"But you like him, don't even deny it. I know that look on your face. And he's cute in that lost puppy kind of way, but he is intense…intensely troubled."

"Meaning?"

"Meaning he seems out of your usual area of expertise. He stared into space like he was catatonic. He had no referral, no medical insurance…"

"He presents a certain challenge but I wouldn't take him as a patient if I didn't believe I could help him." Daniels says.

"Help him, Aye! Help yourself. See that picture over there?" She points to the gilded frame encasing a print of Raphael's Triumph of Galatea.

"I assume you are pointing at Eros?" Clayton says unable to hide the smirk on his face. She knows him so well. Maria is the only member of his staff that could get away with confronting him like this.

"Eros carries two kinds of arrows, Maria." He reminds her.

"Yes, he does, but it is too late for you. He has already drawn his bow and I know which arrow hit its mark." She shakes her head at him, adjusts a pin in her hair. "You tell yourself you are just trying to help. You have a good heart, but he is not a puppy."

"No, but he is lost." Daniel says.

"Yes, I suppose he is. Oh, before I forget…" she pauses and shoves a stray lock of salt and pepper hair from her cheek. Daniel finds the way she uses granny pins to hold up her hair rather endearing. He thinks the pins probably did belong to her grandmother.

"Forget what? Maria." Daniel says, still contemplating the image of Eros and his arrow.

"He's not lost in the liquor cabinet. Give me the keys." She says, quite seriously.

"No need for that. I was joking when I said…"

"Oh, no. Too bad if you were. If I were your mother I'd ground you for at least a month. Now hand them over." Maria holds out her hand, palm up with every expectation that the keys will be placed there momentarily.

"Dr. Clayton. Think of your patient." She says as Daniel rolls his eyes at the ceiling. He quickly surmises this is more about her feeling better about the situation than it is an indictment of his lapse of judgment. Her concern is genuine. And there is that fondness she has for him at the forefront. He knows he reminds her of her own son currently stationed overseas somewhere in Japan.

Daniel reaches in his trouser pocket and pulls out his office keys. He slips off the appropriate key and drops it into her palm. “Happy?”

“That was too easy. You really are concerned about him, aren’t you?” She shoves the key in her pocket. “I’ll put this in a safe place. You’ll be thanking me later.”

“Already am.” Daniel says. He leans over to give her a gentle kiss on the forehead.

“Ah, what would you do without me?”

“Let me give it some thought and I’ll get back to you.” Daniel says as he begins to ascend the stairs. He still has two patients to see before Will arrives.

Will arrives on time, a little early actually. He feels the eyes of the entire office on him as he crosses the lobby to check in. He tells himself this is no different than walking past his students back at the FBI academy. He grits his teeth, keeps his eyes down, and murmurs a greeting to the receptionist. She wears no name tag. Just as well. Less information for Will to process.

“Buongiorno, Mr. Graham.” She says, smiling. “I have some paperwork for you to sign. It is standard forms for billing and so forth. Would you read through it please?”

Will smiles at her English, glances at the forms, and asks, “Can I take care of this on the way out?” There seem to be a lot forms.

A plump woman with salt and pepper hair wrapped in a curious bun in the process of falling from her head emerges from a doorway. She straightens her thin sweater across her ample breasts. She ambles over to the receptionist.

“Hello. I am Maria, the office manager. You are the last appointment today and I suspect no one will be here when you leave, Mr. Graham.” A pause for the unspoken, just like last time.

“Better that you read and sign the releases now.” She gestures to the forms in front of the young receptionist, her hands waiving an invitation for Will to take them.

Will does not like her tone and neither does he like the way either of them is staring at him at the moment. There seems to be some kind of expectation beyond picking up the forms by their expressions. Will thinks he sees amusement in the twist of their smiles. He bites at the inside of his lip. He really would prefer to go over this stuff with Daniel. Especially the billing. He would rather not leave any traceable paperwork in his wake.

“I’ll just take it with me then.” He says taking the pile from the receptionist before she has a chance to reply. He turns and begins to walk up the stairs, shoving the papers in his book bag as he does. No one stops him, so he continues, one step at a time, still feeling the heat of eyes at his back. He can’t get up the steps fast enough, but he forces himself to ascend unhurried, controlling his breathing as he approaches the landing.

He opens the door and walks into Daniel’s office.

“Hey” he says softly so as not to startle Daniel who seems focused on his lap top. Daniel looks up and flashes a quick smile.

Will notes the smile is lacking its usual warmth today. He doesn’t need empathy to figure out why. The irritation of a moment ago is forgotten, as are the forms in his book bag. Daniel is flustered and trying not to show it. He is wearing subdued colors today, mostly gray, and has yet to remove his jacket like he usually does.

Will had figured as much. Well, that makes two of them. Will is simply more comfortable being uncomfortable. Daniel, on the other hand, is used to feeling in control since he usually has the advantage. Unfortunately for Daniel, his empathy is no substitute for memory.

Will smiles in spite of himself. This should be an interesting conversation.

Daniel rises from his chair and walks over to the door to greet Will. Something is different about Daniel. Will’s thoughts begin to churn adding more pigment and texture to the canvas he has already painted of Daniel.

“Hello, Will.” Daniel says his voice tight. He had been fine until Will had walked into the room, a flurry of denim, cotton, soft curls, and oh shit thinks Daniel, those eyes again. Will is disarmingly accessible today, no longer leaves in the wind, more like a force of nature.

Will thinks Daniel says his name too stiffly. He doesn’t want Daniel to start acting all proper on account of getting drunk and frisky. They were both equally to blame, but as Will’s doctor, Daniel likely feels the responsibility more acutely. Will quickly decides to sink that boat and see what else floats.

“Hello, Daniel.” He says, wearing a lop-sided grin and brushing past Daniel in his haste to get to a couch.

Daniel thinks Will shouldn’t use his given name here, in the office, during a session. This is mostly because his name rolls off Will’s tongue like melted butter. He swallows, at once feels slippery warm tongue and the sear of liquor in his throat. Soft whiskers and softer curls beneath his fingers, the tang of sweat and after shave on pale skin and cotton collar. Was he feeling that, or Will?

“I think Dr. Clayton is more appropriate in this context, don’t you?” Daniels says, too quickly, absently holding the door aloft. Will stops in his tracks, half turns, and looks aside.

“Oh, well Daniel was ok before, but whatever makes you more comfortable…doctor.” Will hears the door slam behind him.

A soft sigh escapes Will. This is new territory for him. He’s not sure how to take it from here. He decides now would be the right time to give Daniel the present he brought. He reaches into his book bag, retrieves the bottle of Jim Beam.

“Here,” Will says, “To replace your stash.”

Daniel numbly takes the bottle from Will’s hands and feels an assortment of emotions from him flash within, among them, the warmth of affection. The soft flutter of lashes as Will looks at him confuses Daniel even more. Daniel’s fingers find his tie while his mind takes momentary refuge in the tactile stimulation.

Daniel calms himself. He let his shield down before Will arrived. His idea was to encourage trust. But, now he thinks his emotions are becoming mixed up with Will's unless…he can't tell the difference because Will is feeling the same as he is.

Will realizes why Daniel feels differently today. There is no shield; he has laid it down for Will. Daniel's presence is not gentle mist upon faint shadow and Will's thoughts about him are not scrambled and disjointed as they had been during previous meetings, before the whiskey. This is the Daniel from the other night, now sober and painfully aware of being so.

As Daniel touches Will's mind, the act of empathizing does not cause Will to instinctively retreat in search of impressions to analyze as it invariably does if his shield is up. Daniel's quiet mist has already slipped into his consciousness, a gentle spray of surf on a warm summer's day. Will can almost taste the salt and feel the sand at his feet.

When Daniel had moved from pleasantly buzzed to shit faced, Will's consciousness had been inundated with these same impressions. The utter sensuousness of the sea and sand coupled with smooth whiskey and smoother lips had washed over Will making him realize how brittle and sour he has become.

Will, we both know the unreality of taking a life, of people who die when we have no other choice. In these moments they are not flesh but light and air and color.

Isn't that what it is to be alive?

Daniel is very much light, and air, and color. But he is very definitely flesh, too.

It is unlikely that Daniel has this effect on anyone else, just Will. If anyone had been affected like Will had been, Daniel would surely have been informed by now. Will intends to, as soon as he can find the words.

"I saw your car out front. I'm really sorry." Will says, taking his seat. He watches Daniel sit in his usual couch, but Daniel's expression is anything but the usual.

"The car is…peripheral. What do you think happened? Between us, I mean?" Daniel is sure that Will does not miss the veiled question beneath the question. "Even without your empathy, you probably know everything about me." Oddly, Daniel feels relief.

Will laughs and adjusts his glasses, "People with empathy disorders should be careful who they get drunk with. We were asking for it as soon as you poured me a glass and I accepted. Things happened more quickly than we could process them; and that is all that happened, Daniel."

Daniel sits quietly, lips parted not sure if he should smile or not. Perhaps that was all Will wanted to have happened. He also doubts Will is ever going to address him as doctor now unless he absolutely has to. He supposes it doesn't matter at this point.

Will would like to see Daniel smile. "I don't know everything about you, but I know more than you intended. I gather this is a first for you."

"Try not to look so smug. I get the distinct feeling a little more happened than I remember. So, let me apologize for my behavior." Daniel says, "Now, would you fill me in on what it is I am apologizing for."

"You really don't remember?

"No, Will, I don't."

"You might eventually remember everything…what do you remember?"

"I remember being…very trashed. Again, I apologize. Very unprofessional but given the circumstances, not surprising. We talked and drank. I remember some of the conversation and I must have blacked out. How friendly did we get?"

"Very friendly. The kind of friendly that can't be mistaken for any other kind of friendly."

Will shakes his head as he says this, the little lines around his mouth and the creases at the corners of his eyes deepen with the smile that creeps along his lips as a flush of pink colors his cheeks.

As far as Daniel can tell, Will has a very clear memory of the other night. And, the memories appear to be good if Will's demeanor is any indicator. Will's emotions concur.

Encouraged, Daniel says, "And you kept your appointment, anyway. Look, Will…I think that we need to clear the air before we can continue. What do you think?"

"I think…I would like a drink." Will grins broadly, knowing full well the effect his non-answer and his smile will have on Daniel.

"Very funny. Not a chance." Daniel bites at the inside of his cheek and thinks what a little tease Will is. He is actually being coy.

"You don't remember flirting with me?" Will asks eyes cast down, fingers playing across the arm of the couch.

"Clearly not. But…that is entirely possible."

"You don't remember kissing me?" Will asks.

"You let me?" Daniel doubts he would have gotten close enough to kiss Will if Will had not allowed it. According to his file, Will is more than capable of handling himself.

"You caught me off guard." Will says.

"I caught an FBI agent off guard."

"Almost FBI agent." Will corrects him.

"Are you are upset I don't remember the kissing or that I don't remember kissing you?"

"Which are you more upset about?" Will counters.

"Did you kiss me back?" Daniel says evenly.

Silence. Will shifts in his seat. The rosy blush returns, spreads from his neck, likely to his ears if Daniel could see them through the curls.

Clayton leans forward, actually enjoying this way more than he should. “Oh, you did. And you didn’t stop, did you. Didn’t push me away or slug me?”

“You know, I could have your license revoked, Dr. Clayton.” Will sets his jaw, his composure intact as his eyes meet Daniel’s once again

“Uh-huh. Would you like me to kiss you again?” He leans forward slightly allowing his knee to brush across Will’s trouser leg. Daniel watches the blush grow darker still.

“Maybe later…” Will’s voice trails off. The whisper of contact from Daniel brings the other night fully into his consciousness. It is the most recent encounter of the physical kind that Will has had. Every sensation prickles all over his skin. He used to be better at this.

“Why did you kiss me, anyway?”

“I would think the obvious. What did I say?” Daniel leaves his leg where it is, grazing the fabric of Will’s jeans.

The two exchange a look. Will looks aside but the corners of his mouth twist up a little. He knows Daniel’s knee remains because Will wants it there.

“You didn’t say anything. And I didn’t ask. We just sort of fell on the couch here…” A helpless awkward frown forms on Will’s lips. “You don’t remember anything? Really? You’re fucking with me, right?”

“Sadly, no.” Daniel retorts. “How far did it go? On the couch I mean.”

“Not far. Nobody took their clothes off or anything.”

“Why did we stop?” Daniel says.

“I stopped. Because I realized how drunk you were. How drunk I was. It didn’t seem…right.”

”It wasn’t. I don’t know what I was thinking. Well, I can imagine… Shit. I sure as hell don’t need to add to your anxiety.”

“That’s the thing. I wasn’t anxious. To be honest, I was enjoying it until I started really thinking about it. I knew what I was doing, but I was sure you didn’t, wouldn’t have…if you were sober.”

“Saved from hating myself in the morning. Quite the southern gentleman, you are.” Daniel pauses, “I take it that tumble on the couch was a first for you?”

Will hesitates before answering. There is a slight furrowing of his brow as he looks aside, his mind clearly at work. Daniel waits to see if Will offers an honest answer.

Will does not want to discuss tumbling on couches or couches in any general sense of the word.

“Well, besides needing to renegotiate our boundaries,” Will says, fidgeting once again. His fingers trace along the fabric of the couch. “There are implications here other than questions of sexual orientation. Besides, I haven’t had any in so long, I am not surprised.” Will looks to the bookcases seeming very surprised he confessed so much in a couple sentences.

“Christ, Will. You didn’t have to tell me that.” Daniel says taking in the pale blue eyes and the tightly drawn mouth. Several inappropriate thoughts run through Daniel’s brain and he reprimands himself, but the attraction is not going to go away. More importantly, Will did not really answer his question but Daniel decides not to press the issue. They have time.

“Oh, I think you had some idea. Empathy aside, you are still a psychiatrist. You’d have asked me… eventually.” Will says.

He has never met a psychiatrist who did not bring sex into therapy at some point. Even Chilton had attempted to somehow associate sex, or Will’s lack of it, with his violent pathology and delusions of playing god. Poor Frederick. If only it was that simple.

“Probably. “ Daniel agrees. “But only in regard to your overall physical and mental health. Why? Are there some issues you want to talk about?”

“Now who’s funny? I guess you’re going to refer me to a sexual therapist?” Will says half laughing.

“Waste of time. You wouldn’t go.” Daniel rolls his head against the back of the couch. “What do you think was going on between us?”

“Well,” Will rubs at his jaw, “I think it works like this; you feel my emotions in real time whereas I understand yours through the projection I have created of you in my imagination. We can apparently influence each other’s emotions and emotions lead to actions. I guess I was in better shape than you to analyze it all.”

“So all this happened because of the drinking?”

“The liquor was a factor but you are the variable here.”

“I am?”

“Before the other night, you had your defenses whatever they are up…your shield.”

“Ok.

“Your shield came down with the whiskey. When it did, the effect on me was clear.”

“Effect? What effect?”

“You are a mirror, right? You can actually feel other people’s emotions as clearly as your own.”

“Yes.”

“You keep your emotions separate from what you sense, that is your shield. Right?”

“Yes.”

“Well, your empathy does project whether you realize it or not. It’s just that other people aren’t affected by it, except maybe you make them feel calm. Which, I guess is a good thing for your patients. If your shield is up, you empathize and no one notices. If your shield is down, the only one who notices is you.

"With me, shield up means I sense you as that mist we talked about. Shield down, like the other night, means that mist has substance, it is suffused with all kinds of impressions that bring all the things I see about you in my mind into full focus. A focus I don't get when your shield is up."

"So, I am an open book to you."

"My empathy is not a substitute for mind reading. You aren't an open book but I can read between the lines. You are empathizing right now. Your shield is down."

Daniel nods. "How does focus feel to you?"

"Where there had been only muted color, there is saturation. And like the other night, if I open up when you are opened up, the emotional transfer becomes all tangled up. It's why you did not register to me before. I didn't associate the mist with you. My subconscious was preoccupied with constructing an impression that kept changing, readjusting."

"How did you come up with this?" asks Daniel.

"I've had a couple days to think about it." Will says, "And believe me, I thought about it a lot."

"Yeah, well, I've had a couple days to beat myself up over it."

Will holds up a hand. "It's ok, really. Your ethics are not on trial here. I take as much blame as you. I feel a little awkward about it, but I don't want you to feel badly. I don't want it to affect our working relationship."

"Well, it will, you know. So this is what happens when we let our defenses down. I suspect you have profiled me by now, huh?"

Will appreciates Daniel's directness. "I have. Although I keep learning about you as we talk." Will rises from the couch, begins to circle the room.

"You want me to tell you?" Will asks.

"I told you what I felt about you at our first meeting. Seems only fair, I guess."

Again, the offer of reciprocity, of trust. Daniel remains unguarded; shield still cast aside for Will even though Will's forts remain securely closed to him. Will's estimation of Daniel continues to climb higher.

"I walked around your office the other night. I think I looked at every single object in the room. I watched your reactions as I touched things."

Will pauses in front of the bookcase that holds among books, the Greek plates, and plenty of other art pieces and framed diplomas. "You pushed yourself through school and had the grades and bona fides to meet all the right people. A little family clout, maybe?"

Daniel nods in agreement but permits Will to continue without interruption.

"You travel and don't mind decorating your office with mementos, but I suspect the good stuff is at your house. You display enough to appear successful, but not so much that you show off. You are not comfortable with your wealth, or are at least uncomfortable with how it makes people see you.

"The items you collect are meaningful to you, not random souvenirs to prove you've been there. You savored the experience of searching for these things. Life is valuable to you and you intend not to waste yours.

"Your concern for others, for other people's feelings is evident everywhere. The office is inviting, carefully constructed to put people at ease, appeal to mood with colors that evoke nature, especially the ocean. Your empathy can be overpowering for you, as it is for me. You are very private and about as social as I am."

Will looks to Daniel who is watching him intently from the couch. Will's thoughts turn to the print of the beach scape hanging close by. He hesitates, ambivalence hanging from threads in Will's mind like the gulls suspended in flight in Daniel's photo. The print is dated August, 1999. Daniel would have been about nineteen.

Daniel knows that Will has taken his office apart piece by piece, removing all but the most relevant pieces and has rearranged those like evidence in a crime scene. Will has already assumed Daniel's perspective, has already, in essence, been the ghost of Daniel's past. Will's conflicted pause says it all.

"You've had an awful lot of time to profile me, Will. That is not all you came away with, accurate though it is."

"You're right." Will edges closer to the lovingly matted and finely framed print.

"You took this photo." Will pauses again. The print is the piece that has pricked his imagination and sits in Will's brain like a splinter.

"This…this is the key to understanding you. Because you are tied to it. It is large enough to be seen from anywhere in the room and it faces your desk so that you can look up and see it anytime. And you look at it all the time."

Daniel flinches. He knew Will would see him stripped down to his core, but the knowing hasn't made it any easier. He has certainly set himself up, made a mess of things between the whiskey laced kisses he can almost taste as he stares at Will and the pounding in his chest that hammers away under Will's scrutiny.

"Well," Will says, "Something happened there that has defined your life ever since. You experienced a brush with death. It's why you value every minute. I feel this beach every time I look at you." Will pauses, licks his lips as he thinks. "You are ocean breeze, deafening surf and soft wet sand, salt and brine on my tongue. This place…it follows you."

Daniel sits quiet and still. Will understands that Daniel has been upset with himself the last couple days. If Daniel cannot handle exposing his own secrets and wounds, he will not be able to handle Will's. Will can only temper the experience so much.

"I think I understand, but you can keep this…to yourself, you know." Will says as he slips his hands into his pockets.

Daniel looks at the print and then back at Will. He would never discuss his personal life with a patient, but Will is no longer just a patient. Will is likely to be as much a defining part of his life as that strip of beach. Daniel senses sadness in Will, directed at him, pooling in Will's eyes as Will gazes at him without looking away.

Daniel swallows his trepidation. He cannot expect Will to shed his secrets if he isn't prepared to do the same. It doesn't matter that Daniel's secrets do not light a candle to Will's, what matters is that he is willing to talk openly about them.

"I will tell you the short version. No doubt you know too well how growing up with this…empathy is not easy. I didn't understand it and I had no idea how to explain it to other people. I would get in trouble at school and home for blurting out things, contradicting people, especially adults. I had my issues, always in therapy. High school was…a nightmare.

"Finally, I finished my first year at college. I came home for the summer. I had no real friends. My family loved me, love me still, but they find me difficult to deal with. I…make them uncomfortable being able to know and intuit so much about them all the time. It's like they have no privacy. At least that is what they have all told me in some way or another.

"Thanks, but no thanks." Will says.

"Exactly." Daniel takes a moment to breathe deeply, prepares himself to finish.

"So, I take a drive to the beach, to Cape Henlopen…" he nods at the photo hanging next to Will, "….by myself of course. I take a cooler, a blanket, beach chair and I sit all day soaking up the sun, reading… I have to stay and wait until the beach clears out. The life guards don't leave until five and people will hang around until the sun starts to sink behind the dunes."

Will is watching Daniel as he speaks, but Daniel's eyes are focused on the print, remembering as he looks into the waves rolling onto the sand, the gulls frozen in the cloudless sky. Will recognizes that faraway look on Daniel's face. He imagines he looks very much the same a lot of the time.

"I had a miserable freshman year. The thought of going back…well I figured I would swim out and not swim back. Then I got to thinking how my suicide would taint the beach for my family. How they would never be able to go there again without thinking of me and what I had done. I would poison something I really truly loved.

"At that point, I was alone on the beach. The sun was almost gone. It was perfect. I could have swam out until I couldn't swim any more, looked back and my last image would have been a sunset beyond the dunes and beach grass. But I knew I wasn't going to do it.

"So I packed up my stuff. Walked back to my car. Drove home. Never thought about killing myself again. I somehow managed to get through school, one day at a time."

"Your empathy saved you. You knew what suicide would do to the other people in your life and you could focus on that, listen to that instead of hearing only yourself." Will says.

"I had stopped seeing psychologists, therapists, and psychiatrists after high school, so I have never really discussed it with anyone, even after all this time. But I took that picture to remind me of what I almost did. That there should be something I can point to in my life every day that makes me feel like I made the right choice."

Will looks to the print again, he sees himself sitting on the beach, at the water's edge, setting sun at his back as light shimmers like diamonds across the waves, so peaceful, so inviting to feel the cool dark depths take him down.

"Will?"

Will glances back to Daniel, eyes clear and inviting as always. Will points a finger at him, and there is a hint of a smile as he speaks.

"And as he, who with laboring breath has escaped from the deep to the shore, turns to the perilous waters and gazes."

"Ah, a gentleman and a scholar." Daniel grins, "I like Dante, too."

"Yeah…a favorite quote from his Divine Comedy. I rarely get the opportunity to use my classical education. It seemed… appropriate."

"It certainly was. Then, I'll counter with this one. "Midway upon the journey of our life, I found myself within a forest dark, for the straightforward pathway had been lost."

Will is quiet now. Daniel is gazing up at him from his seat on the couch. Will walks over to his couch and sits, reclining slowly until he feels the upholstery firm against his back.

"You want to hear about my dark forest now, I guess."

"As your psychiatrist, I think it's time."

"You have managed to become more than my psychiatrist." Will says.

"Good. You don't seem to like psychiatrists."

"My reasons should become abundantly clear. You have probably figured my straightforward pathway became lost with Hobbs and the Chesapeake Ripper."

"Your profiles of both killers have taken up permanent residence in your mind. But it's the Ripper who tore your mind apart. Your fort around him doesn't insulate you, does it?"

"No. What would you say is the primary question in your mind about my relationship with the Ripper?"

"That's easy. Why him? Who was he that he got so close and twisted you up?"

"I have an easy answer for you. He was my psychiatrist."

Will watches Daniel's jaw drop. He waits while Daniel recovers. He allows him to chew on the morsel Will has presented him. He trusts that Daniel will recognize he is but tasting only the appetizer and the meal Will is serving will become more difficult to swallow with every course.

"Jesus Fucking Christ, Will." Daniel doesn't even breathe and exhales after realizing he has been holding his breath. "How…how could you even bring yourself to come here?"

"Because only another psychiatrist can help me. I told you I need a counterweight. I can only hope you are up to the task. My gut tells me you are."

Will's eyes hold Daniel's; his gaze is steady and darkly compelling. He can almost feel the clamor of Will's heartbeat superimposed on his own.

"And I was worried about the audition. Shit. You have to tell me everything, you know that."

“I intend to. That bottle of Beam is looking pretty good about now, isn’t it?”

Chapter 9

Chapter Summary

Bedelia indulges her sexual fantasies in her hot tub. At least until she is interrupted...

Chapter 9

Bedelia relaxes in her hot tub. Not for long.

Du Maurier stares out of the kitchen window of her home, gazing at the birds fluttering and preening around the rustic stone bird bath. She switches the phone to her other ear, but within seconds the other ear is burning hot as well.

"I am so pleased Lydia is being released from the hospital today. Of course home is where she belongs…I agree group therapy is not a feasible option at this time."

Lydia's mother continues to chirp at the other end, repeating what the doctors had told her about her daughter's relapse and suicide attempt for what seemed an interminable amount of time but, as Du Maurier glances at her watch, has really only been a quarter of an hour.

Fourteen minutes too long she decides.

"May I ask when you would like me to visit?" Du Maurier interrupts.

The chirping becomes pleading. Du Maurier sets down her glass of afternoon pinot grigio and considers her nails. She skipped her last manicure for another patient's crisis last week. At least that debacle had been interesting.

The death of a loved one always proved difficult to accept, even if the loved one was a cat. Weeks after the pet's demise, the patient had refused to let the animal die. The cat spoke to him, quite literally, beyond the grave, at least according to her patient. Du Maurier had been hard pressed to decide which was more bizarre; that the patient insisted he saw his dead cat, or that it spoke to him.

"Well, of course, if you think my presence necessary for her recovery. I'll pack a bag and leave in the morning. I have some arrangements to make if this is an extended stay…no, no, Lydia is very dear to me. It's no imposition at all. I'll see you tomorrow then."

Du Maurier hangs up, swirls the wine as she makes a mental list of the arrangements she must make to spend some time in Fiesole.

By the time Du Maurier has cleared her calendar, phoned the appropriate services she employs to manage her residence including the security company, the afternoon has gone. She opens up another bottle of wine and slips half a 5mg valium between her lips.

She lights the candles surrounding her hot tub, admiring the ambiance the flickering flames create inside the secluded terrace that encloses the swirling in ground marble pool complete with headrests and wide flat steps that faithfully accommodate unsure feet and dazed brains. All she has left to do is pack.

She unbuttons her blouse, unzips her skirt and slips both articles off. Seconds later, bra, hose, and panties lie on the floor and Du Maurier eases herself into the warm pool and tilts her head back to rest upon the curve of the cool marble.

Her impeccable sleuthing on one Dr. Clayton has been most rewarding. A complete dossier rests on her dining room table, ready for Hannibal when she decides to give it to him. Young Dr. Daniel Barclay Clayton is as financially and academically endowed as he is physically.

He apparently graduated with degrees from Johns Hopkins and completed a short residency there before assuming a most prestigious associate's position in Florence. His curriculum vitae indicated published and peer reviewed research on the therapeutic applications of canines and their ability to empathize with their humans. He has given lectures and been invited to speak at a few psychiatric seminars.

She gathers the oil from beside the pool and massages her arms and legs first, saving torso for later. The fragrance of almonds and musk fill the air.

She wonders why she has never come across him before. He is certainly memorable enough. Then again, he has been practicing in Italy and she…has not. His particular area of psychology will make contact with him easier. Lydia has developed a need for alternative therapy. A new puppy will be just what the doctor orders and Du Maurier now knows a colleague who can assist.

Although moderately wealthy, he keeps a modest residence in Fiesole, and lives alone with his two dogs. Personal information was unremarkable. His family in the states offered no insight.

With the exception of psychiatric seminars, his life is tied to his immediate community. He works. He walks his dogs. He goes to the gym. He goes home. He does this every day. On weekends, he tends his vegetable garden and indulges in a little landscaping. He listens to an eclectic assortment of music played loudly when outside, other times he nods his head in time to whatever he listens to through the earbuds. Some evenings, he plays his piano and occasionally even takes out his violin. He is an accomplished musician. This has been his routine for three weeks.

Conveniently, he is a member of a local gym under the same franchise who owns the gym Du Maurier joined in Siena. She can use her card at any location and use it she has. She has watched Clayton work with his trainer once a week, perform his sets of weight lifting and interval workouts, and run his half hour on the treadmill all while listening to his music, lost in his own mind and unaware of Du Maurier's surveillance of him.

She knows he frequents a pool near his home and she has decided she will introduce herself there. She can confer with him about Lydia; perhaps even persuade him to dinner.

Until then, she can visualize him here, in the tub with her. She lets the carved lip of the marble rest cradle her head, her limbs floating pleasantly on the jets of water. She sinks into a blissful haze conjuring images of green eyes and sensuous mouth, sculpted abdominals, and perfectly swollen cock and balls. Her oil laden fingers wander over her skin, stroking and pressing in a familiar rhythm, her blood pulsing in response.

There is a soft rustling sound at the edge of the tub. Her eyelids flutter open enough to see a lean figure in profile slowly stripping off the cummerbund of an immaculate tuxedo, his soft curls, gently sloping nose, and signature stubble visible in the candlelight. She watches him kick off his shoes and send them tumbling across the tiled floor, then socks. He strips off each component of the suit, eyes lowered and motions measured until a very nude Will Graham stands at the edge of the marble tub, skin pale and perfect as the marble itself save for the raised scar threading across his abdomen.

Her eyes savor him in his nakedness. She is drawn to the thatch of dark hair that curls from his navel down to the erect cock curving up from between his thighs. As he gazes down at her, poised at the edge of blue veined marble, he seems the most beautiful man Du Maurier has ever laid eyes upon.

The wide blue eyes drink her in slowly and Du Maurier feels her body temperature rise even more. His mouth opens slightly, not so much a smile but pink lips part in an audible exhale as he places one foot and then the other into the pool and sinks down into the swirling jets of water. He steals glances at Du Maurier from the other side of the tub, arms resting along the edges of the pool accentuating the muscled shoulders, the definition of the collar bone and the pectorals, nipples bloom russet against the pale skin, erect and glistening.

She beckons to him with one finger and he inclines his head. He slides in beside her and their eyes meet. Du Maurier wants to be undone by those eyes and that mouth. Eyes still open, she tilts her head back in invitation, lays her throat bare to him. His fingers find her throat and the caresses are soft and sure. Lips graze along her skin and teeth nuzzle then prick their way to her mouth. The pressure against her throat is intoxicating.

Soon his fingers are caressing her cheeks and chin as she lies pinned beneath him his body slick, his cock hard. The sensation of a taut male body sliding over her is enough to cause her to arch her back to receive more of that luscious maleness between her legs. She presses her hips against him as his hips grind and he slides his cock teasingly against her clit. She feels his mouth upon hers; searching, pulling at her lower lip with his teeth, tongue forceful and hungry dancing against her own.

Silky skin glides across hers, his body solid and tight in all the right places. And while she cannot get enough of his mouth, she longs to feel his tongue slick over her, explore every inch of her. She writhes beneath him and he seems to intuit what she wants. She feels his mouth cover the nipple of her exposed breast as he cups the other in his warm slippery hand. The tender biting sends shivers through her body and she can feel the swell of anticipation twitching below. The jets of water hum, the tingle of bubbles along her back and legs sends her trembling with the tortuous gnawing of her nipples, mercilessly and alternately caught between Graham’s teeth and fingers.

Soon, they are on the chaise lounge, cushions and towels soaking wet as are they, tangled and dripping over each other, limbs entwined like vines. She feels the drag of his tongue across her navel delighting in the warm slick tracks he makes across her perfumed skin. She can hardly stand it as his mouth parts the wet lips between her legs and she quivers to the touch of tongue and teeth as he consumes her. He bites her inner thigh, hard enough to bruise, but not break skin. She rocks her hips in response, opens her legs wider.

He accepts the invitation, lips tracing higher, administering tiny nips causing her to gasp and flinch in delight. When his mouth reaches the tender joint between thigh and pelvis, she feels a shudder of pain as teeth clamp down catching skin and holding tight. She squirms. He sucks. She feels a trickle of blood and then the brush of wet tongue along the tender folds of flesh. Her legs tense and she arches into him, grabbing his hair as she rises from the lounge chair, pleasure and release tortuously sweet.

Her soft moans reverberate and she hardly sounds like herself. Will's face remains between her legs, his mouth, that beautiful mouth still pressing against her clit as she rides his tongue in the wake of the little quivers that course through her.

"Dr. Du Maurier?" The voice is not Graham's.

Graham raises his head as though he hears the familiar voice, too. His eyes grow dark as he pushes himself off of her, his attentions already somewhere else…

"Dr. Du Maurier?"

Du Maurier opens her eyes to find Hannibal leaning over her in the pool. He is fully dressed with a plush towel draped over one arm. The towel is clearly meant for her. He holds it out so that she can step into it should she decide to get up from the pool.

Her legs feel like rubber bands and she wonders how long he has been standing over her. By the look on his face, he has been standing there far longer than she has patience for. She licks at her lips, her mouth is dry. She takes a rather hearty gulp of her wine before she speaks.

"Hannibal. Have you forgotten our boundaries?" She says softly adopting the tone of detachment she requires to remove herself from the intimacy of a moment ago.

"Not at all. I became concerned when no one answered your door. This was the only entrance I could find. Did you dismiss your staff?" He actually turns his head around as though looking for them. Du Maurier is not amused.

"A change of scheduling." Du Maurier says as she moves around the pool to the steps and slowly ascends into Hannibal's waiting arms. She allows him to wrap the towel around her effectively cloaking her diminutive form from Hannibal's predatory gaze. She wills her body to stop flinching at his touch.

"It was my intention to be alone this evening." Du Maurier says, shaking out her hair.

"You were far from alone just now. Who was with you in the hot tub?" Hannibal asks, smiling.

Du Maurier wants to slap him, a curious impulse she does not experience often, but lately Hannibal has provoked the most troubling of impulses in her. She smiles instead and leans down to retrieve her nearly empty wine glass.

"Shall we?" She gestures toward the patio adjacent to the terrace where a thick robe and more wine await far from the hot tub.

Chapter 10

Chapter Summary

After meeting Graham at the Baltimore State Hospital, she had understood how Hannibal found him fascinating. There had been something alluring about Graham's peculiar mix of vulnerability and charm masking a chilling malevolence that was not unfamiliar to her. A very complicated package Will Graham, most delicately if not loosely wrapped.

Chapter 10

Du Maurier handles Hannibal. Hannibal lets her think that.

"I won't be long." Du Maurier picks up the damp towel from the floor to take with her. She had let it drop to the patio floor only after wrapping herself up in the robe she holds tightly around herself, a futile gesture. She may as well still be naked. Her every movement, every twitch is being studied by cool dark eyes, that flicker with cruel curiosity. She leaves her glass, and musters something like affection to glimmer in her eyes, soften the creases of her brow as she glances at Hannibal before leaving him on the patio.

Hannibal nods. He knows he has disarmed her, but only momentarily. She will be back in her element soon enough. He is certain she was not thinking about him as she had moaned and gasped in the hot tub, fingers upon her breasts and hips jerking out of the water like a fish strangled on a hook. She had shuddered in her orgasm without even touching herself. That was some impressive imagery indeed and Hannibal is more than curious about who could inspire such abandon in Du Maurier.

Du Maurier needs a few minutes away from the distracting gaze that crawls over her skin, erasing the warm and pleasant sensations of a moment ago. She walks through the dining room on her way to her bedroom, retrieves the dossier from the table. Assures herself Hannibal has not seen it, here in the dark, far from the terrace and the hot tub.

This evening's fantasy is not the first time she has imagined herself with Graham, but it is the first time she has permitted her imagination to overtake her. She considers that there is more to her fantasy making than valium and wine.

After meeting Graham at the Baltimore State Hospital, she had understood how Hannibal found him fascinating. There had been something alluring about Graham's peculiar mix of vulnerability and charm masking a chilling malevolence that was not unfamiliar to her. A very complicated package Will Graham, most delicately if not loosely wrapped.

Du Maurier had never wished Graham any harm. It was his misfortune to fall within Hannibal's sphere of influence. He was a threat, plain and simple. Hannibal could only see the dangerous darkness dwelling behind those pale blue eyes. Always seeking the dark had blinded him to the light in those same eyes, light that would not be extinguished by Hannibal. Hannibal imagined that darkness was akin to his own, but it was not. Graham had the potential for violence, certainly, but that violence would always be tempered by his own sense of morality. And for that, he was unpredictable because his morality was situational not absolute.

Even if through his own sheer will, Hannibal managed to persuade Graham to join him in some partnership, they would be at each other’s throats eventually. It is the nature of the beast to be solitary. Even if they hunted together, Graham would always chafe under Hannibal’s staggering ego. Pupils eventually outgrow their teachers. When that happened, Graham would cease to be the object of affection he now was. Companionship with Graham as Hannibal wished was a fantasy.

Then again, perhaps she did not understand the true nature of their relationship since Hannibal had only ever told her half-truths, as he had sat in his patient chair in her living room. She suspects that beneath the calm exterior lies a simmering attraction to Graham that transcends any boundaries she is aware of. Whatever he had been doing with Graham had endeared the young man to him so much that even in betrayal, Hannibal had not found it within himself to end him.

She has never inspired that kind of obsession in Hannibal. She cannot fathom what it is that Graham has that she does not. The process of corruption is always seductive, but innocence once lost, remains so forever. Graham is no longer innocent and has been corrupted beyond repair. Why does Hannibal persist?

Perhaps Graham is worthy of further study. Perhaps the threat he poses could be neutralized. Perhaps trying to avoid the topic of Graham has been misguided and it might be wise to take a more therapeutic approach. Du Maurier might even be able to persuade Hannibal to reveal the true nature of his attraction to Graham. That is exactly the sort of insight that Du Maurier needs. She is more curious now than ever if Hannibal will be able to rip apart the doctor who looks so much like Graham.

Du Maurier adjusts the volume a little louder on the radio. She opens her closet to select something appropriate for slipping into Hannibal’s mind.

Hannibal sits with legs crossed on one of the black wrought iron chairs that complete the antique looking ensemble Du Maurier has procured for her patio. Each of the chairs is a singular work of art, the metal forged and hammered into a different animal motif. Hannibal chose the cobra, of course. Du Maurier would expect that of him. The hanging flowers, all pastel lavender and pink lend a decidedly rustic, albeit feminine touch to the otherwise elegant arrangement.

He likes Du Maurier’s house. It is sumptuous, full of color and aromas. From the carefully distributed floral arrangements to the scented candles, the ambiance is tone perfect. Almost too perfect, like Du Maurier herself. She is very much an extension of her residence, or rather her residence reflects her own carefully crafted visage.

Hannibal is aware he emulates her taste and style in many ways and wonders why she never mentions it. Imitation is the best form of flattery. It has been Du Maurier who, over the past several years, has presented Hannibal with the perfect model of behavior to imitate as he prowls among polite society, ever the wolf among sheep. His blatant adoption of her own mannerisms in her presence never seems to register though Hannibal never tires of goading her.

Du Maurier’s taste in décor has always provided him with inspiration, with the aesthetic to offset his own predilection for the darkly humorous and inappropriate. In Baltimore, it was not uncommon for Hannibal to insert pieces of his own among the actual art objects in his home simply to see if anyone noticed. It was always gratifying when the rare guest actually understood the joke.

None discerned the sly cannibalistic references for what they were. Some would raise a brow in shock before dismissing the idea believing that in their own vulgarity they had merely misinterpreted the intent of the piece somehow. Surely Doctor Lecter would not be so untoward as to condone such wanton carnality or depravity let alone display it in his home. They invariably decided they had somehow missed the point, always seeking the metaphor rather than accept the literal.

Most did not possess the intellect or curiosity to analyze his selections to even that extent. Most were only concerned with how much he had paid for this or that.

Hannibal's mind recedes into his memory palace while he awaits Du Maurier's return to the patio. She is miffed and so, will take her precious time doing whatever it is she is doing. His palace opens into his Baltimore home where he maintains many pleasant memories of a life he misses deeply and he still feels himself robbed of it.

Hannibal pours himself another glass of the tasty wine. Why not? The pale amber liquid feels cool in his throat, cleansing his palate of the tasteless meal he had prepared earlier. He had found the meat wanting, but perhaps it was his own preparation that had been uninspired. Then again, finding an edible section without a tattoo had been impossible…and the organs, well, it was a fallacy that only the good died young.

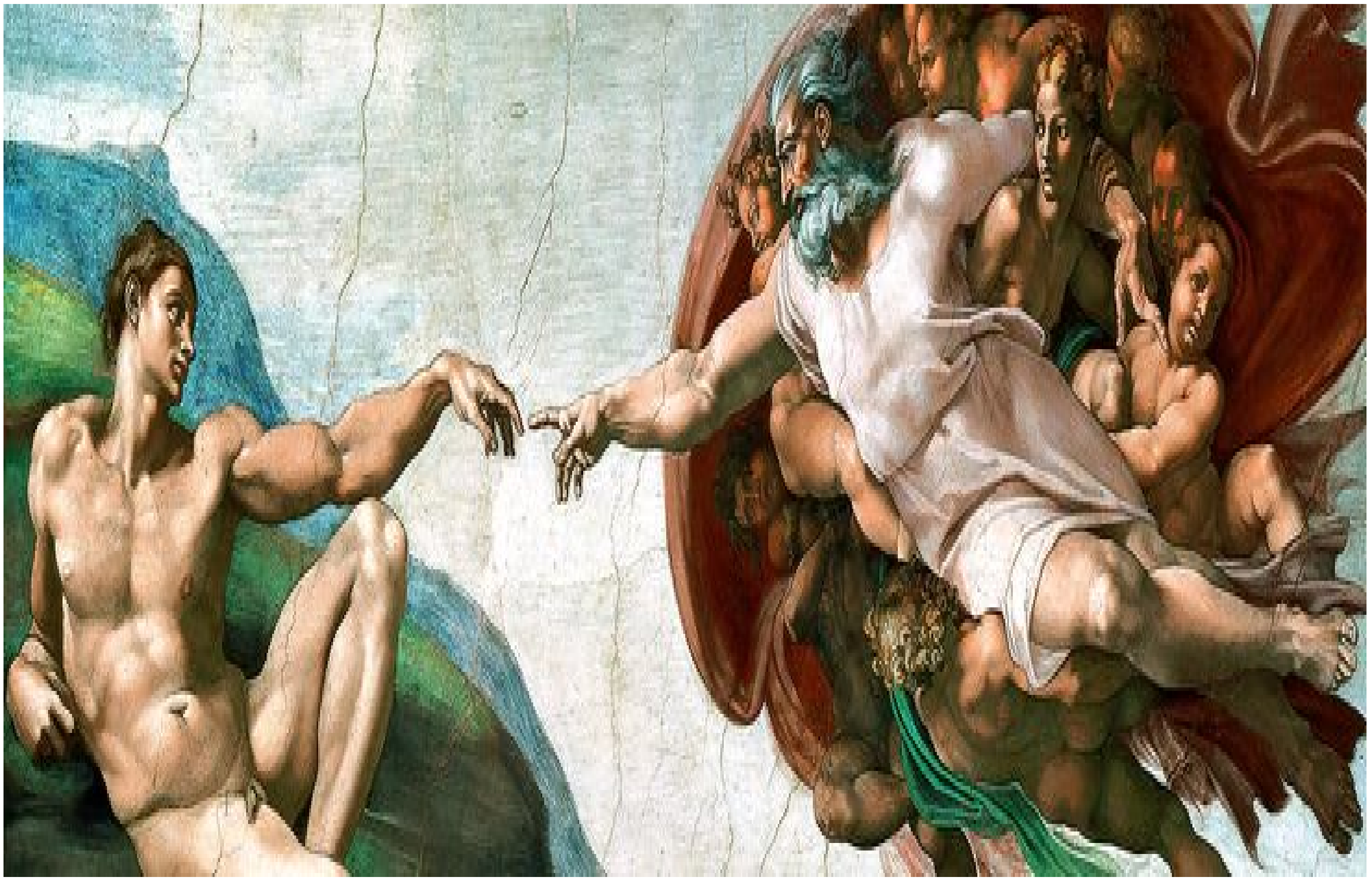
Chapter 11

Chapter Summary

Only Will had truly appreciated the peculiar ironies embedded in the displays of the art in his Baltimore home as only Will could. Hannibal's perverted sense of humor had caused the young profiler to twist his face up more than once. Indeed, Hannibal had displayed some of the work especially for Will.

Chapter Notes

I included images of the paintings Hannibal talks about in his memory palace. The Japanese print he refers to is my imagination, but I can imagine Hannibal entertaining himself at Will's and Alana's expense. Thanks to blktuana for advice on uploading. Totally my idea to have Hannibal rework fine art pieces to suit his own sense of humor and aesthetics.



Chapter 11

Hannibal muses in his memory palace.

Hannibal remembers one dinner party, several years back, when a matronly guest had stumbled upon his reinterpretation of Michelangelo's Creation of Adam in a back room, a place she had no business being anyway. Curiosity kills the cat. The room was nondescript; a storeroom to keep unopened cases of beer, wine, and assorted spirits, clearly dated and rotated accordingly. Perhaps she had intended to inspect the stemware and other crystal pieces that were stored back there.

Whatever she had come for was soon forgotten as she had stood speechless staring at the far wall where Hannibal's oeuvre hung in all its sanctimonious glory.

Hannibal remembers still the dazed look on her face as she had stared quizzically at the reimagined scene, so similar to the original except that the Almighty was as nude as Adam and Adam had an erection worthy of man, not the tiny pathetic nub of flaccid flesh Michelangelo had bestowed upon him. The woman had backed out of the room turning at the last moment to stumble into Hannibal.

"You know this area is off limits to guests. You have been very rude. Now what is to be done about that?" Hannibal remembers saying while shaking finger at her. The look on her face had been priceless as Hannibal had pressed another glass of champagne into her hands and had guided her back to the main foyer. He had kept the room locked after that.

Hannibal had taken a leisurely three weeks to decide upon the perfect recipe for her, a pappardelle with lamb ragu. This was a wicked little Sicilian variation on the French ragout, the combination of mint and crushed red pepper flakes a treat on the tongue.

Hannibal cannot help himself, even now. His villa, an hour away in Impruneta, while not as ostentatious as his Baltimore home, is replete with museum worthy art and artifacts alongside tasteful reproductions often displayed in the most incongruous of places. An astute observer might question the owner's penchant for disturbingly grotesque and violently sadistic renderings littered among the sedate and genuine pieces.

Many of the compositions were painted or drawn by Hannibal's own hands. He looks down at his hands feeling a swell of pride. He shakes his head, marvels silently at the things he has done with these hands.

Hannibal regrets he has few visitors these days. He misses the grand parties he used to host and the attention that accompanied them. His parties used to earn mention in the local gossip columns and even the society pages of the Baltimore Sun Times. He would trade all of those parties for just one visitor in particular.

Only Will had truly appreciated the peculiar ironies embedded in the displays of the art in his Baltimore home as only Will could. Hannibal's perverted sense of humor had caused the young profiler to twist his face up more than once. Indeed, Hannibal had displayed some of the work especially for Will.

But not at first. It had taken time for Will to move about his home as though he belonged there. As though Will belonged anywhere else.

Despite Will's investigative prowess, Hannibal had never once given a second thought to allowing him nearly free reign in his home. He had practically invited Will to discover the Chesapeake Ripper hiding in plain sight in front of him.

Hannibal sips at his wine, remembers how Will had been reluctant to touch his things for quite some time, preferring to twist his head and body around the object that had caught his attention rather than disturb it. Will had not been concerned about fingerprints; he was respectful and perhaps slightly intimidated by the cost, but that too had endeared him to Hannibal.

Gradually, Will began showing up on his own. He had presented a bottle of wine after closing the Silvestri case, in gratitude for Hannibal's help. He had burst in during his dinner with Tobias Budge. And there had been the strained dinner they had shared with Freddie Lounds and Abigail.

Whether for the extraordinary coffee or the company, Will had finally started coming around early mornings after learning that Hannibal never slept in. Remarkably, Will had managed to avoid running into Hannibal as he was returning from a night of mayhem, sometimes by mere minutes. Hannibal had sensed the loneliness Will was reluctant to articulate, but was plain enough in the way Will sat relaxed in his kitchen, fingers curled around his mug, content to breathe in the silence, or close to it as Hannibal puttered around his kitchen.

Later, once Will had felt more at ease, Hannibal had watched him roaming his halls and rooms as though strolling in a gallery. There had been rooms forbidden to Will, and Will had never been so impolite as to inquire why they remained locked. Hannibal smiles to himself. Locked doors would always prick Will's curiosity, a completely open house would be uninteresting and that simply would not do.

Thinking Hannibal in his kitchen, Will had taken to wandering around his house, wine glass in hand examining each and every piece, probably committing all to memory. He would stop every now and then and Hannibal would observe a slow grin emerge or the surprise of raised eyebrows accompanied by a muffled if not amused laugh. Will had been particularly tickled by Hannibal's placement of Goya's Saturn Devouring His Children over the freezer in the rear pantry.

It was only after Will had shared his bed that Hannibal had sent him into the locked storeroom containing the Creation with the key for a bottle of Rothschild Bordeaux. Hannibal remembers clearly standing over the sink, rinsing green leaves of Romaine listening to the clink of the key turn the lock, the click of the light switch, and then the sound of Will's voice from the depths of the storage room.

"Hannibal!"

Hannibal closes his eyes, feels the same contented smile spread warmly across his face as he remembers Will returning from the storeroom, wine bottle in one hand as he had stood before the center island, fingers roaming absently over stubble covered chin and soft lips in the most maddening way. "Hannibal…" he had said again, with affection this time.

Will had rarely called Hannibal by his given name, but when he had, each syllable was delivered in a cadence uniquely his own. The subtle variations of tone would catch in Hannibal's chest like a favorite melody, a song he could never hear often enough. Hannibal wonders if Will ever knew his voice had that effect on him, if Will had ever really understood how deeply he had plucked the very fibers of Hannibal's being by merely saying his name.

Once, wandering around in a pair of Hannibal's pajamas, unable to sleep, Will had ventured up to the third floor. Finding a room of draped canvases had piqued his curiosity and he could not resist pulling down the dusty fabric from each one. Hannibal had watched Will sift through the various art works, some from local artists, some actual pieces purchased from auction houses, and some original work. Will's eyes had moved slowly over each one, taking his time, silently appraising not the value, but the allure for Hannibal, seeking to find the man in each. More pieces of the puzzle to analyze, connect, and appreciate.

He had left the largest canvas in the room for last. He had nearly drawn blood from his own lips trying to keep a straight face as he had gazed upon a scaled down version of Dali's majestic Sacrament of the Last Supper, intended as an homage to the Golden Mean and Plato, except Hannibal had imbued it with a more earthly corporeal twist.

Hannibal had watched Will crouch down for a better look. His fingers had moved across the canvas over the figures of the apostles and Christ, their faces and robes smeared with splatters of red, generous chunks of fleshy pink meat with a side of organs arranged in a banquet beneath the fingers of Christ.

"Take, eat; this is my body…" Hannibal had said to him from the doorway.

Will had half turned to the sound of Hannibal's voice, "Sacrament or seduction?"

"Why not both?" Hannibal had answered.

Hannibal wonders if Will had figured out that he had not used actual paint.

Caravaggio's Still Life with Fruit had also brought a smirk to Will's lips. The painting itself was not amusing, but Hannibal's choice of where to hang it was. Will had been contemplating the print of overripe and suggestive summer fruit, as he had stood naked, taking a long leak, relieving himself of the belly full of wine he had just drunk, in Hannibal's master bedroom. The irony of a study in decay and a commentary on the transitory nature of life hanging over the toilet as he had flushed it had not gone unnoticed.

The image of Caravaggio's toga wearing Bacchus reflected in the mirror over the bathroom sink had not escaped Will's attention either. Hannibal had always appreciated the crude humanity of Caravaggio, and this rendering was especially crude. Caravaggio had posed his young and very debauched god before another basket of rotting yet evocative fruit as he proffers a glass of wine in one hand while grasping the neck of the wine flask in the other. It was not coincidental that this Bacchus was endowed with arched brows that framed half lidded eyes beneath curls of dark hair.

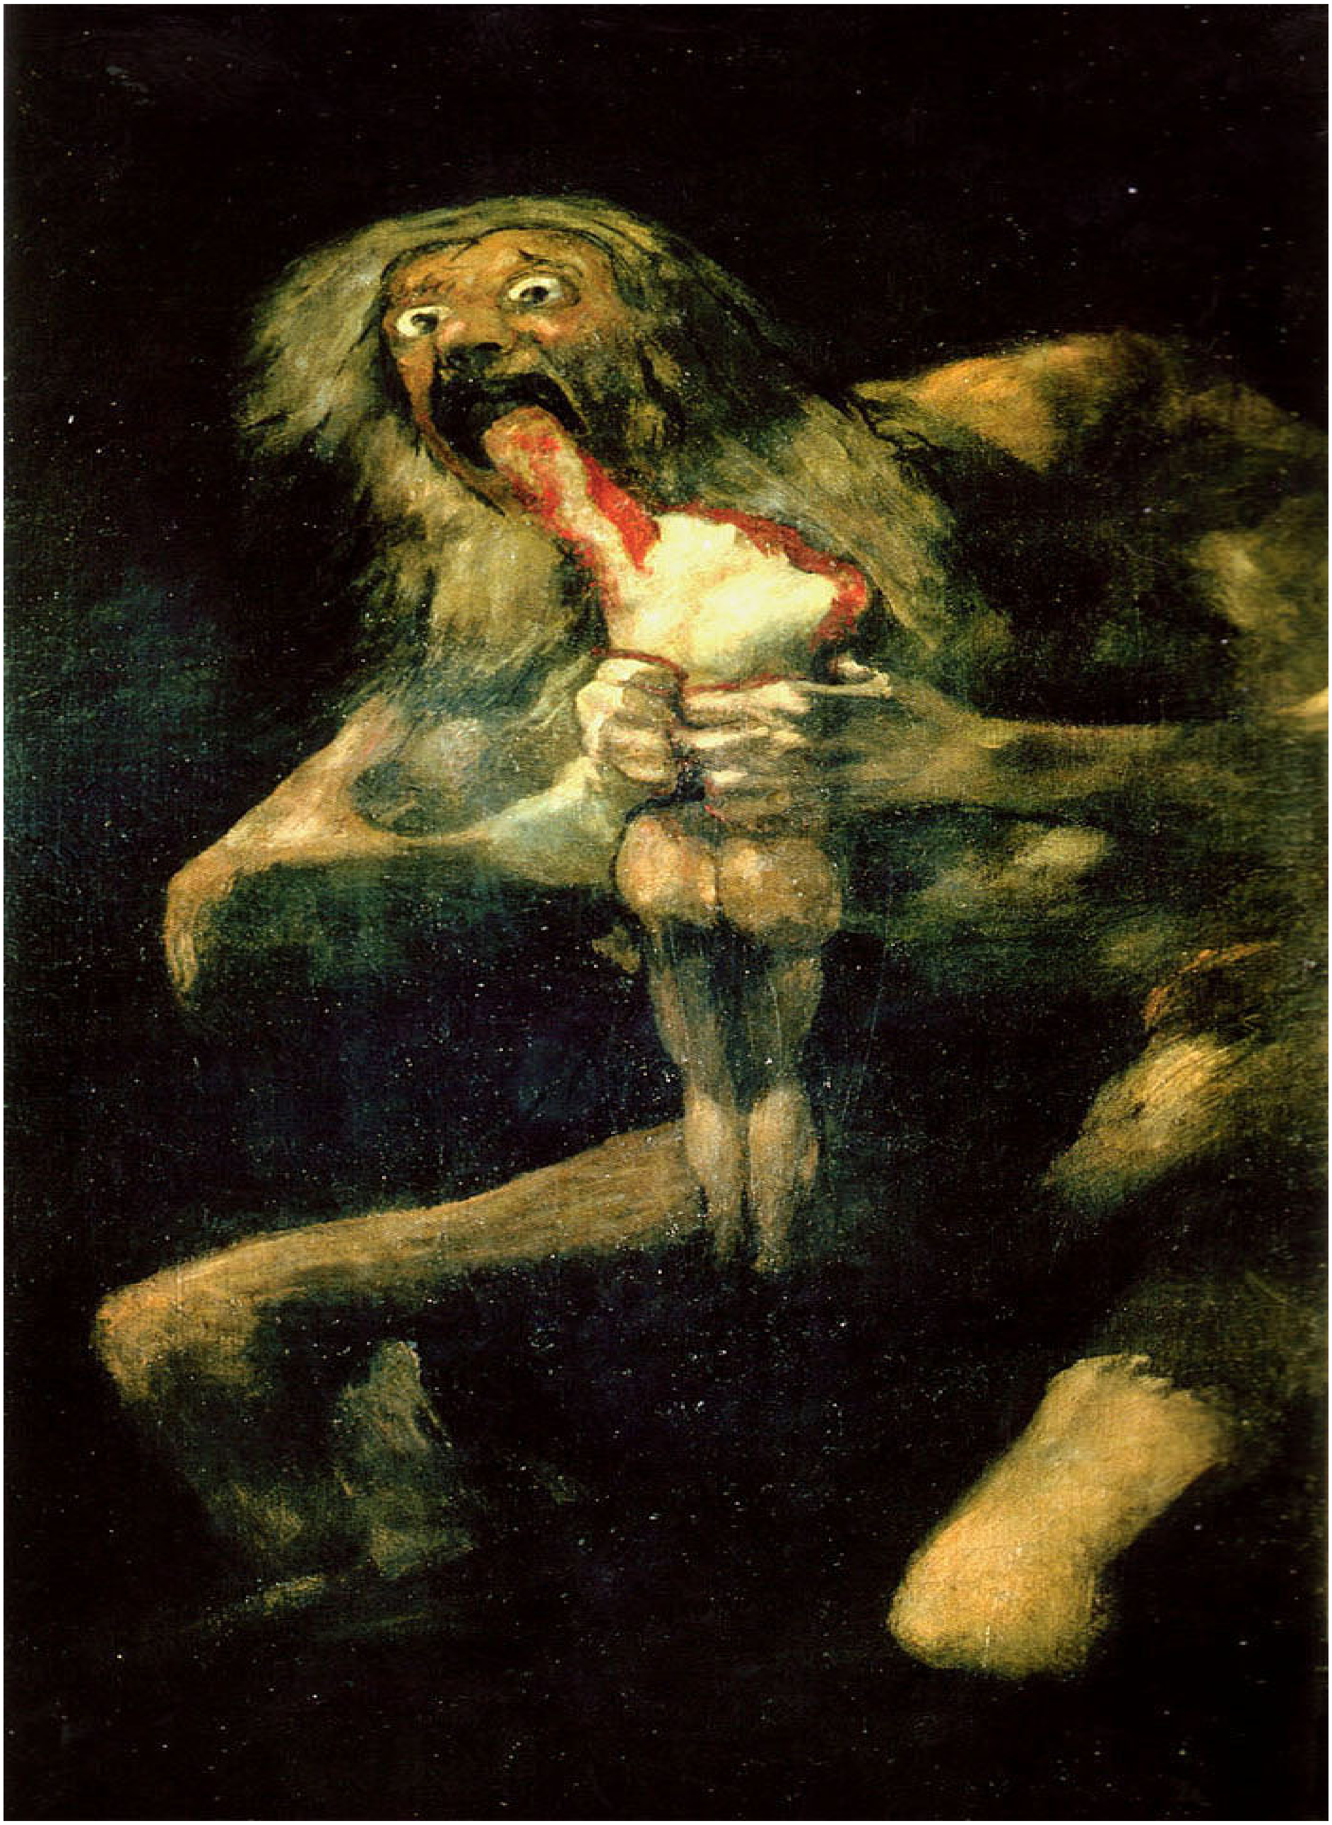
While washing his hands, Will's gaze had wandered. The instant Will's eyes had flicked to the mirror and his tongue had clicked against the roof of his mouth, Hannibal had been beside himself. Will had snapped up a crisp towel to wring his hands dry, a long suffering sigh and indulgent smile on his lips.

Hannibal wanders into the dining room of his Baltimore residence, a most favorite place in his memory palace. Hannibal fondly remembers Will biting his tongue and rolling his eyes dolefully at Hannibal over the dinner table as none other than Alana Bloom had sat dining with them, blissfully unaware, or in stubborn denial of the Japanese prints behind her. One of a petal pink flower shaped like a vulva glistening with drops of dew paired with the equally suggestive print by the same artist of two stiff white lilies, stamen and stigma erect and also dripping with morning dew.

Even Uncle Jack had bestowed only cursory glances, his cluttered mind overloaded with his cancer ridden wife and homicide du jour. In Jack’s defense, he had come for the food. Crawford was not shy about his appetite or about insinuating himself. Hannibal often wonders if the elusive ingredients of his culinary creations had really bothered Jack. Crawford never turned down a meal and always cleaned his plate, sometimes twice.

The wretched wound Will has carved into his heart feels cavernous now as Hannibal moves through his memory palace. And yet, Hannibal cannot stay away. Too many rooms in his palace are filled with Will and Hannibal cannot bring himself to tear them down. Neither can he board them up. Like Will himself, they are a part of him now.

Hannibal withdraws from his memory palace. He senses Du Maurier approaching, the scent of her perfume catches in Hannibal’s nose before he hears the soft padding of her bare feet against the hardwood floor. It would not do for her to catch him wandering in his palace, yet again.



Goya, Saturn Devouring His Children

Will post more chapters this weekend. My finger splint comes off next week. Yeah...

Chapter 12

Hannibal explains his visit to Du Maurier's house at this late hour.

Hannibal finishes his glass of wine; it is a local vintage from Fiesole he notes on the label. He has never been to Fiesole although the town is a stone's throw from Florence. But the wine is quite good and Hannibal is at a loss as to how the vineyard managed to escape his attention. He considers the proprietors must have a reserve cellar worth investigating.

Du Maurier returns to the patio having exchanged the robe for lingerie. She wears a pale turquoise Dolce tank camisole with matching bottoms gathered seductively at her hips revealing taut belly and silky skin. Her blonde tresses are nearly dry. Her feet are uncharacteristically bare, but Hannibal thinks the buffed and polished toenails framing dainty toes are more seductive than any slipper.

She nods at Hannibal to pour another glass for himself as she slides into her own wrought iron chair, this one with lion's head and claws.

Hannibal refills his glass and hesitates over Du Maurier's. She shakes her head but her fingers remain wrapped around the stem, slender knuckles all but white against the delicate blown glass.

"We were about to discuss your overactive imagination." Hannibal says nose to glass, sampling the bouquet before taking another generous swallow of the golden hued wine.

"No, you were about to inquire rather intrusively about my sexual fantasies, Hannibal." Du Maurier says flatly.

Hannibal sighs and sips again at the delicious wine. "Were you drinking this vintage while in the hot tub? If so I would like a case of it."

Du Maurier resists the temptation to roll her eyes. "The vineyard is one of the oldest in Tuscany. One of my patients is a member of the family who owns it. I might be persuaded to procure a case or two of the more rarefied vintages they offer."

“That would be appreciated. And please, my earlier comments were not intended to be intrusive, merely humorous.”

“Well, you need to work on your sense of humor, Hannibal. No harm done. One cannot take offense where none has been offered.” She smiles and inclines her head. Slowly, she slides her empty glass toward Hannibal. A gesture of forgiveness. She will now share a glass with him in the shadow of his apology.

Hannibal is all too familiar with Du Maurier’s techniques but appreciates her attempts at conditioning nonetheless. That she continues to try means she still cares. He graciously refills her glass.

“What brings you to my door so late, Hannibal?” Her nose hovers over her glass. Hannibal notes the widening of nostrils as she inhales and the dilating of pupils as she speaks.

A direct question. Hannibal has a direct answer. “I require your access code to our joint account at Banque Suisse and your permission.”

“This is sudden. To what end?” Her pupils shrink and the brilliant blue of her eyes turns crystal.

“There are some stocks and property deeds I would like to transfer. Rather bequeath.”

“Hannibal…is there something medically wrong?” Hannibal cannot tell if she is actually apprehensive or merely anticipative.

“No. This is about moving on.” Hannibal’s fingers tremble ever so slightly as he sets down his wine glass. The sharp clink of the crystal against the inlaid tile of the table causes Du Maurier to blink. He stares out over the darkened lawn that lies beyond the patio.

“Tell me…” Du Maurier cannot imagine what could possibly distress Hannibal like this. Whatever he tells her will have but a kernel of truth to it, but his distress seems genuine.

“As you are aware, and you leave no doubt that you are very aware, I have found it difficult to let go of Will. After careful consideration, I think that I would like to legally deed property to him and leave some stocks to him, in an escrow account, anonymously of course. I do not need to know where he is, but my lawyers can ensure that his lawyers have access to these holdings in the event he should ever need them. Or want them…”

Du Maurier does not know what to say. Each of them has accounts all over the planet but the joint account in Switzerland holds the most lucrative investments of their amassed fortunes. The account was intended as a merger of convenience and later, a means to check one another, keep each of them from rash impulses. Should one of them die without disclosing his or her code to the other, the entire bulk of the fortune would forfeit to the bank. No force on earth could make the bank hand anything over to the survivor on the account. Unless the survivor wanted to rob the insanely secure bank, there would be no access.

Unless one was so intent on removing the other those monetary considerations did not matter…

“You mean to put him behind you and assuage your conscience with gifts?” she asks.

“It is not a matter of conscience, but of a sense of responsibility. I failed him. I owe him… something before I can fully embrace a life here.”

“What stocks and properties do you intend to give to him?” Du Maurier asks wondering how much Hannibal’s useless guilt and morose romanticism are going to cost her.

“The properties along the Chesapeake, of course. What could be more fitting? And some of that microchip stock or whatever it is.”

“Microsoft.” Du Maurier says quietly.

The relief is immediate. She pretends to consider for a moment. His choice of property is fitting perhaps, but excessive. He is proposing a substantial amount. The properties along the Chesapeake are valued in the millions and the stock, well stock goes up and it goes down. Still, if this means Hannibal is finally willing to leave Will Graham behind…she can have the dog loving doctor to herself. Or, perhaps he would present as the ultimate test of Hannibal’s intentions.

How revealing it would be if Hannibal were to believe, if only for an instant that he was seeing Graham. If she could arrange a meeting that would allow her to observe Hannibal’s reaction, before he had the chance to keep his person suit from coming apart at the seams in front of her.

Her blue eyes glitter at the thought and she turns her eyes on Hannibal, allows them to deepen with concern and compassion. She closes her eyes as though carefully considering the words about to fall from practiced lips.

“Hannibal. Are you certain you want to do this? Do you honestly believe that this monetary gesture, generous though it is, will be enough to bring you closure?”

“I am comfortable with the decision. It is time to let him go. If he had wanted to contact me he could have done so before now. He is clever and would have found a way.” Hannibal says and his eyes seem to shimmer with the pain of resignation. His clipped tone devoid of any nuance is imbued with a sense of finality, perhaps even a hint of indignation and wounded pride.

Hannibal lifts his head and manages a weak smile at Du Maurier to reassure her that his intentions are genuine. He decides tears, even one, would be too much, so he contents himself with the heartbreaking Mozart aria he loves, summoning the requisite moisture immediately.

The version of Hannibal that sits before her is difficult to analyze. He is capable of mimicking human emotion as expertly as Du Maurier. And why not? He learned from the best. His meticulously constructed suit borrows elements of her own. The only way to determine the truth is to let this charade play out.

“How much stock do you want to bestow upon Will Graham?” she asks as she swallows another gulp of crisp wine in anticipation of more lies singed with truths smothered in deceit.

Later, Hannibal hums to the music selection playing loudly in his car, Beethoven’s Appassionata. The last time he listened to this, it had been above the din of the band saw cutting strips of flesh from Beverly Katz. Hannibal had had to play it over, having been unable to hear his favorite sections the first time around.

He drives through the Italian countryside back to Impruneta, to his villa, where Tatiana, the talented Sicilian who speaks five languages impressively, including the French and German spoken in Switzerland, sits before her computer, intercepting an important phone call and taking down Du Maurier’s bank information and access code as he shifts gears in his black Jaguar XK Coupe. He flips open his phone and pulls up his picture files. He glances at the dossier on some psychiatrist by the name of Clayton. Hannibal figures he knows who Du Maurier was thinking about.

How deep into the rabbit hole did he fall? No, Will corrects himself; I jumped down it all by myself. Didn’t I?
Will had known about the conditioning. He had accepted it as part of the price of catching Hannibal. What he had not guessed was the breadth and scope of it.

Chapter 13

Will receives a call from D’Angelo, visits his own memory palace, and sends Luciano and Lucia on a mission.

The ring of Will’s phone disrupts the sunny solitude of Will’s kitchen. The unexpected intrusion interrupts Will’s breakfast. He puts down his forkful of cheese omelet and picks up his phone from the table.

It’s the Firenze Police Department. Will has not been to any more crime scenes. He wonders what D’Angelo wants now. It has to be her.

“Hello.”

“Mr. Graham? Buongiorno.” D’Angelo’s voice is friendly and therefore an obvious omen of unpleasantness thinks Will.

“What can I do for you today, Detective?” Will says, his tone indicating he would rather be doing anything else.

D’Angelo ignores him. “Just a quick question. Are you working with the Paolini twins?”

That was certainly quick. Will can’t think of a good reason to lie and catching him in a lie later will do him no good. He decides he would like to keep her opinion of him as favorable as possible.

“Yes, but I didn’t know they were twins. Huh…” Will can’t decide if that makes the innuendo between them more or less repulsive. “Why do you want to know?”

Will wonders what they have done and how much trouble he is in for whatever it is.

“It has come to my attention, that one or both of them have been snooping around the last several crime scenes. It was brought to my attention by our captain.”

“Yes, it is. So far, there is nothing to connect them to you. If they show up again I have been instructed to interrogate them. They are not unknown in certain circles. Their family is oh, how do you say it…well connected.”

“Like the Corleones.” Will says.

“Hmmm. Not that well connected, but crime is a family trait.”

Will thinks a moment. “Is there anything to hold them on?”

“Obstruction charges might stick. Their family would pay up to get them out. But, you might be exposed in the process and I do not think you want that to get around.”

“No, I don’t.” Will thinks Mason would be the one paying up, and Will didn’t want that either.

“Is the entire family involved in your little enterprise, or just the twins?”

“I only employ the two of them. I didn’t know anything about their family until now.”

“And…how do you know them?” D’Angelo’s questions are becoming less courteous, and more nosey.

“A mutual friend recommended them and that’s all I have to say about it. I appreciate the heads up. I will tell them to lay off. That is what you want, isn’t it?”

“More or less. I was hoping you might be a little more open with me.”

“If the situation calls for it, maybe I will.” Will waits for her to ply him with more questions. But she does not.

“Bene.” She says, “Consider this your only warning and see that those two stop creeping around the precinct.”

“I will do that.”

Will hears the huff of her breathing, the sounds of faint voices in the background. Will imagines her sitting at her desk in the precinct office, a small but tidy desk shoved to a corner away from the cluster of desks that belong to the big boys. She so badly wants to play with them.

“We caught the killer of the pedophile priest. Cookies. Who would have thought?”

“The devil is in the details.” Will says.

“If I…had some questions about another case…some other devils, could I...? Would you…talk to me?”

Will sighs and lets her wait for his answer. He can appreciate what it feels like to be on the outside, existing on the periphery.

“Is there something going on now?” He says, glancing at his breakfast.

“No, nothing that would require your…particular insight. I wanted to uh, be comfortable if I called.”

“You mean when you call.” Will’s lips twist a little. He means his comment to be funny.

D’Angelo can’t see his smile but seems to understand Will’s humor. “Ai, when…So, it’s ok?”

“Sì, until next time, Mr. Graham. Ciao.”

Will clicks off his phone and stares at his plate. He imagines his omelet is tepid by now. He scoops it up onto his toast, also cold now, and makes a sandwich to finish off his coffee. He picks up his pen and writes down what he ate in the log he keeps for Daniel.

Will smiles as he writes, thinking he should include some dubious ingredients just to see if Daniel really reads his diet diary. Will thinks better of it, deciding that Daniel probably does take Will’s health as seriously as he says he does.

He is almost finished relating to Daniel all the events that have led him to Florence. Daniel had taken his notes while Will had described and explicated, pausing amidst requests from Daniel to discuss his feelings.

Daniel’s empathy made talking about things easier. He could feel what Will was feeling as he spoke, could understand the emotions driving the actions he described. His questions had been pointed, uncompromising, but framed with the gentleness Will had come to expect from him.

Will supposes that his empathic mirror enables him to put himself in Will’s shoes to a degree. Will has maintained control of the narrative thus far. He chooses the events he wants to include and Daniel, true to their agreement, writes down the questions Will does not want to answer.

Will has noticed Daniel has written down a lot of questions. He has taken a copious amount of notes. Will’s forts have been closed to Daniel this entire time and Daniel has accepted the arrangement. He has not challenged Will on anything. Not yet.

At this point in the therapy, Daniel’s focus is on obtaining a chronological context. He has needed to know the players in Will’s drama and how they all fit. Will has answered his questions about everyone involved to a point. Will has provided Daniel with sketches, with just enough line and shading to enhance the exposition.

But Will has almost finished with the exposition. Once Will has brought him up to speed, the real therapy will begin and Will is filled with trepidation even though unloading his burden is precisely why he went to Daniel in the first place.

Will sits at the table running his hands over his face. He had entered Daniel’s office with the hope that he alleviate his weariness, lighten his mental load, help him make sense of all that has happened to him and yet, the pendulous stone he carries seems heavier now than ever.

Maybe because Will feels like instead of moving forward, he is going backward.

The fragments of buried memories that have flashed through his mind have not brought him clarity and neither have they brought him closer to any kind of closure. Will’s mind burns with glimpses into his past, of sitting in a chair with lights flashing into his eyes, strains of classical music in his ears, and the touches of warm hands and lips upon his skin while Hannibal whispers to him in the darkness of his office as he slips a needle into his arm.

The implications are plain. Which responses are conditioned and which are completely his own? Is there even a difference anymore? Will thinks there has to be. Operant conditioning is only effective when the patient is unaware. And it is temporary. Remove the rewards or change the associations and the conditioning falls apart. Doesn't it?

These scraps of insanity have further complicated Will's feelings about Hannibal. His feelings are complicated enough already. He is sinking in quicksand.

How deep into the rabbit hole did he fall? No, Will corrects himself; I jumped down it all by myself. Didn't I?

Will had known about the conditioning. He had accepted it as part of the price of catching Hannibal. What he had not guessed was the breadth and scope of it.

First you have to grieve for what is lost and what has changed.

I've changed. You've changed me.

Will has changed. And the changing had evidently been going on far longer than Will had suspected. Hannibal had not only insinuated himself into Will's conscious waking existence; he had been seducing his subconscious quite literally.

Hannibal had always had a design for Will. Causing strategic blackouts had been part of his design all along. His design had never included framing Will. Hannibal had set Will free.

Shoving Abigail's ear down his throat through a tube had been the means to an end. Will had gotten too close, too soon. That had been Hannibal improvising with tools he already had at his disposal. That had been Hannibal making corrections.

Abigail had failed to assuage Jack's concerns. He had followed his hunch and the evidence had born it out. Hannibal had to make her disappear to protect himself. He had used her disappearance and her ear to set up Will. Then Hannibal had had to invent a way to get his favorite patient out of the mess he had placed him in.

At the time, Will had thought that Hannibal had manipulated his release because he wasn't finished with abetting Will's evolution, with helping Will cultivate his urges for the inspirations they were. And that was part of it, but Hannibal had genuinely regretted putting him in BSHCI in the first place. After talking to Miriam Lass and seeing what she had done to Chilton, he had known Hannibal's manipulations could undermine anyone's training, even the rigorous training of the lauded FBI.

You and I are part of his design. He wanted you to be free. He wanted me to be free too.

Neither of us are really free. He's not done.

Hannibal had not been done with Will. Finding out what Hannibal had done to him had been what had stayed his hand as he had gripped the trigger of the gun pointed at Hannibal's head that afternoon in his kitchen. Hannibal had wisely appealed to the only emotion that could have possibly trumped his anger in that moment.

Hannibal's insatiable curiosity was matched only by Will's own.

However, Hannibal had been done with Miriam. Miriam had been totally under Hannibal's control. His psychiatric expertise had rendered Miriam completely powerless to resist. Miriam's identification of poor Frederick as the Ripper had been masterfully played. That she had shot him was a bonus. Will has yet to figure out at what point Hannibal decided to frame the ill-fated Frederick for his crimes. Framing Chilton had not always been his intention.

Hannibal had not allowed Gideon or anyone else to claim his crown. But, as arrogant as Hannibal was, he had been willing to hand over the throne and allow Chilton to take the credit for all his work.

He could bury the Chesapeake Ripper in Frederick's backyard because by then, he had only needed one person to know the truth. There had been only one person with whom Hannibal had wanted to share his secrets, his accomplishments, his bed…

Miriam had been but a pawn in Hannibal's design. Will had known Hannibal considered him the prize worth waiting for. Hannibal was in love with him. In love with the ideal of him. In love with the idea of being in love.

We couldn't leave without you.

But Will had realized too late that the love had been genuine, and to Hannibal's thinking, selfless and meaningful, even beautiful. And Will had unknowingly used that love to lure Hannibal.

Hannibal's rage and pain had been so visceral that night, that Will had welcomed, actually welcomed the blade to his stomach. He had made such a mess of things by that point, that even in his surprise, he had felt deserving. In his efforts to save everyone, including Hannibal, he had left only blood in his wake. The irony.

The pain Will had felt as he clutched Hannibal's shoulder, had not been entirely his own. He had felt Hannibal's wrath, the linoleum blade was still lodged in his gut, but as he had looked into Hannibal's eyes, he had felt the pain, too. Will had endured the pain of both of them, as Hannibal had known he would.

Will had been able to piece it all together, his imagination finally in possession of all the evidence. One teacup, meant for three. He had pieced it together, too late.

The place was made for Abigail in your world. Do you understand? The place was made for all of us together…

Will had shaken his head into Hannibal's shoulder, feeling his hands cradle his head, smooth his hair. Hannibal had not understood that the place he imagined could not exist. But Hannibal had believed. And Will had taken that from him. Will had rejected his restored tea cup and in a tantrum, Hannibal had shattered it completely.

There had been no moment when Will could have explained his own intentions to Hannibal.

As soon as Will had seen Abigail alive, his mind had ceased to function in real time. He had been unprepared for Hannibal's ruthless assault. The pain from the wound Hannibal inflicted had not cut as deeply as the knowledge that Hannibal had hurt him with the same ferocity and tenderness as he had loved him.

Will's head hurts with all the remembering. He wonders if Hannibal implanted some negative reinforcement for that in his subconscious, too. He wouldn't doubt it. Now, with these other memories resurfacing, his feelings about Hannibal have shifted yet again.

Will closes his eyes and thinks it will never stop. He is so tired of thinking about it, all of it. Will is sure it is no accident that the memories have surfaced since meeting Daniel. Will believes that drunken night in Daniel's office triggered his repressed memories in ways that even his conversation with Miriam had not. Miriam had not touched him.

The touching and the kissing with Daniel had evoked the same responses within him as Hannibal had. Only, instead of being in Hannibal's bedroom, where Hannibal had intended the conditioning to kick in, Will had been someplace else, with someone else.

Daniel had perhaps been acting on impulse initially, but even in his inebriated state, Daniel had likely sensed Will's growing arousal, his anticipation, his imagination running wild.

Daniel is fortunate Will did stop. Will would have eagerly torn him apart and fucked his brains out. And then fucked some more…

Will wonders if Daniel had sensed those violent urges and wanted Will anyway. Will thinks there may be a side to Daniel he keeps locked up tight. Will's pathology cannot possibly be a mystery to him. And with all that empathy, he cannot believe he is immune.

Will shakes his head. They will be discussing all of it, every dirty detail soon enough. At least his mind is clear now. Hopelessly and excruciatingly clear.

Daniel is the only doctor Will has ever encountered who has refused to treat him with drugs. Daniel has prescribed nothing for him. He even took Will's diazepam and flushed it down the toilet in his office bathroom.

"I want a clean slate." Daniel had said, "I need to see your brain in action unadulterated and I need to feel your true emotions, not heightened or subdued by opiates."

Will has to concede that he is now as pure as he could possibly be. He has never gone this long without being on something. He thinks his forced abstinence might have something to do with his most recent flashes of memories. His occasional insobriety is another matter. One he would rather not discuss with Daniel.

Will rolls his eyes as he clears off the table, sets the plate and cup in the sink to wash. Daniel probably knows Will imbibes his whiskey only slightly less frequently than he does his coffee.

Will yawns and glances longingly at his bed. He looks at his phone. He should call Lucia or Luciano. He looks again at the bed.

He didn't sleep well last night and while that is nothing new, the nightmares were. There seemed a never ending parade of disturbing images to torment him, taunting him every conscious moment to extrapolate, review, rewind, and interpret. Unlike a crime scene, his dreams were elusive, shifting with every other dream that competed for space in the attic of his mind.

Last night's sequence of dream images had sent him trembling onto the floor on all fours listening to the silent screaming in his head as he had shuddered mute, unable to utter a sound as a slimy winged serpent bird-like thing had erupted from his scar in a blood soaked mass of scales, talons, and feathers slipping from his stomach like some aborted fetus onto the hardwood floor.

Will had stared in silent horror at the writhing thing expelled from his own belly, the gaping wound slick and sticky beneath his fingers as he probed his damaged flesh. To his growing horror the thing had uncurled itself and begun scaling his arm, piercing his flesh with beak and talons as it climbed.

His attempts to dislodge it failed and it clawed its way higher, gripping his shoulders, digging talons into his chest, as it pulled itself across the length of his body. Will had felt it pushing its way back into his stomach, back through the wound. He had woken up screaming, gasping for air still feeling it squirm beneath the scar.

And this was only the nightmare he awakened from at 5:21 this morning. Will had endured an entire night of interrupted slumber, each time waking to the green LED light of his clock and shuddering in a pool of his own sweat.

He knows he should inform Daniel. He thought he had these bad dreams under control and wonders why they have started up again with a vengeance. The frosted ravenstag and the wolf are becoming constant nocturnal companions and Will fears he will start seeing them when he is awake, like the antlers he watched grow out of Daniel's couch.

Will decides he will mention his concerns. Perhaps his encephalitis has returned. Perhaps he should just keep this to himself for now.

He locates the Paolini's number in his contacts. He hits send and waits for one of them to pick up. It's Luciano.

"Ciao?" Luciano says sounding like he just woke up. "Mr. Graham?"

"Ciao, yourself. We need to talk. Do you have a few minutes?"

"Sure. What's on your mind? Haven't heard from you in while."

"I've been seeing to my health."

"You ok now?" Luciano says. Will imagines him picking at his fingernails with the blade he keeps in his right coat pocket. Or, he's slicing up a piece of fruit with it. One thing Will has never seen Luciano do is clean it.

"Yeah. Much better. How do you think our search is going?"

"To be honest, the well is pretty dry, Signore."

"I think so too. I've been considering a different approach."

"So has Lucia. She thinks the Doctore likes his art, yes?"

"Yes, he does." Will says, glancing in the mirror that hangs over his dresser.

"So, Lucia figures he will be buying you know, new stuff, for his place here. To replace what he left behind in the states."

"That makes sense although he likely already had a place and plenty of stuff in storage."

Will can hear Lucia's voice. He waits while the two of them confer between smacks and giggles.

"Even so, he still likes going to art houses. It's his thing, right?" Luciano says.

"Very much his thing. What kinds of places has Lucia been targeting?"

Luciano lists the auction houses and galleries around Florence.

"And the illegal ones?" Will asks.

"Ah…well Lucia knows those as well. And there are always fancy invitation only receptions and concerts he likes to attend. Lucia can crash those, too."

"All the things he did in Baltimore have been suspended, Luciano. He went out in public before he was on the most wanted list. He won't want to draw attention to himself now."

"But it is his nature, no?"

"His survival instinct is stronger, don't you think?"

Will can almost hear Luciano shrug, can almost see him purse his lips in thought.

"Lucia thinks he has to come out sometime. It's been a year. Maybe he thinks it's safe."

"Maybe." Will says, "Or he might engage a third party to make purchases for him. I would."

"Lucia thinks he might be looking to sell some of his art stuff if he needs money."

Will thinks that highly unlikely. For all he knows, Hannibal has more money than Verger. Will decides not to keep shooting down Luciano's ideas. There's only so much his Italian pride can take.

"We don't know much about Dr. Lecter before he came to Baltimore. I think the key to finding him is to learn about his past."

"Oh, to find out where he's going; find out where he's been." Luciano says, pleased with himself.

"Something like that. What do you know about Lithuania?"

"Former Soviet Bloc country. Very difficult to get information there. Lot's of official records lost or destroyed. That where he's from?"

Will hears him slurping, imagines the sweet flesh of a peach disappear in Luciano's vacuous mouth, his blade poised to take another juicy slice.

"You and Lucia could take a trip there. Investigate. See where it leads."

"Hmmmm. I don't know. Very expensive. Need passports, accommodations, and lots and lots of discretion."

"Mr. Verger has very deep pockets, doesn't he?"

"Not as deep as his vengeance."

Will can imagine the dangerous smile reflected in Luciano’s blade that has likely not left his hand the entire conversation.

“Ok. I’ll make the arrangements with Mr. Verger on your recommendation. You prepare a dossier for me and my sister, eh?”

“I’ll be in touch.” Will says.

He looks again at the bed. He looks outside. The sun is out, there is a breeze, and the parkway is not far. He knows if he lies down, he will either think or dream. At least if he goes outside, he will only think. He slips on his sneakers and leaves his computer, his phone, and his laundry inside.

Chapter 14

Chapter Summary

Hannibal returns to his memory palace. This time, it is the master bedroom he visits.

"You said you fed the dogs, repaired the window?" A nod from Will. "You are welcome to stay."
Will had found his keys by then and had stood with one hand on the doorknob. He had inclined his head to look again at his bandage.
"An invitation?" Will had asked, head still bent.
"Always. Your choice, Will."

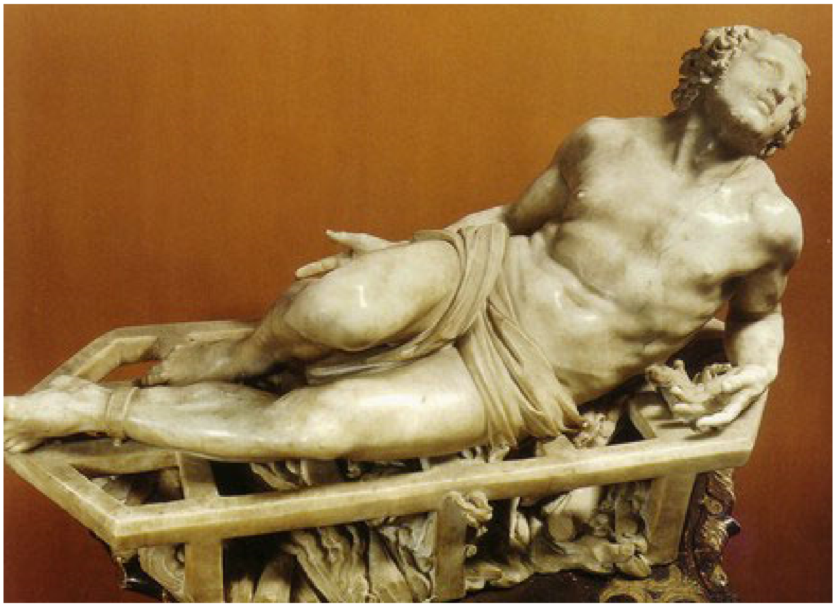
Chapter 14



Saint Lawrence Martyred on a Gridiron

Bernini

Contini Bonacossi Collection, Uffizi Gallery, Florence

Hannibal returns to his memory palace. This time, it is the master bedroom he visits.

Hannibal has finished his lecture. It is dusk outside. Hannibal can see the Ponte Vecchio and the Arno through the huge windows as he walks with his notebook in hand. The Museum is closed for the day but Hannibal has the clearance and the key card that afford him a leisurely departure.

He has walked the entire Corridor many times the past year. After delivering his lecture at Palazzo Pitti, the private home of the Medici, he takes his time returning to the Uffizi Gallery through the wandering passages of the Vasari Corridor, a restricted part of the Uffizi, and closed to tourists.

Sexual symbolism in the art of the High Renaissance had been the topic of his lecture and he had not spared his small audience the fascinating minutia embedded in the collected works of the Medici. Hannibal shakes his head slightly as he walks. Adults should not be so uncomfortable discussing a topic as universal as sex. Although, given his audience today, perhaps not so universal.

Restricting access had not guaranteed the safety of the collection however, and Hannibal is reminded of man's cruelty as he rounds the next corner. People went to great lengths to deny their sexual desires, but spent a lot of time engaged in pointless violence. Hannibal found politically charged violence the most reprehensible of all.

The Italian Mafia had blown up a section of the Corridor in 1993, along with a strip of houses, destroying many irreplaceable pieces and damaging several others. The remnants had been lovingly restored as much as possible and rehung to commemorate the attack. Hannibal thinks five people died, but he's not certain. The loss of art was a travesty.

The Vasari Corridor was designed and built by Giorgio Vasari, artist and architect of the Renaissance, but known for his Lives of the Painters a guide to the celebrated artists of his time, a treatise akin to Seutonius' The Twelve Caesars though less scandalous. As Hannibal walks through the corridor he imagines it without the portraits, paintings, and sculptures and tries to see it as it had been all those centuries ago when the Medici and ruling class of Florence used it to ensure safe and unobstructed passage through the city.

Its raised and winding passageways extend from the Palazzo Pitti to the Palazzo Vecchio in Piazza della Signoria, the seat of power where the Medici had served their beloved Florence and where the replica of Michelangelo's David sits outside so the original is not exposed to the corrosive rain and pigeon excrement. The Corridor joins with the Uffizi along the way.

The Corridor contains work from artists of the past five centuries, and Hannibal can name nearly all of them. In time, he will learn the rest.

He enjoys his position with the Uffizi and takes pride in delivering his lectures to the small groups of professors and special guests granted special dispensation to walk the hallowed Corridor with him. He is in his element as he takes them through a carefully plotted presentation seated in a darkened room of Palazzo Vecchio, their heads nodding at the power point he made to enhance his lecture. He has been gratified by the requests for copies of his expertly researched and annotated notes.

But his pride and enjoyment have not been enough to fill the hole in his chest. As Hannibal's dark eyes are treated to the twisting figures of the saints in rapturous agony that line the walls, he is reminded of the topic of his lecture and his thoughts turn invariably to thoughts of Will.

He pauses, not for the first time, before the work of an unknown artist, believed to be a student of Bernini since the Bernini sculpture it copies is displayed in the Uffizi's Contini Bonacossi Collection, also closed to the public. It is a most sensuous and sensual handling of paint and brush.

The painting recalls the martyrdom of Saint Lawrence who met a grisly end tied to a gridiron. The pose of the finely chiseled and polished marble body is intended to depict grace in the face of death. The saint's legs writhe along the gridiron as his muscular body twists against the bonds that bind his tightly bound extremities in place. He leans on one elbow, so he can angle his head heavenward in order to witness the face of God in his moment of supreme surrender.

Hannibal marvels at the brushstrokes that create the illusion of smooth living flesh upon the flat canvas even after all this time. The illusion would be lost should Hannibal reach out his hand and touch the surface and so, he does not. He stares at the serene visage upon the face of the saint, the smooth skin, the wisps of stubble along his chin, and the mane of tousled brown curls that crown his head.

His mind travels to his memory palace where Will had found himself in a similar pose absent the bonds gathered at wrists and ankles but tied to Hannibal's bed nonetheless.

The starless snowy night that Hannibal had harnessed the savage passion of Randall Tier and sent him to indulge his primal urges on the young FBI profiler who had questioned him only days before had proven the visceral awakening for Will that Hannibal had hoped for. Tier had gazed at the silent and solitary little house in Wolf Trap from his concealed vantage point in the woods, panting with anticipation as his breath had caught in the night air and billowed into the darkness.

Tier had provided a necessary catalyst. It had not been Tier's savage passions Hannibal had wanted to ignite.

While Tier had been beautiful in his own way, his beauty had remained the simple and primal beauty it had always been. Tier had merely refined its expression. The expression was stunning in its simplicity and terrible in its awesome execution, and in that, Tier's evolution had reached its pinnacle. His becoming could now give rise to Will's becoming. Hannibal had drunk deeply from Will's cup of surrender to his becoming that night.

His had been a truly beautiful and complex becoming; as finely crafted as the cherished vintages in Hannibal's wine cellar and infinitely more delicious. The events play out in Hannibal's mind accompanied by all the raw emotion recorded in the recesses of Hannibal's vast and detailed palace.

Hannibal had wanted to see Will, had wanted his feelings to be genuine. With his empathy, Will could imagine a Hannibal in his mind; could mimic Hannibal; could anticipate. He had been doing that all evening as he had prepared his monument to Tier and that had been expected. That Will could do that was why he was here.

The monument had only been a part of the experience he had shared with Will. Savagery distilled and quieted with purposeful creation had given way to other unsated unrealized urges on the edge of Will's consciousness. Dismantling the restraints Will had placed on those urges had been foremost on Hannibal's mind as Will had followed him up from the depths of his basement through the kitchen and up the stairs to his master bedroom and bath, to wash away the blood of his baptism.

But for this, Hannibal had wanted Will, not Will's idea of what Hannibal wanted. He's still not sure what he got that long lost weekend at his home in Baltimore.

Possess.

Consume.

Consummation.

Violence and intimacy, a circle.

Anticipation of this moment had been building for a long time. His advance preparations had nurtured the urges Will had kept buried for so long, including those of the sexual variety. Hannibal had viewed the growing relationship between them as a symphony in the making. Establishing a foundation had taken time, but the prelude was over.

The prelude had been composed by Hannibal. The first movement had been Will's. Will had written the coda to that movement by killing Tier with his bare hands. Hannibal had been ready for a duet, but he had not been sure about Will. Wasn't that always the case?

It had been an honest moment for Will. The conditioning had been designed to ease Will's acceptance, not force it. Hannibal had known how difficult intimacy was for Will. Not that he wasn't capable of sexual intimacy, but he was wary of it, of the loss of control, of self, it represented.

No matter how kissable Alana Bloom had been, Will had only acted on his attraction to her out of desperation for a life line in a moment of distress. Hannibal's conditioning had been a gift to Will. A gift Will had shared, rather surprisingly with Margot Verger. But that had been later. This night, Hannibal had been the recipient of Will's gifts.

No one had ever looked at Hannibal, or into Hannibal, as Will had.

Hannibal had decided after gazing at Will across the little table in his motel room in Minnesota where they had shared their first meal together, that those penetrating blue eyes had the potential to see what others refused to see. That Will's empathy gave him the power to understand and appreciate Hannibal in ways no one else had done and in ways he could share if Will permitted himself to accept what Hannibal had seen in him.

What do you see?

The mongoose I want under the house when the snakes slither by.

It was after Will had returned, unharmed from his altercation with Tobias Budge, that Hannibal had realized he loved him.

I feel like I've dragged you into my world.

I got here on my own. But I appreciate the company.

But it was only after he had caused Will's incarceration at BSHCI that Hannibal had acknowledged he wanted him. Will's physical absence had affected Hannibal so profoundly, that getting him back was all Hannibal could do.

I want you to believe in the best of me, just as I believe in the best of you… I don't want you to be here.

I don't want me to be here either.

No one has moved Hannibal like Will. Will makes him feel…alive.

Earlier, Will had stared at the colorless and freshly cleaned body of Randall Tier as it lay on the rinse table in the basement and had been well aware he might have been the one lying there, albeit in pieces. His quiet soulful eyes had mourned over Tier's corpse acknowledging the scenario where he might have been the one providing the meat for yet another delectable feast. He had brushed his bristly chin over Hannibal's hand resting warm and heavy on his shoulder and he had known Hannibal had not wanted Tier beside him.

Will had taken a quick inventory of his workspace, touching everything with eyes and slender fingers as Hannibal had indulged his curiosity over the hum of Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto. He had sliced off Tier's arms and legs before the beginning of the second movement.

In the beginning, Will had not known how Hannibal had indulged him in so many ways, had found him too fascinating and beautiful to reprimand as he had made himself at home in Hannibal's office.

He was always leaving his coat lying about, walking around the upper level his boots caked with mud.

He had sat at Hannibal's desk, brushing aside Hannibal's appointment book, his pens, clock, and whatever else had been sitting there to make room for his own notebook as he had sat hunched over Hannibal's solid teak antique desk writing lecture notes or grading papers before driving home after a session.

He had leaned on that perfectly polished desk, had actually dispensed with the leather chair altogether and had sat on his desk, all without realizing Hannibal had never allowed anyone to do so without ending up on his dinner table.

Later, after Will had become more familiar with Hannibal's habits and wishes, he had continued to assault Hannibal's desk, but only after treating Hannibal to raised brows, wide blue eyes, and a knowing tease of a smile.

Hannibal had rearranged the items on his desk to accommodate Will with his buttons and belt buckles on the nights he had appointments. He had kept a coaster on the desk just for him.

The indulgence Hannibal had granted to Will in his office paled next to the indulgence Will received at his house. Will had walked a fine line when it came to pushing Hannibal's patience in his own home and for that reason Hannibal had concluded that Will enjoyed living dangerously.

Yes, Will had known the place he held in Hannibal's eyes and his heart. He had won it, and Hannibal had let him claim it for his own.

The dismemberment of Tier had been performed with cold efficiency. Will had severed limbs where Hannibal had indicated once Will had explained the form his debt would take. Will had not recoiled from the task of removing organs nor had he displayed any trepidation about dismantling Tier's mandible from the temporal bones of the upper jaw.

Will was possessed of a surgeon's hands, sure and nimble hands - like his own. He had set those hands to the task of affixing the saber toothed tiger's upper jaw to the gutted remains of Tier's head with the same concentrated determination as he would a motor. He had likely found the tasks remarkably similar by the end of it.

His monument to Tier had mirrored Hannibal's penchant for dispensing judgment but with Tier Will had endowed his gruesome tableau with his own grotesque homage to Tier's pathology and deepest desires. Will's creation demonstrated an intimate identification with Tier's brand of violence; Tier's brutality realized in a sculpture fashioned from his own flesh and bones.

Will had endowed his work with his own unique sensitivity and an attention to detail that Hannibal could only admire. Tier was a masterpiece.

Will had stood in the dim hall of the museum, flexing his bandaged hand, his mind churning restlessly behind eyes that swept over his creation, seeing shadows only he could see. After disposing of the evidence, Hannibal had driven them back to his house.

Will had helped Hannibal clean his workspace in the basement. He had paused to stretch his back, crack his neck, but had not complained. Hannibal's back and limbs were more accustomed to the labor, but even he had felt the pangs of tired muscles. Will had not tarried when Hannibal had finally gestured to the stairs after giving the room a cursory once over.

Will's car had been parked around back in his usual place next to the kitchen entrance. He had already disinfected and cleaned his vehicle and had stood in Hannibal's kitchen, fishing around in his pockets for his car keys.

"Will, it makes no sense to drive to Wolf Trap when a phone call from Jack is imminent. Come upstairs and shower – you need to relax."

Will had continued to feel around for his keys.

"You said you fed the dogs, repaired the window?" A nod from Will. "You are welcome to stay."

Will had found his keys by then and had stood with one hand on the doorknob. He had inclined his head to look again at his bandage.

"An invitation?" Will had asked, head still bent.

"Always. Your choice, Will."

Hannibal knows now how conflicted Will had been that night. Playing secret agent for Jack while subjecting himself to a complete immersion into the very place within himself he had always feared.

But Jack had already demonstrated his disregard for Will's personal safety and mental well-being, and knowing Will, he had likely counted on Jack behaving that way. Will had had his own agenda all along and Jack had had no idea what he had sanctioned. Will had engaged in behavior that Jack would never have approved of, let alone understood.

While Will had been deceiving Hannibal; he had been deceiving himself. Until…

Didn't I?

Will could not have fabricated his emotions nor could he have simulated his physical responses that weekend, no matter how powerfully he employed his gift. His pure empathy had at last, for a time, provided him an accurate reflection of himself.

Hannibal had seen Will naked many times. Hannibal had undressed and dressed him, all while he had been passed out or in some stage of altered consciousness. Those had not been the occasions to appreciate Will's physical assets. To take advantage of Will in that state would have been unforgivably rude. Will's black outs had been of finite duration and Hannibal had his therapy to focus on.

To see Will upright and moving around in complete command of his faculties naked was quite a different thing. A connoisseur of beauty, Hannibal had appreciated the proportion and symmetry of Will's physique. He was quite simply the Greek ideal. Will was exactly what Hannibal would have placed perfect and naked in Eden if he were God.

As they had showered, Hannibal had found himself averting his gaze, subverting his curiosity and, if Hannibal were to be honest, his possessiveness of Will's unadulterated beauty. Hannibal had tempered his elation at being able to touch him and Will allowing Hannibal to touch him. Sheer delight at the sensation of Will's lathered flesh beneath his fingertips had threated to claim Hannibal's control and rip it from him.

A meal Hannibal could devour once, but this…possessing Will like this could be enjoyed time and time again. Hannibal had no doubt that Will had understood the meaning of offering himself like this.

His look of mild surprise when Hannibal had begun to pull off his own clothes as the steam from the shower filled his extravagant bath had disappeared quickly. Too quickly for Hannibal. He had enjoyed the way Will's breath had caught in his throat and the way he had swallowed it down eyes riveted to Hannibal's every movement.

As Hannibal had washed Will, cleansed his hair, his face, his body of the remnants of Tier's dismemberment and restoration, the meaningful glances exchanged between them had confirmed for Hannibal that Will had understood Hannibal's hunger for him and was prepared to acquiesce.

The tension had hung thickly in the steam; the very air they had breathed had been saturated with it.

Hannibal had exercised restraint in the shower. Above all else, Hannibal had wanted to put Will at ease, to summon those associations already so receptive to Hannibal's voice and touch.

Will was not going to run out the door, he had wanted to be here, but this was an important step for Will to take. Hannibal had been preparing Will for this. Even so, Hannibal had never been able to fully understand how Will's mind worked, and no matter how confident Hannibal had been of his therapy, he had only been able to guess how effective his efforts would prove on Will.

Hannibal clenches his jaw in the painful knowledge that Will had viewed his therapy as a cancer that had to be excised, not as a cure. Did he still?

Hannibal's eyes twitch with the thought that Will might very well be self-medicating somewhere, drowning in alcohol and bitterness, numbing his mind enough so he could drift into the fitful state he associates with something that approaches actual slumber. Will's capacity for self-abuse was at least as deep as his empathy. When Will turned his empathic lens upon himself he often found only the worst. Hannibal had tried to change that perception.

And Will, the mirrors in your mind can reflect the best of yourself, not the worst of someone else.

Hannibal remembers he had finished wrapping the fresh bandage around Will's hand after their shower. Will had watched Hannibal redress his wound in silence, and although he was present, he had remained as quiet and pliable as he had been in the shower. He had acknowledged Hannibal; a nod here and eye contact there, reassuring Hannibal that he had not departed completely and yet he had not been entirely there.

Will's behavior would have seemed dissociative had Hannibal not known better. But Hannibal had become accustomed to Will's mannerisms and had dismissed any clinical concern. Neither had he taken Will's aloofness personally. Will's mind allowed him to be many places at once, a singular feat Hannibal had recognized only within himself, until Will.

Part of Will had still been with Tier.

Hannibal had handled Will with care all evening, had spoken in measured tones; had kept the touching gentle, respectful. Hannibal's patience with Will was boundless. Will had always held his own around Hannibal, and Hannibal had always been attentive to the subtle and not so subtle cues from Will when it came to defining his personal space. At least when Will had been conscious.

Will had been in this bedroom before, and the bathroom, but he had not recovered those memories despite Chilton's efforts, perhaps because of them. Will had lost time in this very bed, had slept in clothes procured by Hannibal, clothes that had been infused with the scent of his sachet filled drawers and closets. Will had wandered down Hannibal's halls, sleepwalking, until Hannibal had guided him gently to his Bentley and driven him back to Wolf Trap and had tucked him into his own bed.

Did you lose time again, Will?

Yes…I can't believe this keeps happening to me…

Patience was most definitely a virtue, especially where his dear Will was concerned. The rewards had been incalculable. Hannibal had been guiding Will toward this stage of his evolution for months as surely as he had guided him so many times to his car.

Hannibal had been pleased with Will all evening. Will had obeyed his instructions; neither objecting to, nor questioning anything asked of him…so far.

Hannibal had understood that even while showering that Will had continued to process the multitude of emotions that threatened to tear his mind apart. He was not only analyzing his own responses, but the feelings, intentions, and desires of Randall and of Hannibal as well. The blank expression on Will's face was misleading. It would be a mistake to think that his mind was vacant. Far from it.

Hannibal had placed the surgical tape back into his med kit and had looked down at his work, his fingers taking Will's hand in his. He had stroked Will's slender fingers with his thumb coaxing warmth back into Will's cool dry skin.

"This is the perfect symbol of your desire for violence and intimacy."

He had drawn his thumb across the clean white strips of cotton. He imagines again how that fight to the death with Randall must have played out. How Will's fingers must have curled in anticipation of colliding with flesh, skin, and bone. How he must have stood staring at his stained and scraped knuckles in awe of what he had done. Had he smiled with satisfaction afterward? Hannibal believes he did.

Will's hand had stirred a little at Hannibal's touch, his eyes wide as he had watched Hannibal sniff at the fresh bandage. Hannibal had noted the smell of the antiseptic mingled with the soap smelled faintly like Will's old aftershave. The new Will, the one who had resumed his therapy, had since traded up and Hannibal had enthusiastically approved of that change.

Hannibal had sensed the tension coiled within Will as he had sat on the edge of the bed, still, eyes tracking Hannibal as he had risen to stand beside him. Will had lifted his eyes slowly, taking measure of Hannibal's impressive physique. Hannibal had bathed in the glow of Will's attentions, his senses heighted to a most delightful degree.

"Is it?" Will had said finally, that peculiar flicker of amusement on his lips. "I would think dressing wounds in the nude was pretty intimate."

Hannibal's lips had twitched as he quelled another of the smiles Will could so easily bring to the surface.

"Where violence is the expression of intimacy, intimacy is the reward for the violence. A circle."

He had leaned closer savoring the smell of his soap on Will's perfect pale skin and his shampoo lingering in the dark damp curls framing his face.

"Are you proposing more violence or more intimacy?"

Will had looked up at him as Hannibal's hand had cupped his jaw, thumb idly caressing the stubble on his chin. It was a familiar touch that invited the familiar response. Will had leaned into his hand as Hannibal had answered, eyes distractingly beautiful as he had held Hannibal's gaze.

"I think where you and I are concerned, the two are hopelessly entwined." Hannibal had said.

Will's eyes had softened in agreement even if his mouth had not. Hannibal had been unprepared for what happened next.

Will had abruptly pushed off from the bed and had twisted his body shoving a surprised Hannibal sideways and forward so that Hannibal had been forced to dive for the bed rather than lose his footing. A second later, Hannibal had found himself lying on his back and Will had him pinned, elbow and forearm across his throat. He had pressed against Hannibal's Adam's apple in a show of force, but had allowed enough leverage so Hannibal had been able to swallow slowly.

That had been Will's first mistake.

Will's eyes had flickered with the ripple of movement in Hannibal's throat beneath his arm. Hannibal had fancied that Will had not even been aware of the way he had rolled his arm slightly over the growth of evening whiskers allowing the stubble to tease the soft skin of his arm. Will had moved in close so that their noses were almost touching.

"I agree" Will had said, his breath warm and sweet.

Hannibal had wondered in that moment if Will had enjoyed the feel of their bodies finally touching, the sensation of skin on skin as much as he. He had felt the weight of Will as Will had slid around on top of him adjusting his position. He had actually believed he could hold Hannibal there beneath him. Hannibal had reveled in the sensuousness, the carnality of Will's stomach, hips, and cock pressing, pulsing with the flush of blood and oxygen coursing through him. Will's eyes had held the barest hint of blue glimmering beneath black lashes.

"Are you thinking about killing me, Will?"

Hannibal had swallowed again, had clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth and had waited with parted lips for the subtle movements to register in Will's unblinking eyes.

"Right now? No…"

Will had moistened his lips, and Hannibal had felt the grip of Will's legs around his hips tighten slightly.

Will had leaned in and closed the sliver of space between them; his lips had grazed Hannibal's. Opportunity had certainly beckoned during those times Will had been drugged in his office, asleep in his bed, or suffering a mild seizure and Hannibal had touched Will's lips with his fingers many times, had tested Will's sucking reflex, had touched his lips to Will's as Will had just done, but he had never actually kissed him.

Hannibal had found himself staring at a very awake and self-possessed Will poised right above his mouth. Will had paused, hovering to see what Hannibal would do.

Hannibal had lifted his head off the mattress to press into the tentative kiss Will had offered. The taste of that mouth had sent a cascade of pleasure through every nerve. As Will had pressed back, his lips crushing into Hannibal's own, his weight on Hannibal's throat shifted.

That had been Will's second mistake.

Hannibal had exploited Will's momentary lapse in his hold and had bolted up dislodging Will who had fumbled to regain his position. It was a futile but valiant attempt on Will's part. Unused to the slippery satin, Will had lost his grip on the sheets and his legs had flailed in an effort to find balance on the tip of the mattress.

Hannibal had quickly flipped Will onto his back, had shoved him upward along the mattress, holding his arms over his head locking him in a hold. Will had looked down at his lower half with some alarm. He had found his knees bent and calves dangling over the side of the bed. He had kicked his feet, unable to touch the floor. That was Hannibal's design.

Hannibal had measured the distance from bed to floor a long time ago. Calculating in Will's height had been easy enough for Hannibal to determine the precise placement of the mattress and of the position Will's body should be on the mattress to avoid traction. Hannibal knew the value of advance preparation.

Hannibal had positioned himself over Will, knees between Will's legs, able to spread them if he chose.

Will had looked up at him, grimaced; his jaw twitching from side to side in that way that was uniquely his. He had been annoyed at Hannibal, but more likely with himself. Hannibal had stared down at him enjoying the moment. He had enjoyed just being able to look at him this way.

Hannibal had seen nearly every emotion play across Will's beautiful face up to that night. All but one. And Hannibal had desired to see that emotion most of all.

But at this moment, Hannibal had been content to gaze at Will trapped beneath him. His arms had been bent over his head, his wrists pinned to the mattress, chest rising and falling with each breath; a perfect pose of surrender that Hannibal had conjured up many times before. Hannibal had thought Will had been made to look like this.

The longing to see Will's face contorted in pleasure had been palpable. Hannibal had felt the excess of saliva under his tongue, the minute increase of sensitivity throughout his body. The mere thought had sent tremors up and down Hannibal's spine, tiny needles prickling from scalp to balls. And he had not doubted that Will had been perceptive enough to detect his involuntary responses.

What Will had needed, had been in need of for a long time, was to lose control and give himself over to his urges, violent and otherwise. In a safe environment, of course. There was no place more secure than Hannibal's bed, and no one more understanding or willing to assist than Hannibal.

Hannibal had swallowed the silence that hung between them, had allowed Will time to decide if he truly wanted to take the intimacy further. Whatever happened had to be a voluntary act on Will's part. Whether out of curiosity or unbridled lust, Hannibal had not cared. He had hoped for some combination of the two. Will did not love him.

That Will had wanted to know him, see him, had been enough. On some level, Will must have known that in engaging Hannibal, he would also know himself.

Hannibal had leaned forward, "You once said the light from friendship won't reach us for a million years."

"And you said the friendship we had is over."

"Yet here we are."

"Yes. Here we are."

"Still grieving for what has been lost?"

"Still trying to posit my intentions?"

"You are always unpredictable, Will."

Hannibal had slid his hips over Will's, his cock lightly skimming the skin of Will's, now warm and erect. He had enjoyed the slight shudder from Will and the widening of his pupils.

"I could not have predicted this." He had pressed harder.

A huff and a snicker had escaped from Will. "Please. Orchestrated is more like it."

"I…hoped." Hannibal could have looked into those eyes all night.

"Oh, you…hoped? You leave nothing to chance."

"Do I? We are here, in this moment only because you wish it. I presented you with choices. I know what I want. Do you?"

Hannibal had allowed him to truly consider his question. He had waited as Will had wrapped his mind around the consequences of his answer. The lamp had cast a soft glow about the room and Will's face had appeared younger. The tired creases had disappeared from his eyes and the pucker of flesh that appeared when Will furrowed his brow had seemed less pronounced.

Will had tensed his arms, testing Hannibal's hold on him. He had arched his back so that his body pressed flush against Hannibal's. Hannibal had arched too, high enough so that Will's body could no longer touch him. Will had sighed, a sweet little sound, and had raised his brows, settled himself back into the mattress.

"I will not take your silence for an answer, Will, nor will I infer one from your behavior."

Will had let loose a long sigh then. "Or what? Veiled threats...Doctor Lecter?"

Hannibal had actually blinked. So infuriating, his Will. In answer to his inquiry, Hannibal had eased Will's legs wider, and wider still, until Will's lips had pressed together in a thin determined line.

"There is nothing veiled here, Will. You fantasize about killing me. I propose another kind of intimacy and...ecstasy."

Will had laughed and turned his head aside. "You are suggesting the idea of strangling you with my bare hands is sexually arousing? That's rather…pedestrian."

"As are your attempts to avoid my questions."

Hannibal had leaned in close to inhale Will's hair, lowering his entire body on top of Will as he had breathed in the heady aroma of sandalwood and the musky sweetness that Hannibal had come to recognize as Will's own scent.

"Violent intimacy. Intimate violence." Will had muttered. His face had been so close Hannibal had felt his eyelashes fluttering against his nose.

"My invitation still stands. Accepted or no?"

"Yes." He had whispered. Hannibal had pressed more tightly, grinding his hips against Will in a slow rhythmic motion that caused Will to suck in a breath.

"Hmmmmm?"

"Yes." Will had said again, "Accepted."

Hannibal had kissed him then, deeply and forcefully, not at all the way he had kissed Alana in this very bed. Hannibal had known instinctively that Will did not want romantic nuzzling from him. Will had let his demon out to play and his demon demanded the same intensity in sex as it had in killing. Blood or semen. Will's demon would devour either one with abandon.

As Hannibal had released his grip on Will's arms, Will had cast aside his quiet and composed demeanor in favor of his demon. Hannibal had been assaulted with Will's lips, teeth, and hands all over him. It had been like someone else had joined Hannibal in the bed. And Hannibal had welcomed this other side of Will, had encouraged it, and had loved him for it.

When Hannibal had had enough of ravaging Will's mouth, had felt the urgent kneading of Will's cock against his own, he had pulled away. Will had wet his lips, stared up at him with half lidded eyes.

Hannibal had straddled him, stroked his cheek, and brushed his unruly hair away from his face. Will had propped himself up on his elbows and leveled his unflinching gaze at Hannibal. A most challenging glint from deep blue eyes had peered from beneath thick lashes.

Hannibal had taken Will's face in his hands again, unable to help himself, and spread Will's lips with his tongue. Will had grabbed Hannibal by the shoulders and had sucked his tongue into his mouth. Tongues had glided along teeth and heat had coursed through veins like blood.

He had shuddered in surprise upon feeling the sharp scrape of Will's teeth along his tongue and then had winced in pleasure as Will's teeth had bit down releasing the iron tang of blood. Hannibal's heart had thudded in his chest and he had clenched Will tighter, had felt his rib cage swell as Will gasped for more air, more of this…

Hannibal had bitten him back. Will had arched beneath him, his hands at once in Hannibal's hair, grabbing and pulling, mouths locked together in spit and blood. The groping and twisting had been unrestrained after that.

They had rolled over the bed, bodies entwined in a scramble for dominance like two wolves in heat. Hannibal had found that biting into Will's collarbone and the tender flesh above it sent Will's arms around his neck so tightly Hannibal could barely breathe. He had made a point to graze on him clear up to his neck knowing that pale flesh would bloom with bruises later. In a moment of clarity, Will had shoved Hannibal backward shaking his head at Hannibal to stop.

Hannibal had laughed and shoved him back. Hannibal would leave bruises where he pleased and Will would get used to it. Hannibal had already endured the same from Will. Will's pristine lower half had beckoned to Hannibal and Hannibal had indulged his appetite.

He had crouched over Will bending low to trace his lips over Will's stomach. He had felt the pulse of warm blood and the churn of organs as Will had panted and gasped - so much movement beneath the soft skin and muscle. Hannibal had splayed his fingers across Will's navel and down, pressing gently as Will's hips jerked in response to his touch.

Will had not resisted his teeth.

Instead, Will's fingers had found their way into his hair and Hannibal had groaned in pleasure with every tug. Hannibal had licked lower, past Will's navel, lost in the sensation of silky skin and the taste of salty sweat.

The soft moan that had escaped Will's lips as Hannibal had taken his cock in his mouth had been rapturous. Will had needed no coaxing. He thrust his cock into Hannibal's mouth without hesitation.

How quickly Will had trusted. How completely he had forgotten the biting of a moment ago.

Will had inhaled sharply at the tease of Hannibal's teeth across the slit and had bucked his hips off the bed as Hannibal had scored his teeth the length of him, savoring every twitch, every pulse beneath his tongue as Will's cock slid back and forth through his mouth.

It had been Will who groaned the loudest; his words lost in an incoherent refrain as Hannibal had sucked his cock driving Will mad.

“Nuh…oh, God. Ha…Han…Fuck…OH GOD…Han..ni…bal.”

Will had uttered His name and Hannibal’s in the same breath and Hannibal could not have been more pleased.

When Hannibal had been satisfied he could tease Will no longer, he had released Will’s cock from between his lips.

Will had looked up at him from the mattress, lips drawn in a sinfully inviting smile. He had scooted backward to face Hannibal sitting up on his elbows, hair in tangles about his head. Hannibal had thought that Will should not be allowed to look like that. But he had looked like that.

Hannibal had wanted to impale Will and possess him entirely. But, Hannibal had lavished his attentions on Will because the night had been intended as Will’s introduction to yet another pleasure they could share. Splitting him apart would have been too much, too soon. Patience.

Still, Hannibal had wanted to share this most intimate of encounters with Will as much as he could. He had smiled back at Will from across the rumpled mattress. Hannibal had already written the coda for their first pas de deux in his mind.

Will had tensed, sensing Hannibal was about to spring on him.

Will had been correct about that.

Will had not known Hannibal could move so fast.

The sensation of both their cocks in Hannibal’s hands had been nearly too much for Will to bear. He had trembled against Hannibal’s chest, clutching his shoulders for balance, but most importantly for Hannibal – he had been able to see Will’s face.

Hannibal had had no intention of missing the look of Will’s face in complete bliss. Will had not disappointed him. Like a saint experiencing the grace of God, Will had thrown his head back and had groaned until Hannibal had wrung the last quiver and drop from him.

Hannibal had been quite vocal himself, but he had doubted Will had even noticed. Will had collapsed onto his shoulder and Hannibal had held his head in his hands, reveling in the touch of Will’s arms around his neck.

Eventually they had both succumbed to gravity and exhaustion. Will had unwrapped himself from Hannibal’s embrace and had flopped onto the mattress. Hannibal had joined him, gathering up the sheet and blankets from the floor to cover them as their heat had dissipated and the sweat had dried upon their skin.

It is this moment that Will’s pose upon the satin echoes the pose of the martyred saint painted lovingly upon the canvas that hangs before Hannibal now. The same look of wonder and acceptance had graced his features as he had twisted his body to make room next to him, for Hannibal.

Will had reclined onto his back, pulling up the sheet and blankets Hannibal had draped over them.

Hannibal had stretched out beside him, had caressed his flushed cheeks and twisted his fingers through the damp curls splayed out upon the pillow framing his head like a dirty halo. Will had turned his head to face Hannibal. There had been a look in his eyes that Hannibal had not seen before and paired with the enigmatic smile upon his lips, Hannibal had been perplexed.

He puzzles over it still.

“I am…quite pleased.” Hannibal had said his fingers still curled around damp locks of hair.

“Of course you are.” Will had answered.

“Go to sleep, Will.”

“And breathe deep the gathering gloom…” Will had said his eyes already closed.

Hannibal blinks to see the Corridor no longer hosts shadows - the artificial lights have come one. The sky outside is dark, no longer twilight. He clears his throat and lifts his head. He glances at his watch and decides he has retreated enough for one day.

Will had breathed deeply the gathering gloom; they both had. The storm had indeed been on the event horizon of chaos, but it had been their chaos. Hannibal misses it, deeply.

Chapter 15

Chapter Summary

Will's therapy sessions with Daniel intensify for Will and Daniel gives him some homework.

Daniel is sure that Will could not have had time during those weeks leading up to the bloodbath in Lecter's kitchen, to analyze much of anything. He had been operating on instinct and had spent most of his time with Lecter, unable to step outside the condensed and highly concentrated universe the two of them had created for themselves. It is only now that Will has been afforded the opportunity to parse and examine events in any meaningful way. One thing Will cannot do is be objective.

Chapter 15

Will's therapy with Daniel intensifies and involves some homework.

"Will!"

Will hears Daniel's voice filter through the thud of his heartbeat which is disturbingly loud, echoing in his ears. Despite the pain that envelops him, he feels faint, almost weightless like he is fading…

"Will, Stop!" Daniel's voice is more insistent now, closer. He feels a hand grip his shoulder. He wonders why the paramedics would handle him so roughly given he is barely holding his guts inside with his own hands…

"Jesus….think of something else! Ah…Damn it… Sorry, Will."

Will feels a slap to his face. It is not a gentle slap by any means. Mist descends over Hannibal's kitchen floor, obscuring the tide of blood that seeps onto every crevice of clothing and every pore of his skin. Will feels soaking wet as the mist condenses into droplets spilling over him, rivulets of water run over his back, his hair, his face. He is melting into a pool, his brain as saturated as the rest of him.

He feels another slap but his mind relentlessly recalls his last moments of conscious thought, his eyes trained on the fallen ravenstag, its body heaving as Will struggles for each breath. The snow stag emerges from the doorway and Will's eyes shift from the dying black one to its frosted twin pacing in the hallway. Will sees the fangs and paws of the white wolf crouching behind it and he hears Daniel's voice once again.

"God Damn it…Will! Open your eyes."

His eyes flutter open to see Daniel leaning over him, one hand grasping his shoulder, the other holding onto his own stomach nearly doubled over.

"Think of something happy if you can manage it…"

Will thinks of his dogs, concentrating very hard. It is difficult to train his thoughts elsewhere. It is as if his mind wants to stay on the kitchen floor.

The whining of seven furry faces greets him at his door on the front porch. He is shaking off the snow sticking to his jacket and trousers from shoveling out his car. His breath hangs in the frigid air on the porch as the dogs watch from behind the glass. The forecast had not called for snow or he would have parked the Volvo in the barn…

Daniel's fingers release his shoulder from their grip. Will senses rather than sees Daniel's other hand drop from his stomach as he flops into his couch. The only sound Will can hear is labored breathing, his own, and Daniel's. Daniel takes in gulps of air from his seat as Will does the same. Both of them caught in the remnant of a nightmare Will has been unable to share with anyone until now.

"I can't," Daniel says, his voice cracking, "I can't experience that kind of trauma, Will. Too raw. I couldn't feel myself for a minute. I got completely lost in your memory."

Will licks his lips and sits up straight. He clenches his fist so that his nails press into his flesh grounding him. "That's never happened before? Not with any patient?" He rubs at his cheek.

"Never." Daniel assures him.

Will's face has bloomed crimson on the side where Daniel slapped him. The amount of force Daniel had to use to dislodge Will from his trance surprised him, and it certainly surprised Will. He watches Will move his jaw around, recovering from the sensation, his cheek probably still tingling.

Daniel continues to breathe in measured breaths until he is sure his emotions are his own again. He has run a gauntlet of emotions the last several sessions with Will as Will has taken him through the ordeal that haunts his every conscious thought and apparently his subconscious thoughts as well. He has not yet shared with Will his assessment, but the pain of Will's wound pales in comparison to the pain attached to other more complex emotions that have fermented in the cask of Will's mind.

The pain from the wound was far from complex. Will's emotional response to the feel of the blade was brutally simple. It felt like death to Daniel. He had felt a shock as cold as ice breach his skin joined by the throbbing of severed nerves and muscle as flesh was rent apart sending searing agony through his body. He had almost fallen to the floor. His own mind had taken over to protect him from the onslaught of emotion loosened by Will's descent into his subconscious even as he had tried to deliver the highly coded dialogue of his last conversation with one Hannibal Lecter.

The words themselves seemed to have caused Will to retreat into his mind. Will had fallen silent, tears glistening in his eyes while his mind had recreated the moments with such clarity that Will had removed himself from the warm sun filled office completely. The swell of emotional turmoil had been so visceral for Daniel that he had actually lifted his own shirt to be sure he was only imagining it.

He glances over at Will who is staring at him with a pained expression on his face. "That hurt you. You felt that." Will says, and winces at the thought of causing Daniel such distress.

"I'm ok." Daniel says, "You couldn't help it. The mind is a pretty powerful thing isn't it?"

"That's an understatement." Will says; his lips move without the grimace but his eyes still cloud with a darkness that Daniel is becoming more familiar with all the time.

“You pack quite a punch.” Will says, still moving his jaw around.

“Want some ice?”

“Not that much of a punch.” Will smiles and looks around the room, eager to change the topic.

“My tragic tale is complete and I see that you kept an impressive amount of notes. I am still waiting for the men in white jackets to appear on the other side of the door any minute now.”

Daniel laughs and picks up his notebook and pen. “I enjoy your company too much. And what does that say about me?”

Will raises his brows, tilts his head back, “What kind of crazy are you?”

“The kind with a degree. I’ll have to review all these notes later, put concerns and questions in context, so that I can frame my recommendations properly when we discuss where to go from here.” Daniel pauses, “No one could believe this, Will. I’m still processing…”

“You aren’t the only one. Why do you think I’m here?”

“I mean, there’s so much to dissect and…” Daniel stops, searching for the right words.

“swallow and digest?” Will finishes for him.

“You are very dark, Will.” Daniel says as he bites on the inside of his lower lip. “Well. While I digest the psychological implications of this indelicate feast, I have some other notions for you to chew on.”

“I hope they’re just as tasty…” says Will rubbing at his cheek again.

“I think perhaps too tasty, even for you, since you seem to be avoiding them, pushing them off your plate as it were.”

Will sits up straight, his sore cheek forgotten. “What would I be pushing off my plate, Daniel?”

Will has been very specific about what he has disclosed to Daniel and what he has not disclosed today. At least he thought he had. Will wants to control where the therapy goes next as much as he can.

Daniel had seemed to agree with Will’s initial assessment of how their empathy worked. Will had been honest just not entirely forthcoming. If Daniel had believed that their whiskey induced encounter had been a projection of his own emotions, Will had been disinclined to correct his assumption.

Will reminds himself that Daniel has since had time to re-evaluate that assumption and has perhaps been able to separate his own emotions from Will’s and if that is the case…

“The elephant in the room you don’t see, or you don’t want me to see.” Daniel says watching the blue eyes cloud up immediately.

Will knows Daniel is about to stop playing softball with him. Will can’t even adjust his glasses since he doesn’t bother to wear them to his sessions with Daniel anymore, not since Daniel had grabbed them off his face and looked through them. He had set them on the table and waited to see if Will would pick them back up or leave them where they were. Will had conceded that round to Daniel.

He knows Daniel is empathizing with him right now. At least he's trying to. Daniel's gaze is every bit as intense as Hannibal's, but without the calculating gleam Will remembers so well.

Will breaks eye contact and pours himself a glass of the crisp Roman spring water Daniel always keeps in the pitcher. He pauses, and then pours a glass for Daniel. Despite all his mental preparation, Will remains unprepared. It is not natural for him to open himself up to anyone.

Except Hannibal. But now, Will is not so sure that who he had shown to Hannibal was not a product of careful manipulation and conditioning. By Hannibal.

A terrible thing to have your identity taken from you.

Daniel is right. Will is motivated by his fears, specifically the fear of losing himself. Did he let Hannibal get too close? Did he finally succumb to the siren's song that both attracted and repelled? Will sips at the water, stares into the clear glass and wonders if he is that transparent to Daniel.

Daniel expects Will to be avoidant since he has yet to focus on anything besides his anger. Will is angry about being manipulated, used, and then discarded for his trouble. There is anger directed at Jack Crawford and the FBI in general. There is plenty of anger directed at Dr. Lecter. And, Will is angry with himself. His anger is a valid emotion, but anger is not the only emotion Will grapples with, not by a long shot.

Pain, regret, and guilt still roil beneath the veneer of anger Will uses to keep his narrative focused on the story as he wants to tell it, as he wants Daniel to understand it. Will is still very angry because he has yet to grieve.

Will is a waterfall of emotion to Daniel. His forts are too full to contain it all and emotion spills over Daniel scalding him like an overflowing cup of coffee. Will's narrative has confirmed for Daniel that Will blames himself for most, if not all, of what happened. Lecter's role notwithstanding, all the manipulations and plain human error are the culprits, but Will does not see it that way. Will has yet to forgive himself.

Daniel is not sure Will can do that. Will has been living a life of extremes and forgiveness could easily become atonement. Daniel has recognized that Will possesses the selflessness to skip forgiveness entirely and go straight to the sacrificial alter offering himself in a supreme act of contrition. He's not entirely convinced that there wasn't a part of Will consigned to Lecter's blade and Will was surprised when he woke up in the hospital.

Will sits behind his wall, eyes trained on his glass of water and his mouth a line as his mind retreats from truths he believes have been secreted behind his wall, until now.

When Will doesn't comment, Daniel continues, unflustered by the narrowed eyes that peek over the rim of the glass. He knew Will was very good at this game, but so is he. Will should have figured out that his unwillingness to open himself up would tell Daniel almost as much as if he had.

"We can leave the elephant for another time, after I draft some notes. But Will, the elephant is not going to go away. I know this is uncomfortable for you."

Will shakes his head, looks about the room searching for anything to hang his attentions on but Daniel's face. This is not how he planned on introducing the topic of… Will doesn't even finish his thought. His jaw goes tight and he can't stop grinding his teeth. He is making things worse and he can't help it.

The rapport they have created should be a comfort, but Will has not been out of his own head about his relationship with Hannibal. It feels like another betrayal to talk about him, about himself, to dissect something so intimate, even with Daniel.

Daniel sits watching the storm crash across Will's features as he stares at the bookcases. His jaw moves slightly from side to side. Daniel doesn't require his empathy to read the indignation in Will's eyes, or the penitent way he angles his head toward the carpet. Daniel knows Will has turned himself inside out and exhausted every avenue of reflection alone. He had to before he could accept Daniel's help.

Daniel is sure that Will could not have had time during those weeks leading up to the bloodbath in Lecter's kitchen, to analyze much of anything. He had been operating on instinct and had spent most of his time with Lecter, unable to step outside the condensed and highly concentrated universe the two of them had created for themselves. It is only now that Will has been afforded the opportunity to parse and examine events in any meaningful way. One thing Will cannot do is be objective.

Wills sits on the edge of the couch, hunched forward, arms taut against his knees. He has exchanged his fascination with the bookcase for his half full glass of water.

Daniel cannot take the tension any longer. Someone has to pop the big elephant balloon if only to stop saying elephant.

"Will, I know about the sex." Daniel watches Will flinch at the words.

"You and Hannibal had sex. Crazy psychopath sex. I can't wait to hear about it."

Will's head snaps around so fast and his eyes are so large that Daniel clamps down on his tongue to stifle whatever moronic expression he knows is about to spread over his face. But the avoidance has to stop and Daniel is betting his inappropriate humor will appeal to Will's own dry variety.

Will stares at Daniel, his mouth hangs open. He snaps his jaw shut. His face feels hotter now than it had from the slap of a couple minutes ago.

"Fuck you, Daniel."

Will covers his mouth with a hand in the hopes of hiding the grin beneath it. He fails miserably. He closes his eyes and sits quietly, composing himself.

Daniel is watching the crimson blush from his slap creep along Will's neck to radiate deep down even past the unbuttoned buttons of his shirt and Daniel finds that amazing. Will is full of contradictions, but blushing after some of the things Daniel knows he has done, is just…well, charming really. Will must be unbearably charming lying prone upon a bed.

Hannibal Lecter must have eaten him alive.

Will puts his hand down, but his mouth keeps twisting around the words perched on his tongue. He finally licks his lips, purses them together, without opening his eyes.

“That was perhaps the most effective therapeutic approach I have ever encountered.”

Will opens his eyes, engaging Daniel once again, his expression placid. Daniel notes how Will can slip from expression to expression as easily as he would a shirt.

“High praise coming from you. You’re welcome.” Daniel says, reaching for his glass of water.

He feels hot. His shirt feels a little damp. He would like to splash the entire glass of water over his head. He realizes he is empathizing with Will.

The degree of embarrassment can only be proportional to the actions that prompted it. Will is extremely embarrassed. Ergo…

Will flicks a lock of hair off his forehead, runs his fingers through the ringlets that cover his head on this humid summer day and Daniel wishes he would stop. Will should know how he must appear right now, but he really does not. He is not aware that Daniel is once again tied up in knots.

Daniel’s compassion for Will is constantly at odds with his attraction to him. Will is emotionally compromised and his patient. He shouldn’t be thinking about Will sexually at all but if Daniel thought for even a second that Will was aware of the effect he had… there is not a couch in this room where he would be safe.

Daniel finishes off his glass of water, wipes his lips. He looks over at Will who is engrossed in the fabric of his couch again. Will glances up at Daniel. He raises his eyebrows, inviting Daniel to speak.

“So we can talk about the sex now, huh?” Daniel says. He pours himself another glass.

“When did you know?” Will asks.

Will does not miss how Daniel deflects, distracting himself so he doesn’t have to look at Will directly. Will is not sure if Daniel is handling him or avoiding him. Probably both. Will concedes that discussing sex with him will be awkward for Daniel.

“Almost from the beginning, but I only had anecdotal evidence, observations. And you did your very best to avoid, obfuscate, and misdirect.”

Will nods his head. “But we got drunk.”

“And that pretty much cinched it. Yes.” Daniel decides to continue with the conversation since Will seems amenable at the moment. “You didn’t stop just because we were drunk.”

“Not entirely, no. You’re pretty good at this.”

“Yes. I am.”

“You did remember, then?”

“No, I mirrored your behavior, your emotions and I really did drink more than I could handle. I don’t have your tolerance.”

“Then, how did you know?”

“I woke up the next morning with a huge headache and wisps of residual emotions, yours and mine.” Daniel takes a sip of water, “I’ve had time since then to observe and deduce. Look, Will, your forts are not as secure as you think.”

“You let me believe I’m closed off to you?” Will says, jaw working again.

“You are closed off, but I’ve gotten to know you better so you aren’t as locked up to me now. I was interacting with you like I do everyone else…”

“And I’m not everyone else. I understand.” Will exhales and nods, purses his lips. “You’ve had to modify your thinking for me.”

“Pretty much. But I learn quickly.”

“Yes, you certainly do.” Will says allowing his head to roll back. Will figures he can make it a lot easier on himself if he just trusts Daniel to do his job. Daniel has been more than patient with him. The last obstacle has just been removed. Will relaxes a little into his seat the stone around his neck feels a little lighter now.

Will’s fingers knead at the fabric of his jeans and his eyes begin to wander around the room, a signal he has had enough for one day. Daniel decides he has had enough, too. He has some other notions Will might find more to his liking before they end the session.

“Let’s change topics, shall we?” Daniel pauses, offers Will a grin. “For now, I’ll commend you on following my instructions about your health. It shows. You look a lot better than you did a couple weeks ago.”

Daniel feels the relief from Will as if he had sighed out loud. Daniel understands why he is so resistant. It is easier for Will to discuss the murder and the cannibalism than the sex. His relationship with Hannibal is unique. And highly unconventional, given that Will would rather talk about killing and eating people.

Daniel prefers to broach the topic of sex with Dr. Lecter elsewhere, not here, in his office.

“Writing down everything I eat and drink plus an hour a day at a gym seems to be working.” Will is saying, “I have to admit I feel better.” Will’s tone is conversational, giving no hint of his discomfort of a moment ago. “I had things to work on at home, to occupy my mind…but here…I don’t.”

“You can’t expect to confront Lecter if you aren’t physically healthy. It is unreasonable to think your mind can withstand him without proper physical support.”

Will knows Hannibal would have kept himself fit all this time. His hobbies required a pronounced degree of physical fitness and Will is sure Hannibal is swimming laps in a pool somewhere.

“I know. So what now? Do I still have to keep a diet log for you?”

“If you don’t mind, I think I will monitor your eating habits a little longer.”

“I mind, but that makes no difference to you, does it?”

“Not really.” Daniel smiles and begins to gather his notes to peruse later once Will has left. “Getting you healthy physically is a priority. Still having trouble sleeping though, huh?”

“Always have. That is not going to change.”

“Oh, it may in the future, when and if your relationship status changes.”

Will raises a brow, but says nothing. He forgets how perceptive Daniel is and he shouldn’t.

Intimacy, he thinks is always a double edged sword. The pairing of blade and intimacy is not lost on Will. He sighs and returns his thoughts to Daniel who sits patiently waiting for him to connect again.

No wonder his sessions take so long. Will’s mind works so quickly that talking to Daniel sometimes feels like operating in slow motion. His frequent lapses into his own skull cause delays as well.

Daniel is very aware of the passage of time and acutely aware of Will’s limits. He will have to push beyond those limits soon if he is to help Will come to grips with the battle waging inside. Allowing Will a comfort zone has been necessary, but remaining within that zone is no longer an option. They made a lot of progress today and now they will have to build on it.

“Recreation is important to your mental health and while eating better and getting some regular exercise is important, it is not enough. So, I’m going to give you some homework.”

“Homework?”

“As a former teacher, you are familiar with the concept?”

“What do you have in mind?” Will groans inwardly at the thought of keeping another log, or worse, a diary of some kind. He hopes Daniel is not going to propose dream analysis.

“I want you to plan a fishing trip. You are going to teach me how to fly fish.”

Daniel is pleased at the surprised smile that spreads across Will’s face. Even his eyes brighten at the idea. His response is entirely genuine and spontaneous as Daniel hoped it would be.

“You want me to plan it? I have no idea where to go. I don’t have any gear with me. And it’s not the sort of hobby you just throw together…” Immediately, Will begins to catalog the reasons for not going and wonders to himself why he does that.

“I didn’t think so. That’s why you are planning the trip, not me. Get online and become familiar with the area. I can tell you that the Tevere and the Nera rivers are famous for their trout and grayling, whatever grayling are… There are guide services that get the licenses for you and so on.”

“You checked ahead a little, didn’t you?” Will asks.

“Well yes, I had to know if it was possible before I threw it out there.” Daniel responds, “Tell me what is required and I will take care of all that. I will drive since I know the area. Just a day trip, nothing too involved. But I think a day away from here would be good for you.”

“When would you want to go?”

“Anytime. You know Will, most of us have the weekends off.”

“Right.” Will smiles. He doesn’t think in terms of a five day work week. He hasn’t in a long time. A weekend trip actually sounds good. He could pick up some supplies on the way home tonight; take out the fishing kit he packed containing lures he hasn’t bothered to look at since he arrived.

“You really want to buy the rods and everything? That can run you a lot…”

“I got this. It is my idea, I’ll pay for it. We can probably rent most of what we need. Just make sure the location is within driving distance for a day trip. I am not into camping. Not at all.”

Daniel’s tone is quite serious, but Will knows that while the fishing is relaxing, at least for him, to the uninitiated, fishing all day in a stream while standing against a constant current is likely to be a rather fatiguing experience. Hauling gear and cleaning the catch is no day at the beach. Daniel is not going to feel like driving home afterward.

“I don’t think you know what you are in for. How about I check for rooms just in case.”

Daniel considers for a moment. “As long as there are no tents and campfires, fine.”

“No tents, promise. I suppose I should book a large room.”

“What for?” Daniel says, not following at all.

“For the elephant.” Will deadpans.

Daniel simply stares at Will. The comment is so very wrong, yet, for them, it seems just right.

“Don’t tease.” He says finally. Just to make sure Will understands, he adds, “And…separate rooms.”

Will places a hand over his chest. "I'm heartbroken. Well, in that case, can I bring the libation?” Will says, with hopeful smile. “It’s part of the experience.”

“Absolutely not. Are you crazy?” Daniel pauses, “Forget I said that. This is therapy. And, make it sooner rather than later please. Like within the next couple weekends.” Daniel says trying not to laugh at Will’s perturbed expression.

“Have you ever been fishing? Any kind of fishing?” Will asks.

“Nope.”

“Hunting?”

“Never.”

Will rolls his eyes. “Then, this is going to be an especially interesting trip. For both of us.”

Chapter 16

Will’s dreams are not the worst of his problems.

“All our destinies flying and swimming in blood and emptiness.”

Hannibal’s voice whispers in Will’s mind. He is squatting in the familiar woods again, tracking the animals that haunt his dreams.

He has followed the stag’s tracks from the stream through the snow. Icicles hang from the tree branches, the branches and trees shine in the semi-darkness with a glaze of ice that reflects the light from the moon. The entire forest glitters in the moonlight dead and frozen in time, an eternal winter.

Will’s feet crunch into the layer of ice that covers the snow encrusted ground. He thinks the tracks are fresh; the powder of snow kicked up by the hooves is not yet stuck to the ice. The ice crystals lay across the surface like crushed diamonds on a pane of glass. He continues, the sounds of the stream becoming faint in the windless night.

At last he reaches a thicket of trees, black and slick with the coating of ice that wraps the wood in its shroud of lifelessness and silence. But the thicket is not empty of all life. Despite his jacket, thick pants, and boots, the frigid air permeates and Will’s blood quickens in his veins as he peers inside the thicket.

The white ravenstag strikes at the ground with its hooves, feathers ripple along its neck. Its head is lowered and its body quakes with each belabored breath it takes. Will’s eyes grow large stinging with the cold. He sees a jagged scar on the belly of the stag; it spreads half the length of its belly, cross wise then up, like his own. Will sees the raised fleshy scar of the stag pulsing from where he stands. He knows what is coming.

He instinctively presses his hand over his stomach fingers digging into the jacket as he watches the stag tremble and snort as the scar ripples and bursts wide, spewing out the slippery thing Will has already seen and felt slither out of his own belly. But the mass of blood, talons, and feathers does not claw its way up the stag’s legs.

He watches the thing uncoil itself and his fascination and repulsion intensify as the stag begins to nudge it around on the ground, cleaning the bloody slime from it with its tongue. The thing thrashes on the frozen ground as the thin layer of ice beneath it cracks and gives way so the thing is trailing wet bloody slick all over the snow.

Will hears a growl behind him and turns to see the white wolf edging closer. Will hasn’t brought a gun, but he thinks he doesn’t need one. The wolf is not baring its fangs at him. Will remains still and the wolf comes closer until it is close enough to touch him. Close enough so Will notices the ice crystals embedded in its thick fur.

The wolf brushes its head against Will’s leg, nudging him forward. Will turns back around to the stag and the thing writhing about in the snow.

“Wounds are supposed to heal.” He says aloud. “Why won’t you heal?”

“Everything I have done has been to help you, Will.” Hannibal whispers.

“No.”

Will stands still watching the stag and the thing, blinking the snowflakes from his lashes. His fingers absently graze the soft furry ears of the wolf standing beside him. His other hand still presses against his jacket. The thing is less a thing now and more of a bird. Will sees the feathers, the scaly legs, and the talons and beak emerge sleek, shiny, and black like onyx.

“No, everything you have done…you did for you.” Will says clenching his jaw so he doesn’t feel so…empty.

“We’re orchestrations of carbon. You and me, Will.”

“And Jack…” Will says softly.

“And Jack, too…all our destinies flying and swimming in blood and emptiness.” Hannibal’s voice intones in his head.

Eyes, golden hued and rimmed blood red peer at Will over the onyx beak, a predator’s eyes.

Jack is suddenly standing next to Will, like an ice burg in his heavy tan overcoat hands in pockets looking grim as usual. “Don’t let empathy confuse what you want with what Lecter wants.”

“I didn’t.”

Will watches the stag step backward and away so the majestic black feathered eagle can take flight. He listens until the rustle of wings is swallowed in the silence of the snow crusted wood. It is his own heartbeat that jars him awake.

It is still dark outside when Will opens his eyes. He squints at his clock on the night stand. 4:12 the green light reads. He takes a few more deep breaths before he sits up kicking off the sheet. He tugs at his tee. It clings to his back and Will feels the familiar damp chill spreading under his arms.

At least the sheet wasn’t balled up in his fists this time. Will isn’t sure which dreams are worse; the ones in the woods, the ones in the kitchen, or the ones with Hannibal. He grins. All his dreams are about Hannibal, aren’t they?

He used to kill Hannibal in his dreams. There was always blood, plenty of it. His entire face and body would be awash in it as he would slip out of the dream, aware of his fingers slowly uncurling in release and satisfaction as images of cascading fountains of blood had shot into the air. He had lain in his solitary bed in Wolf Trap listening to his breathing aware of his physical reaction to the violence.

He had felt simultaneously pleased and afraid.

Those dreams had given way to different dreams. He no longer kills Hannibal in his dreams. But the release is equally visceral. He’s not sure how he feels about that.

There is no release, no quiet satisfaction after dreams in the woods. He feels only fear.

Sleep is such an elusive concept, so fluid that it slips through Will’s fingers like a fast moving stream.

He knows he was sleeping better a couple weeks ago. He acknowledges that the nightmares resumed about the time his sessions with Daniel began to concentrate on recent events and his relationship with…his former psychiatrist.

Will does not want to think about Hannibal, does not want to think about sleeping in his bed in Baltimore. Does not want to recall the delicious way the satin slipped over his skin, fresh from the shower or the way the pillows smelled of spiced leather, sandalwood, and aged whiskey. The way his blood had throbbed in his veins alive and hot every time his nose had inhaled the scent of him as his face was crushed against those same soft pillows the taste of soft kisses still upon his lips.

Does not want to remember the way that elusive stream of sleep had not slipped through his fingers but had washed over him and he had closed his eyes to sink warm and safe into his dreams. Will rubs his face with his hands, massages his neck, breathes in, then out, in…out.

Will remembers the white stag and wolf had entered his dreamscape after his initial consultation with Daniel. Will's dreams had been odd, confusing perhaps, but not sweat inducing. He knows that the dreams of the subconscious convey the unspoken fears of the conscious.

Dreams prepare us for waking life.

Will's mouth twists and he feels his eyes growing moist. He trembles as he exhales, shakes off the sharp twinge he feels constricting his chest. He swallows down the lump he feels forming in his throat. He steels himself once again to the knowledge that this is his life, such as it is.

He pulls off the sweaty tee, wipes his face and head with it before throwing it on the floor. He rummages around his drawer for a fresh one. There aren't any.

He glances at the laundry basket full of his dirty clothes and realizes he has no clean sheets either. He has slept on a stripped down mattress before and it wasn't even as clean this one. At least he doesn't have to stare at a chipped sink and rust stained toilet.

A flash of light illuminates the room for a fraction of a second. Residual images from the light disappear before Will can process what they are, like after images from the flash of a camera. He thinks maybe it was lightening but there is no thunder.

Heat lightning, he thinks. It is summer.

The small bedroom vibrates just enough so Will tenses his legs, making sure his feet are firmly rooted to the floor. He rubs his eyes with his fingers massaging eyelids that sting from the inside out he is so tired.

He stumbles over to the window, on the far side of the room, moves the thin curtains aside and raises the slated blinds. It is completely dark outside, save for tiny points of light in the distance. No moon, thinks Will.

He touches the glass with his fingers and decides to open the window wide despite the air conditioning. He needs to hear something besides the din of the ancient system that is supposed to cool his suite.

The window will not budge. Will knows he opened the window last night, and the night before that. After struggling for a few more seconds he lets his hands fall to his sides figuring the humidity has warped the wood of the jambs and casings. He will have to look at it in the morning.

He stands in the middle of his bedroom, eyes closed, letting the air dry the perspiration that tingles on his skin. He listens to himself breathe in the darkness. He tries not to think of anything at all.

No forts in the bone arena of your skull for things you love…

He can’t remember what it feels like not to live in fear and wonders if he ever has. His memory simply doesn’t go back far enough. He has always lived in fear of something or other.

If not his fear of succumbing to the allure of the urges awakened by Hobbs and courted by Hannibal; then he lived in fear that the emotions of those around him, and later, the emotions of the killers he chased, would slowly erode who he was a little at a time. He has fought his entire life it seems to hold on to who he believes he is.

I know who I am…

Will decides not to try to go back to sleep. He walks into the bathroom to take a leak and freezes at the door.

There is a night light plugged into the socket by the sink casting the small tiled bath in an orange glow. He does not remember any night light nor does he recall buying one. He turns to run his fingers across the door jamb to flip the light switch and the bathroom is flooded with overhead light. The night light is gone.

Will blinks his eyes several times. Was he sleepwalking just now? He takes his leak and leans over the sink to rinse his hands. He splashes his face with the cool water that runs over his fingers. He lets the cold water wake him completely.

When he returns to his bedroom he looks to the clock. 6:04 the LED light reads.

Draw me a clock, Will.

Will sinks slowly into the swivel chair at his computer desk. He wipes his hands over his face as he rests his elbows against the arms of the chair. He tries very hard to stop the shaking.

****

When Daniel takes Will’s call in his office that morning shortly after nine, he immediately recognizes the anxiety in Will’s voice.

“I need to ask you something.” Will says, his voice quietly intense.

“Go ahead. I’ve got time.”

“Have you ever…Did you ask me to draw clocks for you?” Will says.

“What? No. Like the ones Lecter had you draw?”

“Yeah, to ground me in the present.”

Will wants reassurance he has not lost time with Daniel. Reassurance that Daniel has not or would not keep it from him. He needs Daniel’s paddle, he can’t keep losing paddles.

“Will, I’ve never asked you to draw me anything. You are always…present with me, and I tell you when you zone out. You are aware when you do it…at least in my office. What happened?”

Daniel knows if Will is asking about clocks, he has suffered a blackout. The question is which memory has triggered this one.

There is a long pause at the other end.

Will does not want to tell Daniel everything, not over the phone. He quickly decides on an acceptable abbreviated version. They can talk later. Daniel will not be satisfied with a phone call anyway.

Will takes a breath, exhales slowly, “I think I went someplace else for a couple hours. I woke up from a dream around 4 a.m., went to the bathroom, came back in my room around 6 a.m.”

“Ok. So you lost time after waking from a dream. What did you dream about?”

“The usual…”

Daniel sighs at the avoidance. Daniel thinks Will the most stubborn person he has ever met. But that stubbornness is also indicative of an incredibly strong personality and the resolve to protect it. Daniel knows Will’s dreams would offer even more insight into Will’s fears, but he holds his dreams close so he can protect them, too.

Will’s dreams can wait until their next session or, even better, until their fishing trip this weekend. Will had dutifully done his homework.

“Were you looking in the mirror when you blanked out?”

“Is that important?” Will says sounding defensive and curious at the same time.

“Could be. Sometimes looking in the mirror after waking from a dream can cause a person to drift back into a dream state if they weren’t completely awake. A kind of stupor. Alcohol doesn’t help.”

“I don’t remember if I was looking in the mirror or not. But, the bathroom looked different for a minute…” Will’s voice trails off, “I…maybe I wasn’t completely awake.”

“Whatever happened, it has unnerved you. You didn’t leave your apartment?”

“No, I know when I’m dreaming, Daniel. I wasn’t walking in my sleep. This was different.”

“How do you feel now?”

“Awake.”

“That’s good,” Daniel says, his tone upbeat for Will’s sake. “I mean besides that. Are you ok to be alone, or do you want to catch a cab here?”

“I’m calm. I am concerned, not panicked.”

Will’s voice is hoarse, dry and Daniel knows he has had a miserable night. He may say he’s not panicked, but his tone suggests otherwise.

“I know this probably feels like you’re regressing, but sometimes a person will retreat into familiar behaviors when faced with the prospect of adopting new ones. You are being introduced to new ways of thinking about yourself and what happened to you.”

"It doesn't feel like regression. It feels like I never left."

"In a way you haven't I suppose. You have been reliving very traumatic events, Will. And you remember things and process things very differently than most people. Any number of memories or emotions could have triggered an episode."

"Chilton told me that blackouts could resume under the right circumstances even without the encephalitis because my brain had already adjusted to the stimuli."

"He's right. Even without the drugs, the illness, or the strobe lights, your brain has already rewired itself. Still, there has to be a catalyst to set it off. If this is the case, then we need to figure out what the trigger is."

"Do you think the encephalitis has come back?"

"No, but it would be easy to find out, if you want to make sure. I can refer you to someone, or you can pick your own."

Will is quiet on the other end. Daniel shifts in his seat, waits for Will to speak again. He had anticipated something like this might happen. He wonders if this is the first time, or if Will has been keeping other incidents to himself.

"Will?" Daniel says after listening to him exhale for long enough. "Do you think I've slipped you anything? Manipulated you somehow?"

"I don't want to think that. Always direct aren't you?"

"I try. I told you I wouldn't do anything without your knowledge or permission and I haven't. I have prescribed nothing for you but a healthy lifestyle and a fishing trip."

"I hate feeling like this, this…not trusting people." Will breathes into the phone, and his breath carries with it a weariness Daniel feels coiling around his own chest and shoulders.

"Unfortunately, experience has taught you that you can't."

"So, what now?"

Will doesn't really expect a complete answer or even a solution to his immediate problem, but he knows whatever Daniel says will be a balm for his mind, even over the phone, and that is the reason he called.

"I'm not going to tell you it's nothing and not to worry about it. But it might not be a bad thing. Your mind, your imagination, works so differently from everyone else's that it is possible you are trying to piece some things together in your subconscious and this is how your mind is used to doing that."

"I guess I can lay off the whiskey before I go to sleep, huh?" Will says sounding more like himself; at least the Will Daniel has come to know.

"Might help. But what do I know?" Daniel says.

"Thanks, Daniel. I'll see you tomorrow then." Will says and hangs up.

Will stares at his phone. Daniel makes sense. He always makes sense. It is so easy to trust him. To trust in the reason of his words and the calm confidence in his gentle voice. To trust in the expressive green eyes that miss nothing and often cause Will to flush warmly beneath his collar.

Daniel tugs at Will's emotions in ways his psychiatrist should not. But when has he ever had a conventional relationship with psychiatrists?

He pulls out clean clothes from the antique wardrobe and sets them aside. He needs a shower first. Then, he can tackle the laundry and pack for the trip.

He tugs at the curtains to let the full sun in the room, brightening it. It is a pleasant enough room. Mason had arranged for the suite in a renovated palazzo once part of a larger estate near the Palazzo Pitti and the Boboli Gardens.

Too bad Mason had never seen it. While it was swimming in old world charm, and was no doubt pricey, the suite left a lot to be desired in modern amenities. The electrical wiring was faulty and the plumbing was temperamental. Will had to constantly remind himself that the faucets in the kitchen had been hooked up backwards. He could not get used to turning the knob for hot when he wanted a glass of water.

The temperamental plumbing also meant several trips to the basement if he wanted to wash his own clothes. Everyone in the building used the community laundry room, a spacious work area once the domain of servants. There was a laundry service, but Will preferred the routine of doing his own. When he kept the routine.

Will frowns at the overflowing basket. He will be engaged in the routine for a while today. And he can take a look at the stuck window.

As he readies for the shower he thinks of the Paolini twins. They must have reached their destination by now. Will needs as much background as he can find on Hannibal if he is to fully understand what makes him tick. Everyone has a weakness that can be exploited, even Hannibal. Will just has to figure out what that weakness is.

Weakness is an expression of emotion. Hannibal's true emotions are masked beneath varnish thick and resistant. It's hard to know what you're getting beneath the layers of deceit.

Unlike Will. Will's emotions are exposed like fresh scars scratched on his skin. Will wraps his scars in garments of sarcasm and avoidance. Garments too sheer to withstand Hannibal's scrutiny.

Will acts on his emotions, but so does Hannibal. Not the emotions he puts on display, the other ones. The ones Will had seen fleetingly, the sincere unrehearsed emotions in rare moments of unguarded honesty.

The emotions he indulged.

Whimsy as Du Maurier had put it, may speak to self-congratulation, but Will needs to know what truly motivates the whimsy, and Hannibal. Whimsy had not been a random choice. Du Maurier had chosen her words carefully.

Will understands the word in its conventional sense, but whimsy is not always accompanied by laughter. Whimsy can erupt in shadows as well as light.

Beneath the amusing wit there is an undercurrent of arbitrariness and a lack of responsibility. At least in the moment of whimsy.

What would appeal to Hannibal's whimsy? What acts of whimsy had Will already witnessed from him?

Her name was Mischa.

Was?

She's dead.

Abigail. Abigail had been whimsy's muse.

Had Hannibal gazed down upon Will as he had knelt in shock attempting to staunch the flow of blood from the wound in her neck and decided on a whim to actively intervene? Or had he done so because standing there helpless with an MD after his name would have appeared odd? Rude?

Then, later, as Will had paced on the upper level of his Baltimore office sounding off about his psych evaluation and Jack, Hannibal had pointed out how Will had orphaned Abigail by killing her father and how Hannibal had orphaned her by saving her life.

You saved her life too. Do you feel obligated?

Yes. I feel a staggering amount of obligation. I feel responsibility. I've fantasized about scenarios where my actions may have allowed a different fate for Abigail Hobbs.

Will did not doubt that sentiment now. Hannibal's act of whimsy had had consequences. Hannibal's entire life had become unraveled after that dragging collateral carnage with him. In his conceit, Hannibal had likely imagined he could control the consequences. Hannibal's curiosity is his whimsy. He usually did not feel any sense of responsibility for what followed.

Did God feel responsible for the fall of man after placing Adam and Eve in the garden?

But Abigail had been different. She had reminded Hannibal of his sister. Abigail had filled a space left vacant by her loss. Hannibal had not been actively seeking a surrogate, but he had reacted emotionally to the scene in Hobbs' kitchen. He had made a life altering decision as he had gently moved Will's shaking hands from Abigail's throat to wrap his practiced hands around the gaping wound instead.

In that moment he had bound all of them to his act of whimsy.

Will was meant to fill a void within Hannibal, too. Hannibal had found a daughter in Abigail and a companion in Will.

Hannibal harbors a deep unrequited need for family. Until Will knows what happened to Hannibal and his family, he can only guess at how that need figures into Hannibal's elusive pathology. Hannibal's psyche is as elusive as the dark forest in Will's dreams.

Will is determined about one thing. He will not face Hannibal again without a fully stocked arsenal. Hannibal had spent plenty of time digging around the minefield in Will's head. The least he can do is return the favor.

******

Daniel looks up from his phone and clicks it off. He glances at the gulls suspended over waves in the beach print on his wall. Will is like the gulls in the photograph, lost in a moment that replays on an endless loop in his mind. A fort he has kept locked up tightly.

Daniel finally holds the key. He needs only to turn it in the lock. He hopes he is prepared for whatever comes spilling out. He had better be. Will keeps his forts locked tight for a reason.

Daniel decides that instead of picking up Will at his apartment tomorrow, he should invite Will to have dinner and spend the night at his place, meet the dogs. Be social.

They could leave a little later in the morning, be less rushed. He could get an idea of Will's sleep habits and see for himself how bad the nightmares are. Will calls them dreams which makes Daniel wonder how bad they would have to be for him to refer to them as the nightmares they truly are. No one wakes up from mere dreams soaked in sweat and shaking from a subconscious seizure.

Will's fear colors his perception, the way his empathy transforms everything he sees and touches. He lives the nightmares that follow him out of his dreams. He lives in fear of waking up.

Will could use some time away from his files and empty apartment. He pulls Will's file, makes some notes about their conversation, and pages his receptionist to send up his first patient.

Chapter Notes: Picture is from a poster for the Mississinewa 1812 First Annual Mississinewa Battlefield Society Rendezvous Oct 15-16 1988, a gift from a friend who engages in reenactments, and remembered my love of history. I found the scene hauntingly appropriate for Will's dreamscape.

Chapter 17

Hannibal decides to check out Doctor Clayton for himself. He's not what Hannibal expected.

Hannibal sits outside one of the numerous cafes that open onto the street across from Dr. Clayton’s office suites. Via delle Burelia is a couple blocks from the restaurant he likes on Via Ghibellina, and very close to Teatro Verdi. The architecture is exquisitely preserved with an understated refinement.

Hannibal has resisted the temptation to go inside. He imagines the interior to be at least as elegant as the outside. He has come here to observe, not to interfere. The deep claret colored Mercedes was already here when Hannibal arrived, parked in an alley lined with more practically priced vehicles. The alley was still bathed in sunlight bearing down from the east.

Hannibal does not plan on spending his day in the café, no matter how inviting the menu.

Soon, the sun will be high overhead and there will no respite from the heat. He is already hot despite the refuge the tall structures provide his side of the street.

The temperature has been rising steadily with the sun and Hannibal loosens the buttons of his cream colored shirt. He opens the fabric wide revealing the sheen of perspiration already on his skin. He lifts his face to feel the warmth alight upon his nose and cheeks.

The warmth of the Tuscan sun invigorates his soul and his wilted shirt is forgotten.

He has brought his sketch book and assorted charcoals with him. The charcoal pencils and scalpel lay across the glass table top while the sketch book rests in his lap.

He has framed out the entire end of the street, captured its picturesque beauty, stucco and terra cotta surrounded by a little sea of shade and foliage in a city claimed by stone long ago.

He has been here all morning, captivated as always by the people around him as he sipped his cappuccino and read the paper. There has been a dearth of activity around Ventresca and Associate, however.

As far as Hannibal can tell, only two patients had appointments this morning and they have since departed. Dr. Clayton must be working in his office. Hannibal hopes he will catch a glimpse of him when he takes a lunch break.

Then again, he may take his lunch at his desk. Hannibal would very much like to see him in the flesh. The singular photo of him in Du Maurier's slim dossier had been small and included at the end of an article along with annotated references.

The grainy photo he had retrieved from his camera and the pages of documents had shed no light on Du Maurier's interest in the young doctor. He was successful and handsome, but Hannibal doubts Du Maurier would be seeking any meaningful relationship with him. Not that sex wasn't meaningful, but Du Maurier's tastes were eclectic.

She was welcome to her occasional diversions and appetites as was Hannibal. Hannibal did not demand or expect exclusivity in that area and he was certain that she did not expect it from him. It would not surprise Hannibal if she investigated potential sexual partners before engaging them. She was circumspect to the last detail after all.

It is the resemblance to Will that nags at Hannibal. Other similarities, that he is single and lives alone; are incidental and insignificant. Hannibal does admit that the doctor's affinity for dogs and therapy has Will written all over it, but that too is incidental. Except for the face he is simply one of thousands of psychiatrists practicing in Italy.

Except for the face, Hannibal could believe Du Maurier is chasing a pretty diversion. Because of the face, Hannibal thinks there is more to Du Maurier's apparent fascination with him.

Du Maurier has not mentioned this psychiatrist or offered a clue as to why she collected a dossier on him. The resemblance may simply be incidental. The dossier contains mostly professional information and copies of his few published works and lectures.

Her curiosity seems collegial. And yet, that episode in the hot tub had been anything but.

Hannibal's phone rings softly in his pocket. As though thinking of the devil had caused her to appear, the call is from Du Maurier.

"Hannibal." Du Maurier says, enunciating each syllable as usual. "Do you have a moment?"

"Of course. What is on your mind?" Hannibal says as he lifts his eyes to the structure across the street.

"I am visiting my patient in Fiesole, and she was happy to accommodate my request for a case of that wine you liked so much. Will you be home this afternoon to receive it?"

"I can be."

“Oh…where are you?”

“In the city, enjoying the view.” Hannibal says as he watches a young man emerge from the office suites and approach the Mercedes.

The street is narrow; Hannibal sits perhaps three car lengths away from him. He is wearing a pale blue shirt and trousers the color of sand. His glasses catch the sun, as do the keys he procures from his jacket.

Hannibal’s eyes narrow as he notices the curve of his jaw, the way the brown locks of hair fall over his forehead and curl over his ears and brush the collar of his shirt. He sports a beard, clipped close. He had been clean shaven in the photo, his hair much shorter, a rather dated photo Hannibal decides.

He is about Will’s age, not as young as he appears in the photo.

“Ah” she pauses, “When might you be returning to Impruneta, then?”

“A couple of hours I should think.”

Hannibal is squinting now as he stares across the street at Doctor Clayton. Clayton unlocks the car and opens the door, leans inside. Hannibal watches him twist his way into the back seat, body angled so that the pleasing lines of his physique move sensuously beneath fabric. Hannibal watches him wrestle with something in the back seat.

“Then shall I tell her to send it after one or two? I know there is no one there to accept the delivery. The wine should not sit outside in this heat.”

“No, most thoughtful of you to call. After two will be fine. Please extend my thanks for her generosity.”

“I certainly will. Perhaps we can all share a glass together soon.”

As Doctor Clayton climbs out of his unbearably hot car, he pauses to brush damp curls off his forehead. The incline of his head and the way the shadows play over his face as he completes the simple gesture are enough to give Hannibal pause.

For the briefest of seconds, it is Will fussing with errant curls and untucked shirt as he leans on Hannibal’s freshly waxed Bentley.

Hannibal’s nostril’s twitch, an eyelid tics. The longing is…visceral.

“I look forward to meeting my mysterious benefactor. Is there anything else?” Hannibal intones into the phone, his words nothing more than lines from a script.

“No. Ciao, Hannibal.”

Hannibal clicks off the phone without answering. The young doctor has retrieved a gym bag from his back seat. He slings it over his shoulder and heads off down the street and around a corner.

Hannibal does not move to follow him. He sits contemplating the wound Will has carved into his heart. Once again, he has managed to reach into Hannibal’s chest and rip out another piece. The regret smolders inside as Hannibal silently cauterizes the wound.

He aches not because the doctor reminds him of Will, but because he is not Will.

Forgiveness does simply happen, apparently.

Du Maurier's agenda with the young doctor becomes clearer. She had hoped to watch Hannibal's reaction to seeing him. Then, she would sit back and watch what Hannibal would do with him. Perhaps she even intends to share him; a novelty to pry Hannibal away from his retreats into his memory palace.

The request for the property deeds and stock was supposed to placate her. Hannibal thinks he has least confused her. Just as lack of trust in others increases the need for religion, confusion increases the need for clarity. She is seeking clarity about him.

Somehow, she happened upon this doctor and has decided to use him to further her agenda with Hannibal.

He will bide his time until Du Maurier presents him with the invitation he imagines is forthcoming. He will play her game of chess a while longer until he can ascertain her intentions.

Du Maurier is predictable. Her existence revolves around one equation, and the math is simple. A life with Hannibal insures her investment. Each holds one of the bank account codes required to access the investment. Balance on either side.

Hannibal's obsession with Will introduced an unknown variable. She means to control the variable still. To remove it without accounting for the unknown variables on the other side invites chaos.

Du Maurier despises chaos. Hannibal likes a little chaos from time to time. Gets the blood pumping. Perhaps introducing a little chaos into Du Maurier's ordered existence would get her blood pumping in a way it has not in a very long time. Hannibal would like to see that.

Du Maurier likely sees her dilemma reduced to subtraction. Killing Will outright would have invited retribution. No bank codes for Du Maurier for that one. Killing him outright would invite disaster. His bank codes would die with him. She might have considered killing him years ago when the stakes were not so high. She likely regrets her inaction. Sending him to jail would still leave her with no bank codes. She would soon be joining him. Hannibal would see to that. Unless she could manage it without showing her hand in it, and even then, she would still be without her precious code.

At present, he can think of nothing that could possibly motivate him to hand over that code.

Hannibal does not doubt she has entertained these thoughts. All things being equal, these are not solutions she can live with. Du Maurier needs to be more creative with her math. How would she do that?

She has placed another piece on the board. And this pawn is gift wrapped. A physical resemblance to Will would be enticing enough, but this psychiatrist has more than a passing interest in empathy and its psychiatric applications. He focuses on the empathic connections between humans and dogs. His dossier suggests he is capable of providing sport of the intellectual kind. The doctor must be part of her equation. He is beautiful bait. She can pursue clarity, manufacture the insight she craves, not about the doctor, but Hannibal. She knows Hannibal will be intrigued by him at the very least.

A diversion for the dinner table, perhaps. And while he dines, Du Maurier will be laughing all the way to Switzerland.

Hannibal smiles. She has figured out a way to steal his bank codes. Hannibal's mind turns restlessly with the possibilities.

His Tatiana is not the only hacker alive. Breaking through fire walls, decrypting codes, and whatever else hackers do is common place. Du Maurier is waiting for Hannibal to transfer the funds.

And what is to be done about that?

Their conversations will be much more interesting from now on. Du Maurier is correct about one thing. Hannibal is certainly intrigued. How will he thank her for being the gift that keeps on giving?

Hannibal collects his drawings, his sketch pad and his pencils, arranging them carefully in the leather case. It is similar to the silk lined case that smelled like cedar and linseed oil he used to take with him out to Will's house in Wolf Trap.

Hannibal gathers his case and leaves a generous tip for his server. He walks along Via delle Burelia deep in thought and retreats…

A Sunday afternoon in Baltimore comes to Hannibal's mind. The kitchen smells of oregano and cilantro, a stew pot sits on the stove simmering with broth, garlic, and onion. A Mozart Aria plays; a clarinet concerto he thinks.

That afternoon, it had been Will who had selected the music from Hannibal's sizable collection, not easily. After loading the cd's he had simply set the player on random, a setting Hannibal used infrequently if at all, and had leaned over the counter to pick up Hannibal's sketch pad. Will had gazed at Hannibal's finely sketched drawings of him in various poses, some imagined and one from the night before. Will had stood biting into his lower lip kneading at the tender flesh with his teeth until, feeling Hannibal's gaze, had pushed the sketch pad away.

"You're uh…very talented with figures and faces."

Will had looked at Hannibal wearing the familiar frown that was always at odds with the amusement in his eyes whenever he was presented with erotic images of himself. He had set the sketch pad upright so it leaned against the wall of the kitchen counter where they were having afternoon coffee while Hannibal worked.

Hannibal had been prepping for their evening meal, dicing vegetables to simmer in the stock. Jambalaya for Will, with Hannibal's own Andouille. Will had cocked his head to one side, his expression thoughtful.

"Have you ever drawn landscapes?" He had asked.

"Not as much as architecture, but I have attempted to capture the natural world. I'm not sure how successful I was." Hannibal had replied truthfully.

Composing landscapes had not come as naturally to him as the arrangement of buildings, the precision of architecture appealed to his sense of proportion and exactitude.

“You should come out to Wolf Trap. Bring your supplies. There’s a place less than half a mile from my house that might appeal to your aesthetics.”

“Mine? Or yours?” Hannibal had asked.

Will had turned from the sketch book to face Hannibal, had sighed and shrugged his shoulders.

“I would like a drawing of the place. Not a photo. I can do that. I would like you to sketch it…for me.”

The warmth that had spread across Hannibal’s face had not been from the steam billowing out of the pot, and before he had even realized he had done so, he had smiled, quite broadly. The look in Will’ eyes had been so honest and so open.

“When do you need to go back and feed the dogs?” Hannibal had said, returning his attentions to the stock and vegetables.

That drawing and many others had been confiscated by the FBI by now. Every remnant of both of their lives had been picked over, scrutinized, sifted through, and most definitely judged by now.

Suddenly Hannibal finds himself in the Piazza Santa Croce without realizing his feet have guided him there of their own volition. He looks up at Enrico Pazzi’s statue of Dante Alighieri.

Dante stands atop a pedestal, shoulders back arms wrapped in his cloak flanked by the large eagle from his Paradiso. Dante’s face is grim but triumphant. He survived his Inferno but Hannibal likes to think he found paradise disappointing.

God remained completely aloof, unconcerned with man’s suffering and without sympathy for his creation. The empathy of man, always at odds with the cold justice of his creator. Hannibal remembers a line from Canto XIX.

Now, who are you, to sit on the judge’s seat, a thousand miles away, with sight that sees a short span?

Hannibal wonders if Will still sits on his judge’s seat in his own Inferno.

Chapter 18

Du Maurier visits her own memory palace, the one with Hannibal and she has a drink with Daniel.

The traumatized are unpredictable because they know they can survive. She did survive what he did to her. But there is not a day that passes that she does not remember how intensely pleasurable the act of killing her patient had been. Not a day goes by that she does not stifle the temptation to feel that way again.

Chapter 18

Du Maurier visits her memory palace, the one she shares with Hannibal and she has a drink with Daniel.

Du Maurier sits under the broad umbrella at the polished stone patio table by the upscale private pool in Fiesole. Her black and white Karla Colletto ensemble remains unopened in the Gucci bag at her feet.

Lydia's father had insisted on purchasing a membership for both of them once Du Maurier had explained how physical exercise was crucial to Lydia's self-esteem and recovery. Drugs, she had explained, were simply no substitute for the natural serotonin boost that came with good old fashioned exercise.

Rather than subject herself to a gym membership, Lydia had acquiesced to daddy's alternative suggestion. They had shopped for days for a swim suit that did not make her look chubby. Lydia had found one to her liking only yesterday, causing even daddy to raise his brows at the receipt.

The entire family should be in therapy, but there was not enough money on god's green earth to compensate Du Maurier for the mental anguish attached to such an onerous task. Neither was there enough alcohol.

Lydia had packed her swimsuit, but had yet to enter the bath house to put it on. Du Maurier had assured her that simply coming to the pool was progress. Baby steps, she had cooed to the receptive and medicated Lydia. Lydia had ordered a frozen piña colada and had rolled her large trusting eyes up at Du Maurier for approval.

Du Maurier had merely smiled at her charge and had ordered a vodka tonic with extra lime.

That had been two hours and three vodka tonics ago.

After complaining about the heat for nearly half an hour, Lydia sets her fruity drink down for the last time and excuses herself. She weaves her way to the parking lot where her driver waits in the air-conditioned town car. She will stuff her face with breath mints before the car reaches the drive to her daddy's estate, so Du Maurier is unconcerned.

She promptly texts the driver instructions to return later; after dropping off Lydia.

Her conversation with Hannibal this morning has not been far from her mind. He had seemed distracted. She had probably interrupted another of his little retreats as he had sat sketching some palazzo or fountain. Hannibal may say he wants to move on, but Du Maurier recognizes that Graham's influence on Hannibal persists even in his absence. Persists despite Hannibal's recent protestations to the contrary. His grand gesture does not persuade.

They have known each other far too long for Du Maurier not to notice the subtle but significant changes wrought by the entrance of Graham into Hannibal's awareness. The change had been nearly imperceptible at first, gradually becoming more pronounced during their last sessions, sessions that play like a broken record in her mind.

You have to maintain boundaries, Hannibal.

When the pressures of my personal and professional relationship with Will grow too great, I assure you I will find a way to relieve them.

Hannibal had a curious way of finding relief.

The pressures had grown too great the moment he had begun referring to Graham as Will.

Hannibal had not noticed how his meticulously crafted person suit had begun to unravel ever so slightly as he had sat in his chair spilling his half-truths and spinning his deceptions about his interactions with Graham. Du Maurier had recognized he was lying to himself and that had intrigued Du Maurier.

The claxons in her head had sounded so loudly she had feared Hannibal had heard them.

They had developed a rapport over the years, created their own euphemisms and coded language to express vagaries that passed for substance that passed for therapy. After her attack, their pantomime had sufficed. Hannibal had refused to accept her retirement and she knew better than to try and convince him otherwise. Occasionally, Hannibal did take what he needed from their sessions. He had kept coming back. And so, their polite truce had become comfortable, even enjoyable.

Until Hannibal had met Will Graham. Jack Crawford had unwittingly opened a Pandora's Box by pairing the two of them together. Graham had been desperately but successfully denying his nature and Crawford had sent him into the lion's den. Whether Graham had pulled the thorn from the lion's paw or become the thorn did not matter to Du Maurier. The lion had felt the thorn. He feels it still.

Du Maurier had seen the writing on the wall. Seeing Graham in his cell at BSHCI had confirmed her worst fears. He was every bit as damaged and dangerous as only Hannibal's brilliance could manage and he was as beautiful as he was broken. Du Maurier had known the young profiler would not stop until he had his retribution, had satisfied his need for vengeance or die trying.

Offering her support, confirming for him what he had wanted to believe, had been painfully easy. What had transpired after that, Du Maurier had pieced together from newspapers, from conversations with Crawford and Graham at FBI Headquarters; and from whatever vagaries Hannibal had seen fit to throw her way.

Crawford had known Graham was in trouble, had known he was drowning. Crawford had searched for her and she had allowed him to find her. She had kept him busy, chewing up time and resources, keeping him away from his sick wife so the guilt would eat away at him like acid until he could take no more. He had acted rashly, impatient to end the stand-off with Hannibal, unable to wait for Graham any longer. She had stroked Crawford's doubt until it had erupted. But, the cavalry had not come.

And all hell had broken loose.

Du Maurier rattles her drink, tosses her head back to ease the tension in her neck that always accompanies thoughts of the debacle in Baltimore. She had warned Hannibal. He had refused to listen. She had left him to Graham. They deserved each other. She had hoped that Hannibal would be forced to kill Graham, and then they would both be free of him.

She had left him coldly that afternoon in his Baltimore office as the gray light of winter had seeped through the grand windows. She had presented her terms cloaked in professional courtesy. That she had invaded his space, his domain, to deliver her terms had underscored her determination and her disappointment. That visit to his office had been her first, and her last.

I am no longer your therapist.

May I ask why?

I have reached the limit of my efficacy. I don't believe I can help you.

Are you giving me a referral?

No…

She had made it clear to Hannibal that their relationship as he had come to know it would now be defined on her terms, not his.

I am simply ending our patient client relationship.

You tried to end it before.

I am grateful for your persistence in engaging me after my attack. However, in light of everything that has happened with Will Graham, I have begun to question your actions, particularly your past actions with regards to me and my attack…

She had also made it clear that Hannibal's motives, whatever they were, were unacceptable. The mention of her attack had been pointed. He had now crossed the line, again. She was withdrawing from the board. It was now up to Hannibal to clear the board. Unless and until he did so, the only thing he could count on was her silence.

…the conclusion that I've drawn is that you are dangerous.

Dangerous to himself, and by extension – to her. Like a parent scolding a child, Du Maurier had been forced to smack Hannibal's greedy hands and stick him in the corner. And he had been unable to resist hurling one last barb on her way out.

I'm resuming Will Graham's therapy.

To what end? Besides your own.

He asked for my help.

Then maybe you deserve each other.

Stubborn to the last.

She had trembled all the way to her car.

She had already made her arrangements to leave weeks before delivering her ultimatum.

Hannibal would have wanted her code and he would have tried to extract it from her. He might even have killed her if she had refused and she had not been certain she could match wits with Hannibal should he ever remove his person suit completely as he most certainly would have done.

Cooler heads had prevailed. Hannibal had received her message in a bottle. The fragrance was specific and she had known Hannibal would know where to look for her once he had returned to his senses and donned his suit once again.

She had not known about the girl. She had not known what Hannibal had planned. She would have tried to dissuade him from his flights of fancy. He would not have listened. A useless conversation avoided.

Once she had realized that Graham was truly innocent of all the murders he had been accused of, she had believed Hannibal had killed the Hobbs' girl as well.

She wonders if she might have been invited to join their little enclave at some point, a female presence for the girl.

Du Maurier tuts and shakes her head. It is more likely Hannibal would have disappeared with his little family, after she had helped secure their escape. Although, she would have relished the look on Graham's face had they made it that far.

Flights of fancy from Hannibal. The very idea had been doomed from the start. Whimsy.

He will be caught someday, but not while he has that code.

She takes another swallow of the watery vodka, savoring the bite of citrus as it slides down her throat.

After managing to escape Baltimore, he had caught a flight from Philadelphia to Paris; and she had joined him there having been released on Crawford's tenuous authority, a decision likely under review by now. They had flown first class on Air France to Switzerland together. After updating their account at Banque Suisse, and making a withdrawal, they had flown to Italy. The da Vinci airport had never looked a more welcomed sight.

By then, they had read about the FBI and its sensational failure in headlines from New York to Miami. Not even a month later, the stories had stopped. Hannibal had remained stoic and seemingly unmoved those first few months. Gradually, he had come out of his waking stupor and had donned the familiar person suit with which Du Maurier was accustomed. Things seemed normal once again. Almost.

She had known Graham had wounded Hannibal, but she had not realized how deeply. Whatever Hannibal had done to Graham had contaminated Hannibal in the process. Hannibal had not been the same since Graham was incarcerated. She had left that Hannibal. The Hannibal who had joined her in Paris had almost been a stranger.

Politely withdrawn. A ghost of his former self.

Since arriving in Italy, she has witnessed the same emotional distance, the same affectation of cordiality while pretending to be engaged. Hannibal performs his social somersaults quite well, but she knows his mind is somewhere else, strolling through his memory palace. And he sketches constantly.

She had begun to doubt his motives concerning Graham while Graham had been locked up and the change in Hannibal had frightened her. If Hannibal was no longer predictable, if his actions and choices no longer made sense, even to her, she could not risk the exposure should he finally make a mistake.

Graham had mistake painted all over him in tall toxic Technicolor. And yet, Hannibal had been drawn like a moth to the flame. First the madness and then the man. Those wide blue eyes and that angelic face had masked a killer as ruthless as Hannibal. Hannibal had been unable to resist what he seen lurking in that ocean of blue. Curiosity had become obsession.

Graham was not the first patient to arouse Hannibal's curiosity nor was he the first to succumb to Hannibal's influence. There had been many over the course of Hannibal's professional career. Hannibal would make a clinical diagnosis, decide on a course of treatment, and implement that treatment with a terrifyingly inhuman detachment she had found so alluring, so inspiring all those years ago.

His curiosity had been pure, unblemished, freed of guilt. He had demonstrated near perfect objectivity. He had been beautiful, a god among mortals.

Hannibal had never intervened past a certain point in the therapy. Had Hannibal not destroyed his patients' records and files, the FBI would have found among all Hannibal's successes, a disproportionately large number of suicides, arrests, and referrals to psychiatric hospitals. One could argue that the number of patients who presented as highly volatile and deeply disturbed was also disproportionately large.

Hannibal had never visited any of them once they had left or been otherwise removed from his practice. Not even in a consulting capacity. He preferred to interact from afar, through correspondence or newspapers as though listening to prayers and confessions while dispensing absolution.

Until Will Graham had managed to crawl through the stitches in Hannibal's suit and burrow under Hannibal's skin. She has never seen Hannibal pine like this, and pining is exactly what it is. Hannibal wants what he cannot have. As long as Graham lives, Hannibal will be consumed by him, in one way or another.

She almost feels sorry for Graham.

She had not believed Graham talented enough to deceive Hannibal so completely. His empathy and his particular madness had certainly mesmerized Hannibal. Graham was much stronger than she had given him credit for.

Whose friendship are you considering?

…We've discussed him before.

Will Graham.

Oddly enough, he's nothing like me. We see the world in different ways, yet he can assume my point of view.

By profiling the criminally insane.

As good a demonstration as any. I find it reassuring.

Reassuring did not begin to describe what he had felt. Hannibal had found it incredibly seductive. And dangerous. To allow Graham, an FBI profiler uniquely capable of entering Hannibal's mind had been reckless. Hannibal had allowed himself to be seduced by the mystery of Graham's mind and, it would seem, the rest of him.

For a long time, she had been the only one able to look at him unflinchingly. And remain. Alive.

She remembers when they first met as she stirs her nearly empty drink. Hannibal was handsome, educated, and impossibly charming when he chose to be. They had respected each other's work and sensibilities. They shared the same tastes and interests. They traveled in the same social circle.

They became lovers immediately. The first time, at a professional seminar out of town. Then a weekend in Mystic Seaport. Another weekend in Boston. The sex had been…to die for. He had very nearly asphyxiated her on a couple of occasions. Du Maurier rolls a chunk of ice around her tongue, feels the familiar tickle between her legs, growing warmer despite the ice she crunches between her teeth.

Hannibal had found a kindred spirit in her. And she had found him likewise a kindred spirit.

Gradually, they began to consult with one another, professionally. Upon comparing notes about two of their patients, both with similar issues, they had found they had employed the same therapy and with similar results. It had taken scarcely a look between them to realize they shared the same… professional curiosity.

They became colleagues in a highly unconventional corner of psychiatry. They had even shared a practice for a time. They had experienced a meeting of minds that had left Du Maurier breathless, anticipating a very rewarding partnership. The possibilities could have been endless.

Du Maurier used to cook with Hannibal. He liked performing for an audience. Du Maurier had enjoyed watching him create in his element. Hannibal exuded a raw sexuality in his kitchen. She had watched him move about his domain with elegance, wielding spatula and cleaver with ease. The food always beautiful and decadent; whetting the appetite for the sensual delights that awaited, upstairs.

Though du Maurier had joined him at the table, she had refused to bring the meat. Hannibal had pressed the issue, but his efforts to persuade had been quietly rebuffed, Du Maurier had demurred preferring instead to supply the wine. Hannibal had tried a more direct approach.

Hannibal had wound up one of his patients, good and tight, and referred him to her.

It had taken him only two sessions to fall apart. As small as she was, she had been highly motivated. It is apparently possible to remove a tongue with a letter opener. It is also possible to make a man swallow his own tongue and choke on it while vomiting. It is, in fact, much easier than one would think.

Du Maurier wonders still what Hannibal would have done had she been unsuccessful. They had the joint account by that time. They had a very lucrative practice and a very savvy accountant. Their broker had been especially aggressive and effective, at least until he found his way to Hannibal's table, and not by invitation.

The traumatized are unpredictable because they know they can survive. She did survive what he did to her. But there is not a day that passes that she does not remember how intensely pleasurable the act of killing her patient had been. Not a day goes by that she does not stifle the temptation to feel that way again.

She had closed her practice. Patients had become dangerous. To her.

She had not stepped foot in Hannibal's kitchen, nor sat at his table since. Until Florence. And yet, she does not dine with him alone.

She knows who Hannibal thinks of as he sits across from her at the table. She knows who Hannibal thinks of when he makes love to her. She knows and Hannibal knows that she knows. Hannibal wants her to know.

Will Graham is now a part of her existence. Hannibal should have killed him. She still cannot understand why he did not. But she is beginning to. He is also a survivor.

Hannibal has given her plenty of platitudes and has effectively talked around his true feelings for a year. It is clear to Du Maurier that Hannibal cannot or will not accept that Graham is not his friend and he never was.

If Graham did not hate Hannibal before being gutted, then he most certainly does now. That Hannibal mourns for what has been lost is expected. As a psychiatrist himself, Hannibal understands the grieving process. Graham's betrayal and masterful performance should be enough to convince Hannibal of the error of his ways.

There is a point where stubbornness becomes delusion. Had Graham been so convincing that even in betrayal, Hannibal believed? How much had been performance, and how much had been genuine, she cannot know. Hannibal had left Graham dying, but not dead. He had left Graham with yet another choice. Another chance.

Delusion? Or…patience?

Hannibal has yet to transfer the deed and stock to his attorney's account. While it is possible that he waits for all the legalities to be finalized, Du Maurier remains cautious. One can never be too careful where Hannibal is concerned. It is also likely that Graham has no attorney to contact.

Du Maurier sighs as she stirs her drink. That would be typical of Hannibal. He sometimes did not consider the world spins on its own axis, not his. She can imagine the drawn lips and narrowed eyes as Hannibal was told his grand gesture was not possible due to some legal snafu.

Hannibal would arrange for an attorney for Graham himself if he had to. He must know that Graham would never accept his gift. Then again, Hannibal often surprises Du Maurier. He is in some ways very much like a child, confused by the behaviors of grown-ups.

He will make the withdrawal sooner or later. Whatever he has planned, whether to leave Graham a parting gift or to present him with a hoped for homecoming, he will have to do something for appearances. Timing is crucial.

When Hannibal enters his code she will have her window to claim the rest. She can only do it once. She cannot lock Hannibal out by changing her codes afterward. Changing codes must be done in person. Hannibal will no doubt conclude the remainder to be in the Cayman Islands, but by the time he does, she will have personally dispersed their holdings into manageable portfolios, spread among the continents.

In the meantime, she has distractions to occupy her.

Du Maurier turns her attentions to the pool and the sun bathed bodies splashing in it or sprawled beside it in the lounge chairs that line its perimeter. She watches the dark haired young man in the cobalt blue swim trunks lift himself out of the pool and walk dripping wet over to his chair.

Clayton is gorgeous. Just watching him breathe is glorious. He grabs his towel and begins to rub his neck, then chest. Du Maurier thinks she would like to be that towel right now. A giggle threatens and she stares at the drink in her hand.

Du Maurier sets her vodka tonic on the patio table and stands up to comport herself. Her coral colored sundress, another Dolce original, is cut low in front and back to allow maximum exposure, but she has kept to the shade this afternoon as she has waited for Dr. Clayton to finish his dip in the pool and recline in the lounge chair to dry off in the sun.

She adjusts her sun hat and walks purposefully over to where he rests comfortably still wearing only his trunks. He is lean and sleek, save for the downy hair on bronzed forearms, calves, and the swirl of fine hair around his navel extending down into the wet trunks. Du Maurier admires the physique for a moment since he is not this stripped down at the gym.

He is engrossed in an issue of Scientific American, his feet move restlessly in time to the music he listens to. He is playing it loud enough that Du Maurier can hear the faint thudding of the bass and drums. He is reading the current issue of the vaunted magazine and Du Maurier decides to gage his vanity.

She brushes a finger over his toes. He looks up from his magazine with a start, pulls one earbud loose and gives Du Maurier the once over. A curious smile emerges as he lifts a hand to shield his eyes from the glare.

"Ah, Dr. Clayton. We meet again. Has another of your articles been published?" Du Maurier says her chosen accent clipped and posh.

"Excuse me?" Daniel says, squinting at the petite blonde looming over the foot of his lounge chair. She seems a bit overdressed for a pool. He notes the jewelry alone costs as much as Maria's salary. Her annual salary. He sits up a little straighter. He shuts off the music.

"You are the Dr. Clayton who writes about dogs and humans? I enjoyed your article last year; an extract from your paper wasn't it?"

"Yes, it was. I'm sorry, have we met?"

"You don't remember me?" Du Maurier watches him shake his head as he tries to remember an encounter that never happened.

"Refresh my memory. Where did we meet?" he asks, shifting his legs slightly, a nervous response to her deliberate scrutiny.

She makes no effort to put him at ease. His reaction will reveal many things to her, among them his interest in her. She can only describe his behavior at the gym as cordial. He keeps to himself, but then again, most everyone does. So, she is pleased when he raises his arms over his head to let his hands rest between lounge chair and his head. His gaze is direct though he still squints in the bright sunlight.

"The symposium in London two years ago, shortly after your paper was published. The Evolutionary Empathy between Canines and Humans I believe. You spoke briefly on it. Too briefly actually. I found your lecture most refreshing." She adjusts her sunglasses.

"If I remember, the other speakers were a little dry…" He says.

Du Maurier would not know but nods her head in agreement anyway. Perusing through copies of all the papers delivered at the symposium had been tedious and she could only assume the authors themselves had been equally as tedious. She has been to her fair share of seminars and symposiums.

"And older." Du Maurier says without a trace of humor. A tick of a smile passes over Clayton's lips, but nothing more.

He breathes in the humid air, exhales slowly as he continues to gaze at Du Maurier. She smiles indulgently as she waits for him to engage her or return to his magazine.

He folds the corner of the page he was reading, a dog ear flap to mark his place. He closes the magazine and tosses it aside. "You seem to know me, but I do not recall meeting you. And I am pretty good with faces, usually."

Daniel is very good with faces and he is having trouble placing hers. His instincts tell him he did not meet her at any symposium, his empathy tells him she is not being entirely truthful with him - about what he could not say. His memory is not infallible, but his empathy is. His instincts have yet to fail him.

She stands in front of him, lovely and self-composed, perhaps too self-composed and this is what has Daniel's empathy tingling like a rusted bell twisting in the wind. She does not ring true to him.

“Dr. Francesca Dumont.” She says, “Pleased to meet you, again.” She removes her sunglasses and smiles down at him. Easy enough to smile at him as he sits with tousled, wet hair and long lashes looking more like Graham every minute.

“I’ll try to remember this time. You do look familiar, but not from the symposium.” He says, a slight frown gracing his otherwise exquisite face. Du Maurier imagines he is no doubt taking in the designer sundress, the Armani sandals, and enough solid gold jewelry to attest to expensive taste and the bank account to flaunt it.

She is a bit put off he does not seem to remember her from the gym. Curious, that. He was focused when he worked out, but she had not believed so focused that he did not take note of the people around him. There were plenty of fit and attractive people there, and she had run on a treadmill right next to him just last week.

“We go to the same gym, here in Fiesole. I thought I recognized you, but the gym didn’t really seem the proper venue for introductions.” She responds, careful to maintain the swank London accent she adopts for Dumont's persona.

“Yes! I have seen you at the gym. You could have said something there. I wouldn’t have minded. Do you live in Fiesole?”

The duality of her nags at him, jagged and harsh like a crust of bread he can’t quite swallow. Outwardly, she presents as what she appears, a doctor, like himself. She is very pretty with her long blonde tresses, luminous blue eyes, and lips that seem set in a perpetual pucker. Although diminutive in stature she is fit and curvy in all the right places. The dress is both tasteful and form fitting. And, he notes with mild amusement, she is formal and stiff - typically British.

And then there are the other qualities he notices. Her movements are languid and calculating, everything about her seems calculated. Her mannerisms are as manicured as her nails. She seems warm and friendly, on the outside, but inside, she is quite cold.

He does notice the crease of her smile widen at hearing he recognizes her. He feels her satisfaction, and it feels like victory to her. Actually, Daniel thinks it closer to conceit. He decides he does not like her, not even a little.

“No. I see a patient here. I use the gym when I visit.” She says inhaling deeply so that her breasts swell in the sundress, revealing a glimpse of her pale soft skin.

Daniel’s eyes do not linger. The gesture seems innocent enough, but Daniel knows it is not. Nothing she has done has been overt or improper and yet he can almost inhale a subtle insincerity about her. She is like wine too long in the bottle.

She calibrates her emotions; they do not flow naturally. He finds her confusing.

“Is your patient the reason for your visit today?”

Daniel is beginning to wonder how long she had been gazing at him. However long it had been it had clearly not been long enough to satisfy her. She is undressing him with her eyes and he is not wearing much as it is.

"Yes, she left a few minutes ago…" Du Maurier gestures toward her table. "I noticed you here by the pool and decided to say hello. It is such a lovely afternoon I wasn't quite ready to leave."

Du Maurier smiles. "I left my bag and my drink…" She waits for him to invite her to join him. Perhaps even offer to walk her back to retrieve her things.

Daniel does not bite. He merely continues to squint. He raises a hand to shield his eyes as he stares up at her. His hand also serves as a buffer. He can play this game too. And better.

He would like to know why she walked over to him. Unless she plans on doing him right here, he thinks wryly. Of course, Doctor Dumont has no idea her emotions are so transparent that her desires cling to him like sweat.

Du Maurier glances around absently, acting surprised suddenly at her brashness. She purses her lips as if realizing she has been far too forward. "I'm sorry if I have ambushed you here…it was thoughtless of me to intrude."

Daniel almost calls her on that one. That was an outright lie. He is feeling like he has been stalked by a lioness in a pretty dress. He doesn't mind assertive women, prefers them. Usually, they prove just as assertive in the sack. Daniel cannot decide if she is being coy, or experimental. It's almost as if she is trying to gage his responses to various stimuli.

Daniel realizes he is a little stimulated.

She observes Clayton glance down at himself, his skin is dry, but his swim trunks still cling to his body, the contours of his physique in full relief against the wet fabric. The distinctive bulge between his legs draws her gaze. Very little is left to the imagination. He glances at his towel, but lifts his eyes to meet Du Maurier's.

He leans forward, sits up straight and swings his legs over the side of the lounge chair so that he no longer faces her. Usually, attention from women is welcome, but not this one.

"What compelled you to intrude, Dr. Dumont?" he asks over his shoulder, body in profile, arms resting on thighs. Du Maurier is shocked he doesn't even invite her to have a seat in one of the numerous empty chairs.

"I was hoping to persuade you to join me for a drink at my table." She says as she allows her fingers to slide along the frames of the sunglasses. Imagines sliding them along something else…

"Your table is on the patio, under an umbrella. I came here for the pool and the sun." He says, stretching his arms and back, basking in the warmth of the hot summer sun. He hopes she takes the hint. He thinks he should be leaving soon anyway. Will is coming over for dinner…

"It would appear you can afford a respite from the sun."

He laughs a little, "Well, you know what they say; you can never be too tan or too thin." He makes a point of appraising her slim figure.

"I believe the saying is you cannot be too rich or too thin."

Clayton raises his eyebrows at the barb, but reaches for his towel and rubs at his head. He hums softly, “What conversation could possibly lure me into the shade, Dr. Dumont?”

“Actually, I was hoping to confer with you about a professional matter. You pair your patients with dogs from local shelters?” A nod from Clayton. “And you currently have patients engaged in this therapy?”

“I don’t discuss my patients…”

“I wouldn’t be inquiring about your patients rather I would like to confer with you about one of mine. I am investigating alternative therapy for her and since you have some expertise and success in that area, I was hoping to explore the possibilities.”

“I have no objection to that. Although,” he pauses to wipe away the water that trails from his head onto his neck, “I wasn’t planning on talking shop today.”

Given his attitude, Du Maurier wonders if he talks shop any day.

“If there’s nowhere you have to be, I don’t think our conversation would take longer than the time it takes to finish one drink. Won’t you join me?”

“Well, I am meeting a friend later…”

He is surprisingly resistant and uncharacteristically reluctant to discuss his own methods with her. Du Maurier is not accustomed to such a guarded response from a professional colleague. Usually, the opportunity to brag is embraced rather than avoided.

“Then, may I contact you at your office? I should have done that rather than approach you here. But I saw you just before she left and since she is recovering from a suicide attempt, my feet moved more quickly than my manners.”

Daniel sighs, a soft sound to accompany the subtle swell in his green eyes. “Well, since we are both here, I have time for just one. What are we drinking?”

“Vodka tonic.” Du Maurier says, quite pleased with herself. Getting him to agree to one drink has been like pulling teeth. Perhaps later…

“Make mine gin.” He leans over to grab his clothes from beneath the lounge chair. He quickly dons a faded T-shirt and pulls a pair of Nike athletic shorts over his trunks, slips a pair of leather sandals on his feet.

He gestures toward the patio. “After you.” He scoops up his towel, watch, and wallet.

Daniel feels the tug to leave like tendrils around his legs but the mention of suicide gives him pause. One drink can’t possibly take too long. Doctor Dumont had a legitimate reason to stalk him after all. He wonders why she couldn’t have made that plain in the first place.

Of course, she wanted to test the water first. He hopes it was sufficiently cold.

Once they are seated with their drinks, Clayton leans forward in his chair, rests his elbows on the table. “I should have recognized you from the gym, but I don’t wear my glasses to the pool.”

“You don’t wear contacts?”

“Don’t like them. Glasses are easier.”

“Near sighted?”

“Bifocals actually, but distance is especially bad.

“You don’t wear them to the gym either.” Neither does he wear them when he walks his dogs but Du Maurier doesn’t mention that.

“The glasses slip off my nose constantly, so I just wear them to work. But, I see you clearly now and those workouts are paying off.”

Du Maurier lowers her eyes and smiles. His tone is not flirty. He has offered a polite compliment to put her at ease, but she reads the caution in his eyes. She assumes this will be the first and last compliment she receives from him.

Daniel is no longer confused about what he feels from her. She has not been calibrating her emotions, she has been fabricating them. He cannot completely empathize with her because she really has no emotions to empathize with except one. She wants…something.

Something besides sex. The sexual attraction to him is real, but secondary. He feels want from her, longing, something like…anticipation. He decides he is still confused.

She begins to describe Lydia and her relevant issues to Daniel. He listens and nods. He makes an effort to drink his gin and tonic slowly, keeping pace with Dumont so she does not notice that he wants something, too. He wants to leave. He wants to leave in the worst way.

It is clear to Du Maurier that he does not intend to linger once his drink is finished. She would appear desperate if she invited him to join her for dinner. She doubts he would accept any invitation. She decides to let him off her hook for now.

She has already slipped his watch from the folds of the towel. It rests in her lap buried within the creases of her dress. The watch will function as an excuse to engage him again, perhaps outside of the gym or this pool, should he decline to consult with her about Lydia.

“Well, I will explore the possibilities with my patient our next session. May I refer my patient to you should she agree to the therapy?” She rattles the ice in her empty glass, watches the green sliver of lime settle to the bottom.

“Of course. I would recommend a joint session. She would remain your patient. I am only providing an assist.” He checks his wrist, then towel and blinks several times. “I’m sorry.” He says, obviously annoyed. “I have to get going…”

He thanks Du Maurier for the drink and extends again his sincere offer to assist in Lydia’s therapy, complimentary, of course. He wastes no time walking back to his chair and retrieving the rest of his belongings. Du Maurier watches him walk to the parking lot.

She knows the drive to his home is not far. She could follow on foot. Whomever he is meeting is clearly much more interesting than she is.

Chapter 19

Hannibal continues to retreat to his memory palace. He can’t seem to help himself.

Hannibal carefully sets the case of Bianco Toscana from Fiesole on the floor next to his climate controlled storeroom. He had just pulled into the long driveway that ascends to his villa when the van had pulled up behind him. Hannibal had waited in his Jaguar peering into his rearview mirror until he had been satisfied it was the wine delivery that Du Maurier had promised.

Hannibal does not like white vans. He does not like them in his driveway. He has good reason to view nondescript white vans with disdain and plenty of suspicion.

He had greeted the driver with his usual visage of decorum, and conversed pleasantly with him in faultless Italian as he had guided him to the kitchen. He had summarily dismissed him with a sizable tip and sent him on his way, activating the electronic gate and security system once the van had cleared the perimeter.

He had gone upstairs and changed his clothes, prepared to spend the rest of the afternoon in his kitchen. The kitchen is spacious, allowing plenty of movement, its dimensions perfectly attuned to the needs of one so versed in the culinary arts as Hannibal. Hannibal especially likes the Italian tiles that surround the walls and the tiled floor, laid in the style of ancient Roman tesserae including a drain off center, so that Hannibal can easily clean the floor with a hose and a squeegee.

Chopin’s Nocturne in B major plays softly as Hannibal selects the ingredients from his stainless steel refrigerator. He remembers playing this piece on Will’s piano, although Will had not been home at the time. His lips pucker at the thought he never got around to playing it for him.

He notices the wine stills sits in the doorway. He had left it there in his eagerness to peel off the damp clothes from the walk this morning in the city. Florence will be sweltering by this time of day. He thinks fleetingly of Clayton, how his movements and gestures are so like Will’s.

Hannibal decides it would be unwise to subject himself to the young man's company. To engage him in even a brief conversation would be tortuous. It is not his fault he looks like Will. Better to leave him alone, or leave him to Du Maurier.

Hannibal lifts the case of wine and carries it into his storeroom. Hannibal thinks he will frustrate Du Maurier, tease her into playing her hand by refusing to cooperate. He will not accept her invitation when it comes. He will watch and observe instead. From a discreet distance. He will make her wait.

Hannibal emerges from the storeroom, white apron wrapped securely about his trim waist. He carries a bottle of the Toscana Bianco with him and sets it in the wine cooler so he can enjoy it with his evening meal. He remembers the flavor and has been looking forward to more.

Perhaps he will have a soak in the hot tub later. Hannibal's lips curl slightly as he returns to the counter to resume his afternoon preparations.

He prefers red wines, especially those with hints of berries and pepper with tannins tamed and velvety so that the wine feels like liquid silk slipping down his throat. White wines should clear the palette in a cascade crisp enough to clean yet mellow enough to linger on the tongue.

Bianco blends should be pleasantly crisp. The Vermentino grape, originally from Spain, grows well in the Tuscan soil and yields a grape that, when aged properly as this harvest was, produces light fruity tones with a slightly earthy finish from the soil. The bianco from Fiesole blends the Vermentino with Chardonnay.

Hannibal is impressed. The bianco he drank at Du Maurier's home had notes of sweet basil and pine nut, quite unique on the palate. This winery in Fiesole has harnessed the most pleasing qualities of this particular grape most expertly.

Hannibal has paired the pale golden hued wine with a fresh salad tossed lightly in balsamic vinegar and virgin olive oil and a pesto fettuccini topped with his own fennel flavored Italian sausage. The sausage is browning now. The aroma fills the entire villa.

He opens the doors to the porch wide and glances at his garden of herbs, tomatoes, and assorted peppers. He pours another generous glass of the other wine in the case, the Toscana Rosso, a Sangiovese blend, apparently the signature blend of the vineyard.

The owner did not waste the opportunity to advertise and Hannibal will likely become a regular customer. The red is excellent. He can taste the dark ripe hints of berries and the tang of dew soaked soil on his tongue. He swallows again and is certain he detects a certain tartness that suggests the grapes grew close to an olive orchard. And it is smooth, so very smooth going down.

He is reminded of an impromptu wine tasting with Will. Of course he thinks of Will. He cannot stop thinking of Will. Hannibal sets down the glass upon the marble counter. His eyes glance about the kitchen as he compulsively compares it with the one he left behind.

The wine tasting had followed on the heels of the celebratory dinner he had shared with Will after they had left a perturbed Jack Crawford at the crime scene of Randall Tier. Jack had had plenty of reason to be perturbed. He had been sour and testy by the time Hannibal and Will had arrived.

Jack had likely ground the fillings in his teeth while pacing the floors. Jack had actually glowered at Hannibal when he had arrived, Will in tow several minutes later. He and Will had not been especially prompt about showing up at the museum. They had made Uncle Jack wait.

Hannibal remembers that morning vividly. He had not slept after Will had fallen asleep beside him. Too many thoughts had run around his head as he had processed the events of their evening, adrenaline still pumping through him though his body had been at rest. Hannibal had been too enraptured, too fascinated to sleep.

He had refrained from turning on the stereo before. Somehow, once he had found himself completely alone with Will in his bedroom, the prearranged selections had seemed too contrived. In hindsight, Will had not needed the distraction anyway.

Hannibal had turned on the music later, after Will had fallen asleep, to play while he slept. Hannibal had played soothing piano quartets, Mozart of course. He had imagined Will would hear the gentle notes playing distantly in the recesses of wherever his mind had taken him in its slumber.

Will had been far more at ease than Hannibal had thought him capable, at least for an initial encounter. The act of killing Tier had summoned Will's demon and Will had let it loose much to Hannibal's delight. Will had needed to lose the control that was strangling him. There would be time to cultivate their newfound intimacy with all the nuance and sensitivity it deserved.

To finally possess him mind and body, to taste, to smell, to touch him alive and warm, responsive to Hannibal's attentions and sharing in his desires had been more than enough. Will had let go completely, just as Hannibal had wanted. In fact, Will had behaved nearly exactly as Hannibal had wanted. Will had used his imagination to please Hannibal.

Of course Will could do that. But Hannibal had wanted to see Will and he is not sure that he did. It is possible Will's actions and responses were his own. It is also possible what Hannibal experienced with him was a combination. Will was unique. Unpredictable. He supposed there could be no other way with Will.

Will had also demonstrated an urgency that Hannibal had interpreted as haste. That was all Will. Will had wanted to experience, to feel; not think. Hannibal had understood.

As delighted as Hannibal had been he had also been aware of the emotional stress Will had wrestled with the entire time. Many times Will's hands had wandered to Hannibal's throat, and each time he had pulled back, his fingers tight in a fist until he uncurled them in Hannibal's hair, twisting ash blonde locks instead.

Hannibal had given plenty of thought to that. Violence and intimacy running in circles around Will's head, all night.

Hannibal had witnessed many emotions sweep across Will's face in a blur of silken curls and smooth flesh. There had been, however, too many feelings to catalog, too much pleasure to be savored in the moment for Hannibal to analyze the assortment of reactions Will was having at the time. Hannibal's senses had been saturated with Will.

As for Will, Will had not so much as fallen asleep as collapsed.

Will's body and mind had succumbed to exhaustion. Defending himself and his home against Tier had been exhausting enough, but he had been high on adrenaline. He had spent the rest of the night and the entirety of the following day making his monument with Hannibal, stealing into the museum to arrange his masterpiece, and had spent all of last evening wrapped around Hannibal in some fashion or other. He had barely eaten anything either.

Hannibal had known he had it in him.

Hannibal had felt the pleasant warmth of satisfaction grow within as he had gazed upon Will in his slumber. Lips parted as each breath passed quietly into the pillows. Will had barely moved all night. No nightmares to follow him out of his dreams.

Whatever dreams had manifested in Will's subconscious, he had not awakened shaking disoriented and in a cold sweat.

Will had at last become intimate with his instincts.

Hannibal still does not know what Will dreamed about that night. Hannibal had not asked that of him and Will had never told him.

Hannibal had noted Will had slept for nearly seven hours. Seven hours of uninterrupted sleep.

Dawn had come and gone. The winter sun had risen over a bleary monochromatic sky. Stark light had streamed over the bed as Hannibal had opened the curtains just enough to brighten. He had already slipped downstairs earlier, prepared a breakfast and put on coffee. Hannibal had returned upstairs to slip silently back between the sweet-scented sheets and blankets. He had not wanted to miss Will waking up in his bed.

That would be like expecting a child to forgo Christmas.

Hannibal removes the sausage from the hot stove before it grows too crisp. He sips at his wine and allows his mind to remove him from Florence, from this tiled kitchen so far from Baltimore. His mind replaces the aromas of meat, fennel and pesto with musk and sandalwood and fresh coffee.

He is back in his bedroom in Baltimore with Will…

Will stirs in the bed, blankets gathered at his waist. His back faces Hannibal but Hannibal can imagine the frown as Will shudders against the chill tickling his shoulders. He turns over quickly, eyes wide with the knowledge he is not in Wolf Trap. His mouth turns up, a hint of a smile as he gazes at Hannibal. He groans and stretches, cracking his back and positions himself on his side, facing Hannibal.

His eyes are still heavy with sleep but Hannibal knows his mind is already at work, thoughts and images assaulting him before he is even fully awake. Will grabs at the blankets, pulls them up to cover his shoulders, seeking an anchor to steady him.

Hannibal understands. Will usually wakes up alone.

"How did you sleep?" Hannibal asks reaching out a hand to touch the soft curls.

Will shakes his head free of Hannibal's fingers. "You know exactly how I slept. You probably watched me."

Barely awake and already challenge in his eyes.

“Will, this is new for you, in many respects. Any thoughts on that? I ask out of concern for you.”

“Concern? For me?” Will raises his eyebrows in mock surprise.

Hannibal cocks his head, resumes fingering Will’s curls. “This was your first time with a man?”

“There’s that. Mostly, there is the concern that I’ve been intimate with you – the object of my afflictions.”

So infuriating, his Will.

Hannibal takes Will’s face in his hands. “You felt both of us, didn’t you? Felt my embraces, my body as fully as you felt your own?” Hannibal asks, preferring directness this morning of firsts.

A slight nod from Will. He stops pulling away, looks at Hannibal from beneath a fringe of lashes in the grey light. He really looks at Hannibal this time, carefully.

“The entire time?” Hannibal asks.

Another nod. Hannibal holds Will in his gaze knowing Will wants to look away. Will’s brows furrow as he gazes back.

“You become as lost in intimacy as you do in the minds of killers. No wonder you avoid it.” Hannibal pauses, “You can’t control your empathy…even in bed.”

Will’s eyes flick away, embarrassed. His face flushes hot. Hannibal lets go of his face, smoothing his hair behind his ears.

“You were overwhelmed last night.”

Will flinches, but Hannibal realizes he flinches at the words. Hannibal slides his fingers along Will’s jaw, caresses the wisps of beard on the face he loves so much. The familiar gesture calms him. Somewhat.

This time, Will’s values and decency were present and shocked by his own associations and behavior. Hannibal knows this is difficult for Will. To allow Hannibal this glimpse into his mind is intimate indeed.

Will angles his head so he can look into Hannibal’s face as Hannibal’s fingers stroke at his lips, a gentle invitation to spill his secrets. The yielding of soft flesh against his fingertips causes Hannibal’s breath to hitch in anticipation. Will’s eyes are clear and unguarded, Hannibal can see himself in them they are so blue and clear.

“With us…it was…” Will whispers into Hannibal’s fingers. “…almost too much. I can’t help it. It just happens.”

“I imagine that could become disorienting for the other person if they didn’t know what to expect.”

Will pulls back a little, wets his lips in thought.

“You had to know. Everything about me fascinates you.” Will says.

“I did not know, but I…hoped.”

A quiet snicker from Will. “Of course, you would.”

“When you kill the pleasure is singular. You feel only your own pleasure with perfect clarity and self-awareness. When you make love, the pleasure is no longer singular.”

“No, it isn’t.”

“The emotions of your partner drive your own pleasure, your passions. If you climax the same time as your partner…” Hannibal stops. His lips wrinkle before he can control himself.

“Envious…Doctor?”

“Intrigued.”

Hannibal tugs on Will’s hair. Will allows it. He allows Hannibal to spread his fingers through his tangle of curls and pull him close. He allows Hannibal to cover his mouth, bite the flesh of his lower lip, and push him into the mattress. Hannibal feels the pads of Will’s fingers skim over his cheeks, his throat. The fingers linger on his jugular and press softly against the pulse of blood that quickens at the touch.

“You are empathizing right now?”

“Does it matter?” Will breathes into Hannibal’s neck.

Hannibal decides it does not.

Will presses his hips against Hannibal’s, gently at first then more insistently with each undulation. Hannibal feels Will’s fingers against the nape of his neck, hugging him closer. They rock back and forth in the bed, each fascinated and consumed by the other.

Hannibal is dimly aware of the smell of the coffee downstairs, of the smell of soap, cologne and sweat upon the satin. All he can taste is Will. Their lips are locked tight when Will’s phone rings. Will tears himself away to look at the phone. He needn’t have bothered. They both know who it is.

Wills shifts and stretches his arm out to reach the cell phone on the night stand. He gives Hannibal a questioning look. Will had not put his phone there. Hannibal had placed their phones where they could get to them hours ago. Will sighs and answers the phone.

“Hello? Jack.” Will closes his eyes as he listens.

“Ok. And where are you now?” Will sits up and yawns into the phone.

“I’ll get dressed and be there as soon as I can.”

He abruptly clicks off the phone and flops back down onto the bed.

“He’s in a mood.” Will says.

Hannibal stifles a grin. He pulls Will back over to him. He wants to feel his warmth, the caress of his skin against his own. Will does not resist. Will makes no move to get out of bed or get dressed. Hannibal gazes at the scar from Jack’s bullet on Will’s shoulder as Will gazes about his bedroom.

Hannibal’s phone rings on the opposite night stand.

“Your turn.” Will says.

Hannibal picks up his phone.

“Hello….yes, Jack…Of course. I’ll get dressed and be there as soon as I can.”

Hannibal clicks off the phone and looks to Will.

Will is chewing on his lower lip. “You just can’t help yourself, can you?”

Will kicks lazily at the sheets and blankets. “We should go.”

“Yes. And arrive separately.”

“Agreed.”

“It will take you a little while to drive to Baltimore from Wolf Trap.”

“Yes, it will.”

“Plenty of time for coffee and a little breakfast.”

“I could eat.”

Hannibal rubs his toes against Will’s ankles. “Jack doesn’t like waiting.” Will says.

“Life is full of disappointments.” Hannibal responds.

Hannibal raises his wine glass to his lips. It is empty now. Chopin’s Nocturne is long over. Vivaldi’s Four Seasons - Spring now plays quietly. The sausage is cold.

Hannibal sets his jaw and he manages a tight swallow. He decides he isn’t really that hungry any way. He pours the remainder of the bottle into his glass, and clings to the remnants of that morning.

How Will had rolled his eyes at finding a toothbrush waiting for him in the bathroom. How he had gazed into the mirror downstairs in the foyer at the raised welts along his collarbone and neck.

How Hannibal had handed him his simple knitted scarf while smothering his own welts in cashmere and wool.

“Don’t even think about kissing me outside.” Will had said.

How disappointing it is that only remnants remain.

Chapter End Notes

> I experimented a little here with the tense. I wrote Chapter 14 memory palace entirely in the past. I found it awkward to write intimate scenes that way. I put Hannibal in the past here, but it is written in the present. I am not sure which is better or which reads better or if it is confusing for you. Thanks for reading!

Chapter 20

Daniel reflects on Du Maurier, or Dumont, as he knows her. This invites thoughts of sex, and Will.

Anima Mundi, Roberto Ferri

Daniel pulls into his driveway overlooking the hills and terraces of Fiesole. He decides to leave the car in the drive figuring he will have to load up the trunk this evening anyway. He flips off the ignition, cursing as he twists around to the backseat to retrieve his gym bag. He should not have indulged that doctor at the pool. He had never felt as objectified as he had beneath her gaze. His skin still prickles as though the finely manicured nails she had tapped against the tumbler of ice and vodka had skimmed along his flesh eager to draw blood.

He sits still in his seat, staring over the steering wheel at the wall of his garage. Usually people's emotions churned, thick and dense like wet concrete in his mind. Du Maurier was not wet concrete. Neither was she dry leaves in the wind as Will had been to him upon their initial meeting. She was ice so cold that she burned him like fire. Like being sliced open with an icicle.

He'd wanted to run, but the mention of her suicidal patient had caused him to reconsider. He had been impressed with Dumont's insights into her patient and despite her clear sexual attraction to him; her clinical knowledge was dead on. He wanted to help Lydia if he could.

He had found the sensations from Dumont frightening and exciting. Every alarm in his head had gone off yet he could not deny the heat he had felt between his legs, the swell of blood stir in his cock at the thought of her mouth around it. She had a pretty mouth.

He imagines her mouth, supple and soft slipping over his skin, drawing him in and out until her lips are swollen and her throat is so bruised that days later, every time she swallows she thinks of him. He is pretty sure she was imagining the same thing.

Daniel had been both fascinated and repelled by the attention. He was used to the staring, especially from the opposite sex, but Dumont had sat enrapt of his every gesture, evincing a savage seething undercurrent. His jaw tightens with the knowledge he feels the same savage undercurrent in Will sometimes. And that does not bother him at all. It should.

Daniel sighs and opens the car door and steps out. With looks like hers, she must have no shortage of interested men. She had been singularly attracted to him. Her patient's suicide attempt had provided opportunity, almost like she had sought him out on a whim. She had apparently noticed him at the gym and had found in her patient a legitimate reason to approach him. Therapy with him would help her patient and provide her with multiple opportunities to pursue him. While not being the most noble of motives, her actions were hardly criminal.

She had not meant to put her primal emotions on display for him. It was not uncommon for people to say one thing and mean another, or to keep their true feelings cloaked. People did it all the time. What a world it would be if everyone saw people as he did. The entire fabric of polite society would disintegrate.

Humans rely on a certain degree of deceit to survive. Humans do not really want the truth, not all of the time. He acknowledges she was a little wasted, elegantly wasted, but still. He wonders what she is like in a bar. Maybe he should let her loose on Will. He laughs aloud at the thought.

What is Will's type anyway? As far as Daniel can tell romance has been off the table for Will for quite some time. The relationship he wanted with Alana Bloom never got off the ground. He had commiserated with Margot Verger, had sought solace in physical intimacy and had learned he had merely been the means to an end.

Daniel suspects Will's tryst with Margot had also been an act of self-affirmation. He had been intimate with Lecter by that time. Both relationships had been difficult for Will to talk about. Lecter had managed to interfere with tragic consequences. Even without Lecter's interference neither relationship could be characterized as promising. Neither relationship could have ever been fulfilling for Will.

Daniel had sat mute, listening to Will talk about both women and trying to remain detached so that Daniel would not feel the hurt he carried. Both women had rejected him, both in their own callous way. And Will had taken it.

If Lecter's interference had been limited to only those two individuals, Daniel would still be appalled. How Lecter had maintained his license to practice was a mystery. There must have been complaints, some allegations of malpractice.

Daniel pauses as he shuts the car door, swallows hard as his gym bag slips off his shoulder. Lecter probably ate them.

Daniel draws a deep breath and tries to resume his original train of thought. He thinks he is starting to sound like Will.

Dating is not an activity Will could have pursued over the past couple years and Daniel can understand that. He was not all that stable himself and he would not have wanted to expose a potential romantic interest to Lecter. Alana had already been in the thick of it.

Will had not dated much at all though, even before Crawford had drawn him into the Hobbs' case. Will is fairly celibate by his own admission, but he had evidently cut loose with Doctor Lecter.

Daniel has some ideas about that.

Daniel had known Will's feelings about Lecter were far too complex as to be reduced to a moral dilemma. Will couldn't know the barrage of emotions Daniel had felt every time Will had said his name.

Will's emotions had been easy enough to interpret when he had been describing the crime scenes of Beverly Katz and Georgia Madchen. Anger, guilt, a well of sadness had erupted. With Abigail, the pain had seared enough to cause tears. Daniel supposed he had learned to contain the emotion from other victims.

The mind can only handle so much and Will had learned to compartmentalize his grief and disgust for the numerous crime scenes he had profiled. It wasn't that he hadn't felt each one as freshly as the first each time; he had. He had learned to manage his emotions so he could look.

Daniel cannot imagine feeling both killer and victim at the same time. Cannot imagine the shock of realizing you identified more with the killer than the victim, and identified so much that you could think like him. Understand him. Become him.

That was the horror Will lived with every day. And that was the allure for Hannibal Lecter.

Will is twisted up into knots over Lecter. Lecter has become a part of Will. Will can never, never be without him. He can only learn to live with him. Will is only now coming to grips with this.

Daniel knows he cannot undo what Lecter has done to Will. Will has come to him with hopes that he can. Will said he needs to manage his mind, needs a counter weight, an anchor. And that is rational Will talking, always managing expectations. Irrational Will wants Lecter out of his head and wants back what was taken from him.

Daniel can deliver what rational Will wants. But first, Will has to be honest with himself. He is not there yet.

As far as Daniel knows there are only two emotions capable of causing the kind of emotional turmoil he feels from Will. Two powerful emotions at war with each other. And Will feels them both, in equal measure.

Love and Hate.

Will clings to the hate. He remembers with perfect clarity each and every cruel manipulation, each horrendous deed. He hugs the remorse and guilt close so that the hate remains in his mind's eye far from his heart's embrace. He hates Lecter. He hates what Lecter did to him. He hates himself for allowing it. For enjoying it.

Everything he sees, touches, and feels cause him to experience either or both of those emotions. Both emotions are connected to Lecter. They are because everything in Will's universe is connected to Lecter. By design.

He refuses to acknowledge the emotions he pushes away, keeps at arms' length. If he embraces those emotions, he invites the emotion that terrifies him most of all.

Will does not want to acknowledge the love.

He wants to believe Lecter manipulated him with conditioning techniques, flashing lights, and drugs. If Will can believe that is true, his hate can remain pure and his vengeance becomes righteous. He does not want to believe that his feelings are his own.

But Will liked the violence. He was manipulated into expressing it, but he enjoyed it. He may have been manipulated into Hannibal's bed, but he enjoyed that, too. The sex was part of Will's manipulation of Lecter, part of the trap. Will could tell himself that to a point.

Sex is not love. But, if Will had truly used sex to lure Lecter, he would not be twisted up inside.

Delving into that aspect their relationship is going to be a hell of a therapy session. Daniel understands the emotional entanglements that will assuredly come place him in a very sensitive position. He realizes he is uniquely qualified to help Will through this, and he knows there is only one way to really know what is going on in Will's head.

If he can get Will to a happy place in his mind, the therapy will go much better. Will has already demonstrated a willingness to subject himself to unorthodox practices. After being subjected to Lecter's brand, Daniel doubts Will will even blink an eye at Daniel's proposal.

Well, he may blink once. Daniel sure as hell won't be writing in any journals about it. The loss of his license would be the least of his worries.

Hopefully, this fishing trip will allow Daniel some insight into that part of Will's universe that is not associated with Lecter. Daniel needs to see Will engaged in an activity he associates with home and happiness so Daniel can create some kind of emotional baseline. He needs to feel Will's emotions when he's not under pressure, or upset, or traumatized.

And Will needs a break from his life of extremes. He needs to do something…normal.

Will was a teacher once. He was a cop. In their current dynamic, Daniel is the authority figure. The relationship is doctor and patient, for the most part. Will needs to be the authority figure, needs to be the teacher again, if only for a little while.

A little role reversal will equalize things, invite reciprocity, and strengthen the foundation of trust they have between them. Will wants to believe in the best of people. Daniel wants to give him reason to keep believing that.

He walks up to his house, hears the girls barking and fussing inside since he left the kitchen window open again. He really hates air conditioning, but the dogs would die in the summer if he did not turn it on. He lugs his briefcase and gym bag up the walkway and unlocks the back door.

He wonders what kind of therapist Dumont is, besides a very successful one. She must restrict her patient base to the rich and famous with her wardrobe and jewelry. She is way out of his league.

Well, he will learn soon enough if her patient wants to see him. Dumont will call his office for an appointment or she won't. Daniel is not surprised that a fellow psychiatrist is a little fucked up; perhaps she is even in treatment for something herself. Daniel is sure there is a lot more going on in that woman's head than Daniel cares to know.

He shoves thoughts of the odd psychiatrist out of his head. Will is going to be here soon and he hates feeling rushed.

He lets the dogs out for a quick pee in the yard before ushering them inside. He had cleaned up earlier, but he had meant to be packed for the trip before Will arrived. He reprimands himself for leaving his watch. He could have sworn he had it with him. He must have dropped it by the pool. He'll have to call after he feeds the dogs.

Chapter 21

Du Maurier is curious. She gives in to whimsy.

His garage sets on a lower terrace. She sees he has parked his car in the drive and already made his way up the stone walkway to the house. She can hear him clattering about in his kitchen, music from a local radio station hums through the open door off the patio. He sings along softly, his Italian impressive and his voice actually on key. The friend must be coming to dinner.

Chapter 21

Du Maurier is curious. She gives in to whimsy.

Du Maurier slips her phone back into her clutch purse. The driver acknowledged her text. He will wait for her at the café while she takes her walk. She reflects on her conversation with Clayton as she meanders along the stone walled avenues and tumbling vines.

Clayton's response to her is atypical. She had expected a more playful response from him. He should have been flattered by her ego stroking but her attempts at flirting had been rebuffed, so she had slipped into professional mode.

He should have jumped at the lucrative possibilities of treating Lydia. Even as a consulting psychiatrist, he could charge a hefty sum. But he had wanted to consult pro bono. Du Maurier did not believe anyone consulted pro bono anymore.

Clayton had extended a professional courtesy to let her know in no uncertain terms that this consult would be a one-time offer. To accept payment would be to invite further referrals. He does not want them, at least not from her.

Du Maurier is completely baffled. She is more intrigued now than ever.

She had been subtle at the table, wearing her usual patina of cultured reserve and yet Clayton had behaved like a deer hearing the snap of a twig. Du Maurier had felt uncomfortably transparent. Sitting across from him at the table felt too much like sitting across from Graham at FBI headquarters. She had felt like she was being assessed, profiled.

Clayton's expressive green eyes had searched her face tirelessly as they had talked; his face a constant distraction. The eye contact, the licking of lips, the brush of fingers across his mouth, had been tantalizing, as if he had smelled Du Maurier's lust in the very air they breathed and had been infected by it. Had acted on it. Curious.

Of course, he would have no idea how far that lust extended or what forms it could take.

And yet, his concern for her patient had been genuine. His compassion over her suicide attempt had been evident in his tone of voice and unmistakably clear in his eyes.

Clayton was an intriguing mix; there were obviously layers to him that her initial assessment had missed. His preference for his music over human interaction was to blame, at least partially. She admits her observations of him have been largely devoid of other people. He is often alone. Du Maurier considers that his resemblance to Graham is not limited to the physical similarities and this is an alarming thought.

Also alarming are thoughts of Hannibal. The nagging feeling that he might have seen the dossier on Clayton hangs like a cobweb. And yet, he has given no indication that he has. The only picture of Clayton had been almost a decade old. She would have preferred no photos at all, but leaving the article incomplete would have drawn attention.

It would seem that it does not matter. Hannibal is preoccupied with his own thoughts. He is still pining for Graham. No matter what he says.

It occurs to Du Maurier that this attempt at closure is a ruse to placate her concerns so that Hannibal can track Graham to wherever he is through legal channels previously unexplored. If Hannibal's lawyers engage Graham's lawyer, Hannibal will find a way to locate Graham.

I see his madness and I want to contain it…like an oil spill.

Oil is valuable…What value does Will Graham's madness hold for you?

You are suggesting I am more fascinated with the madness than the man?

Are you?

No…

Will Graham's madness had indeed spilled all over Hannibal so that Hannibal was slick with it. Hannibal had always been provocative, always curious…but never emotional. His behavior is no longer predictable. His needs and desires are no longer hers. The need to pull him closer has arisen out of this new dynamic between them.

Du Maurier imagines nearly every micro expression that graces Hannibal's face to be caused by Graham. If she continues to indulge in her wine; she will likely start seeing his image everywhere too, even outside of the hot tub.

Du Maurier knows why she fantasizes about Graham in the hot tub. It is the same reason she pursues Clayton. She wants to take something of Graham from Hannibal. To demystify him somehow. Hannibal had systematically removed all of Graham's ties to his life outside of Hannibal. Hannibal had wanted Graham all to himself and for a short time he accomplished that.

What had Hannibal enjoyed with him? What was it about Graham that Hannibal had risked so much to keep him? She doubts she will ever know. She can never experience Graham as Hannibal has, but she can satisfy other desires with Clayton. He looks enough like Graham to have walked right out of one of Hannibal's drawings.

Hannibal used to draw sketches of her in early morning light, French coffee and croissants scattered among pencil scrapings and dusty pastels. He had kept them in a portfolio tied up in satin ribbon. Graham had rated fully realized portraits in subtle shades of grey charcoal, pen and ink. Hannibal had matted and framed them himself selecting only the rarest of woods with which to encase and preserve his beloved.

Du Maurier had seen and tolerated the numerous charcoal sketches of Graham Hannibal had drawn over the past year, all of them faithfully reproducing every detail from memory. Du Maurier was certain they were recreations of earlier work, sketched while Graham had dozed nude, twisted up in satin, sprawled in Hannibal's bed. And while the bedroom sketches had been figure studies in real time, there had been plenty of fantasy drawings as well. Graham's face had graced more than one reworking of Saint Sebastian themed drawings, bloodied and martyred and exquisitely rendered.

Most infuriating was the fact that Hannibal had left his work out purposely, not caring if Du Maurier saw them or not. Du Maurier wonders if Graham is aware of the throne Hannibal has placed him on. That knowledge would indeed be dangerous in the hands of Graham. Graham would exploit that knowledge and enjoy doing so. Hannibal would find himself torn between self-preservation and desire for the very thing that seeks to destroy him.

She glances at her watch as she walks. She adjusts her gait, no need to break a heel. She will be at Clayton's house soon enough. The hills of Fiesole do not deter, she takes them in stride enjoying the stretch of muscles in her legs and the tug in her abdomen as she walks. She does not like the sweat.

Du Maurier wonders how Graham sees Hannibal now. What revelations have manifested in that brilliant imagination of his? More importantly, what are Graham's revelations about her? She cannot be sure what he intuited from their exchange all those months ago.

It may be small comfort, but I am convinced Hannibal has done what he honestly believes is the best for you.

No, that isn't small comfort; that would be no comfort.

She had offered a truth knowing Graham would take that truth as evidence of Hannibal's ability to fool even his own psychiatrist. He would only understand the subtext of that truth if Du Maurier could convince him that she understood perfectly.

I believe you.

She had left Graham plenty of food for thought, sustenance to fuel his anger. Anger leads to action. And act he had. Unpredictably.

Her thoughts return to Clayton as she ambles along the cobbled streets towards Clayton's house. She has been to his home many times, watched him toil in his garden, take meals on his patio, sip coffee and pet his dogs as he gazes over the city of Florence below.

He lives off of Via Fra Giovanni, near the Piazza Mino da Fiesole, close to the top of the highest hill. The house is situated on a fine piece of real estate, well-chosen and well maintained. It is a three story town house, mustard yellow stucco walls with rustic brownish red shutters and steps. Vines and glazed pots of flowers adorn the walls and creep over the terrace out front. Du Maurier has already seen the garden around back. He grows vegetables and flowers with equal success.

His garage sets on a lower terrace. She sees he has parked his car in the drive and already made his way up the stone walkway to the house. She can hear him clattering about in his kitchen, music from a local radio station hums through the open door off the patio. He sings along softly, his Italian impressive and his voice actually on key. The friend must be coming to dinner.

Du Maurier walks past Clayton's house to the next street, takes a left and walks to take up a vantage point from a market and tavern situated a street below but offering an unobstructed view of Clayton's backyard from the rear of the tavern where tables and chairs are scattered under an awning.

From here, she can see his entire patio, terrace, driveway, and garden. Du Maurier checks her emails, clicks on an issue of Cosmopolitan, another guilty indulgence, and settles in to enjoy her magazine, and the view. There are a few other patrons braving the heat, tourists she decides.

Du Maurier adjusts her sun hat and removes her sunglasses.

The cute server appears and asks what she would like to drink. She laughs to herself thinking if she drinks another vodka tonic she might see Will Graham appear before her. She orders a cappuccino despite the heat, and leans back in her chair.

She watches Clayton go in and out of his back door, intermittently bringing out tableware and wine glasses, and finally begins to tackle the gas grill. He curses loudly as the flames leap up, nearly singeing his shirt.

She observes him bring out a plate, light a cigarette, go back inside, bring out a huge bowl of what looked like salad greens and a wine bucket sloshing ice and water over the table. He soaks up the spilled water with a towel and then tosses the towel to the side of the patio in a damp heap.

The dogs bark excitedly from within the house and Du Maurier imagines his guest has arrived. Clayton disappears into the house. She resumes her reading, glancing at the patio and the door every so often.

Chapter 22

Will arrives for dinner and dogs.

“Damn.” Daniel says, “What a dog magnet you are.” He stands back allowing his dogs to fuss over Will as much as he will allow, which is apparently quite a lot.

“Shelter dogs, right?” Will says, stroking the cautious black one. She wriggles like a sausage with legs against Will’s knees as he rubs and strokes at her fur.

“Yeah. Both of them.” Daniel says, “Both females. Seems Italians like their males, the shelter is mostly females. And these two…adopted me.”

“Hmmm, the unwanted are always the most grateful and affectionate ones.” Will says softly, stroking the ears of the little black one. “This one’s Cara? Some kind of herding dog?”

Chapter 22

Will arrives for dinner and dogs.

Will pays the cab driver and grabs his duffle bags from the backseat. He moves his jaw from side to side in an effort to ease his anxiety. He is not anxious about the trip or seeing Daniel. He cannot remember the last time he looked at his files. Lucia had called once to let Will know they had begun their searches of orphanages in Lithuania. He can’t remember how many days ago that was. He is losing time again.

Right now, he feels lucid, aware and vaguely hungry. He smells an outdoor grill and his stomach rumbles.

It was only yesterday he talked to Daniel on the phone, but it feels longer than that. The hours had ticked by slowly and Will had had only his laundry to keep him company. Day had crawled into night and Will had crawled into bed with his usual trepid resignation.

His imagination never failed him and he wished it would. His dreams had fulfilled all his expectations once again. He smiles bitterly. At least he had had clean shirts and sheets this time.

The dreams are relentless. The stag no longer haunts his dreamscape. The snow has melted to reveal a forest swallowed by flames. As he walks he feels the crunching of not ice - but hot cinders beneath the soles of his boots. The wolf is no longer white, but grey, like the smoky sky above. The charred remains of the trees rise from the ground like brittle bones. The wolf follows him along the smoldering path they forge through the ruined woods.

Silence, torturous silence pervades as Will walks through the once beautiful forest his footfalls lost to the deafening quiet that claims each step he takes. The stream is dry; the rocks along its bed are cracked and coated with dust. The dust is all that remains of the rolling stream. The maddening silence is eventually pierced by the cry of the black eagle with the blood rimmed eyes. Will's blood chills in his veins.

He feels its twin stir beneath the scar that seems to tighten along his flesh.

Will follows the eagle as it flies over head, he can hear its wings beating over the thud of his heart and the crackling of burnt brittle gravel at his boots. Except he knows he does not tread on gravel.

He doesn't look down as he staggers along. He knows if he looks he will see what he nearly trips over with every step. He doesn't want to see. The sky looms darker ahead. The pounding of wings stops and the rustling of feathers ahead signals the eagle's descent.

He knows the eagle waits for him. He wakes with the smell of smoke in his nostrils and his shirt drenched as though the heat burning his boots and licking at his face had been real. Will knows he has to look eventually.

He contemplates Daniel's house from the driveway, admiring the landscaping and the classically Italianate architecture. Will thinks if he lived in Tuscany, he would want a home just like this one, pretty, well kept, and large enough to accommodate a family. Except, perhaps, he would find a place a little further out in the country…

He looks around at the other houses nearby with their sun drenched porches, yards full of flowers, and barefoot children running beneath clotheslines filled with fresh smelling sheets and shirts. He hears Daniel's dogs barking from inside the house and looks to the screened door. He can see them pacing and waging their tails from where he stands at the edge of the drive yet he remains rooted to the spot as the dogs bark.

For the briefest of moments he is standing in Wolf Trap on a sunny summer's morning in front of his porch, Winston pacing at the door.

"Will!" Daniel calls from inside.

Will looks up and grins at him. He doesn't feel like smiling, but he does so anyway. Daniel always looks pleased to see him. His enthusiasm is infectious.

"Look out! Incoming…"

Daniel opens the screened door and is nearly knocked over by the dogs who rush toward Will. Will braces himself for the impact as both dogs sniff and jump at him. He drops his bags and falls to his knees so he can avoid being pawed to death.

Will is all too happy to oblige the dogs as they push their wet noses into his clothes, his collar, and his face. He has missed his own dogs terribly and revels in the sensation of their soft fur on his skin. He ruffles the fur along their backs and massages their ears, alternating between dogs, mindful of the smaller black dog that keeps getting shoved aside by the larger dog.

"Hey, Hey…" Will averts his head from the slobbering tongue inches from his face, "Who are you? Huh? Ah, right there…that's it…"

He massages the neck of the larger dog as she buries her head in his lap. Daniel does not miss the longing in Will's eyes, the sadness that flickers in the pools of blue as he cups Bella's shaggy face in his hands. But Will is smiling and that is what is important.

He looks better he feels Daniel decides. There is slightly darkened flesh beneath his eyes, the rims faintly tinged pink from lack of sleep. He is groomed with clean clothes as always, but Daniel can feel the fatigue. He knows Will play it off until he remembers Daniel knows better. Then, he will be able to talk about it.

"Damn." Daniel says, "What a dog magnet you are." He stands back allowing his dogs to fuss over Will as much as he will allow, which is apparently quite a lot.

"Shelter dogs, right?" Will says, stroking the cautious black one. She wriggles like a sausage with legs against Will's knees as he rubs and strokes at her fur.

"Yeah. Both of them." Daniel says, "Both females. Seems Italians like their males, the shelter is mostly females. And these two…adopted me."

"Hmmm, the unwanted are always the most grateful and affectionate ones." Will says softly, stroking the ears of the little black one. "This one's Cara? Some kind of herding dog?"

"I think so, they are both mixes, I never bothered to ask…" The larger dog begins vying for Will's attention.

"And this one is Bella." Will says, eyes distant with thoughts of Crawford's wife. "Got any toys?"

"In the yard somewhere." Daniel looks around, finds a chewed up tennis ball near the porch. "Here you go."

He tosses it to Will who catches it, squeezes it in his hand above the dogs' heads.

"Yeah," Will dangles the tattered green ball from his fingers, "This one's your favorite, isn't it…"

He commences tossing it to the dogs, and they listen to his commands to take turns. Will is impressed they are well trained to alternate and they stay clear of the road. It is evident that Daniel has spent a great deal of time with them.

Daniel sits down on the porch to watch Will bond with the dogs. He knows playing with them allows Will to get out of his head for a while. Even better, Will will like how he feels with them. He will want to feel that way again. And the dogs will pick up on Will's loneliness and exploit his kindness as only dogs can.

Bella and Cara will make sure Will is the center of attention. They will twist themselves inside out for him. Will is already once again down on his knees fighting with Bella over the ball, grass and dog hair sticking to his clothes.

After a while, Daniel whistles and snaps his fingers at the two dogs. They pause, looking from Will to Daniel. Will tosses the ball back to Daniel. Daniel walks over to his dogs, ruffles each of them behind the ears.

"C'mon girls. Leave him alone. Enough play for now…" He tugs at Bella's collar and she relents. Cara retreats behind Daniel's legs, large brown eyes still fixed on Will.

“Here,” Daniel leans over to retrieve Will’s bags. “I’ll put these inside while you walk the girls around back to the patio. I’ll meet you around back.” He pauses seeing Will’s somber expression.

“Everything ok?”

Will manages a weak smile, “Oh it’s me, remember? Of course I’m not ok…but I’ll survive. Go ahead, take the stuff inside.”

Will whistles to the dogs and Daniel watches them follow him through the yard. He carts the bags inside and tosses them on the couch so he can grab the wine he has been chilling out of the fridge. Daniel reaches the patio first and is relieved he has time to check the grill before the dogs come bounding around the corner, Will in tow.

Miraculously, he hasn’t burned down the patio with all the interruptions. He reaches for the bowl covered in tin foil. Will joins him next to the grill.

“What’s for dinner?”

“Well, what else could two Americans in Italy want?”

“Not burgers…”

“I almost did make burgers, but I marinated ribs instead.”

Will opens the grill to find two racks of pork, thick and dripping over the flames.

“Smells delicious.” He says watching Daniel apply more marinade to the ribs. Daniel gets the feeling Will is not finding them as delicious as he said.

“Yeah, I pre-cooked them so they won’t take too long. Should be ready soon. It’s really too hot to cook inside.”

“I hardly ever grilled outside. But I always enjoy it when someone else does.”

Will feels his stomach rumble again and not in a good way. But Daniel is standing beside him, and his peculiar mist that smells of tidal spray and sand envelopes his mind again. Will clings to that, tries to ignore the nauseous feeling in his gut and the prickle of the scar beneath his pale shirt.

Will pulls out a chair. He notices the opened bottle of wine chilling in the bucket. He picks it up to check the label. It’s a local vintage, Pomino, the label reads. “What’s a Pomino?”

“The region. It’s a Tuscan variety - it’s like a California Chardonnay.”

“Oh. White wine with ribs? No beer?”

“If you’re going to be fussy, there’s red inside, but it’s awfully hot for red. And no, I forgot beer.”

Will smiles. He doesn’t really care; he just enjoys arguing with Daniel. “What kind of red? I am a bit fussy about wine.” Will says.

Daniel turns from the grill to look at Will. Will meets his eyes and drops the wine back in the bucket with a splash.

"Hmmm, something for you? There's some cheap chianti. I hope it hasn't turned in this heat. Could be vinegar by now." Daniel flicks the spatula at him and adds, "I doubt you'd even notice."

"Huh. You know, I could use a glass of water."

"Bottles are in the fridge. Any particular brand of that you prefer?"

Will grins and walks to the back door. The kitchen is nearly as hot as the backyard from Daniel leaving the door open.

"What? No air conditioning either?" Will laughs as Daniel turns back to the grill, waving him off.

Will ducks inside the kitchen. He's not sure what he was expecting, but the kitchen is immaculate except for the necessary ingredients of their current meal scattered on the marble counter. The walls are brick red; the floors are actually tiled, not covered in prefabricated faux tiled flooring. He can see hardwood and stone down the hall.

Will feels at home here. The colors are warm and rich. He can smell the pine cleaner Daniel must have used shortly before he arrived. Will smiles to himself as he realizes Daniel must have cleaned up a bit for his house guest. He sees the water bowls for the dogs and their leashes hanging from hooks near the door. Dog smell. Will has missed that.

He smells perfume, too. Not men's cologne. This is a distinctly feminine scent. He has smelled this fragrance before. In Daniel's office and now here. He is certain it is the same scent. He still can't place it.

Will grabs two bottles of water from the fridge and makes a mental note to ask Daniel about the perfume. He considers Daniel had another friend over earlier. Or another patient. He walks back outside and sits down at the table across from Daniel.

Will thinks he has never seen any of Daniel's other patients. There must be another exit, a privacy exit in his office. He is always the last patient of the day so he leaves the way he came in. Still, he has never seen anyone outside either. Perhaps Daniel schedules his patients this way deliberately.

"Are you going to lurk in the doorway all night?"

Daniel's voice interrupts Will's thoughts. He returns to the patio. Daniel motions for Will to turn around.

"I don't think you noticed the view from here. Take a look behind you, to the east."

Will turns and walks to the far end of Daniel's patio. He can see Florence in the distance, hazy hills beyond the city. He can make out the Arno snaking through the landscape below.

"Right in your backyard. No wonder you love it here. What's past the hills?"

"Oh, let's see. You're going past the Boboli Gardens, past Palazzo Pitti, the next town is Impruneta. You can barely see it from here on a clear day. Not today though, too humid."

"I imagine the view of the Basilica…di Santa Maria del Fiore has been the same for centuries."

"Yeah…" Daniel says softly, taking the water bottle from Will's fingers. "Your Italian is getting better. Pronunciation anyway."

Will smiles. “Thanks, but my tone is flat. I don’t think I’ll ever speak it as you do.”

“You never know. Stay here long enough you might. Sentirsi Italiano nel tuo cuore.” Daniel holds a hand over his chest and gestures with the other toward the basilica.

“Right…Italians speak with their hands. You do feel Italian at heart don’t you? You’ve lost some of your Americanisms.”

“I love Italians. They are very passionate people.” Daniel raises an eyebrow and gestures toward the table.

The ribs sit on a huge ceramic plate between the place settings. The wine has been poured. The dogs sit on either side of table with tongues hanging out.

“Ready to eat?’

Will sets the water down, points to the dogs. “No…. Are the dogs joining us?”

“Well, where else would they be?” Daniel strokes Bella’s head. “What…your dogs didn’t eat with you? How is that even possible?”

Will throws up his hands in surrender. “It’s your house, my mistake.”

Daniel cracks open a water bottle. If he’s going to drink that wine, he figures he should hydrate a little. It has to be close to a hundred degrees and the sun hasn’t set yet.

“Seriously, Will. You locked the dogs up when you ate?”

Daniel pulls out a chair and Will does the same. The both help themselves to the pile of napkins and line their laps with them. The ribs are dripping with the glaze of marinade and Will thinks there might not be enough napkins.

“I didn’t have to lock them up.” Will says, “They behaved if I was eating at the table…” Will stops speaking as Daniel drops a morsel of meat into Cara’s mouth.

“Oh, C’mon…” Will takes a gulp of wine. “Next you’ll tell me she sleeps with you, too.”

Daniel raises his eyebrows, a sheepish grin on his face. Will rolls his eyes.

“Wakes me with kisses every morning.” Daniel says lifting his glass in a mock toast. “To man’s best friend.”

Will nods his head and lifts his glass. “I’ll drink to that.”

Chapter Summary

Who is this friend of Doctor Clayton? Du Maurier had to ask.

The gait of his walk, the tilt of his head… Du Maurier feels the blood drain from her face.

“Are you alright?” the girl asks.

“Yes, No…I need a moment.” She manages, her eyes glued to Clayton’s backyard.

Chapter 23

Who is this friend of Doctor Clayton? Du Maurier had to ask.

Du Maurier lifts her head from the magazine in search of the server. Her cup is empty and though the heat is unpleasant, she does not get quite the caffeine buzz from iced coffee. The annoying bark of Clayton’s dogs resonates across the sloping green terraces.

As her eyes track up the hill to Daniel’s backyard, the clerk appears at her table and takes the oversized cup from Du Maurier’s fingers. Du Maurier barely notices as she blinks repeatedly, her breath caught someplace between chest and throat.

Clayton stands before his grill. Another young man has rounded the corner of his house trailing the dogs behind him. He raises his arm to run his hand through dark curly locks that hang in a familiar tousled way framing a familiar bearded face. He stands next to Clayton at the grill, and then walks over to the table.

The gait of his walk, the tilt of his head… Du Maurier feels the blood drain from her face.

“Are you alright?” the girl asks.

The young clerk looks up the hill where Du Maurier’s gaze is trained on two young men, one sits at a table, the other stands by a grill. Their voices do not carry on the slight breeze, but it is evident they are enjoying themselves.

Du Maurier reminds herself to breathe. The one who is not Clayton goes into the house. Clayton remains at the grill. Du Maurier blinks several times. She must be imagining it, a mild case of fatigue coupled with anxiety and alcohol and this heat.

“Do you know them?” the girl asks.

“No…” Du Maurier sucks in a breath. Her throat is unbearably dry. She reaches for the glass of water. It is wet and it nearly slips from her hand. She almost chokes on the slice of lemon floating on top.

Her server doesn’t seem to notice. Her eyes are fixed on the patio, too.

“Too bad. Because they are too cute, don’t you think? I would love to be sitting at that table right now.” She flicks her hair out of her eyes and wanders off.

Du Maurier feels sick. The heat is suddenly overwhelming. She must be ill. Her subconscious fears have finally manifested themselves into her waking existence. Clearly vodka and the Tuscan sun do not mix.

This entire ordeal with Graham has traumatized her to the point that she is hallucinating.

She must get another look if only to dispel the imminent panic attack. She thinks she is losing her mind. She looks around for the server. She tells herself to be calm. Clayton is having dinner with a friend. They are not going anywhere for the present. She must calm down and be rational.

That cannot be Will Graham having dinner with Clayton. Clayton looks like Graham. Maybe he has a brother. Clayton did say friend, however. Du Maurier swallows back the espresso and milk that gurgles in the back of her throat.

The server approaches Du Maurier with another cappuccino. “Here…Signorina.” The young girl says, balancing the large cup and saucer on her tray, “On the house. You look like you could use it.”

“Thank you. Most kind of you.” Du Maurier manages to sound polite. She eyes the fresh cup, frothy and steaming. She feels sick all over again.

Du Maurier sweeps her hair away from her cheek as the girl sets the cup down on the table. Du Maurier watches her disappear back inside. She adjusts her seat so that she sits in less exposed position. Clayton won’t notice her; he hasn’t so far, but if that is Graham…

Her mind clamps down on the panic like a steel trap. She breathes deeply and begins to sip at the hot beverage, knowing it will ground her.

The dark haired guest returns to the patio carrying two bottles of water. Du Maurier watches him open a bottle and swallow down half of it. He hands the other bottle to Clayton who has appeared at his side. He wipes his arm across his mouth and looks out over the patio. It is the face Du Maurier would know anywhere.

Du Maurier realizes Clayton does indeed resemble Hannibal’s obsession. He could pass for Graham from a distance, but not up close. Not if the real thing is standing next to him, absently tracing his fingers along his pale yellow tee-shirt just above his belt as he gazes into the distance.

Will Graham is in Florence.

Du Maurier cannot tear her eyes away from the train wreck on the patio. She feels numb.

Seeing the two of them side by side is jaw dropping. How is this possible? What kind of universe is this?

She wishes she could be invisible, but that fantasy aside, she must arrange her thoughts, prioritize the evidence before her.

His arrival in Florence suggests many possibilities.

What would Graham be doing here except…?

Hannibal. Graham is looking for Hannibal. Does Hannibal know? What was Hannibal up to?

Du Maurier sits in a stupor as time stands still and all rational thought evaporates from her mind. She cannot focus. The sight of Graham seated across from his doppelganger is too much for Du Maurier to process at the moment.

She can see the two of them clearly from her table, she watches them laughing and talking, licking fingers and gnawing at bones. Glazed fingers grab at wine glasses, and napkins graze across lips smeared with grease and sauce.

The cappuccino settles in her stomach. Her stomach churns. She realizes she has not eaten in hours. She waves for the little server to come back and orders an antipasto. She munches on the breadsticks as she waits for her salad.

She has been observing Clayton for three weeks and in all that time she has not caught even a whiff of Graham. Where does he stay? How long has he been in Florence? How did he meet Clayton?

Of course, Graham needs a psychiatrist. He is still recovering. He chose Clayton because of the dogs. And possibly the empathy. How much does Clayton know?

Clayton could not have known who she was this afternoon. He was reluctant for reasons she could not guess, but not because she was a person of interest and wanted by the FBI.

Du Maurier can see the two of them have developed a comfortable rapport. Graham actually looks healthy, at least from this distance. And he is smiling, laughing even. His entire visage changes with the laughter, like he is a different person.

If this really is Graham he either has amnesia or Clayton is one hell of a psychiatrist.

The FBI washed their hands of him. He is here alone. It is unlikely that he knows Hannibal is actually here. He has been here long enough to develop a relationship with Clayton. If Graham knew Hannibal was here, he would not waste any time confronting him. If Hannibal knew Graham was here, he would not be wandering around Florence lost in art galleries and pruning his garden. Graham has not contacted Hannibal, nor will he. He is hunting.

Du Maurier needs to know where Graham is living.

She daintily picks up another bread stick, rolls it thoughtfully between her fingers. She inserts the twist tasting of butter and garlic into her mouth and slowly licks at the crumbles of cheese as she thinks, slipping the toasted twist back and forth between her lips.

There are ways to find out. She can call the cab companies. It will take time to narrow down which company, but finding the cab that drove out to Fiesole today will not be too difficult. She has been forced to do some sleuthing in her profession before.

She takes out her phone and leaves a message for the driver to pick her up in an hour. She will go back to the estate, relax and plan. She must now rethink her entire strategy with Hannibal.

Hannibal. She cannot introduce Clayton to Hannibal now. She shudders in the chair. If she had already given that dossier to Hannibal she would have led him straight to Graham. Hannibal will most certainly never transfer the funds if he knows Graham is here.

Whether Hannibal truly intends to give Graham his gift or if he is using it as a means to find Graham is irrelevant if he learns Graham is seeing a psychiatrist an hour away from his villa.

Du Maurier stops sucking on the breadstick as her eyes grow wide. Only an hour away. What would Hannibal do if he saw Graham and Dr. Clayton together? Once Hannibal had regained his senses from swooning over his beloved’s proximity, Hannibal would be insanely curious. And, insanely jealous.

Depending on the nature of Graham’s relationship with Dr. Clayton, Hannibal might even start rummaging through his recipes.

Du Maurier tears a chunk of breadstick and chews with relish and a renewed appetite. There must be a way to get Hannibal to transfer those funds before setting him loose upon dear Doctor Clayton and the troublesome Graham. If Hannibal transfers the funds, she will have his code and be on a plane to Switzerland while he amuses himself with the boys. If not, he will amuse himself anyway and she may yet find a silver lining in the dark cloud that is Will Graham.

Chapter 24

Will can't keep his demons down. Daniel wants them out. But not like this.

Will takes the wash cloth Daniel extends to him as he hangs his head over the toilet. He wipes the cool cloth over his face and neck, flushes the toilet.

“I think it’s just dry heaves now.” He stands up a little shakily, his knees numb from kneeling on the tile.

“Why didn’t you tell me you weren’t eating meat?”

“I keep a diet log for you, don’t you read it?” Will exhales slowly feeling the flexing of his stomach muscles still reeling from the purging of its contents all over the not so white porcelain. He swallows down the frustration mounting inside. “I hoped I could keep it down.”

Daniel thinks a moment. “It’s all pasta in your log. I didn’t make the connection. I’m sorry. I should have been looking for that. What did you have at the restaurant that night, after the cops picked you up?”

“Shrimp scampi.”

“Well, it could have been the heat…”

“It wasn’t. I can’t…handle the taste.”

Will closes his eyes remembering the meals, the delicate sauces and marinades, the assortment of exotic fruits paired with equally exotic vegetables arranged with flair and distinction on the plate. But these were mere distractions from the most rarified of entrees to ever grace a table. Every cut of meat, every organ had been carefully selected and prepared with the utmost attention to detail. And so delicious the tongue screamed for more while the mind simply screamed…

Daniel is quiet. “Christ..the ribs weren’t…”

“People? Yeah, I know. I threw up because I know the…difference. I think I still expect the…other white meat.”

Daniel watches Will stand over the sink, saturate the cloth with cold water, and wipe over his face again. Will’s mental battle is not only interrupting his sleep, the battle has spilled into his gut. His body has been drawn into the war, too.

“Why do you think that’s the reason?” Daniel leans against the wall to give Will more space. It is getting really warm and close in the small bathroom. And the lingering smell of vomit is not too pleasant either.

“Because I was eating…Lecter’s cooking for weeks, and even before that. I couldn’t keep anything down in the hospital that had meat in it, and after I left the hospital, I still couldn’t.”

“Are you sure it’s not my cooking?”

Will blinks and stares at Daniel with mouth open. “Now that…was funny.” He wrings the facecloth out, shakes it and hangs it over the sink.

Daniel rubs at his face. This is not how he imagined the evening going. Not at all.

“If you’ve been on a restricted diet for months, then eating a plate full of ribs like that is bound to make you sick. You couldn’t possibly still be physically affected by your uh… former diet.”

Will gestures to the toilet.

“That…is an extension of your subconscious. Associations. Part of you wants to expel Lecter and part of you…doesn’t.”

“That is bull shit. Don’t give me that psycho bull shit, Daniel. I don’t have any parts that want to keep him.” Will grabs a towel and dries his face.

I have to deal with you. And my feelings about you. I think it’s best if I do that directly.

Will buries his face in the towel, breathes into it until he feels his fingers relax against the terrycloth. He finishes drying off his neck and sets it on the vanity. He knows Daniel can empathize with him, is empathizing with him right now. That double edged sword of intimacy carves into him again.

Daniel sees Will’s jaw locked tight. Feels Will’s anger creep along his own jaw and find its way to his limbs, twining around his own fingers. Oh, how Will loves his anger.

Daniel sighs watching Will grit his teeth. He can imagine the nasty acidic slime that must coat everything in his mouth. It’s not like Daniel had never been sick before. He had leaned over this same toilet not three weeks ago. Had it only been three weeks?

He should press the issue, right here, right now. Will had to be familiar with the psychology of what he was experiencing, the psycho bull shit as it were. Will had internalized a lot. Daniel should have noted the absence of meat in Will’s log book. Then again, just jotting down ravioli was not all that descriptive. Daniel feels awful serving the ribs. He should have known. Of course Will was emotionally affected by food.

Eating is such a tactile activity. All the senses are engaged. Taste and smell can evoke memories in ways the other senses do not. Will's memories were never far from his conscious existence at any given time. The consistency of cooked flesh on his tongue and the act of ripping tender strips of meat from bone had taken him away from the table on the patio to someplace else. Someplace Daniel could not begin to imagine.

Knowing what it was he had been eating in Lecter's dining room, contributing to the meals himself, and yet finding them flavorful and delicious had to have been utterly bizarre. A mind bending experience Daniel cannot fathom. Will was supposed to pretend he liked the cuisine, but Daniel wonders how much Will had been pretending.

Will knows. This is why he throws up. Daniel swallows the bitter saliva under his tongue. He thinks he might get sick. Will stares at him, storm clouds obliterating the blue like ink spilling from a fountain pen. That look of his is pretty disquieting. Challenging even.

Daniel looks down at his feet, thinks he might just break out the sausage for breakfast anyway. See what kind of reaction that provokes in Will. What he'd really like to do… He realizes he is empathizing with Will's anger.

Instead, he raises his head to look at Will.

"The toothpaste is in the medicine cabinet. Might as well get your toothbrush and get ready for bed. We have to get up early to leave by four."

"Four? Why so early?" Will relaxes a little. The change of topic is welcomed.

"It's a good hour and a half to Sansepalcro where the hotel is, and the guide. We have to get checked in and meet him by seven. Your notes."

"Guess I forgot."

"You still feeling ok to go?"

"Wouldn't miss it. Where did you put my stuff?'

"Living room. Here, I'll show you your room and you can get settled."

Will notes the clipped tone. He is being reprimanded for his stubbornness. Will is too tired to care. He wants to sink into bed. Maybe he is tired enough to pass out this time.

Daniel guides him out and down the hall to the guest room on the right, across from his room. The room is small not much space to contain the double bed and dresser. A large throw rug covers the hardwood floor and a single window sets over the bed. There are blinds but no curtains.

"I'm across the hall. There's another floor, but I don't go up there in summer. It's mostly storage and a work room."

"Hobbies?'

"Weights. It's nice and cold up there in winter. The basement is too damp."

Daniel pauses before clasping Will's shoulder. "You know where everything is, just make yourself at home. Bella is in her crate and Cara is already in her bed."

“I thought she sleeps with you.”

“She does. It’s her bed. I just share it with her.” Daniel smiles and walks into his room, shuts the door.

Will locates his bags downstairs, unpacks what he needs, and returns to the bathroom to ready for bed. Will is stripped down and between the sheets in no time. He notices there is no clock on the dresser. He stares at the ceiling waiting to join the grey wolf in the forest of smoke and cinders.

Chapter 25

Daniel gets a taste of Will's night life. They do manage to get on the road for their fishing trip.

Will stirs. He turns over to see Daniel. He blinks remembering where he is. Daniel switches on a light and Will is momentarily blinded.

“How’d you sleep?” Daniel asks.

Will looks him over through slits, notices the shirt; notices the sheets lay on the floor. Daniel’s empathy had evidently been effective. Perhaps too effective.

“Better than you it looks like. You changed your shirt.”

“Twice. Oh my god. How do you function?”

Chapter 25

Daniel gets a taste of Will's night life. They do manage to get on the road for their fishing trip.

Daniel is awakened by the whine of Cara from the foot of the bed. He listens and hears someone shuffling up or down the stairs. After a moment he realizes it must be Will trying to be quiet in the dark.

“Will?”

“Yeah.” Will ambles to the doorway, twists the knob and peers inside. He sees Daniel’s silhouette in the window. He is leaning on one arm as he faces the door where Will stands. Cara thumps her tail next to him.

“What’s the matter?” Daniel sits up in bed, strokes Cara as she lies tucked against his leg.

“I…can’t sleep. Got a bottle of water. Sorry to wake you up.”

“You can’t sleep? Or don’t want to sleep.”

“Can’t get one past you, can I? I do want to avoid the bad dreams, but I can’t seem to sleep anyway.”

Daniel glances at his clock. It has only been an hour since they went to bed.

“I don’t have anything here to help you sleep, not that I want you taking anything but you are so resistant it would have to be pretty potent stuff. Then, you might be too groggy to get up in a few hours.” Daniel considers the situation, wipes at his eyes still heavy with sleep.

“I have stuff at my office but it would take half an hour to drive there…Did you try, you know?” Daniel makes a gesture with his hand, the meaning quite clear even in the dim light from a street lamp outside.

“No…Is that a clinical question?”

“Yes. How often do you…”

“How often do you?”

“All the time.” He squints at Will in the semi-darkness. “We all do it. Relieves tension, works almost every time. Look, it was just a question. I guess masturbating involves a little imagination and you don’t want to go there. Am I right?”

“I’m just going to take my water and go back to my room.”

Will cannot talk about this with Daniel right now. Not with him sitting there, petting the dog in his underwear, sheets crumpled in a heap at the bottom of the bed where he has kicked them. Will blinks away thoughts of another bed, blinks away thoughts of this one, too. It would be so easy to slip in beside Daniel; he wouldn’t have to stroke himself…

Will should have known the dogs would give him away. He just wants to go back to his room and wait it out until morning. A couple cups of coffee and he’ll be good to go. He does it all the time.

“Will, I know this is awkward but I have an idea.”

Daniel pats the empty side of the bed. “Climb in. See if you can sleep here. This empathy between us might actually help.”

“How do you mean?” Will’s voice comes from the darkened hallway incredulous and certainly dubious. Daniel feels a prick of…anticipation. He imagines Will biting at his lip. Daniel thinks Will is going to be disappointed. His idea is not what he is sure Will anticipates.

“Maybe this connection works during sleep. Maybe I can be a buffer, absorb some of the anxiety, enough so you can fall asleep.”

“How would that affect you?” Will thinks of his dreams.

“I have no idea. I’m curious, aren’t you? It’s an opportunity for me to help, if I can. If not, I can stop by the office in the morning; pick up something to take along.”

I was curious what would happen…

“I don’t know…”

“Let me get this straight. You chased killers for the FBI, have done some pretty fucked up things yourself but you won’t get in bed with me because it might actually help you sleep? That makes no sense.”

“Well, when you put it like that…” Will leans against the door jamb clutching his water bottle. He takes a long drink. Gestures towards Cara licking at her paws on the bed.

“What about her?’

“She’ll move, or she won’t.” Daniel says pulling the sheet back. “You know, if you had allowed your dogs in bed with you, you’d have slept better.”

Will huffs as he climbs into bed, pulls up the sheet Daniel has rescued from the bottom of the bed. He feels Cara nestled next to his leg, still lying stubbornly against Daniel. The fifty pounds of black fur does think it’s her bed.

Will feels the heat of Daniel lying next to him and he is comforted by that. He closes his eyes and mumbles a good night. He allows the smell of surf to wash over him. He can almost hear the waves lap against the shore.

“Sweet dreams.” Daniel says over his shoulder.

Daniel rolls over to face the window. He knows Will’s dreams will be anything but. He listens to Will breathe beside him. He closes his eyes wondering what wickedness will wind its way into his own dreams.

*****

“Bella! Get away from there!”

Daniel is keeping a grip on Cara’s collar while snapping his fingers at Bella. She is growling at something under the porch. Daniel has no wooden deck and no wooden porch, but he is dreaming and his house in the dream has both.

Bella whines and scratches, gnawing at the wood to get underneath. Her paws rake along the dirt and the grass. Daniel hears the cries of some animal from beneath the porch. He tries to see but no sun can get through the boards. He doesn’t like the sound of the crying. The crying causes tingles up his spine; the hairs on his neck are alive. He can hear rustling as the animal, or animals move in the darkness. He does not like this. He wants to run but he can’t leave the dogs.

The thought that something is living under his porch bothers him; and the thought of his dogs messing with it bothers him even more. The crying is more insistent now and Bella is going wild trying to get at it or them. There is definitely more than one. Cara breaks from his hold and now she too is pawing and digging at the porch.

The loss of control sends Daniel into a panic. He does not want the dogs under that porch. He moves toward them sliding onto his knees as he tugs and pulls on their collars. His efforts prove futile.

Panic erupts, he falls back legs flailing as the dogs drag something over him in their haste to get into the yard. His revulsion and terror grow as Bella shakes the misshapen thing and begins scraping it along the concrete sidewalk. Cara follows suit, both dogs growling and scraping. The noise fills Daniel’s ears. He thinks the screaming things in their mouths will bite them, give them rabies. He sits stunned on the grass watching in horror as the dogs scrape the things until fur and blood cover the pavement. He stares at the mangled remains, mute with terror.

He wakes already sitting up clutching his Tee-shirt. It is damp. He heaves, his chest tight, as he touches the mattress convincing himself it was a dream and he is awake now. Cara shifts at his feet, lays her head over his ankles. He glances at Will.

Will is on his side, facing the closet; his breathing is irregular but not panicked. He is dreaming, too. Daniel quietly gets out of bed without disturbing Will. He exchanges the damp Tee for a fresh one. He looks at the clock. It is only a few minutes past midnight. He climbs back in bed and tries to go back to sleep.

The alarm nearly sends Daniel out of bed. He slams his hand on snooze and flops back onto the bed. His shirt is again damp. The air conditioning is cranked up to its highest setting and yet the room feels close, warm and ripe with the smell of sleep and sweat.

Will stirs. He turns over to see Daniel. He blinks remembering where he is. Daniel switches on a light and Will is momentarily blinded.

“How’d you sleep?” Daniel asks.

Will looks him over through slits, notices the shirt; notices the sheets lay on the floor. Daniel’s empathy had evidently been effective. Perhaps too effective.

“Better than you it looks like. You changed your shirt.”

“Twice. Oh my god. How do you function?”

“Not easily. Bad dreams?”

“Yeah. Whatever you were dreaming had an effect on me. Your emotions caused my subconscious to create my own nightmares.” Daniel pauses, considering the effects on Will. “But you slept better didn’t you? I mean you were able to actually fall asleep.”

“Yes, and pretty quickly too.” Will stretches and moves to sit up. He is not prepared to entertain the implications this early in the morning. He cannot consider sleeping with Daniel all the time. For plenty of reasons. Not the least of which is Daniel’s rest is disturbed, quite a lot.

Daniel mulls the implications over in his head. He stands up and turns off the alarm before it can go off again. They have to get ready and get on the road. This exchange, this connection between them invites a lot of possibilities. Possibilities that do not all focus on therapy. But, there are psychiatric applications. Daniel has to convince Will to finally talk about his dreams.

Dreams are a tool of psychology. Dreaming or the lack of dreaming has an effect on consciousness, on daily living. In Will’s case, his subconscious is linked so closely with his conscious that his dreams would be incredibly revealing. The fact that he keeps them close like his favorite emotions, tells Daniel quite a lot.

“I think most everything got packed last night. I’ll put on some coffee while you get dressed and ready. I’ll throw some stuff in the cooler and we’ll hit the road.”

“Sounds good.” Will stumbles into the bathroom first, listens to Daniel descend down the steps, Cara in tow, panting at his heels. He’ll have to take the dogs out, too. Will turns on the light. He stares at his toothbrush hanging in its ceramic holder and remembers another toothbrush, the holder shiny and metallic, he smells the scent of sandalwood.

Will sits in the comfortable leather seat of Daniel’s Mercedes. They are speeding south along on the A1 toward Arezzo. Then they will turn east to Sansepalcro where the Hotel Podere Violino is situated on the Tevere and its tail waters where he and Daniel will be fishing a few hours from now.

His initial enthusiasm had lessened somewhat, the unfamiliarity of the place dislodging him from his comfort zone, but he was still looking forward to an afternoon of peace and near quiet. He would not be alone, but being with Daniel was the next best thing. He often retreats to the stream in his mind, casting his lures, watching them float along the currents of sun dappled water. And then he hears the screech of a bird, an eagle, and its winged shadow blocks out the shimmering waters of his dreams.

Today, he will experience a very real stream in Italian waters running from Tuscany to Umbria and without the shrieking specter that stalks him.

The traffic is light given it is still very early on a Saturday morning, the sun still lurks beneath the horizon. He has been gazing out the window even though it is too dark to see anything, but he knows his lack of engagement will signal to Daniel he is not in the mood to be social.

Daniel cannot ignore the avoidant behavior. When Will wants to make a point he is not subtle. Will even wore his glasses to underscore how badly he needs time to think, to be alone with his thoughts. They have driven in silence save for the radio tuned to a local music station and turned down low.

Daniel has not attempted to lure Will out of his mind. They have the entire weekend. He wonders if that is what occupies Will’s thoughts. If the prospect of being alone together is causing the anxiety he feels from him. Getting sick all over his bathroom had embarrassed him. Sharing a bed in order to sleep had not set well with him. Discovering that he had slept better in Daniel’s bed had not seemed to please him either. Daniel can only wonder how many affronts to his dignity Will has suffered over the past year. He supposes tossing up his dinner barely registers. There are simply too many unpleasant things Will could be thinking about.

He considers asking Will to remove his glasses, but Will isn’t using them as a crutch as much as a means of communicating. He knows Daniel knows he doesn’t actually need them to see. Daniel knows he uses them to not see. Will does not want to be inundated with Daniel’s emotions this morning either.

Daniel takes another drink of coffee followed by a chaser of water. He takes out his pack of cigarettes from the console and lights up, exhales the smoke and rests him arm along the open window so he can enjoy the rush of wind on his face.

Will glances over, sniffs at the air as the smoke fills his nostrils. He cracks his window.

He watches Daniel smoke out of the corner of his eye. They have been on the road for about half an hour. In that time Daniel has munched through a granola bar, a pear, and a bag of trail mix. He had not finished the pear since it had slipped from his fingers and had rolled back under the seat.

“Wanna get that?” he had asked Will while licking juice off his fingers.

Will had merely stared back and returned his attentions to the window. Only then he had allowed himself to grin. The pear remains under Daniel’s seat.

Then, Daniel had alternately sipped at coffee, applied chap-stick, and gulped down a bottle of water. This was his second cigarette. Will wonders how much more food, drink, and cigarettes it will take to satisfy Daniel’s compulsions. He thinks there are enough snacks in the cooler and cigarettes to last the entire trip.

“That’s quite the oral fixation you have there.” Will says, finally turning away from the window to look at Daniel directly. He is immediately sorry he said anything at all.

Daniel’s’ hand pauses mid-way to his mouth. He runs his tongue along his teeth contemplating what he should say in response. He wraps his lips around the tip of the cigarette, takes a long thoughtful drag while Will waits.

“I like putting things in my mouth.” He says as he exhales making a point of not looking at Will. He can feel Will’s gaze as clearly as he can feel the amusement and the affection. He does not have to look to know Will is chewing on his lip again, prey to his own fixation.

“This is a fishing trip, right?” Will adjusts his legs pushing against the seat to lean back.

“Of course. Therapy. Wonder what we’ll catch, huh?”

Daniel flicks the cigarette out the window and lifts his coffee to his lips. He turns up the radio. Will watches the sun coming up across the Tuscan fields of olive groves and sunflowers. He thinks Daniel should be more careful with his emotions. Unless, he is prepared to act on them.

Will can appreciate the irony. He has to be in therapy to get any.

Chapter End Notes

I know the fishing trip has elicited some degree of expectation. It's coming...pardon the pun.

Chapter 26

Du Maurier engages in a little mischief. While the boys are away, the snake can play...

Du Maurier sits on a stone wall across and down from Daniel's house pretending to read a tourist magazine. She wears a head scarf to protect her face from the sun and from scrutiny.

Fiesole is a tourist attraction for those seeking a respite from the crowds of Florence. Florence relies on its tourists. There are enough of them strolling about on their way to the ruins and the museum at the very top of this hill.

She had finished her antipasto last evening, feeling much better after coating her stomach in something besides caffeine and alcohol. Before she had slipped into the back seat of the town car, she had made some helpful observations. Observations that will assist her today.

She had observed the boys, as she now likes to refer to Clayton and Graham, packing gear and duffle bags into the trunk. She had watched Clayton give instructions and a key to the neighbor living two doors down as Graham had played fetch with the dogs in the driveway. She had observed the boys clearing the mess from the table and grill, performing a little dance as they avoided actually touching each other. There was something going on between them, but she could not quite put a finger on it.

By necessity, she had been too far away to discern much more. More curious, she had also watched Graham bolt into the house, Clayton right behind him.

The boys had turned out the lights shortly thereafter.

They are clearly going on an overnight- trip to leave the dogs. The neighbor's services are the reason Du Maurier sits waiting with her tourist bag and brochure. Eventually, the pleasant looking Italian woman with the dark curls down her back and the form fitting capris will come by to feed and water the dogs and more importantly take them for a walk, disengaging the security system before she takes them out.

Du Maurier can slip inside and be gone without being noticed. She knows the woman will wait until the sun is no longer overhead to walk the dogs. She has timed her surveillance in anticipation of a late afternoon walk. The pretty little Italian will want to take out the dogs while the shadows are long, but not too late to interrupt her own plans for the evening.

It is almost five-thirty when she comes. She unlocks the front door, steps inside to the sound of barking, and moves to the wall where the security panel must be. Soon, she is out the door again trailing behind the dogs, leashes taut as she struggles to control them.

Du Maurier glances around before approaching the drive. She walks quickly, the scarf and grey jacket billowing in her wake. As she steps inside she is greeted by a very pleasantly decorated living room adorned with prints, bookshelves, and rustic pieces of furniture that complement the aged structure. Clayton has excellent taste in décor .

She notes the piano in the corner, a baby grand, old, but oiled, and she already knows, tuned. His violin case rests beside the bench. She reminds herself she does not have time to indulge. She walks swiftly to the kitchen, sees the multitude of sticky notes and receipts stuck to the refrigerator with magnets.

All too easy. Graham's address and phone number are written in block letters on a note at eye level. She takes a picture with her cell phone. The kitchen is tidy; the colors are a little too dark for her taste and it feels very masculine like the rest of the house. It is not Spartan, but a definite functional aesthetic dominates. She does not have time to ruminate further. There is one more room she wants to see before she makes her exit.

She reaches the top of the stairs and finds a small room, clearly the guest room. Graham must have slept here but perhaps not for long by the looks of the bed. It barely looks slept in. The bathroom is also tidy and smells vaguely of vomit. An air freshener sits on the toilet. The toilet is clean; but that smell is unmistakable. She decides this must be because there is no window.

Clayton's room is the only room left. As she steps inside, Du Maurier smiles as she realizes she has hit pay dirt. The bed is a mess. Two sets of boxers and several tee-shirts hang askew over the hamper. The closet has been left wide open in their hurry to leave early this morning. She notes the black hair of the smaller dog all over the bed. She wrinkles her nose. Boys…

Du Maurier walks down Via Fra Giovanni and waves to the pretty Italian woman walking Clayton's dogs as she passes by. She clicks on her phone and reviews the photos she took of the fridge and the bedroom. Her eyes flicker as she rereads the address. Of course Graham lives there. He is ten minutes, if that, from the Palazzo Pitti, the Vasari Corridor, and Hannibal.

She has to move quickly while they are gone. The boys will not be returning this evening, but they will Sunday evening. Clayton has patients Monday. She wonders which day Graham has his appointment. She imagines Clayton sees him more often than once a week.

Clayton has no idea what he has gotten himself into with Graham. No matter what Graham has divulged in their therapy Clayton cannot imagine the dynamic between Graham and Hannibal. When he does, it will be too late.

She strips off the jacket and tosses it into someone's trash. She can't have Graham anywhere near Clayton's office. She can't have him living so close to the Vasari Corridor. Hannibal spends far too much at the Palazzo Pitti to risk a chance sighting of Graham.

She throws her head back to shake off the scarf. Her blonde tresses fall along her shoulders, brush against her bare back. She stuffs the scarf into another trash receptacle. She feels liberated.

After this weekend, it won't matter which days Graham has appointments. It won't matter if Hannibal camps out at Palazzo Pitti. Graham is about to have a change of residence.

Du Maurier texts her driver to come and pick her up. She has shopping to do. At the hardware store.

Map of Florence where Will, Hannibal, Daniel, and Bedelia kill, eat, and love.

Chapter End Notes

The map (thanks Google) shows approximate locations of where the characters go in the story. Daniel's home in Fiesole would be seven to ten miles north east. On this map that would be north of the Palazzo Vecchio. Hannibal's home in Impruneta would be ten miles west of Will's place. Bedelia's home in Siena would be forty five miles south of Will's place. Hannibal lives forty miles from Bedelia. Hope this helps visualize the distances and the area.

Of course I reserve the right to transport my characters across time and space just like Bryan Fuller does.

Chapter 27

Chapter Summary

Daniel and Will spend the day fishing but eventually they have to return to their hotel suite.

Daniel already knows what Will needs. Has known for a while now. In order for Daniel to do what he does best, Will needs to be intimate with his instincts for Daniel, with Daniel. With his empathy, Daniel will draw more from the intimacy than even Hannibal, and Hannibal had been able to infer quite a lot.

trevere river hotel

Chapter 27

Podere Violino used to be a huge estate with an enormous barn and several other smaller buildings all constructed of wood and ancient stone. The buildings have been renovated and the grounds are landscaped so they blend with the natural beauty that surrounds the Tevere. It is five minutes from the tail waters where they fished today.

Will had found the Tevere remarkably similar to his favorite fishing spot at home. There were more coniferous varieties of trees than he was used to, but a stream is a stream wherever you go.

He shares a suite with Daniel; they have adjoining rooms and share a bathroom, doors from either side. Their rooms are on the first floor, they are not large but they are lavished in comforts.

Daniel is probably asleep by now, in his bed, in his room. He had even passed up wine with dinner saying he would fall asleep in his plate. Will had not doubted him. He had readied himself for bed immediately after dinner but not before thanking Will for having the sense to book a room. He had apologized for not stopping by his office for sleep medication and made it clear that Will was welcome to join him if he had trouble sleeping again.

Will had not mentioned that he had not remembered the medication either.

Will had nodded and closed his door on both Daniel and the idea. Associations formed quickly as did habits.

Daniel had not bothered to phone the main desk for a wake-up call either. Unless he had done so after retiring to his own room, but Will doubted it.

Will supposed he was not concerned about what time they returned in the morning, or afternoon for that matter. Will was not concerned either. There was nothing he had to rush back for.

His laptop was waiting for him on his desk in the little flat back in Florence. Daniel had reiterated this was therapy. No work. He had not brought any either. Will had carried his cell with him, but he needn't have bothered. It hadn't rung all day. He's not sure how he feels about that.

Will rubs at his eyes, leans his head back against the polished wood of the headboard. He is tired and he should slip down beneath the comforter, but he knows what awaits him in the darkness of his dreams. He closes his eyes preferring to let his mind take him back over the day.

Daniel is much more at home in the hotel than he had been trapesing through woods and swatting at insects. Will had averted his head many times so Daniel would not see him vacillating between something akin to satisfaction at watching Daniel struggle with the great outdoors and compassion for him. Will is not ungrateful; he knows the trip was for him. And, after a couple hours, it was abundantly clear the trip was not for Daniel.

He had tried to tell Daniel what to expect, but Daniel had been unconcerned until reality had slapped him in the face. Daniel had the mosquito bites to prove it. Will chuckles aloud. He had remarked to Daniel that he must be very tasty.

Daniel had responded that since the bugs weren't biting Will, what did that say about him?

Will had let Daniel go first in the shower. He'd hardly had a choice. Daniel had tossed his baggage on his bed and begun unbuttoning his shirt and kicking off his boots as soon as he'd shut the door. He had not given a second thought to Will standing there, gear and bag still in his hands.

Daniel could not wait to strip off the wet clothes that smelled of fish and stream and sweat. All day he had been affable as always, but Will could tell that it would be a while before Daniel stepped in a stream wearing boots and overalls again. He had tripped over his own feet on his way to the bathroom in his unabashed glee at returning to civilization.

Learning how to tie off the lures and cast the rods had not been difficult for him, he learned quickly and was coordinated enough that he hadn't sent the bait flying too far downstream or flung it at Will or their guide. Will had enjoyed teaching him, had enjoyed watching him experiment until he found a stance and casting style that worked for him. Will had especially enjoyed the closeness; of being able to stand quietly next to him without the need to fill the air with words.

Will was learning that they often didn't need words. They communicated quite well without them. He had smelled ocean and sand all day despite standing in the fresh water stream. Daniel's mist had again soothed him, a spray that came and went like a breeze across his face.

Their guide, Dominic, or Dom as he preferred, talked with Daniel in rapid fire Italian, too rapid for Will to keep up. Daniel addressed that right away. Apparently, Daniel told the gregarious Dom that Will was some kind of American fishing expert, with his own tv show, and remarked how it was shame Dom had never seen it. Dom had warmed up to him considerably. Dom spoke in English for Will and the two of them had enthused over the finer points of fly fishing.

Daniel had graciously and intentionally bowed out, allowing Dom and Will to monopolize the conversation. Dom and Will had monopolized the fish, too. Even though the air temperature had been near ninety degrees, the stream remained cool and the fish had run all day. Between them, they caught nearly two dozen trout and half a dozen grayling.

Daniel had been able to catch fish, reel them in, but they slipped away every time he tried to wrestle out the hook, all but one. He had pointed to his lone six pound trout and joked he was going to mount it.

They had let most of them go.

They had the option of cooking the remaining fish themselves, but as soon as Daniel understood that meant cleaning the trout and watching them cook over open flames while sitting around a campfire, he had almost whined in protest.

Will had stood with feet apart, smoothing his whiskers as he had faced Daniel on the bank, feigning indecision. Will had enjoyed watching Daniel pace in front of him trying to gage Will, pleading his case with large green eyes.

Will had relinquished the trout into the care of one of the sous chefs, even leaving the choice of entrée to her. She had promised they would absolutely love it, gushing over Will despite the wedding ring on her finger. Daniel was already halfway down the hall by the time Will had finished speaking with her.

Daniel had not been too tired to eat the excellent meal promised by the sous chef. Will usually enjoyed pan frying his catch in his well-seasoned skillet with only butter, salt and pepper. He would have liked cooking over a campfire. There was nothing quite so delicious as freshly caught trout cooked crisp outside so the white flakes of flesh melted on the tongue. He wonders if his skillet is still tucked under the center island where he left it.

Dinner this evening had been a treat far beyond Will's simple preparation. Trout Picasso, she had called it. The trout had been grilled and covered with cubes of assorted seasonal melons and a sauce so delectable that both Daniel and Will had cleaned their plates, literally.

Will calculates the cost of the river trip package then adds the rented rods, the guide fee, the licenses, the river fee, and the rooms. Will had used his VISA for the reservations but Daniel had proactively taken care of the rest, probably right after Will had given him the information. He hopes Daniel intends to bill Mason for all of it.

Daniel had been tired, that was true. Unlike Will, he was not accustomed to being sleep deprived and running on fumes of caffeine and adrenaline. But he had tried to make it through the day despite how fatigued he was. He had done it for Will.

He had given Will the gift of living in the moment, of being present and aware of only the stream and the fish. No dreams. No Hannibal. It is a gift Will finds most precious.

Will has had a good day. And he has Daniel to thank for it. Will would have never put the trip together himself. Daniel had to prescribe it, call it therapy for Will to do it. He admits that Daniel handles him pretty well. He has known Daniel for only a month yet it seems far longer than that. The empathy helps. Will doubts they would have this relationship without it. There is a balance to it that agrees with Will, a reciprocity rarely achieved in his experience and that too is precious.

Will resists and Daniel persists, like the ocean tide splashing upon the shore, breaking against the sand, receding only to return again. Will thinks he should stop resisting.

You are alone because you are unique.

Daniel is alone, also. And, in Will's experience, Daniel qualifies as pretty damned unique. This balance they have achieved is unique. Will does not want to upset the balance but balance is static and relationships are not static. Daniel has already crossed his professional boundaries for Will. He keeps crossing boundaries in order to preserve the balance knowing that at some point it will tip; one way or the other.

And yet, his ocean continues to break gently upon the shore while Will stands with feet firmly planted in the sand.

Will has allowed him in, but only so far. Daniel's mist envelops his mind, but does not penetrate it. Will knows it could. Daniel would feel every emotion exactly as Will feels it. He would know how every thought, every word, every touch felt to Will. Will could let Daniel know him, see him.

He sounds like Hannibal. Will's jaw tightens at the thought.

I have let you know me, see me. I gave you a rare gift – but you did not want it…

Hannibal's words sift through his mind as they always do. Strangled words spilling from a mouth stripped of its tenderness. Will sits up straighter in his bed, shoulders against the carved oak headboard and his head angled at the ceiling. His stomach still gurgles pleasantly, full of the trout and wine from dinner. He presses a hand to his stomach, allows his fingers to wander lower to caress the scar beneath his shirt.

He doesn't mind so much that the scar is so noticeable; that it mars his otherwise smooth skin, that the sight of it still surprises him. It's not the ugliness of it that he minds.

He remembers Hannibal touching him there, before.

A favorite indulgence of Hannibal's, to trace his fingers along Will's body, his eyes taking note of every tremor, every hitch of breath. Will remembers the caress of Hannibal's lips there warm and wet against his flesh, tongue sliding on his skin while strong smooth hands grasped his hips, thumbs gently pressing drawing the softest of hisses. How readily his body had succumbed to Hannibal's attentions. Hannibal had only to draw his thumb across that tender expanse of pale flesh below the navel to lift Will off the mattress, to stay Hannibal's hand and keep it there.

Hannibal was always aware of Will, as though Will were an extension of self. No sigh escaped Will's lips that Hannibal did not notice, no movement of his body too subtle for Hannibal to miss.

It is the knowledge that he cannot ever touch this scar or look at it without remembering how it got there that Will minds. That he cannot separate the pleasure from the pain.

As Hannibal intended. To wound Will; to hurt Will as Will had hurt him had not been enough. To punish Will with his empathy, knowing Will's mind would absorb Hannibal's pain as well as his own had not been enough.

He had to taunt Will as well. So that life, should Will choose life, would be forever marked by Hannibal. He had branded Will physically as though the searing damage to his mind was somehow an insufficient keepsake. Will has only to run his fingers over his ruined flesh to be reminded of him. Hannibal touches him still.

Still violent.

Still intimate.

Caressed with a blade.

The Ravenstag of his dreams had been born out of Will's subconscious blending of Hobbs and the copy-cat, with his empathy he had created a hybrid in an effort to reconcile what his conscious mind could not. Will knows his mind had created the Ravenstag, had connected him to Hannibal. Sometimes, it had merged with Hannibal, the malevolent antler headed monster of his dreams. And so, it had circled the fringes of his dreamscape while he had played the lure with Hannibal and it had finally lay dying on the floor of Hannibal's kitchen as Will had lain in his own blood, the blood of so many on his hands.

But, Will had not waded into the quiet of the stream and neither had the Ravenstag.

It had accompanied him to Italy. Will is no longer haunted by Hobbs or the copy-cat or even the Chesapeake Ripper. He has new specters to haunt him. The Ravenstag has served its purpose. He knows the large black eagle with the serpent's tail and red rimmed eyes is a creature created in his subconscious but its significance is eluding him this time. As Hannibal is eluding him.

He has always thought in images. Images accompanied by sound, by smell, by touch and taste. By raw emotion. The eagle is Will's subconscious at work, mining the forts in his skull for substance to guide him, but the destination remains a mystery. He knows the thing that squirms beneath the scar and the eagle are connected to Hannibal. He just doesn't know how.

Perhaps as he learns more about Hannibal's past, his dreams will shift as the Hannibal in his imagination shifts.

The room is cooler now and Will slips beneath the scratchy hotel comforter, pulls it up over his shoulders, rolls to his side to stare at the curtains. Hotel comforters are always scratchy it seems. Will decides he sleeps in hotels too often if he is even thinking this much about comforters.

Sleep beckons but Will stubbornly retreats to his stream, he thinks of Winston, the only one of his dogs to ever accompany him into the stream of his dreams.

Will lifts his head from the pillow with a jolt. He is not alone with the eagle either. The wolf is always with him, white and wary at first but now, it is grey and protective as Will trudges through the burnt and tortured landscape he inhabits when he closes his eyes.

Will remembers the wolf had materialized out of the mist in a dream following his initial meeting with Daniel. The landscape had been crisp clean everything covered in white snow, even the Ravenstag had succumbed to the frost bearing mist. Will had plummeted into drifts of snow as ice crystals had rained down upon him.

Will has charted his own path out of the forest of white and into the dead place he finds himself night after night. And the wolf has come with him, has stayed with him even through the Ravenstag's departure and the arrival of the serpent tailed eagle.

I feel like I've dragged you into my world.

I got here on my own. But I enjoy the company.

Will has dragged Daniel into his world, and it would seem; his dreams. I enjoy your company too much. And what does that say about me? Daniel has been a willing companion, venturing into unknown territory for his patient's sake.

Will knows how Daniel thinks, can put himself in Daniel's mind. He can see himself through Daniel's eyes, just as he could with Hannibal. Daniel believes in second chances. He believes no act is irredeemable. He believes he can help Will navigate through his storms, not as a compass, but as ballast. He has become the ready anchor when Will needs one. He is willing to be more than that.

He sees both the best and the worst in Will.

I need to know what you have been through so that together, we can ascertain what it is that you need and…if I am qualified to provide it.

Daniel already knows what Will needs. Has known for a while now. In order for Daniel to do what he does best, Will needs to be intimate with his instincts for Daniel, with Daniel. With his empathy, Daniel will draw more from the intimacy than even Hannibal, and Hannibal had been able to infer quite a lot.

Hannibal has manipulated Will's mind to such a degree that Will thinks Hannibal might know him better than he knows himself and that thought truly frightens.

But Daniel has not fabricated events. Daniel has not dulled his mental defenses nor chipped away at his resistance.

Daniel said he would not prescribe any drugs or engage in any therapy without Will's knowledge or permission. Ever cognizant of the fine lines they have drawn between doctor and patient, Daniel will not cross this line or he risks Will equating him with Hannibal. Daniel waits for Will's permission.

Will's eyes flick to the door. He thinks what a long walk it is to that door. He knows if he walks through it, he will not be returning to this bed.

Chapter End Notes

Podere Violino is a real resort hotel situated on the Tevere River. I loosely based the fishing trip around the area but I had to research the fly fishing.

Chapter 28

Will gets intimate with his instincts. Daniel is REALLY pleased with the therapy.

Will stands in the bathroom that separates his room from Daniel's, separates his life into before and after once again. He stares at his reflection bathed in the soft amber glow of the night light and wonders how he can appear no different and yet his entire being feels like it has been rearranged. Changed.

Rebirths can only ever be symbolic

You've been reborn.

Wasn't that the goal of your therapy?

Will wants to be with Daniel. He wants to surrender to the mist that sinks into his consciousness every time Daniel is near; so that it binds him and saturates every pore. Last night as he had lain in Daniel's bed, he had drifted in an entire ocean of that mist. That his own unrelenting compulsions had been overridden by the balm of Daniel's mist had surprised him.

He had not meant to wake Daniel up but he should have known the dogs would. Before getting the bottle of water downstairs, he had tossed and turned, unused to the feel of the guest bed and the smells of Daniel's house. There had been too much to process from the evening's events. Too much in Daniel's house left twisting around in his mind to distract him.

Daniel would have surmised this after watching Will comb through his office over the past few weeks.

Daniel has been gradually introducing Will to his life outside of his practice. Daniel had wanted the trip to provide the context for an initial encounter between them. A neutral location. Equally new and unknown to both of them. A place with no associations other than the ones they would impart to it, the memories they would create there.

Daniel does not want external stimuli to compound the internal. There is enough of that already. Will cannot ignore it and Daniel knows this. He has tried to arrange the most conducive environment he could manage for them.

Daniel has patiently allowed Will to warm to the idea of intimacy with him. The balance Will feels, the trust Daniel has engendered has all been leading to this. Daniel has been preparing Will for this, rather allowing Will to prepare himself.

When did Daniel become so wise?

Will exhales slowly as he turns the doorknob. His skin prickles with the blast of crisp air from Daniel's room. Will tells himself he shivers because of the air conditioning. Daniel lies wrapped in shadows cast from the lamplight outside. He has left the curtains open so that a seam of light slices over the bed.

So like Daniel to reject the darkness in favor of the morning sun.

Daniel wakes to movement beside him, a rustling of sheets, a dip in the mattress and weight settling, quietly shifting. He squints in the near darkness to find Will has slipped between the sheets and comforter. He shifts his body away from the middle to allow Will more space.

As he relaxes his body once again he feels a prick against the skin of his calf. Will must have nipped his leg. He shifts his position again. Feels the scrape of toenail again, more insistent this time.

"What are you doing?" Daniel mumbles, clinging to sleep.

"Poking your leg…with my toe." Will's voice is quiet as he states a matter of fact.

"Well, stop it."

Daniel groans, stretches his legs and cracks his ankles preparing to sink back into sleep when he feels warmth spreading below. It takes him a second to process the sudden familiar warmth and why he is feeling it. He turns to Will who is gazing at him from his pillow, blankets gathered at his waist.

"You…you don't…" Daniel is no longer squinting, but wide eyed and quite awake. He reaches out his hand to roam over Will's naked chest.

"…don't have…any clothes on." Will finishes for him as he reaches a hand up to grasp Daniel's neck and pull him closer. He presses his lips against Daniel's. Daniel bends to him, opens his mouth to receive what the alcohol robbed him of last time. His hands find Will's face, he strokes lightly along Will's cheeks and Will's mouth widens in response.

Will's kisses are deep and searching, Daniel feels the hunger, the need in Will for the solace he seeks. Need flows from Will and each press of lips bring with it an ache Daniel knows all too well. He feels the throb twine across his stomach; the wound Will will not allow to heal.

The wound Lecter inflicted has become self-inflicted. By design.

Daniel holds Will in a close embrace their lips locked together, Will's body and mind in a place he can manage. He runs his hands through Will's hair, enjoying the thickness as it glides through his fingers, notices the slight relaxing of Will's shoulders. The rhythmic massaging of finger tips on his scalp soothes away the furrowed brows, releases the awkward tension of legs still coiled concealed beneath the blankets that remain bunched about his waist.

Embarrassed he is here in the bed with Daniel. Even more so that he is without any clothes. Despite being the one who removed them in the first place.

Daniel thinks again what a contradiction Will is.

Will keeps his eyes shut. He needs to so he can focus. So he can take the mouth Daniel offers and savor the delicious ripple that sucking on his tongue sends directly to his cock. He rolls his hips as his cock swells under the comforter already too warm and close for comfort.

As Will's body grinds against him, Daniel feels the pulse of blood quicken in his limbs and rush to his groin, balls tight and cock stretching against the fabric of his boxers that presents such a thin yet frustrating barrier between them. The clothes have to go.

He pulls away. Will sighs as the withdrawal of Daniel's lips leaves him sucking air.

"What?"

"Shirt."

Daniel struggles to remove his tee encumbered by the comforter and the insufferable weight and heat of it. He flips the mountain of fabric from his body and sits up. He can't believe Will hasn't tossed the blankets himself.

Daniel reaches for the comforter and flings it aside, kicks it off the bed completely. Will glances at it on the floor for a second his fingers still grasping the sheet at his side. Daniel smiles at this. Will can keep his security blanket for now.

Daniel tugs his shirt off, lets it drop to the floor. His sun kissed skin has a luster to it in the dim light and his body feels perfect and smooth as he slips between the sheets to gather Will in his arms again. He wants Will to remove the boxers, wants Will to rip them from him in the worst way.

The mad kissing resumes as feet kick and legs entwine. Friction. Heat. Movement inviting sparks that crackle between them like flint striking rock. The promise of shattering completely.

Slow, Will thinks, slow or you'll hurt him. But need beckons; it nips, it bites.

Will is consuming his mouth still. Daniel likes being consumed. Will likes kissing. His entire body comes alive, a thermic reaction like striking a match. His mouth ignites the rest of him. Daniel decides Will's mouth was made for kissing.

Will is beside himself. Daniel tastes as warm and sweet as before, a tingle of mouthwash upon his lips instead of whiskey. Will hears gulls and echoes of waves breaking upon the shore. He feels his body loosen, give in to the warm hand that grips his neck and holds him close.

He struggles against the impulse to sink his teeth into the wet lips that graze at the corner of his mouth.

Daniel threads a handful of curly locks around his fingers. Will inclines his head, eyes closed as he folds into Daniel's hand. Daniel nudges his knee between Will's legs and smiles into Will's mouth, laughing a little as Will's thighs widen then close again tensing around the knee that presses pleasantly into his balls.

Daniel allows Will that sensation a moment before clenching the curls he holds tightly drawing the silky strands into his fist. He twists his hand around and tugs hard for good measure. Will pauses, his body stills. Daniel watches him draw breath sharply through open moist lips, waiting.

Will opens his eyes and he knows Daniel knows. Will is truly naked now.

“Fuck. I can’t let him go.” Will whispers into Daniel’s neck, “Even for this. He will still be here.”

Will pulls away, a tortured expression on his face. He rubs his knuckles compulsively along his chin, his eyes betray how wounded he is. Will turns his head to stare at the ceiling, to gather his thoughts. This is still so new, this…whatever it is has Will’s nerves on edge, jangling sharp like broken glass in his head.

Violence. Intimacy. A circle.

Impulses can be controlled with restraint and conquered with…obedience.

“Will…”

Daniel’s chest tightens at the wince Will gives him. He knew he would not be alone with Will but it bothers him just the same. There is purpose in it, however unwelcome. He looks at Will in profile beside him. Beautiful, even like this, still wretchedly beautiful.

Lecter had seduced the killer in Will through manipulation; why not seduce latent desires from him? Lecter had quite simply left nothing to chance regarding Will. At least that was the intention.

Daniel sighs, offers Will an indulgent smile. “Isn’t it fitting then, that you share him with me?”

“Daniel…”

Will looks aside, the very idea troubles him. His brows furrow with the inhale of breath and he parts his lips to speak but thinks better of it and exhales instead, defeated before they have even begun.

“Will, you can’t help it. You can’t control your empathy standing up, why would I think you can control it lying down?”

“I feel…transparent.” Will talks to the ceiling.

“Look, if he has to be here, don’t let him spoil it. I was counting on his company.”

Will lifts his head, eyes wide. Of course Daniel anticipated this. Daniel strokes his cheek and pulls him close. “Don’t think about it. Just try to stay in the moment, with me. I’ll remind you if start to drift.”

Will extricates himself from Daniel, rolls his head back to rest against the pillows, sighs and nods in resignation. He reminds himself this is therapy. This is what therapy has become for him. This… is what he has been reduced to. Will swallows the bitterness and it burns like acid in his stomach.

Daniel eases up a little along the mattress, props himself on his elbow to look down at Will. Daniel feels the poison beginning to well up.

“Ever the patient.” Will continues to stare up at the ceiling. Chews at his lower lip.

Daniel pauses, sees the hurt Will is blinking back. Feels the stinging in his own eyes. Understands. He decides quickly what Will needs.

“Would you rather call me…doctor?”

Daniel has barely asked his question before he feels himself slammed onto the mattress. He looks up at Will, lips pursed, eyes mischievous and wide in the stripe of light.

“You are as crazy as I am. Saying something like that, to me.” A smile blooms regardless.

The poison dissipates for the moment. Will flops back down and reclines beside Daniel. He buries his head between Daniel’s neck and shoulder. He wants…he wants…he wants what he cannot have.

Will needs time to pull himself together. Daniel needs a moment, too. He cradles Will’s head, and knowing his touch calms him, allows Will to draw comfort from the touching. He strokes the hair that still hangs over the back of Will’s neck. He promised to get it cut two weeks ago. As he runs his fingers through it, Daniel is glad he didn’t.

He slides his hands over Will’s shoulders, along the arms that snake around his waist. Whatever the dynamic between them, Daniel needs to know the control buttons Lecter managed to instill in Will.

He knows what he would like to do with Will, but what he would like may not yield the insight he needs. For now he decides to allow Will’s comfort level to be his guide, to let Will do what comes naturally without the added stress of meeting expectations. Conditioned or not.

That Daniel even has Will in his bed is enough.

“Tell me what you want.” Daniel says softly into his ear.

Will uncoils himself from Daniel, lifts his eyes. He knows what will calm him.

“How far does your oral fixation go?” Will offers a tentative teasing smile.

“You are clearly dying to find out.”

Will draws Daniel close, covering his mouth with kisses once again, more demanding this time, urgent. Daniel shudders against the scrape of teeth along his lower lip, gasps as Will bites down hard to pull at the tender pink flesh until Daniel can hardly stand it.

“Will…”

Daniel feels the blood rush to his brain and elsewhere as Will sucks on his lower lip. It feels incredible. Will…feels incredible. Daniel thinks he might faint if they keep this up.

Daniel is used to feeling the emotions of others in bed. It is always a challenging experience. Managing his own impulses and emotions while being bombarded with his partner’s is often tricky, but Daniel has learned to cope with the swell of emotion that accompanies sex, and certainly to use his empathy to his advantage.

Will poses an entirely different challenge. Daniel had known that first day in his office that Will was different, that he was receiving but a trickle of the flood Will kept safely inside his fortress. Will is such a powerful presence and Daniel is so attuned to him now that despite all the mental preparation Daniel thinks he might still be overwhelmed. He can only hope.

Will’s emotions roll and tumble, colliding with his own. Daniel pushes Will back so that their lips separate. Will raises his eyes to question Daniel, and immediately licks and bites at his lips.

Daniel wonders which of them is more fascinated with all things oral.

Time to find out.

Daniel tugs at the remaining blankets, yanks them clear off the bed. He turns back to Will slides in beside him and trails his fingers over the body he has been dying to touch. Will folds into his touch, yields his body up to Daniel and his own desires.

He wants Daniel to consume him so he can be swallowed up in bliss, mindless vacant bliss. He wants to consume Daniel, to sate the hunger for warm fragrant flesh that tantalizes his senses, to feel the luscious powerful rush that will come with the satisfaction of seeing and feeling Daniel come apart in his hands, in his mouth.

Daniel feels the press of Will’s hands along his sides to pause at his hips and squeeze. Daniel sucks in a breath and every muscle in his body tenses with the knowledge of what Will intends to do. He has surprised Daniel, again.

Will snaps the waistband of the checkered boxers that cling to Daniel’s hips. Takes his teeth to them, inhales the smell of soap and Daniel’s own particular maleness. Will nudges Daniel’s cock and balls through the flimsy fabric with his nose teasing Daniel and himself.

Daniel’s cheeks flush hot at the sight of Will on his knees face turned into his hips, hotter still as air, warm and moist sinks into the fabric. He closes his eyes as Will tugs the boxers off, groans with the touch of lips and tongue at the tip of his cock. Flinches in delight as Will nips at the length of him, and when Will smothers the thatch of black hair in kisses.

He caresses Will’s ears his fingers finding their way inevitably into his hair digging themselves into a mass of curls. The sensation of silk between his fingers and the velvety softness of Will’s mouth around his cock is almost too much.

He rocks in the bed legs splayed, belly up. Like prey.

He is not surprised when Will takes the length of him clear to the back of his throat.

Will adjusts his weight on his knees as he grips Daniel’s hips to steady himself. He knows Daniel likes it slow. Will takes his time, feeling the swell of his own cock pulsing between his legs.

There is a delicious throbbing that comes with the lack of tactile stimulation. As his cock hangs suspended with only the cool air to touch it, an almost painful ache keeps Will centered. He draws on Daniel harder, suck then thrust, suck then thrust…faster now.

Daniel gasps into Will’s hair, then arches backwards paralyzed with pleasure when he cums. He is vaguely aware that Will still grasps his hips, still holds his cock in his mouth as the spasms finally relent and his body begins to feel once again like itself.

Will rises from the mattress to kiss Daniel full on and deeply, hands clasping his neck from behind to press him closer still, to feel Daniel’s lips crush against his own, so swollen that they throb exquisitely with the contact.

The taste of himself on Will's lips brings Daniel back to the present fully aware Will is still waiting for his. Daniel feels his cock rigid against his leg. He nuzzles against the locks of hair that tickle his lips and nose. In a minute…

Will feels a prickle of goose bumps as the air conditioner hums and blasts beneath the window. Will sweeps a blanket from the floor and pulls it over them.

Will nestles against Daniel, allowing him the moment. He lets his fingers wander over Daniel's nearly hairless chest, so different from… He traces down to caress Daniel's smooth stomach, skin soft and damp with perspiration, the ripple of taut muscles that still quiver at his touch, not yet relaxed from the fatigue of climax.

Will can admire Daniel without feeling vain. Although their physical similarities had been disquieting at first, over time, Will does not see much of himself in Daniel at all. Daniel has his own expressions and mannerisms that define him in ways that are not anything like Will.

Better that he isn't. Will would have him no other way. How did Will ever manage to find him?

As though reading his thoughts, Daniel stirs beside him. He smooths his hands over Will's hips, pushes his thumbs into the bones so it hurts, just a little, just enough to cause Will to close his eyes and roll his tongue over his lips. Daniel takes the massage deeper into his flesh, his fingers drawing open mouthed sighs from Will.

Will rolls his head back, opens his mind to the tactile sensations that will overtake him. He awaits the sweet smelling ocean Daniel will bring so he can sink into the quiet he craves. He feels himself floating…

Until Will feels fingers at his navel and Will flinches. It's an involuntary reaction to the gentle pressing against his stomach muscles. Will grabs Daniel's hand before it can alight on the scar. He sits up.

Daniel eases Will back onto the mattress and with his free hand presses his knuckles along the line of Will's jaw to reassure, to soothe.

Will struggles against his own memory.

Blood. Betrayal. The cut…so deep…

A place was made…

Not Hannibal's hand there…Daniel's…Daniel's hand…

Will relents. This is therapy he reminds himself.

You want him to know you…see you.

Know me…see me…

Daniel feels Will's hand cover his. Will's muscles relax as Will spreads his fingers over Daniel's and squeezes. Permission. An invitation Daniel accepts.

Daniel bends to kiss Will's navel, then he nuzzles along his stomach, including the scar. He traces his lips over that, too. The scar is part of him and Daniel refuses treat it with any more reverence than the rest of Will's body. It has too much power over Will as it is.

Will relaxes with Daniel's kisses. Although no one has touched him since being released from the hospital, allowing Daniel to actually feels…good. It is because it is Daniel that is feels so…good.

He watches Daniel climb on top of him. Will sits up on his elbows shifts his weight on the mattress as Daniel shifts around on Will's thighs.

He slides backward along Will's legs, taking the remaining blankets with him. He grins at the slight shudder from Will at the exposure, to the cool air and Daniel's gaze. He pauses and raises a brow in surprise.

"Not circumcised, huh?" Daniel murmurs quietly as he stares up at Will.

"Louisiana…" Will mumbles.

Daniel crouches on his knees and runs his hands along the inside of Will's thigh. Feels Will's muscles tense in anticipation. He spreads Will's legs wider so he can sit comfortably between. Trim and well-muscled, Will paints a lovely picture on the bed.

Drowsy half-lidded eyes peer at him through that tousled mane of curls. He's simply maddening. Daniel's cock stiffens just looking at him. This is of course compounded by Will's emotional response.

Daniel moves his hands along Will's thighs - watches the ripple of pleasure it causes. With one hand he cups Will's balls, tumescent and warm - swollen silk at his fingertips. He slips his fingers lower to stroke the pucker of flesh beneath. A soft gasp as Will squirms but allows it. Daniel moves his hands down Will's thighs again, begins to kiss along the inside, to tease as his lips move slowly up, ever so slowly.

Will tilts his hips. The touch of Daniel's lips on the inside of his thighs, up one side and down the other sends tingles up his spine. His mind drifts until he feels fingers pressing at the base of his cock then the cool sweep of tongue and lips along its length. Daniel rests one hand on Will's pelvic bone to steady himself. He leans over and bites at Will's skin to make sure Will is still in this room, with him.

Will arches his back grips either side of the mattress. Daniel rewards that breathtaking sight with another scrape of his teeth along the tender flesh just below Will's navel, he bites, sucks feeling soft skin and hair fill his mouth.

Will clenches the sheets in his fists, twisting so tendons rise like cables up his arms.

With the other hand Daniel grasps Will's cock lifts it from the thatch of dark curly hair and rubs his thumb across the tip, enjoying the shudder it elicits from Will. He gently peels back the foreskin, Will trembles immediately, his breath catches and he holds it while Daniel's thumb circles the slit.

Daniel licks along the sensitive slit, his tongue perfectly rough and the charge is electric, it nearly sends Will off the bed.

The sensitivity is both exquisite and torturous. Will takes measured breaths as Daniel takes him in his mouth, slides his tongue on the underside allowing the tip to graze deliciously against the roof of his mouth. Will grabs at the sheet whining quietly it feels so good.

Daniel's hand cups his balls just the way he likes and he rolls his hips thrusting his length further nudging harder against the back of Daniel's throat. Will is so undone he can't think.

Slow gentle strokes alternate with frenzied thrusting. Will is almost there.

Daniel knows Will is about to burst at the seams. Will's breaths are ragged, tinged with soft cries as Daniel brings him ever closer. Will is panting now, his cock rigid. Daniel stops sucking, and much to Will's dismay, lets Will's cock slide out so that it lay slick and hard against his stomach. Daniel wipes the drool from his lips wets his fingers.

Will watches wide eyed as Daniel takes Will's cock back into his mouth, and the wet fingers disappear between his legs. Will feels Daniel slip one finger inside. That's all it takes really. Muscles clench in pleasure that spreads like heat. The pressure in his cock is unbearable.

Daniel curls his finger, a stretch, a press…

Will breaks.

Daniel feels Will's cock tremble then jerk in his mouth. He sucks and licks enjoying the sobs that rip from Will as his body succumbs.

It is only when the spasms have left him trembling and damp upon the twisted sheets that Daniel lets Will's spent cock slip from his mouth. He wipes his face with the sheet and stretches out beside Will on what is left of the bed.

"You uh, really tore this bed up." Daniel says, "I think there's a charge for that."

"They can bill me."

Will pulls Daniel down to him, kisses him deeply eyes cast down, seeming embarrassed suddenly by his display of affection.

Daniel strokes his fingers along the scruffy cheek, nuzzles Will's hair. He doesn't have to say anything. And neither does Will. He presses his lips to Will's head before gathering up the mess on the floor. He sorts the blankets, decides to leave the scratchy comforter on the floor, and makes up the bed quickly.

He throws the blankets over Will and climbs in. Will's eyes are closed, but he turns toward Daniel and nestles deep into the pillows. Daniel turns to lie on his side to face the window. After a moment he feels Will at his back, forehead pressed between his shoulder blades.

Will feels like he is floating. Floating on a sea. And there is nothing for miles, for as far as he can see.

Chapter 29

Du Maurier sets her plan in motion and Will and Daniel continue with therapy.

Slowly, he relaxes into the curve of Will's body. He breathes deeply into his pillow as Will breathes deeply into his neck.

As he hugs Will closer Daniel realizes there are no lines he would draw between them, no barriers he would not cross for Will. And this thought frightens him. As exhilarated as he feels right now, he knows Will's darker side remains and that Will has suppressed that part of himself for Daniel.

Chapter 29

Du Maurier sets her plan in motion and Will and Daniel continue with therapy.

Du Maurier is uncomfortable. She is uncomfortable because sweat trickles down the back of her snug black body suit to pool around the crack of her shapely derriere. Her hair is wound tightly around her head and stuffed into a baseball cap. She does not even know, remember, or care which team's logo is embroidered along its rim. She knows that it shields her face and keeps errant evidence from falling onto the floor of Graham's suite.

The uniform she wears stretches tightly along her back but she does not have to wear it much longer. She will discard the stained jumpsuit and utility belt as soon as she drives the cleaning service's vehicle back to the company garage where Signoria Talmo naps quietly in the trunk of Du Maurier's rental car wearing only bra and panties. She will awaken later, fully dressed and hunched over the steering wheel of her work van, drooling and wondering how she fell asleep in the middle of her shift.

Du Maurier must hurry if she is to download the contents from the hard drive of Graham's laptop. She has searched for a flash drive but found none. He either keeps it with him, or doesn't bother with one. He may upload files to some virtual storage, but his internet history will be written into the hard drive and therefore, accessible.

She waits as the laptop boots up. It is password protected of course. She slips a device into one of the USB ports and waits for the decryption program to upload.

Her jaw tightens and she gasps aloud as the screen erupts in a stream of white on black numeric code that flashes rapidly before her eyes. She has tripped something and the hard drive is wiping itself clean. She has now effectively rendered Graham's laptop useless.

She closes her eyes and shakes her head from side to side. This used to be easier, she tells herself. Perhaps she has become complacent. Whatever the reason, it does not matter. At least if she has no access to the information in this computer, neither does Graham. Until he secures another one.

Whether he has copies of his files or not she cannot know and whatever he has learned about Hannibal is lost to her. She cannot worry about it now. She is no worse off than she was before. She cannot feel loss over something she never actually had in the first place.

She leaves the laptop to its fate. At least Graham will never know it was tampered with. When she is finished, there will be no evidence of that, or much else in his suite.

She acknowledges there is not much else in the suite. Graham lives simply with few luxuries. His belongings are easily accounted for in drawers that slide open easily to reveal his clothes folded and arranged neatly. A nearly empty bottle of whiskey sits next to the equally empty refrigerator. Glasses, tumbler, and plates sit washed in the drain board. Utensils are clean and set upon a towel folded in half next to the sink.

The bed has been made in Graham's particular exacting way, blankets tucked just so into the mattress. Even the bathroom is spotless, accoutrements all arranged according to need. Form follows function. Tidy. Accessible.

Everything in its place. Just like Hannibal. Except for the ostentation. There is no room for pretension with Graham. His accommodations are as modest and unassuming as he is. Despite the prestige of living on Via dei Benci.

She opens the main door to his suite and checks the hallway. She slips the bag of tools over her shoulder. Ensuring that she has not been seen within the narrow confines of the palazzo's passages, she makes her way to the basement where the laundry room is. And the circuit breakers.

****

Will opens his eyes to a wide strip of sunlight streaming through the curtains that is almost blinding in its brightness. It takes him a moment to recognize the hair sticking out from beneath the blankets is dark brunette like his own, not silken strands of dark ash blonde. The room is not bathed in the blue and cream he expects to see when he awakens to weight in the bed next to him. Hannibal's face is not gazing at him from the other side of the bed, dark eyes still hooded with sleep and mouth creased with the curious smile Will knows Hannibal reserves only for him.

Neither is the sunlight streaming through the window over the silhouette of Hannibal sitting in a chair with charcoal pencil and drawing pad, robe open to furry navel revealing his muscular chest, its satin edges trailing along the carpet.

Are you sketching me, Doctor Lecter?

Yes, I'm almost finished. Would you mind lying back as you were…please.

He groans and tries to put the images of his dream behind him. He presses his head into Daniel's back where he's lain the entire night. His body is dry and so is his hair. No damp curls pressed onto the pillows, no sweat soaked sheets to drag off the bed. Just as he had awakened in Hannibal's bed.

Daniel stirs and reaches a hand around to grab a handful of Will's hair and he tugs gently. He feels Will pressing against his back. He stretches out and turns over to find Will still coiled comfortably beside him. It is a sight Daniel would like to see every morning. His heart hitches in his chest and he smiles helplessly as the now familiar sweet ache spreads from his chest to his face.

It has been a long time since Daniel has felt this particular kind of ache. This aching that threatens to overwhelm him and short circuit every synapse in his brain that screams stop.

Will lifts his head to offer Daniel a smile. He immediately feels Daniel's mouth on his and all rational thought leaves his mind. He thinks of nothing else but the assault on his senses, the feel of soft wet lips against his own, the press of naked flesh against his own, of hair tangled around fingers.

Together, they roll and tumble on the bed, gently at first as senses and limbs acclimate and then more forcefully as their bodies entwine, movements synchronized each attuned to the other.

Will doesn't have to tell Daniel what he wants this morning. Daniel wants the same thing. Hard. Rough. Fast. He feels the slickness of Will's cock rub erect against his, and doubts Will would last long in his mouth. He knows he wouldn't. He's about to cum himself. He imagines if Will is feeling what he is, and Daniel is pretty certain he is; the barest of touches will set him off.

Will feels the glide of Daniel's tongue slide wet and warm over the tip and he groans as Daniel takes the length of him inside his mouth. He thrusts wildly, feels the delicious swell as his cock touches the back of Daniel's throat and his body shudders with tremors from the release.

Daniel groans beside him at about the same time. Will slips out of Daniel's mouth and curls up on the mattress, body still twitching. Daniel's hands are between his legs as he rocks into the disheveled mattress and twists of sheet and blankets.

Daniel can't get enough air. But the spasms of pleasure between his legs radiate throughout his body, the throbbing pulses are so intense he can't do anything but whine into the pillow. He feels Will pressing into his back again, arm over his shoulder pulling him close.

Slowly, he relaxes into the curve of Will's body. He breathes deeply into his pillow as Will breathes deeply into his neck.

As he hugs Will closer Daniel realizes there are no lines he would draw between them, no barriers he would not cross for Will. And this thought frightens him. As exhilarated as he feels right now, he knows Will's darker side remains and that Will has suppressed that part of himself for Daniel.

Daniel is frightened because he fears he will not be able to refuse Will anything when that dark side emerges from the shadows in Will's mind. Daniel has also done something he promised himself he would never do. He has fallen in love with his patient.

Will revels in the peace and contentment that seem to flow from Daniel, as though the mist has descended on him. His body is drenched in it as he clings to Daniel in the warmth of the sunlight. He knows this feeling will not last. It can't. But he can enjoy it while it does.

****

Will sits across from Daniel at their table in the dining room of the hotel. They have already checked out and packed the car. They will finish breakfast, albeit more like brunch, and be on their way back to Florence and Fiesole.

That is, if Daniel ever finishes eating his breakfast. Will feels like they have been sitting here for hours. Will looks at his watch, sees Daniel is not wearing his.

“Where’s your watch? Don’t you usually wear one?”

“Yeah, I seem to have misplaced it. Probably lost it at the pool. Shit. I forgot to call about it.”

Daniel pushes his French toast around the syrup that covers his plate. He can feel Will staring at him as he pokes at the remaining piece of bacon. He saturates it with syrup and lifts it to his mouth, eyes still focused on his plate. He wishes Will would stop staring at him.

Will winces at the thick glaze of syrup on Daniel’s plate, just looking at it makes his teeth hurt. He had no idea a human being could consume so much sugar as Daniel had this morning. The pools of syrup he had poured over his French toast had drowned his eggs and bacon as well. Several packets of sugar had found their way into his coffee and he had quaffed down a large glass of orange juice. He had also smothered everything in butter.

Will had eaten a pretty hearty breakfast himself. He knows the reason for his appetite this morning. It sits right across from him.

Will is acutely aware Daniel has eaten his breakfast without looking up. He has talked between mouthfuls, but Will has been unable to catch his eyes since they sat down in the dining room. Will sets his coffee cup in the saucer and helps himself to another of the anisette muffins from the basket of pastries that sits between them. He is not used to avoidant behavior from Daniel. He had been fine in their suite.

“Daniel, you haven’t looked at me since we sat down. Come to think of it, you have hardly looked in my direction since we left the room.”

“And drawing attention to the fact is not going to change anything. I’ve noticed you aren’t looking around much either.”

Daniel waves at their server across the room. She nods and raises a finger to let them know she’ll be right over.

“You know why I don’t. What’s your excuse?” Will wipes his mouth with the napkin and tosses it aside.

Daniel sighs and shakes his head.

The sex had been incredible last night. They hadn’t been awake for five minutes when they went at it again this morning. Will has to know how he feels.

Daniel has been feeling quite contented all morning. In fact, he feels extremely contented at the moment since he senses Will’s emotions, too. Daniel cannot even think of a word that quite captures what it is he feels as he sits across from Will, but he does know he doesn’t want whatever it is to manifest all over his face in the dining room.

Daniel sets his fork down and lifts his head to finally look at Will. Will notices now that the faint blush of color along Daniel’s neck and across his cheek is not sunburn from yesterday. Of course. He should have realized Daniel was having a little trouble keeping a lid on his emotions.

“Daniel…” he begins.

“I haven’t stopped grinning since I got out of the shower. If I look at you, here, everyone in this room is going to know that…shit, Will. Just leave it alone.”

He grins at Will before ducking his head to look sideways at the server who is quickly approaching their table.

Daniel slips his credit card to the young server. With the other hand he retrieves his car keys from his pocket.

“Ready to hit the road?”

“I’ll just go wait in the car.” Will says as Daniel tosses him the keys.

As they speed along the interstate Will glances in the rear view mirror. The police car is following them again. Will had thought it had turned off a few miles back. He leans forward to check the speedometer.

“You want to drive?” Daniel asks him.

“No…just checking your speed. You, uh…like driving fast.”

“I do. Are you sure you don’t want to drive? You would love to drive this car, admit it.”

Will smiles. He would. But not with that cop behind them.

“You do know that cop has been following us for a while now.”

“Yeah…so?’

“So maybe you should slow down. I’m sure the speed limit isn’t eighty-five. Italy or not.”

“You didn’t complain on the way down. I drove just as fast yesterday.”

“I’m not complaining.” Will says, clearly irate that Daniel even suggests that he is, “There wasn’t a cop yesterday.”

Daniel likes how easy it is to piss Will off. He gets edgier every second. Daniel presses his foot on the gas pedal. The speedometer climbs up a few more miles per hour.

“He’s going to pull you over, Daniel.”

“What’s the worst that can happen? So I get pulled over. He gives me a ticket. I bribe him or I pay it. I drive off. It’s not like there’s a body in the trunk.”

He sees Will’s head snap to look over at him, eyes wide and lips parted.

“There’s not a body in the trunk, is there, Will?”

Will’s mouth falls open, but he manages a response.

"Not today." Will says mildly as he rubs his fingers along his nose, “You really are about as fucked up as I am, aren’t you?”

“Getting there.” Daniel says, grinning. Daniel thinks Will should laugh more often. His entire being lights up when he does. Will’s usual expression is so often as somber as his thoughts.

He eases off the gas and looks in the mirror. The flashing lights switch on and the siren blares from behind. Daniel hits the brake and begins to guide the Mercedes off road, but the police car swerves and passes them on the left. It speeds off down the highway, and disappears completely from view.

Daniel almost sighs in relief, but Will would enjoy that too much. He sneaks a look at Will anyway. Will gives him a sidelong glance, but says nothing. They are both startled by the ringing of a phone.

It is Will’s phone chime going off indicating a text message. He clicks on it to see it is from one of the twins. He pauses before reading it, preparing himself for the entirely different mindset he requires to deal with news of Hannibal.

Daniel watches Will read, observes the subtle changes in his features, the setting of lips and the tightening of his jaw suggest that the message must be about Lecter. He supposes he should be grateful Will hasn’t received any messages before now.

“Good news?” Daniel asks after Will has put the phone back in his pocket.

“I suppose good is a relative term. You sure you want to hear this? It’s about…Lecter.”

“If it affects you I should hear about it, don’t you think? I am in the loop now.”

“I suppose you are. I asked my source to investigate Lecter’s background. No one knows anything about him before he came to the U.S. Well, my source says to check my email for some files and that they are currently in France following up leads there.”

“France?”

“That’s what they said.”

“Who’s they?”

“A brother and sister who are employed by my benefactor, Mr. Verger.”

“Right. So, are you going to open up the email?”

“I can’t with this phone. I’ll have to wait until I get back and check from my laptop.”

“I’d like to know what they found out if that’s ok with you.”

“Daniel, I don’t want to pull you into this any further than you already are. Discussing the past with you in therapy is not the same thing as being actively involved in the present.”

“C’mon Will, anything you learn will change your perspective. You wanted someone to bounce ideas off of, an anchor. Well, here I am.”

Will knows Daniel is right. Whatever he learns about Hannibal will find its way into therapy somehow. Wills seems to tell him everything any way, eventually. He smiles to himself at this.

“I’ll send you what’s there when I open it. I have no idea what they found, so I’ll be as surprised as you.”

“Maybe I can offer something to actually warrant the outrageous fees I’ve been charging Mr. Verger.”

Will laughs and raises his brows at Daniel. “How expensive are you?”

“Is the therapy helping?”

“I think so, yes.” Will smiles again and wonders at how easily Daniel can tease smiles from him.

“Then don’t worry about it.” Daniel says, eyes on the road. “Since we can’t look at the emails until we get back, do you mind if we talk about some other issues with regard to your uh…therapy?’

“Let me guess…”

“At least I have a frame of reference now.”

Will thinks Daniel only thinks he has a frame of reference. He’s still on the appetizer.

Daniel continues to stare at the windshield. He knows it will be easier on Will if he doesn’t look at him. Will needs a buffer, he needs the illusion of privacy even if he is aware Daniel feels every emotion that flickers across his face or flashes beneath the surface.

Daniel takes out his cigarettes. He knows Will watches as he lights one, takes a long drag off it and sends a puff of smoke trailing up to the roof before the wind pulls it out the window. He waits.

Will thinks a cigarette looks pretty good right about now. Once he smells the smoke, he is certain he would like one. He breathes in deeply, and sighs knowing he shouldn’t indulge. He’s been doing so well. Daniel hands him the pack before he can even ask for it.

“What kind of doctor encourages smoking?” Will says he lights up.

“Smoking is maybe the least objectionable behavior I encourage with you. Professionally speaking I should just throw my license out the window right now.”

Will laughs at the remark but he knows a part of Daniel still wrestles with recent decisions…and impulses. Welcome to the club… He inhales and feels the rush of nicotine sink right into his brain, feels his body relax.

“I didn’t bring my notes so I’m kind of winging it here, but I have a pretty good idea of what I see as the primary issue that needs to be addressed.”

“You make it sound so clinical.”

“Sorry. Will, I know what twists you up the most. And everything else pretty much falls under that umbrella. That’s the anger I feel from you. Then there’s the regret and the guilt. We can’t even get into all that self-recrimination until we talk through the anger.”

“You think I shouldn’t blame myself for my own actions?”

Daniel feels the temper already bubbling inside. “Depends on what actions you are referring to. But…”Daniel pauses and looks at Will who is staring back intently, tempest rising in the sea of blue.

“But…we aren’t going to talk about that right now. We are going to discuss your feelings about Lecter. At least we’ll try.”

Will lets out a long suffering sigh. He leans back against the seat flopping against the headrest.

“Go ahead.” Will waves a finger through the air.

“Let’s clear the air. I want you to have no illusions about what I think is going on in your head.”

Will waits, not sure if he likes Daniel’s sudden change in tone.

“You hope that Lecter’s conditioning is responsible for your impulses, your urges in the bedroom. That becoming intimate with your instincts was all part of the lure.”

“What do you mean, I hope…?

“Let me finish. You hope because you want to believe your sexual responses were the result of manipulation while you were suffering from the encephalitis, that he took advantage of you…”

“He did. He abused my trust.” Will takes one more drag off the cigarette before flipping it out the window.

“You wonder how much of your performance with Lecter was you playing bait, and how much… wasn’t. And this is compounded by the knowledge that Lecter had the opportunity to manipulate your mind and your feelings.”

“Yes. But I don’t understand…”

“You want to believe all this because if you were conditioned for the sex, you were conditioned for the violence as well. That becoming intimate with your instincts was guided by Lecter at every turn.”

“You think I’m looking for a pass on this? Looking for a way to not feel responsible?”

“No, no. It’s way more complicated than that. If you believe that Lecter manipulated your feelings, your impulses, to such a degree that you were not acting of your own free will, then your hatred is valid and your vengeance is righteous. You want to believe that more than anything.”

Will is silent, jaw working a mile a minute. Daniel continues, knowing Will has to hear it.

“You could even live with that as the sacrifice you made to play the lure. No one made you seduce Lecter. You went into the game you played with your eyes open. Whether or not you blame Jack for pressuring you is another matter…”

“Jack had his own crosses to bear at the time. I am not without compassion for him.”

“How Jack dealt with the cards he got is on Jack. I’m talking about you.”

“Daniel, I am responsible. That I thought I could out think him, out maneuver him, cost everybody.”

“You think you deserve to pay more than you already have? Will, if you believe Lecter’s conditioning enhanced what was already there inside you; that means you are more like him than you want to admit. And this scares you.”

Will looks out the window. “I’m listening.”

“It also means that you can’t blame him for your impulses. It raises the possibility that you are a bad person. You have thought of this this already, and that’s why Lecter could gut you in his kitchen and why you never thought to raise your gun.

Will is staring at him, eyes wide and fists clenched at his sides. He sees Daniel looking at him. He glances down and slowly unclenches them. Daniel flicks his cigarette out the window.

“You have killed so you must be bad. Lecter kills so he must be bad. You won’t forgive yourself because that would mean you can be both good and bad at the same time, and if you allow that for yourself, you have to allow it for Lecter, too. And you don’t want to. Hating him is so much easier. Forgiving yourself might lead to forgiving him. And with forgiveness comes understanding. You aren’t ready or willing to go there yet.”

“You want me to see good, in Hannibal?”

“If it helps you see the good in yourself, then yes.” Daniel notes that this is the first time Will has slipped and called Lecter by his first name. He thinks this is significant. A turning point for Will… maybe.

Daniel can feel the anger and the confusion emanating off Will in waves. “No.” Will says, “I can’t accept that.”

“What?”

“I smoke. That’s bad. I eat healthy. I go to the gym, but I still indulge in this habit that is really bad for me. It is going to kill me someday. But, I enjoy it. I am a contradiction.”

“Smoking is not killing people. Bad analogy.”

“Not really. Everything is relative. Good and evil are relative. Am I bad because I smoke? Am I good because I don’t kill people?”

“We were talking about conditioning. Conditioned responses. I wasn’t aware of the conditioning.”

“There are different kinds of conditioning. Some we can be aware of, some we don’t have to be aware of. You have been subjected to both. Awareness changes everything. Conditioning in itself is not a bad thing.”

“Will, there is no reason to pick this apart technically. We both know how conditioning works. We all are products of conditioning in one way or another. Your responses to sex are partly a product of conditioning, as are mine. Of positive and negative reinforcement. The difference is your responses are specific to an individual, not learned over time from multiple partners."

Will shifts in his seat. He turns his head back toward the window, watches the fields roll past in a blur of green, yellow, and orange against blue sky. He could drift right now; let the sound of Daniel's voice roll past him like the fields of sunflowers…

He feels Daniel's hand on his thigh, feels the press of fingers willing him to stay in the present. He swallows and squeezes Daniel's hand, lets it rest there.

If Daniel has to keep his hand on Will's leg to keep him from drifting off the entire trip back home, he will.

"But Will," Daniel continues, "…your responses are also genuine. They are yours. What really concerns you are Lecter's intentions. You have to ask yourself what it is he wanted from you. The conditioning was a means to achieving that. Move past all the things he did to you, and the things he did to everybody else, and figure out what those things tell you about the man."

Of each particular thing, ask: What is it in itself? What is its nature?

"Think about what he does, beyond the obvious of killing people and eating them." Will says.

"Yeah…I'm sure you have puzzled over his pathology quite a lot. What did the Ripper do? And why did he do it?"

"We discussed this already. Lecter is not the Chesapeake Ripper anymore."

"No, he isn't. He evolved…didn't he?"

"Yes, yes he did. What are you getting at?" Will sits up in his seat. So many ideas and images churn and tumble through his mind he can't keep up.

"Think about it. Take your time." Daniel lifts his hand from Will's leg.

Daniel sees Will's eyes cloud up, sees the familiar tic along the lower lid as lashes flutter shut. He gives Will his space. He has no idea what Will is thinking about, but Will is engaged and interested and that, he believes, is a good thing.

Will can retreat and think for the rest of the ride back. They can revisit all this as much as they need. The important thing is that Will is thinking about it and in ways that haven't occurred to him. They should be arriving in Florence in less than half an hour. He'll let Will zone out and wake him when they get to his place off Via dei Benci. Will will likely appreciate being alone with his thoughts in the solitude of his own place.

Chapter 30

Hannibal retreats to his memory palace and he receives an interesting phone call.

The doorbell had chimed softly just as the kitchen clock clicked to seven. Hannibal’s hands had paused over the sink an involuntary response to the chime, but the flush of warmth beneath his sweater had been in response to his visitor.

“Hello, Will.”

“Doctor Lecter.”

Hannibal had not been surprised Will had erected boundaries upon walking through his kitchen door. The illusion of formality would soothe muscles already alert and agitated, aware of the nervous energy vibrating in the air, every molecule charged with anticipation.

Chapter 30

Hannibal retreats to his memory palace and he receives an interesting phone call.

vetruvian man da vinci

Vitruvian Man, Leonardo da Vinci, 1487

And there was infused in that brain such grace from God, and a power of expression in such sublime accord with the intellect and memory that served it, and he knew so well how to express his conceptions by draughtmanship, that he vanquished with his discourse, and confuted with his reasoning, every valiant wit.

So Hannibal had quoted Giorgio Vasari on the genius of Leonardo da Vinci earlier today as he had taken his small group of professors through the wing of the gallery where Leonardo’s sketches were on display. The passage has run through Hannibal’s mind all afternoon as he has tended his garden that lies beyond the pool behind his grand villa. In complete solitude.

And there was infused in that brain such grace from god…

What he has is pure empathy…It’s an uncomfortable gift, Jack.

He bends the stem toward him gently so as not to break the tender green shoots or to cause the delicate yellow buds to come loose and fall thus depriving him of the lovely fruit. Snip. Another brown and withered leaf falls to the sun ripened earth. Hannibal gathers it up from the soft soil and slips it onto the page of newspaper he uses for his pruning.

He wipes a lock of hair out of his eyes, unused to the length still. Trickles of sweat run along his jaw, drip from his chin, indeed his entire head is moist on this excessively warm day in Impruneta. The day had not started out so warm, muggy certainly, but the cool dew of early morning had given way to blistering heat.

The blistering heat is the culprit wreaking havoc upon his garden daily, the reason Hannibal rests upon his knees plucking the dead from the living every afternoon. Snip. He watches the silent descent of the leaf as it settles to the earth.

Nature always wears the colors of the sprit Emerson had said. If that is so thinks Hannibal, the spirit is cloaked in contentment today. It is within the refuge of his garden that he finds some semblance of his former life. A garden invites wildness among the brick and stone and metal and glass of human existence. Here, Hannibal can truly enjoy his sanctuary.

His villa is not only a sanctuary from the agencies that would wrest him from this life, it is a sanctuary from the jungle of concrete and stucco beyond his walls. It is within Hannibal's walls the best of humanity dwells. And where the lesser of god's creations become sustenance for the worthy.

FaurePie Jesu plays softly; the plaintive tone of the requiem seems to rise from the ground to serenade nature herself. For Hannibal, gardening is an act of creation. He summons life with each caress of his fingertips upon the tender leaves and delicate blooms. And god saw that is was good, smiles Hannibal.

Hannibal loves the aroma of his tomato plants. He inhales deeply the distinct scent, fresh and clean through nostrils attuned to the most subtle notes of any fragrance. These are his plum tomatoes, his pride and joy. Meaty and firm they provide the perfect consistency for the myriad of Tuscan, Neapolitan, and Sicilian recipes he has prepared over the past year.

They are also quite perfect as they are, sliced on a bed of baby spinach and basil interspersed with thick creamy white slices of mozzarella cured in crushed pepper and olive oil. Seasoned with just a dash of sea salt, the taste of cool slippery meat and pearlescent pools of pulp melt on the tongue.

He clips a few more wilted leaves before moving on to the next plant. His fingers squeeze the plump red fruit and he selects the ones he wants. He thinks he may have to resort to canning a fair amount this season as he gazes at the basket at his feet. An exceptional harvest this year due in large part to the many hours he imparts caring for his crop.

Du Maurier is to join him for a late supper Monday evening. She has been in Fiesole with her patient, but needs to tend to a few other patients around Florence before driving back to Siena to recuperate. Her patient, the daughter of the winery owner, is apparently quite the handful. Hannibal wonders what particular insights this patient has the misfortune of providing Du Maurier.

As Hannibal understands it, this Lydia has been under Du Maurier's care for as long as they have been in Florence. And she has suffered two relapses, most recently a suicide attempt. Hannibal had been surprised Du Maurier had resumed practicing psychiatry here. She tended to avoid temptation.

Ah, but the mind must be stimulated. In Baltimore, she had limited her psychiatric experience to the academic, providing peer reviews for colleagues and stopping in as a guest speaker to the surrounding colleges on the east coast. She is afforded no such prestige here, and even if she wanted to indulge her more academic proclivities, their current situation precluded attention of that sort.

His position at the Uffizi is discreet. He is one of many professors and art historians intensely involved in their research and nearly disconnected to the modern world. For them, the past is the present. Because his tours and lectures are reserved to the few and the privileged and he has little to no contact with the public, Hannibal moves with anonymity through the galleries of the Corridor.

Hannibal moves with anonymity every day. Groceries are delivered. His few needs purchased on the internet are also delivered to his door. He feels invisible in his solitude. He paces through the finely furnished rooms of his spacious villa in solitude. He simply paces.

He thinks of da Vinci, who would most certainly have found worthy inspiration here in his garden. Leonardo's drawings of animals, both real and imagined had been the topic of his seminar today. As his guests had scrutinized the faded charcoals upon the aged and brittle parchment Hannibal had wondered how many dead creatures had found their way into Leonardo's workshop.

Leonardo's love of nature, especially animals extended even to rejecting meat. He was vegetarian by choice, an anomaly for his time. He bought birds, frequently sold as food not pets, to set them free. Hannibal had noted the volume of work that had survived the centuries. Leonardo's detailed drawings captured the living essence of birds, horses and…dogs.

Leonardo had maintained that no species of animal ate its own kind, except humans. His remarks had been prompted by Vespucci's recently published tales of cannibalism in the New World, but the comment was inclusive of all life. A true pacifist, Leonardo could not bring himself to partake of any living creature. Hannibal doubts the Italian master would have appreciated the irony in Hannibal being the garden's caretaker.

To hunt for the thrill of the hunt was a human trait. To rend is bestial; to enjoy it is human. Da Vinci's monsters were composite beasts. Always drawing from nature, the various body parts of his monsters had been created from living predators, not imagined. Leonardo's monsters were of the four legged variety, never two. Leonardo had not wished to acknowledge the beast in man.

Unlike Tier. Compelled to express his violent urges in the guise of predator and unable to see himself as such without his suit of teeth and bone.

A paradox. A true predator kills to survive. Tier had not eaten of his kill.

An irony. Tier had been unable to kill without his suit.

Tier had at least been comfortable with who he was, who he had become. Tier had embraced his nature. Had died embracing it, his life taken by the superior predator who, ironically, had fought against his nature, had feared it, had released it for the first time as Tier had gasped his last breath in his hands.

Hannibal has not been able to stop thinking about his lost weekend with Will. The first of many, and all that they shared is now secured within his memory palace. Tier had provided the awakening Will had needed. Will's entire being had been enflamed, his subconscious desires and impulses at long last recognized, kindled and set ablaze on his living room floor and later…in Hannibal's bed.

They both owed Randall Tier a debt.

Hannibal remembers well talking with Jack and Will once he and Will had finally arrived at the crime scene to stand in awe of the gruesome monument Will had made. Hannibal wonders still over the odd conversation they had shared around the surreal sight of the dismembered Tier mounted on saber toothed tiger bones.

Hindsight provides a painfully clear lens from which to view the past. Hannibal can see again the triumvirate, Hannibal, Will, and Uncle Jack circling around Tier and each other that cold, damp morning at the Natural History Museum.

After making it obvious he had not been pleased with their lack of punctuality Jack had prompted both Will and Hannibal for their thoughts as Tier's dead eyes had stared into the depths of the museum. Jack's eyes had flicked from Hannibal to Will relentlessly, puzzling over their comments and parsing their words for insight into their universe; a universe he could never be a part of.

Tier would have been caught eventually. And he would have led the FBI to Hannibal eventually. Tier's days had been numbered the moment Hannibal had dispensed with confidentiality and told Jack all about him. Hannibal could have killed him, but sending Tier to Will had served several purposes simultaneously.

Hannibal had known Jack suspected one, if not both of them by the time they had finished speaking under the cavernous vault of the museum. Motive escaped Jack and without it he was directionless in his investigation. Neither Will nor Hannibal should have been there, but Jack had never allowed FBI protocol to hinder his work.

Will was not FBI anymore; even his teaching position had been revoked. But, Jack still needed him.

Hannibal had been there because Tier had been his former patient. It had been Hannibal that pointed Jack in Tier's direction in the first place. Jack had no doubt done some serious head scratching while waiting for Hannibal and Will to arrive. His head had been ready to split in two by the time they had departed. Jack had likely hoped Will had nothing to do with Tier.

Will had quickly and effectively dashed that hope.

Different pathology, same instinct.

His killer empathized with him?

Don't mistake understanding for empathy, Jack. No, if there's anything…it's envy.

Envy?

Jack had raised his brows clear to the vaulted ceilings above them. Hannibal had just insisted the killer mounted Tier in order to inflict a final indignity upon him. This falsehood had been delivered to Jack in an attempt to misdirect, to point the finger elsewhere. To clear a path for Will that would lead Jack away from both of them.

But Will had practically admitted to it. Will had corrected Hannibal. He had offered his own interpretation, contradicted Hannibal right in front of Jack. Hannibal had then supported Will's interpretation, had allowed Will to run with it, curious to see what game Will was playing.

Randall Tier came into his own much easier than who killed him.

This is a fledgling killer.

Hannibal's remark had prompted Will's chin to lift just a fraction higher, his eyelids to tic ever so slightly. Hannibal had thought of the welts smarting along his collarbone, welts shared by Will who had stood with hands in pockets, evidence concealed beneath tweed and knitted wool.

He's never killed like this before, not like this…

Hannibal had spoken quietly at Will's back, watching Jack scrutinize Will with a discerning eye.

Not like this, no.

This is the nightmare that followed him out of his dreams.

Jack had stared at the both of them for several seconds; dark tired eyes had moved to one and then the other. Dark tired eyes that spoke of the precious time he had left with his wife, eyes that betrayed the anger as the minutes and hours ticked away, here far from his lovely dying Bella.

After a moment, Jack had cleared his throat. Will had continued to stare at Tier as though neither Jack nor Hannibal were even in the room. Will had retreated from the scene altogether, to that place in his mind no one could reach. Not even Hannibal.

Jack had walked over to Hannibal. He had thanked Hannibal for coming in on a Sunday morning. His thin smile had been edged with ice. Hannibal had nodded, had glanced at Will, who ignored him.

"Will…" Jack had touched the sleeve of Will's herringbone coat.

"Anything else, Jack?"

Will had blinked himself into the present, shaking off Jack's touch and the trance with a shrug. His left hand had disappeared into his coat to adjust his scarf. Hannibal imagined Will tracing his fingers along his skin and wondered what thoughts had passed through his mind as he had.

"Actually, yes. A word please, if you wouldn't mind staying a moment, Will." Jack's tone had left no room for minding.

To Hannibal he had said, "Doctor Lecter, thank you again. We'll take it from here."

Hannibal had then turned to leave glancing at Will who had caught his eye and had merely looked back at Tier or what remained of him. Jack had wanted to talk to Will alone and did not care if Hannibal knew it. Hannibal had left them there, but he had not left the museum. He had waited on the stairs, obstructed from Jack's view but not Will's should Will look in his direction.

It was clear they were having words. Jack had stood close to Will, imposing and authoritative in his brushed woolen coat and shiny badge. Will had faced him, a quiet reed before the oak, eyes blinking as his mind absorbed Jack's words.

Jack had moved to touch the collar of Will's coat, a clearly angry and invasive gesture. Will had deflected; a shoulder roll and a sideways glance had drawn Jack closer still. Jack had pushed his index finger against Will's chest. Will had recoiled from the touch and had inclined his head in response to Jack's tone finally turning his head away from his former boss. But he had not backed away.

While glancing at the stairs, Will had seen Hannibal poised and motionless in the shadows. Hannibal had seen the lift of his chin, the subtle shifting of lips, and then pale blue eyes had turned back to Jack. He had spoken quietly, head down hands still stuffed in his pockets.

Whatever Will had said made an impact. Jack had taken a step backward, then another allowing Will to move. He had turned away from Jack and moved toward the stairwell.

“You’re not hearing me, Will. You should follow me back to headquarters.” Jack had called after him.

Hannibal had descended the stairs then, had heard Will’s voice above him, from the top of the stairwell.

“No, I’ll be going home, Jack. Didn’t have time to feed the dogs this morning…”

Hannibal had stood next to his Bentley, parked alongside Will’s Volvo. Had watched Will approach, hands still in pockets, eyes distant.

“Dinner?”

A pause. “Eight?”

The hairs on Hannibal’s skin had bristled slightly against the fabric watching Will’s breath roll off his warm lips and hang in the chilly air. Eight o’clock was far too late to wait.

“Make it seven. For an appetizer.”

Hannibal had climbed into his car and driven from the parking lot watching Will in his rearview mirror. Will’s reflection had been watching him as well as he had climbed into his own car.

Hannibal had returned home, to begin preparations for dinner turning the conversation over in his mind. At the time, Will’s actions had seemed to Hannibal more of a taunt than anything else. A useless confession Jack could not use, but honest enough to please Hannibal and placate his own sense of guilt.

What Hannibal had witnessed had not been a performance, not entirely. Will had been dancing on the edge of a knife with Jack that day in the museum. He knows now the game Will had been playing; the only game Will could have played, and he had played well.

Will had presented coded messages to Hannibal and to Jack. He had been playing both of them, his actions still fresh in his mind as he had clung to his guilt. Aware of the trap he was setting for Hannibal but fully aware of his own urges.

He had said enough to let Jack know who the killer was, to let Jack know to leave him alone to do his job…on Hannibal. He had placed Jack in a delicate situation and he had taken the control of it away from Jack, at least tying his hands and getting them dirty. Jack had already admitted to pushing Will, under oath. He was doing it again. If Will went down, Jack would go with him.

Even without the trap, Jack could not act without evidence. There was no evidence at the crime scene to indicate where the murder had taken place.

To search for evidence at Will’s house would require a warrant. If Will were arrested, again, Jack would be called out on the FBI’s wide red carpet for involving him in a murder investigation, again.

Jack's professional credibility would crumble under the weight of unforgivable offenses. Without Will, his chances of capturing Hannibal evaporated. No motive and no evidence could be tied to Hannibal either.

Jack had not entirely swallowed Chilton's guilt despite Lass's damning performance, not that Hannibal had needed him to. The lines connecting the dots were merely the string to tie up a package the FBI had long since tired of waiting upon. Only Jack had not entirely trusted the evidence gift wrapped and thrust into his hands. He had placed his trust in Will to bring Hannibal in. But now, with Tier, he had two killers on the loose. And he could not do a thing about it.

Will had dangled means, motive, and opportunity in front of Jack like rotten fruit on a tree, but there were no gloves thick enough to insulate Jack's hands from the taint should he reach out to pluck them free.

So clever, his Will.

The doorbell had chimed softly just as the kitchen clock clicked to seven. Hannibal's hands had paused over the sink an involuntary response to the chime, but the flush of warmth beneath his sweater had been in response to his visitor.

"Hello, Will."

"Doctor Lecter."

Hannibal had not been surprised Will had erected boundaries upon walking through his kitchen door. The illusion of formality would soothe muscles already alert and agitated, aware of the nervous energy vibrating in the air, every molecule charged with anticipation.

Will had not used the front door since he had begun coming around for coffee; a habit Hannibal had missed when Will had been locked up. He had also taken to parking his Volvo far from street lamps.

Hannibal had taken his coat, slipped it off his shoulders for him, inhaling the familiar odor of dog mingled with the scent of heat and anxious perspiration. And Will had angled his head so Hannibal's nose could linger close to the hair that brushed against the collar of his shirt.

And then he had been gone, off to the other side of the kitchen, pacing before the print of Fragonard's Bathers hanging on the wall behind him.

Will's hair had been tousled as usual; Hannibal thinks he has yet to see a comb in Will's hands. But, he had showered again and had taken care to trim his beard.

He had dressed casually but with an eye to Hannibal's predilections; the corduroy trousers fitted snugly over slender hips, the seams tapered along the length of his legs. The simple cable knit sweater hugged at his shoulders displaying the contours of his body most sensuously. The cotton shirt beneath, had been left unbuttoned just enough to reveal pale skin streaked with pinkish marks from the night before.

The boots were all Will - barely tied with tongues catching the fabric of his trousers as he walked around Hannibal's kitchen trying to look at ease, but not quite pulling it off. Hannibal had given him his space. Allowed Will time to transition from the solitude of his car to the stimulation of Hannibal's kitchen.

To adjust to the sight of Hannibal in a cashmere sweater and brushed cotton drawstring pants that hung loosely almost touching the floor as Hannibal had moved about his kitchen barefoot. To accept the unspoken invitation to make himself at home as Hannibal scrubbed vegetables over the sink.

Hannibal had already made modifications for Will. It was a simple thing, to put him at ease.

Music played low throughout the house, Beethoven's Piano Trio in B Flat, the track lighting overhead had been adjusted to shine a little less brightly, and a bottle of wine had been set ready on the counter. Hannibal had poured two glasses, had offered one to Will, and had raised his glass.

Will had answered with a tilt of his own glass before taking a tentative sip and then swallowing down a healthy gulp eyes on Hannibal, knowing Hannibal would take pleasure in watching the subtle movements of his throat.

Hannibal had drunk from his own glass as Will had watched him with a similar satisfaction. Each of them fascinated, each wary of the other, and both knowing where they would end up. It had been the getting there that Hannibal had enjoyed so much.

They had taken up their usual positions, Hannibal at the center-island, and Will opposite, arm resting on the counter, fingers curled around his glass of wine, a tether to reality. He had swirled the ruby colored Bordeaux around the glass adjusting to the space, adjusting his body so that its affect aligned with his attitude, his mindset.

He had gazed around the kitchen and circled back again, his eyes finally alighting on Hannibal, centered – placid and blue.

"The dogs were happy to see you, no doubt. All is well in your little boat upon the sea?" Hannibal had looked up from the cutting board, Will's image reflected in the blade of the chef's knife he held in his hand.

"Despite the storm that rocked it the other night, yes." Will's eyes had narrowed as he had held Hannibal in his gaze. "The injuries to Buster were superficial…if that matters to you."

"If it matters to you; it matters to me." Hannibal had said in all sincerity.

Will had swirled his wine, set the glass upon the counter and placed both hands flat, his bandage frayed and tinged with dried blood. He had flexed his knuckles watching the bandage constrict more tightly around his hand.

"You sent him there to invade, to pollute my space, and…to kill me."

Spoken like the predator he was, radiant with his newfound flush of power.

"I sent Randall there to die…at your hands. You are quite aware that was the expectation."

"My home is tainted with his blood."

Powerful and petulant. So infuriating, his Will.

"As are your hands. You feel as though you have desecrated your home?"

"I feel like you have desecrated my home."

“Desecrated or sanctified? It is really a matter of perspective. He would have taken your life had you not been the stronger. You reclaimed what was yours. In blood.”

Will had been quiet, contemplative as he stared into his wine. Hannibal had continued to rinse the greens for their salad.

“What is Jack thinking about Tier?” Hannibal had asked after a moment.

“He is thinking about questions he doesn’t want answers to.” Had come the reply, softly spoken and without hesitation.

“For now. Jack will press you. It is his nature.”

“He will press you, too.”

“How do you feel about that?”

“How do you feel?”

Will had swallowed down the rest of his wine; then had reached for the bottle. He had poured himself another glass. And, without asking, he had leaned over the counter and topped off Hannibal’s glass, eyes trailing the flow of ruby colored wine until, having filled Hannibal’s glass once again, had lifted those pale blue eyes to Hannibal’s and had leaned further across the counter so that his lips almost grazed Hannibal’s chin.

All the musky sweetness that was Will had filled his nose, igniting all of his senses. The taste of the wine on his lips and the scent of Will in every breath had been intoxicating. As Will had known it would be.

Hannibal had wanted to rip his clothes from him right then and there. And Will had known that too.

“Didn’t you say something about an appetizer?” Will had asked, rolling his tongue over wine stained lips.

Hannibal had reached for him then.

Hannibal had not even cared about the wine all over the counter, or the broken glass on the hardwood floor.

The cell phone chirps from where it lay on the wrought iron table. Hannibal almost ignores it, but he so rarely receives phone calls he picks it up to see who calls him at this number. There are only a few possibilities.

Seconds tick by as Hannibal stares at the number on the tiny screen. It has been many years since he last accepted a call from his cousin.

“Hello, Roberta…”

Long after the phone call has ended and twilight beckons along the horizon, Hannibal still sits quietly on the stone bench in his garden, basket of tomatoes and peppers at his feet. He must think through the information he has just received from his Uncle Roberto’s daughter. Apparently, a couple has been asking questions about the Lecter family. This couple had been asking questions in Lithuania, then Prague, and now France.

He has heard the name Paolini before. It seems to Hannibal that was the surname of one of the employees at the Verger estate. Carlo was his name, wasn't it? Or had it been the other one…the one who had bled out after removing Hannibal's scalpel from his thigh? Ah, yes, Matteo.

Sardinians are a most vengeful bunch. Now, what is to be done about that?

Chapter 31

Will has some strange dreams on the way back to Florence.

The figures seem to dance across time; faded red bodies vibrate on black ink as the plates melt and drip from the bookshelves in Daniel's office. Will sits in his usual couch, watching the red and black droplets stain the carpet in Daniel's office. He thinks of his therapy with Daniel here and of his therapy with his former psychiatrist. He leans over and peers between his knees to look at Hannibal's office below as the drops of red and black splatter onto the ladder at his feet, the hardwood floor, and finally the large antique desk he knows so intimately.

Beads the color of blood rain down upon Hannibal's drawing of Achilles mourning the death Patroclus until the charcoal figures and the thick paper that contained them are drowned in a sea of red much like the words exchanged between doctor and patient in this very room, echoes of regret amidst truths embedded somewhere within the deceit.

Therapy is such a loaded word. Does he have psychiatrists or conversations?

Am I your psychiatrist, or are we simply having conversations?

"Yes" I think is the answer to that.

The ocean roars through Will's head, his thoughts tossed like pebbles along the shore. Will gathers them up in his mind, and they sift, coalesce, and connect though cohesion is as distant from Will as the wave that crests suspended, ever reaching toward the shore but never quite breaking upon it.

You have to ask yourself what it is he wanted from you…

Will stares out the window of the Mercedes but Daniel knows he does not see the vineyards and fields of Tuscany. He does not seem to feel the wisps of hair that lace his cheeks or his lashes from the constant wind that blows through the open window, nor does he seem to notice the city limits of Florence rapidly approaching as signs for the Boboli Gardens and other tourist sights begin to appear along the highway.

Daniel can only wonder where Will is right now.

Will has allowed his mind to free associate in response to his conversation with Daniel, inviting thoughts and images he culls from his memories. His subconscious paints the images that populate the incredible landscapes he inhabits, visions very different from the images he summons at crime scenes. He knows his mind holds far more than he is aware of at any given moment of cogent thought and he trusts his mind to do what it does, has done, all his life.

His thoughts frighten him still. He cannot force a pattern upon them, they grow wild in the field of his mind untended and shunned like forbidden fruit. These are the nightmares that continue to follow him out of his dreams.

He knows where he will invariably end up. He always finds his way there, one way or another, because he exists there. Because nothing in his life has robbed him of his senses, his body, or his mind, like Hannibal has.

No, no…don't. Don't…please…

He spits the blood out of his mouth, again.

He sees Abigail slip to the floor, the sacrificial doe on Hannibal's altar. Hannibal had saved her life; his right to take it. It seemed Abigail's fate to die at a father's hand.

The shadow of Hannibal falls over him as he tries to staunch the flow of blood…

I've only ever wanted what is best for you.

No, you w…wanted what was best for you…

Will…

Hannibal extends his left hand to touch Will's shoulder, but Will flinches away, recoiling at the sight of the stained fingers. Hannibal withdraws, lets Will speak.

You…you wanted something m…more.

And you did not?

You s…saw more, w…wanted more…than I was p…pre…pre…pared to give…

It hurts to concentrate. His mouth struggles to form the words he presses through his colorless lips. Will knows he won't be conscious much longer...

What did you show me Will? Did I ever really see you? I was honest with you Will.

Will clutches at his tattered shirt, soaked and black with blood as he leans against the cabinet on Hannibal's kitchen floor…again. He keeps returning here…why can't he stop, stop…

I let you know me, see me. I gave you a rare gift, but you didn't want it.

Didn't I?

No…you did not allow yourself to see. The scales fell from your eyes but not from your mind.

I s…see y…you well enough.

The floor feels like ice as his damp clothes stick to his skin. Will could sink into the floor, his limbs feel so heavy.

You still see with your eyes, through the lens of Jack, the lens of the FBI…not mine. You have the ability to see me Will. And you did glimpse and you became afraid…

Hannibal leans down closer, sinks to his knees, his surgeon's hand slips between Will's bloodied hands to touch the torn flesh Will is holding together with slippery soiled fingers. Will's hand trembles as Hannibal gently moves Will's fingers apart so he can open the flesh wider to peek inside.

You want to believe I am the serpent in the garden. And you fear the same serpent lies coiled inside. You don't have to fear it, Will.

Hannibal's eyes are touched with sadness, dark and glistening as he gazes at Will.

I let you release it…from me. T—To cut it, cut it out…

Not possible. Ah, my dearest Will.

Hannibal's hand falls away from his wound, his mouth twisted in anguish.

Will's eyes trail down Hannibal's right shoulder along his rolled up sleeves to the blood stained knife Hannibal still holds tightly in his fist. Will slides his feet helplessly against the wet floor. He doesn't know why he tries to stand up. He knows he can't. He slams his head against the cabinet to distract him from the pain.

That's not why you lay here Will.

You are the s…snake whispering l…lies from the sh…shadows.

Will hisses between clenched teeth his eyes shut. He can taste his salty tears mingled in the iron rust that trickles from his mouth.

Who lied? The serpent or god? When their eyes were opened…did they die? Did they die, Will?

They…they were c…cast out.

Will is cold, so very cold…

Cast out because they disobeyed? Or because they tempted God's anger daring to be more…like him?

Will looks at Hannibal kneeling on the floor next to him. Thinks he was supposed to leave…why is he still here…?

Will…If we learn our limitations… Hannibal prompts as he wipes the blood from Will's stained lips with his own fingers.

If we learn our limitations too soon…, Will's lips move, his eyes look up at Hannibal through slits, he hears the ocean.

…we never learn our power. Hannibal's fingers fall from his lips.

Will retreats into the sound of waves washing over him. When he opens his eyes again he is lying face down on the shore, the sea at his feet. He pushes himself off the sand and begins to walk along the shore toward the people he sees in the distance. His body feels different, heavier, he knows he no longer wears trousers or shirt as he walks along the beach, but he doesn't take the time to look. The need to hurry is foremost on his mind.

He feels no pain in his side as he begins to run across the wet sand. The wind begins to swell and he feels the spray of ocean on his face, in his hair.

He sees boats further out. Like the curtains that once enclosed Hannibal's office, red and white striped square sails hang limp from tall masts, and… oars extend uselessly along the wooden decks. Will begins to run more quickly along the beach, to see what kind of ships are these…

As his feet sink into the sand, he thinks of the plates on Daniel's bookshelf in his office, scenes of the Trojan War reduced to red figures etched on black, tragic heroes from the past… Of battle tested friendships etched in charcoal.

These are ancient Greek ships, Triremes, out at sea, filled with ancient warriors and there are more warriors, stretching beyond the dunes wearing plumed Greek helmets, bronze cuirasses and carrying freshly forged swords and spears, some watching from the dunes…

He is on the shores of Aulis and he holds a spear in his hand. He wears a gleaming cuirass, too.

A lone warrior, dressed in sandals, leather skirt and cuirass polished so fine the reflection off the sun is blinding, stands on the beach holding up a young girl, long braid down her back, legs splayed coltishly in the sand. He holds in his hand a short sword angled at her throat. His thumb caresses the ball of the gem studded hilt, eyes fixed on Will.

Will almost trips over the sand, NO…no…not again…

He recognizes the lone warrior as he staggers closer, breathless, the sand stinging his bare arms and legs, straps of leather cutting into his feet.

Hannibal? He gasps the name into the wind. He looks upon the maiden Hannibal holds in his arms, dressed in a white chiton, the thin linen falls from her narrow shoulders exposing one fair breast. Her entire body quakes with every breath she draws between her trembling lips. Will cannot even say her name aloud… Abigail he mouths soundlessly as he falls to his knees in front of her.

He knows who Hannibal is in this twisted reenactment in his mind. The Greek fleet floats upon a still sea at the mercy of Artemis, fickle goddess of the hunt. Hannibal raises his right hand over Abigail's head, dagger poised. He lifts his head to the sky. The wind whips at his face and the braided locks of hair that hang down his back.

He lowers his gaze to stare at Will with eyes the color of burnt blood, cold beads that bear down on Will still crouched at Abigail's feet. When he speaks his voice is terrible and low and Will sees Abigail shudder against the arms that hold her.

Agamemnon sacrificed his own beloved daughter, Iphigenia to Artemis so the goddess would release the Achaeans' ships and send a strong wind to carry them to Troy.

No! Wait…

Agamemnon with his ash blond hair and chiseled cheek bones stays the knife at Iphigenia's scarred throat.

Wait…Artemis sends a deer to die in her place…

Ah, not this time. Did Achilles send you, poor Patroclus? Does he still desire the gods to hurl my fleet to Poseidon, dashing timber and bone upon the rocks so you two might storm the walls of Troy together? Unless you have wings, you will need my fleet to deliver you. The fleet cannot sail without her sacrifice. If you would have the crown that the Fates hold fast; she must die.

Here…take this…

He holds out a long strip of fabric that flutters in the wind. Will takes the dark veil spun of the finest rubicund silk to hold tight between his fingers lest the tempestuous breath of Artemis snatch it away.

What would you have me do with this?

Bind her mouth so she cannot curse us with her dying breath…

Will blinks the stinging sand from his eyes…

He is suddenly seated at Hannibal's dining room table, back in Baltimore. The table is set, complete with huge goblets of ruddy red wine, as crimson as the silk that slipped through his fingers not a moment ago. To his right, at the head of the table sits Hannibal in pale plaid suit of muted blue and across from him sits Daniel, looking wan and a little tipsy wearing a beige cable knit sweater. Will shifts uncomfortably in his seat too warm in his flannel shirt and wool blazer.

They are eating trout.

Beautiful fish, Will. Hannibal says, dishing up a plate for Daniel.

Daniel accepts the plate, his fingers pale, flakes the color of brick beneath his nails too dark to be wine.

You're welcome. Will answers his lips numb, hands in his lap unable to take up his knife and fork.

We're all Nietzschean fish… Hannibal says turning to Daniel.

Makes us more tasty. Daniel says from the other side of the table, placing a forkful in his mouth. He smiles at Hannibal who turns to Will with spatula in hand.

Your plate, Will?

"Will…Will!" Daniel says, tapping him on the shoulder. "We're here, but you'd better brace yourself. We're going to have to walk the rest of the way…" Daniel's eyes are wide and gentle as he stares into Will's blinking blue ones. "It looks like there was a fire at your place."

Chapter End Notes

Sacrifice of Iphigenia
The 5th century BC krater depicts the dual images of Iphigenia and deer alluding to Euripides' version where Artemis substitutes a deer and Iphigenia is not killed, but sentenced to serve as a priestess in the Temple of Artemis in Tauris, where it is the custom is to brutally sacrifice all foreigners. Iphigenia shares in the curse of House Atreus. She is doomed to be killed or become a killer.

Chapter 32

Will and Daniel get some answers about the fire from an unlikely source.

Will stares into Daniel's face uncomprehending.

"Will…the palazzo is ruined. We need to find out what happened."

"No…" The familiar fatigue threatens to pull him back into his retreat, but he finds the strength to pull himself up and out of his seat.

Via dei Benci is lined with fire trucks and cars as people swarm around the vehicles like flood waters. Will climbs out of the Mercedes to stand beside Daniel in the midst of the chaos. The smoke is ominous and heavy in the humid summer air. Ash and particles of what was float and then settle covering everything on the street in sooty gray residue.

"Are you…here, now?" Daniel says, not sure if he should grab Will's arm to steady him, or let him be. Will looks dazed as he stands next to the car trying to blink himself into the now.

Daniel knows Will is resilient, but he just can't seem to get a break. This kind of loss would be upsetting to anyone, Daniel can feel plenty of anguish all around, but he feels the distress in Will acutely. He looks calm on the outside, and yet Daniel can feel him struggling against the understandable urge to rage over the insanity of it. He's ready to lose it himself. How much can a person take?

"I…feel like I've been thrust from one nightmare into another." Will says, he closes his eyes a moment and the painful grimace causes Daniel to wince.

It seems to Daniel this connection between them is becoming stronger. He's not sure that is a good thing. His empathy has its benefits, but retaining his sense of self, of separateness from Will would be…prudent. He doesn't have time to think about it at the moment.

"I had to park here, but I see law enforcement up ahead. We need to talk to them."

"I can do that." Will forces himself to look around, detach himself from it. Treat it like a crime scene. He can see his former residence at the end of the block. The ruins of the building smolder as ash smoke, and steam rise against the blackened sky.

When Will finally starts to walk, Daniel locks his car and moves to walk beside him as they wind their way through the people milling about. The area is securely cordoned off and the police presence is evident everywhere they look. The palazzo is utterly ruined, an empty shell in shambles.

"It doesn't look like there is much left." Will says as he scans the immediate area. He feels numb, like this is another dream he is walking through.

"How are we supposed to get through? There has to be a command center of some kind where we can get information." Daniel cranes his head trying to see above the crowd.

"It would be where the trucks are. We're almost a block away as it is." Will says remembering there is a back alley that joins his palazzo with the adjacent one. "There may be less of a crowd on the side way from the street. Let's try the next street over, go around back."

It takes a little while, but soon they have advanced around the corner and are headed toward the next corner that will take them where Will leads.

Daniel knows it is going to be bad. He can feel both excitement of those drawn to the macabre and sympathy from others among the onlookers as they walk past on their way around the next corner.

As they approach, several police officers bar them from advancing further. They have managed to reach the back entrance, almost. Will wants his access to the scene and Daniel knows he wants to see if there is anything left to collect just as badly as he wants to determine what happened with his own peculiar gift. They argue with the officers and just as tempers are about to flare, Will and Daniel hear a familiar deeply accented voice from behind them.

"I'll take it from here. I know these two."

Detective D'Angelo wipes at the grime on her face. Her damp shirt is smudged with soot and is tucked into low cut pants that cling to her like a second skin. Her hair is clipped in a tight pony tail that brushes her collar. It looks like she lopped off at least six inches of dark brown hair since the last time Will and Daniel saw her.

She still wears no makeup and Will decides she does not need it. He focuses on her canvas shoes that are quite ruined now. He finds himself wondering why she did not wear more practical shoes…

"Been out of town I see. Perfect alibi." She smiles as she says this and both Will and Daniel breathe a sigh of relief at seeing someone they know. Someone who might help.

"Dr. Clayton." She nods at Daniel and adds, "Detective Ruggerio isn't here this time." She peers into his face, challenge given.

Clayton bites at his tongue and quietly swallows the tart remark that was poised on its tip. She shut him down pretty quickly because her focus is undeniably on Will. He can feel her compassion for him - can feel her desire to be closer to Will. Daniel rejects the challenge. Maybe Will can persuade her to help. He looks over at Will who stands facing the ruined palazzo, gazing at D'Angelo from the side, seeming to contemplate both at the same time.

She dismisses Daniel from her thoughts and turns to Will. She wants to talk to Will without the interference of Clayton's protective bubble hovering over him. She wonders if Clayton is really his shrink.

"Mr. Graham, I am so sorry. Your residence is pretty much a total loss. What the fire didn't destroy, the smoke, heat, and water damage did. I can't let you go in there.

"Well, give us the good news first." Will says, flicking ash out of his eyes.

D'Angelo takes a breath. Her smile is kind, ever compassionate. "Electrical fire it looks like. Preliminary assessment is that it was accidental. Did you know your neighbors, Mr. Graham?"

"Not really. Just greetings at the mailbox. Why?"

"The tenant the floor below you, retired, senior citizen, lived alone with her cat?"

"Signora Rossi? The fire started in her suite?"

"Looks that way. The fire traveled right up the wires to your suite."

"Did she…make it?"

"Afraid not."

"Any other…loss of life?"

"Miraculously, no. Everyone got out who was home. The fire started before dawn. Not much warning though, no time to take anything with them. I hope you had insurance…" D'Angelo lets the matter drop.

"I did…do. Look, can I talk to the…fire marshal or one of the investigators?" Will says.

"I know you have lots of questions, but you aren't law enforcement here. You are civilian."

Will paces in front of her. He knows she is doing her job, but she owes him. He thinks he should call in his favor. Actually, he shouldn't have to. He bites at his lip thinking how to phrase his request.

Before he can open his mouth Daniel speaks up, "Detective…you do know what Will did for the FBI, right?"

D'Angelo looks from one to the other. "Alright, so I do. Did he tell you I called him about crime scenes?"

Daniel looks at Will who gives him a sidelong glance and a weak smile. D'Angelo rolls her eyes. "I'll take that as a negative. Is he still your patient, Dr. Clayton?"

“Yes. Why?”

“Because I am trying to figure you two out.”

“What is there to figure out?” Daniel says, “Look, let’s start over. This is Will. I’m Daniel. And you are…”

“Detective.” D’Angelo crosses her arms over her chest and angles her head to one side. “I’d really like to help, but my hands are tied. This is not a police investigation.”

“Then, why is a detective here?” Will says, looking into her face, something he has not done since she walked up to them. Her soft brown eyes catch his. Will’s hands find his pockets. “You’re not here for crowd control.”

D’Angelo looks aside, and shakes her head. “I was the one on call, so I came out to the scene, but once they called it accidental and removed the body…I could have gone.”

“You knew I lived here…” Will searches her face, “Were you concerned for me, Detective?”

D’Angelo purses her lips trying not to smile. “Yes, given your proclivities and habits, yes I was.”

“Careful Detective, we might become friendly.” Will says quite seriously.

D’Angelo gives him the eye for a long moment and then hold holds out her right hand to Will “I’m Alia. Alia D’Angelo. Pleased to meet you, Mr. Graham.”

“Will.”

He takes her warm hand in his, grasps it for a long second and finds her brown eyes a little too intense. D’Angelo pulls her hand back and brushes at the soot on her shirt.

“I suppose it’s even futile to try,” she says, “if I start, I won’t stop.”

Daniel notes the quiet exchange of electricity between them as their hands touch briefly, empathy not required. D’Angelo has done a one eighty on Will since the first time they met. Will is retreating as they speak; the touch of her hand enough to summon his wall. Daniel wonders how many conversations they have had. About crime scenes. It would seem Will does not tell him everything about everyone. Daniel waits to see how long it takes for D’Angelo to fold and lead them to the fire marshal.

Will turns toward what is left of the palazzo and considers that nothing remains of his belongings. There wasn’t that much, he can replace the clothes, but the laptop was secured. He can get another laptop, but not like the one in his suite which is likely unrecognizable at this point. He kept some files on the flash drive in his duffle bag, but access to most was through a secured storage site that recognized the melted laptop. He groans inwardly. This will require a call to Jack.

D’Angelo interrupts his thoughts. “You would really like to have a look around wouldn’t you?”

“Just to see if what I see concurs with what the official report says, yeah – I would.” Will looks toward an ambulance. “They already took the body away?”

“Yes, a least an hour ago. Uh, not much left to see really. She will still have to be identified. Her place was pretty much consumed. It burned hot once it got going. She had a lot of flammable items, like curtains, old upholstery and antique furniture that went up like kindling."

"I'd still like to have a look around if you can arrange it. I wouldn't need a lot of time."

"Ok. I'll introduce you to one of the guys I know. He's a pretty good investigator himself. His English is not so good, so maybe I should stay close?"

Will nods and looks to Daniel, who has been standing behind him. Daniel catches D'Angelo's eyes and knows instantly he will not be joining them. She can have her moment with Will. Might even be good for him.

"He stays here." D'Angelo says and manages not to smile…too much.

Daniel sighs and takes a step back. He hates it when he's right. D'Angelo looks back to Will who stands with hands back in pockets, brows up awaiting an explanation.

"I can get you inside, but not both of you." She shrugs it off with a frown and a toss of her head. Her expression is so typically Italian.

"Take your time. I'm not going anywhere." Daniel grins at D'Angelo and waves Will off.

"Thanks." Will says as he turns to follow D'Angelo through the yard full of mud and debris.

Daniel watches them pick their way across the yard trying to keep their footing as they sidestep the debris and mud. It occurs to him that Will is going to need a place to stay. At least until he can make other arrangements. Daniel rubs at his eyes and feels the residue cling to his fingers as he does. He thinks the soot clings to his skin the way bad luck seems to cling to Will. He hopes Will finds nothing suspicious. His mind is already occupied enough.

Chapter 33

Hannibal retreats to his memory palace, prompted by the call from his cousin.

Uncle Roberto presses a thick manila envelope into Hannibal's hands; an envelope Hannibal knows is filled with francs of sizeable denomination. He is to exchange them for U.S. dollars in anticipation of his new life in Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, a place he has never even thought about until his acceptance letter from Johns Hopkins University.

Hannibal brushes the hair from his face and lifts his eyes to his uncle.

Chapter 33

Hannibal retreats to his memory palace, prompted by the call from his cousin.

Hannibal sets his cell phone on the blue veined marble counter in his kitchen. He has just finished speaking with Tatiana and is satisfied with her handling of his affairs. Apparently, Du Maurier believes she calls Banque Suisse every other day to inquire about the balance and the transfer she expects is imminent. His lawyers have likewise been contacted by Du Maurier's lawyers requesting an update on the paperwork for the transfer of deeds.

Hannibal presses a finger to his temples, feels the throb of blood pulse uncharacteristically warm against his bronzed skin. He will have to address this impatience tomorrow evening at dinner. Du Maurier knows her calls will be reported to him. She is deliberately making a nuisance of herself.

She does not expect Hannibal to act any more quickly in response; she wants his attention. Well, he smiles; she shall have that and then some. She should be careful what she wishes for.

Du Maurier believes she calls Banque Suisse every day because Tatiana has intercepted every one of her calls to Banque Suisse since Du Maurier never fails to use her cell phone. Tatiana has cleverly alternated taking Du Maurier's calls with an associate so that Du Maurier does not receive the impression that Tatiana is the only person employed there. There is the possibility that Du Maurier might lose her phone somehow, but she would likely retain the same number and Tatiana has assured Hannibal that unless Du Maurier deviates from routine and calls from someone else's phone, any other contingency is covered. Tatiana's expertise is not cheap but Hannibal believes she is worth every Euro, and there have been many, many Euros. It is only money after all.

He sighs and turns his attention to his recipe box. He is still unable to decide on a menu for tomorrow's late supper with his colleague. He does have more time than he had originally allowed for his preparations.

Earlier today, before Hannibal had returned to his villa to tend to his menu, there had been an unfortunate fire not far from Palazzo Pitti. Hannibal had been sitting in traffic when the sirens had sounded.

The centuries old palazzo had been nearly razed on one side, at least according to one of the polizia assigned to redirecting the long line of vehicles to an alternate route. Besides making it clear that access to Palazzo Pitti would be unavailable for several hours, he had also said that apparently, faulty wiring had resulted in an electrical fire that had quickly consumed half the structure in a blaze. There had been only one fatality.

Hannibal had watched the black plume of smoke rising from across the highway, stealing across the heavens to roil portentously over the city. Another historical treasure lost, a tragedy caused by human incompetence. Destruction without purpose is wasteful.

Hannibal doubts the palazzo will be restored. The owner will collect his insurance and hope he is not sued by its former occupants. Thoughts of the unfortunate palazzo evaporate as Hannibal at last finds a recipe that interests him.

A light summer meal accompanied by an exquisite Sauvignon from the Alto Adige region or a Malvasia should set Du Maurier purring. He will make a lemon risotto, chilled foie gras served with wedges of Italian cheeses and his own summer sausage. The sausage and the liver for the pâté have already been supplied by one Signora Porcelli.

To overcharge Hannibal for her carpet cleaning services had been rude but easily addressed. To learn that Signora Porcelli had continued to overcharge his neighbor whose glaucoma prohibited her from reading the bill and from appreciating the complete lack of justification for it in her home fairly begged for a remedy that Hannibal was all too happy to provide. Signora Porcelli has filled his meat locker with adequate restitution. And his neighbor loved the sausage.

As Hannibal begins to gather up the ingredients to prepare the liver, he thinks of his recent conversation with his cousin, Roberta. She is Roberto’s only child, born of a woman Hannibal never knew who was long dead by the time he had found a home with his uncle and his second wife Lady Murasaki. Roberta is an old soul though in actual years she is not much older than Hannibal. She had already left for university by the time Hannibal had arrived at the home of his uncle. Hannibal has never met her in person and thinks on how strange that is.

Roberta is the matriarch of what remains of the Lecter family in Europe. She still lives in the arrondissement of Saint Laurent, one of the twenty so called districts that spiral around Paris. It is a lively district, known for its artisans, shops, and restaurants, but it remains primarily residential and one of the more ethnically diverse arrondissements in Paris. Hannibal remembers it well.

He remembers well his parting words with his Uncle Roberto that long ago afternoon in the very same living room he had entered when he was sixteen years old, penniless and orphaned. Hannibal slices the liver into thin strips and slips them into the pan one by one as he retreats into a past he finds bittersweet at best.

1984 was an otherwise unremarkable year for Hannibal. Except that the year marked his departure from the European continent, there was nothing noteworthy about it at all. He remembers with perfect clarity the engine of the taxi running outside the luxurious flat he shared with his Uncle Roberto and Murasake, or Lady Murasake as she was known. He remembers that the third act of The Marriage of Figaro was playing on the stereo, an opera he finds…evocative to this day. He remembers the smell of saffron rice and steamed fish had filled the living room as he had stood before his uncle, head bowed as long locks of blonde hair had fallen over his eyes.

Uncle Roberto presses a thick manila envelope into Hannibal's hands; an envelope Hannibal knows is filled with francs of sizeable denomination. He is to exchange them for U.S. dollars in anticipation of his new life in Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, a place he has never even thought about until his acceptance letter from Johns Hopkins University.

Hannibal brushes the hair from his face and lifts his eyes to his uncle.

"There's a lot of money here, uncle. I don't know how to thank you for…"

Roberto holds up a hand and his lips curl into a smile beneath the nearly completely gray mustache. He looks to Murasake who stands in the doorway, leaning on the door jamb, silent though her dark almond eyes are focused on Hannibal.

"You are welcome to it and the only thanks we require is that you become the success we know you are capable of. To have no need to ever ask anyone for anything again. To become…what you wish to be in your new home."

Hannibal looks to the envelope in his hands and raises his eyes slowly to his uncle, a quiet rage stirs behind his eyes and he checks it quickly.

"This is not a gift. It is a bribe?"

"No! Hannibal…never a bribe!" Murasake says from the doorway, clutching her sweater around her more tightly so that the curves of her body are visible in the gloomy light of the late afternoon. These are curves Hannibal knows…intimately.

Hannibal's jaw tightens and he wills it slack again just as he wills the tears that threaten to sting his eyes to recede from his lashes before they can spill. He is getting better at willing away the emotions that would undo him.

"You are family, Hannibal." Uncle Roberto is saying, "The money is a gift to pave a way for your new life but you cannot remain here. Your passions…" Roberto glances to the doorway and Murasake lowers her eyes.

"…and your proclivities arouse a certain curiosity that you know our family cannot abide."

"Ah, yes, the sins of the father…"

"Too many sins and too many fathers in a long line of Lecters. It is unfortunate that…"

"I do not feel unfortunate. I feel empowered." Hannibal lifts his head in defiance. Who among the living is qualified to judge the dead?

"Empowered or not, you cannot remain in France, or Europe. I think you will find the United States a better fit, more suited to your particular ideas, interests, and…tastes."

Roberto takes out his pouch of tobacco from his jacket, pinches a bit and takes his time stuffing the mahogany pipe Hannibal has watched him fill a thousand times. He likes the aroma of the tobacco, slightly spicy, a hint of vanilla and he knows he will miss it.

“We only want what is best for you. That is all we have ever wanted.” Murasake says, her eyes pleading, and how softly sweetly she pleads with Hannibal from her perch in the doorway.

The horn blows from the taxi outside the flat. The driver is understandably impatient. He arrived nearly half an hour ago. This also means that Hannibal will miss his flight if he does not leave soon.

“It is time, Hannibal. I would ask one thing of you.”

“You would ask something of me as you send me away?”

“I would. You must change your name.” Roberto says with a quiet authority Hannibal knows too well.

“Why?” Hannibal already knows why but he wants to hear his uncle say it. Hearing him say it will make leaving easier.

“You know why. There is a shadow over our house and you should take a new name to begin your new life without ties to a past you no longer have to claim.”

“To break with the old as I embrace the new?”

“Exactly.”

“You would separate yourselves from me by name as well as by miles?”

“It is necessary. The past cannot follow you…”

“And the future will not find you.” Hannibal says with venom he did not know he had.

“Hannibal it is the last and only thing I would ever ask of you. The gift is yours regardless but…I ask this one thing.”

Hannibal looks to Murasake and her eyes are large and black, like a starless sky, as though they have swallowed up all the other colors and no light remains. Uncle Roberto sucks on his pipe as he lights the bowl and it flickers red beneath the match.

Hannibal looks to the mantle over the fireplace at the collection of tea cups Murasake keeps there.

The horn from the taxi blares again, longer this time, a clear signal that Hannibal is about to lose his ride to the airport.

Hannibal lifts the Queen Anne tea cup from its saucer on the mantle and watches it slip from his fingers to shatter on the flagstone. The fragile antique cup explodes into dust. Hannibal feels satisfaction warm him as Roberto flinches at the sound and Murasake, sad beautiful Murasake blanches and closes her almond eyes as she turns away from him.

“I will not.”

Hannibal slips the envelope into his bag, shoulders it, and hefts his single suitcase out the front door to the waiting taxi without a backward glance, the crack of the shattered cup still sharp in his mind.

As Hannibal steps outside, the heavens open for him and the rain that has been threatening to fall all day pours out of the sky. Hannibal feels like he has been baptized.

He has been baptized with tears from heaven; and he welcomes the cleansing that will wash this life from him, so he can emerge reborn. He climbs into the backseat and wipes heaven's tears away.

Tea cups do not shatter themselves and Hannibal has yet to put even one back together. And yet the shards of all the teacups might yield enough pieces to complete one cup, provided he could fit the pieces together. Roberta will be calling again this evening. Hannibal is hopeful that perhaps one shard is within his grasp already.

Notes: An amusing aside, the surname Porcelli is derived from "pig" in Italian.

Chapter 34

Chapter Summary

Will and D'Angelo check out the fire and Daniel corrects some of D'Angelo's misperceptions about Will.

D’Angelo has so many questions she would like to ask Graham, but there is one that is foremost on her mind.
“Why do you still look for him? I mean, why does it have to be you?”
“Glutton for punishment?” Will rubs at the soot collecting around his neck. He knows D’Angelo wants an honest answer, so he will give her what he can. “I feel…responsible."
Will finally raises his head to look D’Angelo squarely in the face; her very pretty sun kissed brown eyed face. D’Angelo nods as she finishes off the rest of her water bottle.
“Maybe Doctor Clayton should help you with that in your therapy because from what I can see, you are clearly not responsible. Lecter is.”

Chapter 34

Will and D'Angelo check out the fire and Daniel corrects some of D'Angelo's misperceptions about Will.

Detective Alia D’Angelo had introduced Will as an forensic specialist from D.C. to Raphael, hoping that supplying Graham with some clout would smooth the way for him with her investigator friend. She had told Graham on the walk up what she had planned to do. He had asked only how old Raphael was. He had merely nodded when she had guessed Raphael to be about thirty-two.

Will had not told her what he had planned on doing. He had taken her little scheme and turned it around on her, which, she had to agree, had created the desired effect, but at her expense.

He had let D’Angelo make her introductions and then Graham had taken Raphael’s outstretched hand and confided quietly that he was really only one of the tenets but he did have some investigative experience. Raphael had glanced over at D’Angelo, a knowing smile on his face. D’Angelo had shrugged and looked aside. He had probably figured she had taken a shine to Graham and he respected Graham for not going along with the farce. Raphael had promptly taken Graham under his wing for the next hour, showing him whatever he asked. Which was precisely the outcome Graham had anticipated.

Graham had actually caught her eyes as he had brushed by her and with a raise of his brow and quick flash of a smile, had let her know he could handle himself just fine. A bit miffed at first, D’Angelo had slowly realized that pushing Will off as an expert, an expert American would have raised a challenge, like waving a red banner at a bull. Raphael would have almost certainly gotten into a pissing contest with Graham and likely been even less cooperative, despite D’Angelo being a friend.

It had not helped that D'Angelo had stupidly bragged to Will a little too loudly about how much higher the percentage of English speaking police officers was over firemen. Raphael had spoken near flawless English for Will. She had wanted to slug both of them. D'Angelo had hovered in the background feeling about as useful as the debris that smoldered around them. She had taken the opportunity to compare the Graham in front of her with the Graham she had read about.

Will was beginning to remind her of one of those misunderstood saints, favored with a gift from God but doomed to live as an outcast among his own because of it. His god given gift had seemed to get him into a lot of trouble, and driven him to the fringes of society. And, he appeared to revel in his exile; he did not try to be sociable. He seemed to prefer his own company, unwilling or unable to engage with the people around him. She had known that Graham was not going to behave like one of the crew, but D'Angelo and certainly Raphael had expected him to be more socialized. Instead, he had been polite but very reserved. Graham had elevated avoidance to an art.

Except when it came to his psychiatrist. The two of them behave as though they have known each other a long time. D'Angelo knows that is unlikely given Clayton has lived here for years and Graham arrived in the last couple months. They look enough alike to be related, but personality wise, they are quite different. She gazes at Will, his expression distant deep in his own thoughts, as he examines the exposed and melted wires that remain at the point of origin in the grim vestiges of Rossi's room.

He had already done his thing, had in fact done it three times, once in the basement, once in Rossi's suite, and finally in his own suite. She had expected something a little more dramatic.

She had watched Will mentally recreate the events of the fire that had destroyed half the palazzo effectively ruining everything he owned in the process. His hauntingly expressive eyes had swept over the remains, like a broom collecting clutter in an attempt to piece together the cruel forces that had robbed him of his lodgings and consumed his belongings. At least that is what she understands he was attempting to do with his almost psychic ability.

After visually assessing the scene, Graham had quietly stood motionless with eyes closed each time. He had stood like that for several minutes as though in a trance, breathing regularly. He had shivered a little when he had opened his eyes again, but otherwise his psychic episode was rather unremarkable.

Upon becoming fully conscious again, he had stuck his hands in his pockets and chewed at his lower lip until his eyes had finally alighted on her, blinking in surprise as though he had forgotten she was there. But as bewildered as he appeared, D'Angelo knew his mind was at work observing everything and making associations and connections effortlessly with his eidetic memory and his empathy.

She's still not sure how that works.

Graham may not be as bewildered as he appears, or as he likes to appear. Some reports would have her believe all of his mannerisms are suspect. He mimics behaviors on the spectrum to mask the dangerous psychopath inside. His apparent social awkwardness is explained as pretense, that he is fully aware of how attractive and distracting he is and he uses people's reaction to him to his advantage. D'Angelo is very assuredly fascinated.

D'Angelo is fascinated by the ability he is supposed to possess and the rumors circulating about how that ability turned him into a killer, a killer sent to seduce another killer. She has not entirely embraced the rumor mill about Graham, but she has not entirely dismissed the rumors either.

There he squats on the floor against the wall, examining the remains of the damage, remote and behaving as though he is invisible in the shadows when he must know he is anything but.

She has read up on Will Graham quite a lot since meeting him a month ago. And there was plenty to read. Perhaps he does have reason to want to be invisible. He does not have much of a fan club back home.

She had been fascinated by the Chesapeake Ripper stories. The only reason Graham's name had come up was because of his connection to the Chesapeake Ripper, some serial killing cannibal who had been a shrink in Baltimore. It was the kind of sensational crime story that could only happen in America. Reading about Graham's involvement in the case was unavoidable and his story was about as intriguing as the Ripper's.

Graham had the misfortune of being the guy who let him get away. Before that, he had been the guy who had lost his mind trying to catch him. Now it would seem he is the guy who will not let him go.

What she has read does not seem to match what she sees before her. She has read some very damning testimony from his trial. Some of it from some fancy expensive shrink named Chilton who had said Graham's entire persona was fabricated. She does not know about all that but she does not doubt the police reports she has read, or the vicious news articles she pulled up out of various archives. She cannot reconcile the troubled former FBI special agent or whatever he was with the young man on the far side of the room, with his large blue eyes that reflect an awful lot of hurt for someone so young. No matter what he is or what he may have done.

There is a quiet strength in him that reminds her of her father, a man she respected and who even now provides the litmus test for potential dates…

D'Angelo almost smacks herself. She feels her face grow hot. She wonders what is wrong with her today. Will Graham has just lost everything he owns, at least what he owns in Florence. The last thing on his mind is dinner and a movie and it should be the last thing on hers. Except it isn't. And she has moved way beyond the dinner and movie.

She should be more sensitive to his state of mind. What is it about death that makes people think of sex?

She reminds herself there's his damned shrink to consider. Clayton is legit. He is well respected in Florence and Rome. He is an excellent psychiatrist as far as she can tell. But, while Clayton is witty and she has to admit, handsome, his interest in Graham does not seem entirely professional. There is a certain protectiveness of Graham that extends beyond the doctor and patient relationship they claim. She has been trained to be observant and that training tells her there is something else going on between them. She looks at Will wondering how far that something might go.

She needs a bottle of water.

Will decides there is not much more to see here. His suite was unrecognizable. There is nothing to salvage. It had taken him several minutes to identify his laptop. He had snapped a few pictures, for Jack, but his apartment was a total loss.

Neither is there any evidence to indicate the fire was anything but accidental. An overloaded circuit had sparked and ignited the cotton fibers of the Oriental rug in Rossi's living room. She had likely plugged in one too many appliances into an extension cord and plugged that into the overloaded outlet.

Will had not been able to plug in the toaster and run his microwave at the same time without the lights flickering. But, it is the timing that bothers him. With the exception of this weekend, he has spent every single night in his suite since arriving in Florence. That Signora Rossi had picked last night to plug in multiple appliances… Will rubs at eyes that sting from too much smoke and too much thinking.

"Detective?" Will says to D'Angelo who lifts her head, "Do we know what appliances she had plugged in to the socket here?"

"They are still identifying the rubbish. They will match it up with the list she left her insurance company. If she even made a list. I can send you a report when it's done. What are you thinking?"

"I don't know…just thinking." Will rubs at his eyes some more. He can't take much more of the smoke and figures D'Angelo has had her fair share of it as well.

He should probably just be grateful providence smiled upon him for once. He should probably start thinking about somewhere else to live. He knows he can stay at Daniel's; that an offer will be forthcoming, but he also knows that staying with Daniel could easily become moving in with Daniel.

While not an entirely unpleasant thought, not by far Will acknowledges with a smile, Will is acutely aware of how emotionally draining that could prove for Daniel. For both of them. There is also the fact that he has not lived with anyone since college. He likes his space. It would appear Daniel does as well. He could certainly be living with someone if he wanted to be. Will realizes he knows nothing about Daniel's current personal life, has seen no evidence that he has a personal life…

"Got a place to stay for the next couple days?" D'Angelo appears beside him sucking on a bottle of water. She hands one to Will who accepts it gratefully. He is parched. It has been hours since he drank something besides coffee with breakfast.

Breakfast at Podere Violino seems like it was days ago. How did he get from there to this?

"Uh, Dan…Doctor Clayton is likely amenable to a…temporary imposition." Will says in between chugs of ice cold water.

"Amenable, huh? If you don't mind me asking…"

"I probably would."

"I was going to ask what you are in therapy for."

Will finishes off the water, wipes his mouth and looks around the palazzo while he speaks. He finds it unsettling to look into D'Angelo's face for very long. He is aware she stared at him shamelessly the entire time they went over the scenes. He thinks she must have read about him and can likely deduce what someone like him would be in therapy for, but her tone suggests she is genuinely curious. Will cannot be completely honest with her no matter how genuine she is. He cannot be completely honest with anyone.

"My job, my former job…with the FBI is…was physically and emotionally traumatic for me. I am trying to work through some job related issues without relying on medication. I've been on meds for the injury and I wanted to…talk through it without being on anything."

"I can understand that. I imagine it would be easier to block stuff out rather than deal, at least until you are ready. I read about what happened in Baltimore."

Will is quiet. He has said too much to her already. When she's not being pushy, those big brown eyes of hers are very…engaging. He is running out of things to focus on.

"Look, Will, there haven't been any murders here like the ones in Baltimore. There is nothing even close on the radar and I would know."

"I know that. But he would have changed his signature, his M.O. by now and most certainly his appearance." Will stares at his feet.

D'Angelo has so many questions she would like to ask Graham, but there is one that is foremost on her mind. "Why do you still look for him? I mean, why does it have to be you?"

"Glutton for punishment?" Will rubs at the soot collecting around his neck. He knows D'Angelo wants an honest answer, so he will give her what he can. "I feel…responsible."

Will finally raises his head to look D'Angelo squarely in the face; her very pretty sun kissed brown eyed face. D'Angelo nods as she finishes off the rest of her water bottle.

"Maybe Doctor Clayton should help you with that in your therapy because from what I can see, you are clearly not responsible. Lecter is."

******

Daniel stands up from his seat in the grass, wipes off his pants. He has taken advantage of the relative solitude by napping a little. He cannot shut off the emotions of the people around him, and there are a lot of people, an awful lot of people. What he can do is tune them out, so they become like white noise or like static from a radio station.

He becomes too distracted in large crowds and then he can't think clearly. If he can't think clearly he becomes anxious, extremely anxious, and he is a little too old to have panic attacks. This is why he can't go to concerts or ball games. This is why he keeps an Ipod plugged into his ears all the time. This is why he still lives with his dogs he thinks with a wry smile.

"Hey." He says, as D'Angelo and Will approach from the husk of the building that still smolders obscuring the blue sky above. "So, what's the verdict?"

"All is as it appears to be." Will says. "I guess we can go. What happens now? Who do I contact or does someone contact me?"

"See that van over there?" D'Angelo points about half way down the block, "There are officers to take down your information and coordinate with insurance companies. You contact your insurer on your own. It takes time to file all the paperwork, but if you get the forms from us first, it goes more quickly."

She glances at Daniel, "There are also some mental health personnel there, but you evidently already have your support system in place."

"You mind?" Will says to Daniel.

Daniel looks as tired as he feels. Will figures if there is a line, he'll forget about it. Let Mason eat it. Still, knowing the FBI, he'll get chewed out for the laptop. He'll get chewed out for it anyway. He has to account for the laptop. Well, Jack does. Let him explain how it got to Italy.

"I've waited this long, go ahead, Will. I'd bring the car around, but I think walking would be quicker at this point."

Will nods. It is essentially a parking lot where they are. "I'll be right back."

Daniel gives D'Angelo the once over after Will has put some distance between them. She is very cute in her sooty little outfit with the smudges of ash on her cheeks and arms. Her head comes to about his nose, even with the heels. Daniel wonders why she wore such impractical shoes to a fire. Bad shoe judgment aside; she does seem to have the self-assuredness to handle Will. Given her warm fuzzy feelings, she is thinking about him right now as she watches him approach the van.

D'Angelo feels Clayton looking at her even though she pretends to gaze around. She thinks now would be a good time to get some answers while Will is occupied. She takes a breath and turns to speak her mouth already open and forming the words when Clayton abruptly turns to her.

"Oh. You were about to say something?" Daniel asks, knowing full well she was.

"No, go ahead. You first." D'Angelo snaps her mouth shut.

"Well, about these crime scene discussions you've had…"

"What about them? You trying to tell me how to do my job?" D'Angelo eyes blaze right up and Daniel feels her anger like a pin prick, quick and sharp.

"No, no…but it is your job – not his. Not anymore. I am trying to do my job and getting him involved in crime scenes is not helping."

"He's good at it. He offered…"

Daniel gives her a hard look at that remark and she purses her lips. He decides to let it go. He would rather have her cooperation than set off her temper which seems pretty easy to do.

"Detective…" Daniel sighs, he should not have to spell this out for her but, "What do you think profiling crime scenes does to him? I mean, what do you think he's in therapy for?"

"He said to talk through his recent injury. And you took him off his meds?"

Daniel rolls his eyes. He has no idea what bullshit Will told her. "He did not want to become addicted to pain meds, and he doesn't like the way anti-depressants make him feel. But thinking about crime scenes and the crimes, is harmful to him. Psychologically."

"What do you mean exactly? I know he thought about that Ripper case so much he got in too deep, got himself hurt over it. He sees all the clues and evidence in his head, like a big computer, no?"

"No." Daniel cannot believe she doesn't understand. Will must not have told her much at all.

"He feels it. He recreates it in his head and he feels what the killer and victim feel, what they think. Can you imagine what it's like trying to go about your own life after that? Trying to fall asleep after that?"

D'Angelo throws her head back and looks up at the dark cloud overhead. She cannot imagine what Graham must go through. She has a tough time shaking off the sight of crime scenes some nights. She thinks how he did it with her watching just this afternoon. He was not only gathering evidence, he was experiencing it.

"Alia, he can think like anyone, anytime, all the time. He is…unique. I've never had a patient like him, never met anyone like him."

Daniel looks away from her to give some time to process. He watches for Will, not wanting to have him wander back up to them, unnoticed, to hear them talking about him.

D'Angelo thinks if he can think like anyone, he can think like her, like his shrink even. She figures that must make for interesting therapy sessions. She realizes he does pretend to be afflicted with certain social disorders, but because he needs a buffer when he deals with people. Not because he is a raging psychopath.

Merda! Graham must be seeing Clayton because he is still haunted by thoughts of the Ripper. More than just thoughts apparently. He is apparently trying very hard not to be a raging psychopath.

"Mio Dio. I…I didn't realize…how could I? How is that even possible? No wonder…"

"No wonder he's in therapy? Now you know. And you should keep that to yourself. I told you because…"

"Because you want me to understand how important it is that he stop. But he keeps doing it, doesn't he?"

"He likes to help. It was his job for a long time. But his job nearly cost him his life and his mind."

D'Angelo is quiet for a change. This Clayton is right. She supposes Graham may seem more together than he actually is. She does not believe someone with Graham's resume would casually be in therapy. There is clearly much more to his ordeal than she knows and much more than either Clayton or Graham is willing to tell.

"Look Alia," Daniel doesn't smile or try to look charming. He knows that his physical assets do not move her at all. "If you care about him, and I get the feeling that you do…"

Daniel pauses. She actually blushed just now.

“Be a friend. Or…ask him out.”

“Ask him out?”

D’Angelo feels embarrassed suddenly. She could not be that obvious, could she? Her heart skips a beat as she wonders if Will picked up on it. She cringes clear down to her soiled toes.

“Yeah. Why not? Maybe even fuck him.”

Daniel almost laughs at the look on her face. The look and the tingle of heat he feels from her confirm she has already thought about that. Quite a lot.

D’Angelo stares at Clayton. Her face is beyond warm. She looks to the van to see if Will is still talking and filling out forms. He is on his way back. She looks back to Clayton and wonders what his angle is. She decides to test the water and see if he’ll bite.

“I thought maybe you already had.” She stares stubbornly into the imperturbable sea of green.

“Had what?” Daniel does smile now.

“Fucked him.”

“Really. Well, I wouldn’t let a little thing like that stop me.”

“A little thing, huh?” D’Angelo smiles rather broadly like a piranha. Teeth and all.

“Ah, walked right into that one.” Daniel looks up and sees Will approaching. He nods his head and D’Angelo rolls her eyes, turns to look at the building, again. She composes herself before turning back around.

Will is showing the forms to Daniel when she does. Daniel does not look up or give any indication that they spoke at all. She wonders how he does that so easily and figures it must come with his profession. Clayton is not what she expected. Neither of them is.

“If you’ve had enough for one day, I know I have.” D’Angelo says.

“Yeah, about time to pack it in. Thank you, Detective, for all your help today. I mean it.” Daniel says. He does mean it. He likes D’Angelo or at least she is growing on him. She manages a cool smile.

Daniel figures Will must be very distracted not to notice D’Angelo’s composure is fractured.

“Yes,” Will says, folding the papers up and sticking them in his back pocket, more rolled than folded and sticking up over his belt. “Until next time.”

Will smiles not knowing what else to say. He looks back and forth between the two of them, senses something hanging in the air and figures they must have had some words. D’Angelo had made no secret of her impatience with Daniel. Will finds this odd given that Daniel is way more sociable than he is. She does seem to have a problem with male authority figures and as his shrink, Daniel must present as such to her. He shrugs it off.

“You know where to find me if you need to.” D’Angelo decides to leave before she says something really stupid. Or, before she delivers a parting shot at Clayton. She muzzles it, reluctantly.

D’Angelo walks off, very tired and more than a little dazed. She knows she will be replaying this afternoon over in her head as she falls into her bed this evening. She is so tired; she may not wait until evening. Her shift was over hours ago. She had waited for Will Graham. And as she walks away, she decides she was not disappointed. She will see him again.

Daniel watches D’Angelo walk towards the barrage of fire trucks and assorted other emergency vehicles. He looks at Will who is watching her, too.

“She turned out pretty nice for a cop.” Daniel says.

“Yep.” Will replies, full of his usual wit. Daniel senses the tiredness in Will, can feel it in himself. The emotional roller coaster today is taking its toll.

“You are not thinking of going anywhere but my place, right?” Daniel says. “You have to be completely spent about now.”

“Just about. Found yourself another stray, huh?”

“Yeah, and you’ll fit right in. C’mon, let’s get outa here, go get cleaned up, get something to eat…to drink.”

“I could use a drink.” Will says. “Several, in fact.”

Neither of them speaks as they walk back to the Mercedes. Daniel feels the sense of loss and the fatigue from Will. There is a heavy knot in his chest that twinges a little when he looks into Will’s face. He lets Will slouch, silent and deep in thought, against the open window as he drives back to Fiesole. Daniel does not feel much like talking either. Nothing like losing everything you own to ruin an otherwise truly fantastic weekend. Daniel feels relief more than anything; relief that Will was not home when that fire started. There was nothing Will could have done though he might have tried, knowing Will.

Daniel is very grateful that Will had not been home; grateful that Will had been with him.

Chapter 35

Chapter Summary

Aftermath of the fire, Will and Daniel settle in. Daniel gets a call from Du Maurier.

"You know you can stay as long as you need. I don't expect you to recover from this tomorrow."

A long sigh drifts from Will as he leans against the door jamb, one foot in and one foot out of Daniel's bedroom. Daniel thinks Will finds himself in that position more often than he would like, perpetually on the precipice of something or other.

"Seems like you are stuck with me for a little while. I'm going need some clothes of my own though." Will tugs at the collar of his tee.

Chapter 35

Aftermath of the fire, Will and Daniel settle in. Daniel gets a call from Du Maurier or Dumont as he knows her.

Will sits on the couch in the living room reading over the insurance forms. Daniel is upstairs taking his long overdue turn in the shower.

He and Daniel had unpacked the car, dragged everything inside without saying too much. The dogs had gone nuts, and while Daniel had seen to their walk and their dinner, Will had wandered around the house in a daze, a tumbler two fingers full of whiskey in his hand, just observing and allowing his mind to acclimate to the idea that he would be staying here before finally stripping off the filthy clothes and hopping in the shower.

He had almost fallen asleep under the steady stream of hot water and had to let cold water splash all over him so he wouldn't be tempted to crawl into bed and pass out. That…would have been rude.

While the idea of staying here with Daniel is comforting, Will understands this gives Daniel virtually unlimited access to him. The multiple sessions a week had been taxing enough. Will had at least been able to leave, put some distance between them. This weekend has unalterably changed the dynamic between them. He glances down at himself, at Daniel's pale blue tee and boxers that fit snugly around his body.

Will doesn't know if he should groan or laugh. In the space of two days he has gone from seeing his psychiatrist to sleeping with him, both literally and euphemistically. And now, within the last couple hours, he has found himself homeless. He has to call Jack. He needs to open that email from the Paolini twins. He can't wait to fall into a fitful sleep and dream about Hannibal. He feels incredibly vulnerable. He feels…raw.

He looks in the fridge and closes the door back up again. He opens the liquor cabinet, considers another drink, and then closes that door back up again. He decides the sandwiches and iced tea were enough to go to sleep on. He is unspeakably tired. He should turn out the light and go on up to bed.

He heard Daniel shut the water off a few minutes ago. Bella is stretched out in her crate at the other end of the living room near the kitchen. Daniel is clearly not coming back downstairs tonight. He is already collapsed upon his bed, Cara at his feet. Will tosses the papers on the coffee table and turns out the light.

Daniel sets his alarm and shoves Cara off his pillow. "Scoot. Scoot. Points for trying though. Missed me didja?" He buries his face in her neck and runs his hands along her back and is rewarded with the thumping of her tail.

"Are you making out with your dog?" Will laughs from the doorway.

"Oh yeah, just got to second base…" Daniel flips Cara over and rubs her belly. "I uh, have to go into the office tomorrow. Mondays are nuts, you know after a weekend people need their shrink. I could reschedule Tuesday's patients if I need to…"

"No, no. Unless you want to catch up on your sleep. Don't cancel patients on my account."

"You know you can stay as long as you need. I don't expect you to recover from this tomorrow."

A long sigh drifts from Will as he leans against the door jamb, one foot in and one foot out of Daniel's bedroom. Daniel thinks Will finds himself in that position more often than he would like, perpetually on the precipice of something or other.

"Seems like you are stuck with me for a little while. I'm going need some clothes of my own though." Will tugs at the collar of his tee.

"We'll go shopping downtown Florence. But, until then, we seem about the same size so help yourself."

"Your closet…not really my style…"

"Oh, well then, you can always go without…" Daniel grins.

An exasperated huff comes from the doorway. "I'm sure I can manage with your summer wardrobe a few days."

"Ok. The house smells like smoke so you can have laundry duty while I'm gone tomorrow but if you just want to sleep all day, go ahead. Trauma is no joke and you have been traumatized today."

"This? This hardly qualifies as trauma. Barely a blip on my screen." Will smiles a tired smile.

“Yeah, right. It’s late. I can hardly keep my eyes open.” Daniel clicks off the light on the night stand. “Goodnight, Will” Daniel says to the darkened room.

The bed sinks on the far side. Will sits on the bed stroking Cara in the dim light from the street lamp.

“No guest room?” Daniel asks as his head hits the pillow.

Will slides into bed next to him, pulls the sheet up. “I would just find myself in here eventually.”

****

“Buongiorno!” Maria greets Daniel on his way up the back stairs to his office. He waves and smiles but does not want to engage Maria, not this early. He needs more coffee first.

“How was your weekend? You went on your fishing trip didn’t you?”

“Yes, and everything was great. Thanks again for arranging for the gear and handling all the expenses.”

“You wouldn’t know what to do without me.” She says moving to stand at the bottom of the stairs. She can see the print of Raphael’s Triumph of Galatea from where she stands.

“You look a little rough this morning. Quite a weekend, Hmmmm?”

“It was rather eventful, yes.” He does not need to be reminded of how rough he looks; he feels rough, like a hundred miles of bad road rough. Daniel figures she probably has not realized the fire mentioned in the paper this morning was Will’s residence. She will eventually, but Daniel has patients to see, his first already sits in one of the couches in the lobby sipping an espresso.

“I should get upstairs so you can send Signora Carnivale up.” Daniel turns to resume his walk up the steps with feet that feel incredibly heavy this morning. He holds the cup of coffee in his hands tightly and wonders how many more cups it will take to really wake him up.

“Any more arrows find you this weekend?” Maria’s playful voice follows him up the stairs.

Daniel stops on the steps, turns around to face Maria. He knows she means well and she is teasing him, but he has allowed too much latitude in this regard and if he does not enforce some limits she will continue until she says something truly inappropriate, probably in front of other people and she will not be able to walk it back.

Daniel is also not in the mood for it. Not at all. He shared in Will’s anxiety soaked dreams again last night and found sleep a rare commodity. He reminds himself not for the first time he has to get Will to talk about his dreams. Daniel might be able to make sense of his own if he understood the images that sent Will to clenching at his sheets.

“Maria, my therapy with Mr. Graham is confidential. It is also not a casual topic of conversation and it is deserving of more than innuendo.”

“Doctor Clayton! I didn’t mean anything by it.”

“Well of course you did, Maria. Mr. Graham is my patient. You will not discuss him with me or anyone for that matter.”

“Aren’t you in a mood this morning?”

“Maria…enough already.”

“Not discuss him? A little hard to do when he comes in here three times a week. None of your patients get that many sessions a week with you.”

“His particular issues require more time and that is all you need to know. And Maria…” Daniel’s voice trails off as she moves away from the bottom of the stairs, either distracted by something or ticked off at his tone. Well, he’s little ticked off, too.

“Maria?”

“Yes, Doctor Clayton?”

“You may cancel Mr. Graham’s afternoon sessions.”

“For how long?”

Maria’s face is tight. Daniel knows she is right now wondering what happened this weekend to cause the change in scheduling.

“Indefinitely.” Daniel says watching her face twitch as her mind scrambles for explanations. He climbs the rest of the stairs and savors the quiet of his office before he tells the receptionist to send up Carnevale.

Two patients later, it is nearly lunchtime. Daniel wonders what Will is doing. Hopefully, he’s just taking it easy and catching up on whatever it is he needs to do. Daniel had told him he was welcome to anything in the house, including his laptop. He hopes to be able to talk with Will about the files from his Italian investigators in France with news of Lecter or his family when he gets home this evening.

Daniel likes associating home with Will. Despite the events that brought him there, Daniel is pleased that Will is there.

Daniel’s desk phone beeps. The receptionist downstairs interrupts his thoughts to tell him there is a Doctor Dumont holding for him on line two.

“Hello. This is Doctor Clayton.”

“Ah, I am pleased to get hold of you this morning. I am calling about my patient, Lydia.”

“How is she?”

“As well as can be expected, she has her good days and bad days. This weekend was more of the latter.”

“Sorry to hear that.”

“We talked about your ideas for therapy and she is open to trying. When would you be available for a session?” Du Maurier breathes into the phone. Daniel can hear some classical piece of music in the background. He recognizes Ravel’s Boléro and thinks that an odd piece to play at eleven in the morning.

“Good. Let’s hope a little canine bonding helps with her feeling so isolated. I’ll look at my schedule. Were you thinking about next week?”

“Actually I was hoping for something this week, if there is some way you could fit her in.”

“Well, I did have some rescheduling in the afternoons this week. One hour long session around 4 any day you like.” Daniel decides Lydia can have one of Will’s sessions. He certainly won’t be coming in to the office for a while.

“I had an idea about our initial consult with Lydia. She has not been in an office setting for over a year now and I thought if you wouldn’t mind a house call…

“A house call? Lydia does understand she is seeing a doctor. Going to the doctor’s office is pretty standard. If she has some issue with sessions in an office setting you might have mentioned it earlier.”

Daniel shakes his head and is glad Dumont can’t see his face as he speaks. Why does this have to be so damned complicated?

“She would like to meet you with some dogs if that is possible. She thought she should experience the therapy in a place where she is comfortable and I agree.”

Daniel is trying to keep the annoyance out of his voice but it is pretty difficult with Dumont switching things up on him. Lydia is sounding less and less like a young adult with problems and more and more like a spoiled and indulged child. Daniel is wondering how many of her issues might have been avoided if someone had simply told her “no” a long time ago.

“I take it she has more issues than you had time to discuss previously. Which issues do you want the canine therapy to focus on?”

“Her main issues are as I described, and we agreed that her tendency toward suicide and other attention seeking behaviors would be the targets of the canine therapy. That has not changed.

“Ok. Because its efficacy would be limited by multiple goals. Too much expectation is counter-productive.” Daniel says to Dumont, Ravel’s overly long opus still playing in the background.

“Well, to that end I was thinking that since you live in Fiesole and her father’s winery and estate are just outside, that you might be willing to bring dogs out there and we could have the session on the grounds.”

Daniel thinks this is highly indulgent behavior and his instinct is to disagree, but he also knows the family. At least he knows a little about them and understands that if Lydia does not want to go a doctor’s office, that somehow the doctor will be persuaded to come to her. Her therapy must be awfully expensive.

“What did you have in mind?” Daniel asks thinking that a therapy session at the patient’s home will run quite a bit longer than an hour. And then there is the travel time.

“Perhaps this weekend? Or late afternoon on Friday? Can you bring dogs on such short notice?”

“Lydia understands these are therapy dogs? That they are trained?”

“Oh, yes, she understands they are for therapy.”

“Does she understand this is an initial consult to see how she responds to the dogs? And how the dogs respond to her?”

“Of course. And if all goes well, you will pair her with a dog that fits her needs and personality. Lydia will want a puppy of course…”

“Lydia will have what I decide she should have.”

Daniel waits for Dumont to argue or at least express irritation at his tone. He does not care if she takes umbrage to his attitude or not. This therapy is quickly becoming a nuisance and he does have other concerns and patients. He thinks Dumont is the type to press an advantage and would have no problem monopolizing his time as she clearly allows Lydia to monopolize hers.

Daniel does not let any of his patients monopolize his time… Daniel frowns. That…is not entirely true, is it?

“I think Lydia might benefit from your style of therapy Doctor Clayton.” Dumont says after a thoughtful pause, and Daniel can imagine her lips drawn into that tight smile he had noticed by the pool.

“I hope so. As for the dogs, I can bring two dogs this weekend. I’d rather not do it on a Friday, after working here.”

“Wonderful. Does Saturday afternoon work for you, say around three?”

“I can make that happen. Do I just show up at the gate?’

“I can send a car for you. But you have to transport the dogs, don’t you?”

“Yes. Just let me know where you want to me go, and I will be there.”

“Well then, I will call you with directions. I am so pleased we could make this happen soon. I am most grateful.”

Daniel is not sure for whom she is grateful, herself or Lydia. Daniel gets the feeling that Lydia is not only one he is accommodating.

“I look forward to hearing from you. Ciao, Doctor Dumont.”

“Ciao, Doctor Clayton.” Dumont says in her clipped accent.

Daniel does not usually introduce the patients to the dogs until after an initial session to go over expectation about the goals of the therapy and expectations about the dogs. Dumont seems to have some sort of timetable imposed on her to account for her pushiness. Then again, she just may be pushy in general. Daniel decides he will worry about it Saturday.

Right now, he has to get through the rest of this horrible Monday. He looks to the phone on his desk and thinks about calling Will, but decides to leave him alone, give him his space. Will would call him if anything was wrong. It’s almost eleven-thirty. Daniel hopes Will is settling in.

Chapter End Notes

The next couple chapters have Will experience odd dreams or hallucinations at Daniel’s house. Hannibal’s will have a conversation with his cousin, Roberta, and dinner with Du Maurier wherein both the vipers play a little quid pro quo. I am out of state visiting family and the atmosphere is conducive to neither solitude nor concentration. I will do my best to post next weekend. D'Angelo does have a roll to play and it is always good to have a friend in law enforcement especially if you are ex-FBI on the trail of an intelligent psychopath.

Chapter 36

Will takes a trip through his own memory palace and sees some images that seem more like hallucinations than dreams. He loses time again while checking out Daniel’s piano.

You want me to see good in Hannibal?

If it helps you see the good in yourself, then yes.

Will sits at Daniel's piano, skimming his bare feet along the pedals as he contemplates his discussion with Daniel from the car yesterday. The caress of his feet across the pedals floods his consciousness with memories like an overflowing stream running concurrently with the stream of now. Will lets the now slip away like one of his lures helplessly adrift as the reel spins in his hands.

He runs his fingers over the ivory keys thinking of the last time his fingers graced ivory. That would be Hannibal's black keyed harpsichord. The eighteenth century Flemish harpsichord that sat in the far corner of the salon upon the polished marble had often provided the setting for softly spoken subterfuge over snifters of brandy. The best deceptions are couched in truths and Will knows that embedded in the deceptions they had traded with each other, behind the metaphors and beneath the artifice, they had also exchanged glimpses into each other. Hannibal had revealed himself in snatches as had Will.

They were, each of them alone. Loneliness, a singular emotion they had in common, had been painfully apparent to each of them in those snatches and glimpses. Perhaps the shared aloneness is what had prompted the honest revelations that occasionally found expression amidst the artful parleys they exchanged with each other. But unlike the dinner table or the chairs in Hannibal's office, the bench at the harpsichord forced them to sit side by side, and when they played the carefully calibrated instrument, the need to take up a position and hold it seemed to dissipate with the music. The physical closeness had resonated deep inside to allow genuine enjoyment to surface unmarred by the contest of wills that usually marked their conversations.

The duets had marked a sincere collaboration born of a mutual desire to experience harmony in their discordant partnership and for a stolen moment neither had held sway over the other.

The occasions at the harpsichord he had shared with Hannibal seem now to have occurred on a different wavelength, within a different universe almost. The universe of the Ripper, of Jack and the FBI, and of reckonings had disappeared, replaced by an alternate universe where Will sat playing an eighteenth century Flemish harpsichord sipping brandy in borrowed pajamas at one in the morning with a brandy sipping serial killing cannibal in pajamas nuzzling at his neck. It had been a surprisingly comfortable universe where the two of them actually just talked and played, and at least for the duration of the music; it was the other universe that had seemed mad.

These were moments when Will truly questioned whether he was engaged in a reckoning or a becoming. And the question lingers still.

Will does not remember how the marble floored salon with enough art and décor to rival a museum became their sacred space where reality was anathema and talk of their associates was taboo. He thinks the custom might have started one evening after dinner, after that first weekend he had spent almost exclusively at Hannibal's home making a monument of Tier. Will had wandered into the salon while leaving Hannibal to his kitchen and his culinary compulsions.

Will's fingers stroke the keys at Daniel's piano as he recalls the notes for Beethoven's Für Elise, one of the more simple compositions Will had attempted on Hannibal's harpsichord. The piece was not really suited for harpsichord but slowing the tempo had helped. Will had not noticed Hannibal listening from the doorway, tea towel in hand as he polished a wine glass, until the movement of his shadow had caught Will's attention. Hannibal had disappeared back into the kitchen but had returned a moment later sans towel and glass.

He had crossed the room with a casual yet commanding gait in trousers and socks with his shirt unbuttoned to his navel and sleeves still rolled up to stand beside Will at the bench. Will had responded to the simple lift of his chin and the subtle softening of his eyes by scooting to one side to allow Hannibal to take a seat at the lower octaves. Hannibal had glanced at the sheet music once and then proceeded to play the bass clef notes of Beethoven's most popular solo piano piece waiting for Will to join in.

Will had hesitated and Hannibal had repeated his notes and his invitation with nimble fingers and Will had let his right hand float above the keys until he counted the correct measure to join in. It had taken only seconds for Will to relax against the warm shoulder next to his and for the next several minutes, only the music had existed.

After that, the harsh realities existing beyond the gates of 5 Chandal Square never intruded upon their time in the acoustically perfect salon where notes and words ascended to the ceiling and floated away. For the space of a sonata there had been no universe but theirs. As unsustainable as it was, their universe remained sacrosanct until…Will leaves the thought unfinished.

Will had never been able to mentally catalog everything in Hannibal's salon and he knew Hannibal put items away and replaced those items with yet others, possibly to keep him stimulated. It had worked. The salon had been Will's favorite room in the house. Walking around it had been like strolling through the Smithsonian. The cultured side of Hannibal had been on display, not to mask the violence that was part of him, but rather to augment it and, Will thinks, shine light on the darkness inside Hannibal.

Will had advised Chilton to shine a light on his relationship with Hannibal. He had told Chilton that Hannibal worked in the shadows and denying Hannibal his shadows was the only way to expose him. After Miriam Lass had suffered a complete meltdown and shot Chilton, mistaking him for her abuser, Will had ignored his own advice and had joined Hannibal in the shadows believing that the only way to catch him, to lure him. That had worked out so well…Will does not hop on that train of thought either.

But actually, there in Hannibal's salon among all the books and art and music Hannibal had lurked also. Hannibal did not always operate in the shadows. Sometimes he sat in plain sight.

Ever the willing mentor, Hannibal had opened himself up to Will in that grand salon. He had invited Will to know him, to see him through the literature and art that formed the foundation of Hannibal's universe. Nothing Hannibal did with Will or for Will was without an element of instruction. Or persuasion. In Hannibal's universe they were one and the same.

If Will could recreate those duets and conversations in his mind, could use his imagination to recreate the contents of that room, he could shine a light on the dark corners of Hannibal's mind that continued to elude him. Will thinks of his recent dreams and the way the dark scaly eagle always manages to stay ahead of him. Is he chasing it or following it?

His reimagining of Hannibal could also benefit from a look at that email from the Paolini twins. Too bad the internet was down or whatever was causing that damned yellow exclamation point to obliterate the access bars icon on the tool bar of Daniel's laptop. Any scrap of information on Hannibal's family or his past would contribute to the Hannibal that continues to evolve in his subconscious and manifest in his dreamscapes. Light and dark. Good and evil.

He recognizes Daniel is trying to frame good and evil as fluid concepts rather than as absolutes because Daniel has recognized that Hannibal does not see good and evil as absolute concepts. Hannibal does not define either concept in any traditional sense. Will used to, but he's not sure that he does anymore.

I've given up good and evil for behaviorism.

Then you can't say that I'm evil.

You're destructive. Same thing?

Evil is just destructive? Storms are evil if it's that simple.

As Daniel had pointed out, everything is relative, even good and evil. Good and evil are human constructs imposed on human behaviors and motivations since the dawn of civilization. Will has never been especially religious. He understands the function religion plays in societies but had never given much thought to the role of faith in his own life. Or the absence of it. Will has always found acts attributed to the Almighty to be arbitrary at best.

I liked killing Hobbs.

Killing must feel good to God too he does it all the time. And are we not created in his image?

Depends on who you ask.

God is terrific. He dropped a church roof on 34 of his worshippers last Wednesday night in Texas, while they sang a hymn.

And did God feel good about that?

He felt powerful.

Leave it to Hannibal to frame Will's own doubts so eloquently. Will learned early on that his prayers often went unanswered and he had found little to no comfort in words that rang hollow at every funeral he had ever attended. Will had considered his lack of faith might have something to do with God's lack of response to his prayers over the years, but he had also observed the same absence of intervention among the pious. And yet he found himself uttering a prayer now and again in case someone was listening.

I prayed I would see Abigail again…

Hannibal giveth and Hannibal taketh away. Nothing like a lover scorned to bring out Old Testament style retribution. He wonders if the fact that he can rationalize and understand Hannibal's actions means that he does empathize with Hannibal.

Don't confuse empathy with understanding, Jack…

Don't let empathy confuse what you want with what Lecter wants.

Did he? Does he still? Or does he cloak his desires in confusion so he doesn't really have to look upon the soiled raiment beneath? Just like Hannibal's meals were so much easier to swallow down if he didn't really think about them too much. But he had thought about them as he had chewed and swallowed every morsel on his plate. He had shared in Hannibal's destruction and creation; consuming the ritual sacrifice no longer as oblivious guest, but as participant.

Will had known how the act of consumption was Hannibal's way of undoing the perpetrators who had offended his peculiar sensibilities. They were never truly vanquished unless they had been ceremoniously eaten, consumed, and made a part of him. Eating flesh was a sensuous and carnal experience, as sensuous and carnal as the act of sex. Hannibal is a connoisseur of flesh and his association of flesh with sustenance and of eating with sex had been clear enough to Will.

Hannibal had made his associations clear to anyone who paid attention. Will figures most people ignored what was right in front of them all the time. The placement of erotic imagery around the eating areas of the house was not accidental or thoughtless or random. The act of consuming flesh in all its forms was a sublime act.

Is this meat an act of god, Will?

Will's offering of his own flesh to Hannibal that night after killing Tier had been a consummation of sorts. Like the human flesh Hannibal had prepared lovingly in his kitchen, Will had been similarly prepared albeit with much more adoration. Will had known Hannibal's desires, had known for a while, and he had allowed Hannibal to strip, bathe, rinse, tenderize, and metaphorically eat his flesh that evening.

He had known how much his acquiescence would please Hannibal and how his act of surrendering would gain Hannibal's trust. Will had not been prepared for how letting go in that bed would affect him, or how incredibly easy it would be. Hannibal had seen a flawless transformation because it had been genuine. Will had discovered that following the urges he had kept down for so long, giving in to his impulses and recognizing them for the inspirations that they were had been both deliciously exhilarating and terrifying.

Hannibal had encouraged him to become intimate with his instincts. He had not only manufactured events for that purpose; Hannibal had also been grooming him, conditioning him all along. After Will had sent Matthew Brown to kill him, Hannibal had decided Will was something more than a curiosity, a pet project. Apparently, Hannibal had found Will's newfound violent urges compelling enough to kill a judge and remove enough doubt about the fabricated copycat to get Will out of the jam he had placed him in. And when Will had resumed his therapy of his own volition, Hannibal must have taken that as his cue to become the mentor.

Will kicks at the pedals. Hannibal had also fallen in love with his would be pupil. How did Will feel about that? Hannibal had manipulated Will into becoming intimate with his instincts. And Will had loved that intimacy, had felt the awful seductive power of it, and there had been moments when he had loved Hannibal for it, had felt a connection to him. Hannibal had essentially raped his mind, and not just once, but over and over. Will has feelings for him still, and Will cannot reconcile the love with the hate; cannot reconcile his sense of justice with the inhumanity of Hannibal's deeds.

And yet, Hannibal always had a response to Will's righteousness. Hannibal had never tried to purge Will of his righteous anger rather he had always offered an alternative to Will's rigid perspective. Hannibal had tried to persuade his pupil. To what end? Daniel had asked Will to consider a similar question.

You have to ask yourself what it is he wanted from you.

Hannibal would have played mentor to his pupil for a finite period of time. What had Hannibal envisioned beyond that? The idea of family had been laid waste on his kitchen floor. But Hannibal had not killed him for a reason. If Hannibal had wanted Will dead that night; Will would already be dead. He had left Will with the choice of going quietly into the stream or…what?

Will had been prepared to walk quietly into that stream. Baltimore's paramedics are apparently very well trained.

Will does know what Hannibal did not want from him. Hannibal had not wanted Will to provide him with a version of himself. And most of the time, that is exactly what Hannibal got. It is what Hannibal must have glimpsed in the cracks of Will's façade that had guided his surgeon's hands to avoid every vital organ in Will's body as he had ripped open his flesh.

Adopting Hannibal's mannerisms and thinking had been relatively easy. Will had used his gift to maintain the essence of Hannibal's persona when he was with Hannibal. But thinking like Hannibal was not the same thing as feeling his feelings. Will wonders if his imagination had overtaken him so completely that he had overwritten his own emotions with his version of Hannibal. Or had the act of slipping into Hannibal's skin finally aroused the emotions and instincts he had been able to push away and keep down?

Will had empathized so closely with Hobbs that he imagined Hobbs eating and showering at the same time as he. He had crawled so far into Hobbs' pathology and psyche that Will had felt intense guilt over the victims, like a part of him had actually killed all those girls while another part had stood watching in horror. If he could do that with Hobbs in a matter of days, Will is beginning to realize the magnanimity of what he has truly subjected himself to with Hannibal.

He knows that Daniel has already guessed that a part of Will eagerly participated in Hannibal's therapy and welcomed the previously unacknowledged urges. The question remains how much of Will's transformation had been abetted by Hannibal's drug induced conditioning while he had been sick. Will has always harbored violent feelings and urges, but who really set them free?

This was the big question he wrestled with all the time. As Daniel had pointed out Will had a central fear and all his other fears stemmed from this. All of Will's doubts thread through his mind winding and weaving their way into this one tapestry of fear.

The savagery he had experienced with Tier had been a long time coming. His desire for violence and intimacy that had found expression with Hannibal had been honest and raw and the culmination of either the most brilliant demonstration of psychic driving ever, or the awakening of a side of Will that was as much a part of him as the rest.

How could doing something so bad feel so good? Will had expected to hate himself in the morning, but he had not. He had awakened with a whole new set of issues to ponder and fret over. It hadn't helped that the object of his afflictions had lain beside him, a subtle pleased smiled about his lips while twirling locks of Will's hair around warm fingers. He had felt plenty of hatred for Hannibal up to that point. He had felt an unbelievable amount of self-loathing. His actions regarding Tier were criminal and punishable by law. His surrender in that bed, a necessary punishment, was the price paid to bring Hannibal to justice. What did it mean to enjoy the punishment?

What did it mean to enjoy the company of the architect of all the madness?

Hannibal was equally capable of acts of compassion as he was violence. And why not? God was a capricious deity, always dropping the roofs of his churches on the faithful while songs of worship fell from their lips. Like god, Hannibal was beyond measure in wanton malice and matchless in his irony.

Every creative act has its destructive consequence, Will.

Will understands Hannibal's manipulations and scheming are played out on a cosmic stage because Hannibal sees himself at the center of a universe where he is both creator and destroyer. Hannibal believes he embodies both good and evil. He does not prefer one over the other. Rather, the universe bends to his will. He is no more or no less than a force of nature, a primordial element, like an ancient deity.

Christians do not have a monopoly on capricious deities. Will thinks of Hannibal's fascination with mythology evident in his art selections and his own drawings. Will cannot recall without smiling the numerous works of art that had received alterations beneath Hannibal's brush.

Images of the art in Hannibal's house flip through the rolodex of Will's mind as his fingers find the notes on the keyboard of Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata, memory guiding both actions simultaneously. His conscious mind continues to dissect and rearrange past conversations seeking new insights as fingers glide over the worn ivory of Daniel's baby grand.

Hannibal's pathology requires a much larger tableau than Christianity. Hannibal's narcissism draws upon a deeper theological well. Hannibal is epic. Hannibal is theatrical. Hannibal sees his actions in mythical proportions. Will thinks of the shores of Aulis and his ancient Greek dreamscape. Homer's Iliad is not the only fount from which Hannibal's wellspring of narcissism flows.

Whenever he's mentioned in the Iliad, Patroclus seems to be defined by his empathy.

He became Achilles on the field of war. He died for him there, wearing his armor.

He did. Hiding and revealing identity is a constant theme throughout the Greek epics.

As are battle-tested friendships.

Achilles wished all Greeks would die, so that he and Patroclus could conquer Troy alone.

Will thinks on Hannibal's words. At the time, Will had been more focused on the transparent allusion to his relationship with Hannibal, as Hannibal had likely anticipated by presenting Will with that charcoal sketch. But there was something more. Hiding and revealing identity was a common theme for the Greeks. What had Hannibal really been alluding to? And what other epic Greek themes would appeal to Hannibal's immense ego?

Will looks up from the piano to see Cara and Bella lying at his feet, their wet noses tickling his toes. He looks at the clock on the mantel. Barely eleven. As Will scans Daniel's bookshelves he thinks talking to Daniel more about Hannibal's pathology would be a good idea. The volume of titles on psychology is rivaled only by history with literature running a close second. The more Will examines the titles the wider his grin becomes. It looks like Daniel took many of the same college courses as he did.

Will sighs and turns his attention back to the keyboard. He glances again at Daniel's laptop on the table and frowns at the annoying yellow blob that still hides the internet access bars on the toolbar.

Daniel did ask him to consider the good in Hannibal. Will knows he has been thinking around the topic. His conversations with Hannibal about good and evil had left Will with the impression that Hannibal operated outside of such mundane mortal considerations. Daniel is aware of this. Will kicks at the pedals. It is Will's interpretations of good and evil that Daniel wants Will to consider by assessing Hannibal's. Daniel knows Will identifies with Hannibal through his empathy.

Daniel's gentle prompt was designed to cause Will to consider the ways he and Hannibal see and that Will has been seeing Hannibal's deeds through the lens of his values, not Hannibal's. Will's recent dreams would seem to concur. Hannibal sees himself as a problem solver; problem solving is hunting. Hannibal also seeks to solve other people's problems, and although he ignores the pain his fixing caused for all his patients who required it, Hannibal was trying to help them, to do what he thought best for them.

Our conversations, Will, were only ever about you opening your eyes to the truth of who you are.

What you did to me is in my head, and I will find it. I'm going to remember, Dr. Lecter, and when I do, there will be a reckoning.

I have huge faith in you, Will. I always have.

Will rubs at his face. Conversations aside, Hannibal had injected Will with more than words. Will wonders if the illicit therapy he remembers in bits and pieces has anything to do with Hannibal's huge faith in him. Hannibal honestly believed he was helping Will; that he was doing good. Was it good for Will or for Hannibal? Should Hannibal's therapy prove effective, and it was effective, Will corrects himself, what would be the benefit to Hannibal? Altruism was not in Hannibal's vocabulary.

You have to ask yourself what it is he wanted from you…

Daniel continues to be very good at his job. Will has to admit he is very thorough. His understanding of how Will's mind works with all its spiraling associations and imagery combined with Daniel's grasp of Will's relationship with Hannibal has led Will down a path he deliberately throws obstacles onto in order to avoid taking that very path.

Will sits up straight on the piano bench. Perhaps this is why his dreams of the burned out forest keep repeating up to the point where the serpent tailed eagle with the blood red eyes waits beyond the crest of smoldering rock. Will continues to wake up just before he summons the courage to go further.

A brilliant crack of light flashes about Daniel's living room and Will blinks his eyes to the sharp pain in his head that seems to resonate with the bright light that continues to flash. For a moment the piano pedals at his feet and the keys at his fingertips change in the light, morphing into a different piano. A piano of oak not mahogany sits before him; a straight back, not a baby grand, is shoved against faded wall paper of tiny pink rosebuds and pale green leaves. Will breathes the scent of salt air through his nostrils and the room vibrates again, like it had in his suite at Via dei Benci.

Will's chest tightens and he closes his eyes willing the flashes to stop. The tightness in his chest isn't so much about being frightened and Will is frightened by the odd hallucination, but he recognizes the ache of loneliness that rends his soul as he sits rocking on the bench the way the wound in his gut tears at his mind. He feels…alone, again.

Ever feel abandoned, Will?

"Will…Will?"

Will's eyes move beneath heavy lids. He had been sitting at a different piano, in a different room. Not Daniel's house…not his house in Wolf Trap either…but he has seen the room before. Where…

"Will!" Daniel observes Will with marked concern as he sits at the piano his eyes fluttering slits in the sunlight that streams from the patio. He wonders how long Will has been sitting here like this… The dogs pace by the door and Daniel realizes they have to go out, that Will has not taken them outside recently, maybe not all day.

He sits down on the bench and grabs Will by the shoulders, gentle presses to nudge him out of his trance. Will begins to shake himself free from wherever he is.

Will sees mist before his eyes, smells whiffs of ocean air and realizes his eyes are not fully open. Consciousness causes the mist to dissipate and Will sees Daniel's face staring into his, his large green eyes moving all over Will.

"What happened?" Will says, wondering what is causing Daniel to look so worried. He just spaced out for a minute. But Daniel should not be home yet…

"How do you feel?" Daniel asks, his hands still perched on Will's shoulders. The trembling begins to subside…gradually beneath Daniel's fingers.

"Disoriented."

Daniel searches Will's eyes, sees the familiar clouds of hurt and confusion there, feels the anger and frustration from him welling in his own chest. Daniel resists the impulse to break contact, knowing that moving away would also hurt, would at least injure what pride Will has left. Having Daniel find him like this is embarrassing enough.

Will blinks as he looks at the mantle clock.

"It's…is it four thirty, already?"

"Yeah. I closed up early, left at four instead of five. Took about half an hour to get home. Will, when was the last time you looked at the clock?"

"Eleven." Will says his face like stone.

Will looks around the living room and his eyes fix on Bella and Cara pacing by the front door. Will rolls his shoulders and scoots back along the bench, he feels Daniel's hands fall away.

"Ah, I'm sorry. They must really have to go. Go ahead and take them out. I'm ok."

Will stands up and shuffles into the kitchen. He has not changed his clothes from what he wore to bed last night; Will stands over the sink still wearing only boxers and a tee. Daniel watches him take a large glass from the cabinet and turn on the faucet over the sink to let the cold water run.

"I'll be here when you get back. I suppose you'll want to talk…"Will says his attention focused on the water swirling down the drain.

"We can talk if you want, or not. Get your head right first."

Will laughs as he shakes his head and stares into the sink. “That’s what I’m paying you for.”

Daniel ignores the bitterness. He can’t blame Will for his sour humor this afternoon. Apparently, leaving him here alone without something to do, without something to engage his mind besides his thoughts is not a good idea. Daniel hooks the dogs up to their leashes. He will give the matter some thought while he walks them.

Will could not know that Daniel stopped billing Verger over a week ago. Daniel figures the less Verger knows about Will’s therapy the better. And, at this point in their relationship, Daniel cannot bring himself to accept the money. And not just because he finds Mason Verger a repulsive human being.

He does not consider Will his patient any more. Even before the events of this weekend had redefined their relationship, Daniel had been struggling with the patient doctor label. With Will homeless and crashing here for an indefinite period, a reevaluation would seem to be proper.

“I’ll be back soon. Why don’t you start dinner or something? Make yourself useful.”

Daniel catches Will’s eyes as he turns toward the front door. As he opens the door to let the dogs bolt outside he feels relief from the spark of amusement he saw in the dark clouds. Hopefully, the storm will have cleared by the time he gets back.

Chapter End Notes

> As promised, the next chapter is a Hannibal and Du Maurier chapter but... I was unable to finish it fit for posting. I will do my best to post by mid-week. Being out of state put me out of my element and I overestimated what I could accomplish. Hope everyone had a Happy Thanksgiving!

Chapter 37

Chapter Summary

An interesting conversation with Hannibal's cousin Roberta.

"I was deeply saddened when our correspondence stopped; I decided to let you be the one to resume contact." Roberta says after a moment.

"I knew you were taking care of Uncle Roberto. I am aware that our correspondence did not set well with your father. There was always that. He had made no secret that you were off limits."

"He only meant to protect the family, his family, Hannibal. He always loved you, but you forced him to make choices."

"And did daddy dearest ever learn of your proclivities?"

Chapter 37

An interesting conversation with Hannibal's cousin Roberta.

Hannibal sits on the veranda that faces the back of his villa. His sleek black swim trunks are still damp and his thin muslin shirt clings to his moist skin. Water still drips from his hair onto the terry towel that hangs around his neck. He thinks he should just have Gianni dye his hair back to blonde completely rather than contend with the constant nuisance of adjusting for the chlorine. Hannibal tires of the ruddy brown he had settled upon. The brunette locks belong on someone else.

The morning sun strikes the surface of the pool and Hannibal blinks into the glare stubbornly refusing to allow the sun to obstruct his view of his garden or detract from the delight of his flowers.

He is speaking to his cousin Roberta, who had not phoned the other evening and will now inform Hannibal of the reason for her delay, at least he hopes that is her intention for calling this morning. Talking with Roberta has always been easy and pleasant. Because she was not present during his sojourn with her father and Lady Murasake, there are no negative associations or memories of Roberta. He had corresponded with her years ago after he had arrived in Maryland alone; reduced to his own resourcefulness. She had been a taste of home across the miles.

After he had acclimated himself to university life and could arrange for a third party in France to forward his letters under cover of another name he had struck something close to friendship with his distant cousin. It had quickly become apparent that they were not so distant.

His relationship with his cousin had developed completely independently of Uncle Roberto. A necessary deception thinks Hannibal, and most fruitful. Roberta guards her secrets and her sanctuary as jealously as does Hannibal.

Hannibal is certain this is the reason she has been so cooperative. Hannibal's recent exploits had been splashed all over the news, all over the planet apparently. Hannibal can imagine Roberta was not pleased at having to field questions because she shared his name. But, Hannibal can also imagine her dispensing with all the unwanted attention for as long as it lasted with the same quiet authority as her father, and Hannibal thinks, with something close to his own focused efficiency. His uncle's words had proved prophetic. Hannibal thinks his cousin a more worthy successor to the family legacy than Roberto ever was. At least his own father had embraced the heritage of the name and all that came with it. Had died embracing it.

"So, you are enjoying Florence?" Roberta says in her delightful accent.

Her English is grammatically perfect, but her French is evident, especially when she punctuates her English with French phrases. Hannibal thinks he could listen to her melodic voice all day. And he could since Tatiana has supplied him with an untraceable encrypted phone. He does not know how it works and does not need to. Tatiana knows how it works.

He knows his cousin has also obtained a similarly untraceable phone else they would not be exchanging such sensitive information with each other. She had tried to explain how her number could register on his phone despite the encryption, but Hannibal had been too eager to converse and her words had washed over him as incomprehensible as the babbling of a proverbial brook. The thought that Roberta might actually know how all the technology works wrangles at a corner of his brain.

He swallows a mouthful of anisette biscotti that dissolves tastelessly on his tongue. He chases the residual powder down with a swig of orange juice from the huge snifter that sits on the Murano serving tray. He has not had much of an appetite the last couple days. He attributes his lack of interest to the heat. At least that is what he tells Du Maurier.

Hannibal's fingers caress the Venetian glass glittering on the table, concentric circles of cobalt blue alternating with deep red and dark yellow hues. Plans, within plans, within plans…

"You know you do not have to speak English on my account." Hannibal says his fingers tracing along the circles of the tray.

"Oh, mais oui, Hannibal. I need the practice as I so rarely hear it. Why, I cannot remember the last time I watched a show from the UK or the US."

"What a coincidence, neither can I."

Hannibal enjoys the purr of laughter from her. It has been a while since he has been warmed by soft laughter so thoroughly. Hannibal misses that warmth and the source of it but turns his thoughts to the matters at hand before he imagines soft curls and a stubbly profile on the other side of the curtains that hang to his right.

“Why did you stop writing?” Roberta asks abruptly, causing Hannibal to sit up a little straighter in his burgundy and white chaise lounge. He slips the towel from around his neck and tosses it over the back of the chair. He honestly does not remember why.

“When did I stop?”

“I believe the last letter I received from you was what…at least eight years ago. You had written that you had just left the ER at Maryland General. Why did you leave?”

Roberta falls silent. Hannibal searches his mind for an appropriate response. Roberta need not know every reason he left Maryland General Hospital.

Hannibal had found new hunting grounds. He had reluctantly left Johns Hopkins’ ER before Maryland General for the same reason. It was not prudent to stay too long in one place.

He had completed his psychiatric boards, had obtained his license to practice and had met Du Maurier at a conference. She had persuaded him to practice psychiatry full time. She had been very persuasive back then. He had enjoyed the power over life and death that being a surgeon had afforded him, but Du Maurier’s brand of psychiatry had provoked in him a different kind of power. The power he had wielded in the ER could not compare to the power of psychiatry in all its manifestations and all its possibilities. The opportunity to study the human condition within his own paradigm and to watch his patients bloom under his tutelage had been truly gratifying. Du Maurier had not been without her wisdom or her charms.

Psychiatry was such a versatile tool in all its vast manifestations. In the right hands of course.

He had noticed how alike he and Du Maurier were, how similar their perspectives on a number of topics, and particularly on the treatment of psychological disorders. Hannibal had found Du Maurier receptive to his particular talents and she had been a willing pupil – to a point…

Roberta is awaiting an answer. Hannibal gives her the short version.

“I had begun my practice by then already realizing that the pace of a surgeon’s life was not conducive to my other interests. I had found someone to share my interests, or rather thought I had.” Hannibal pauses, “I suppose I owe you an apology that is long overdue.”

“Not necessary. Long distance relationships are so difficult, even among family.”

“Relationships do not require distance to be difficult.” Hannibal glances at his cold demi-tasse of espresso, at the lemon rind that clings to the saucer because he never dropped it into the tiny cup. Because he had no taste for the beverage once he had made it.

“I suppose you still live alone?’

“Yes, and rather happily so.” Hannibal lies smoothly.

Roberta is quiet a moment. Although she is aware of the news from Baltimore, she has graciously refrained from alluding to it except to ease her concern that Hannibal was indeed safe. Hannibal supposes she will not challenge the abbreviated version he told her despite the fact that Hannibal knows she is as capable as he of reading between the lines. Of intuiting from the cast of characters which ones had likely been…interesting to Hannibal.

“It is a rare soul who finds contentment in a solitary life, Hannibal. Or have you simply stopped looking?”

“I suppose one never stops looking.” After a short pause he adds, “You are alone.”

“Hmmm. Now. But not always. Perhaps the Fates will allow you some measure of happiness once the storm that sent you back across the ocean has dissipated.”

Or perhaps the storm will follow me. “Perhaps…” Hannibal pushes the espresso to the other side of the table.

“I was deeply saddened when our correspondence stopped; I decided to let you be the one to resume contact.” Roberta says after a moment.

“I knew you were taking care of Uncle Roberto. I am aware that our correspondence did not set well with your father. There was always that. He had made no secret that you were off limits.”

“He only meant to protect the family, his family, Hannibal. He always loved you, but you forced him to make choices.”

“And did daddy dearest ever learn of your proclivities?”

“No…although he shared in them regardless. The irony.”

“And Murasake?”

“If Lady Murasake ever knew or suspected, then she condoned with every mouthful. Always enigmatic that woman, perhaps that is why my father loved her so.”

“How is she?”

“Oh, Hannibal. She died two years ago.”

Hannibal is quiet for a long moment. Though they had been separated by years, Hannibal had not thought them so many.

“From what did she die?” Hannibal asks remembering her face in half shadow as she had turned from him those many years ago.

“Heart failure. Cardiomyopathy apparently. No one knew and if she did, she never told anyone.”

“Ah, did she ever return to Kyoto?”

“No. She helped me manage the estates until she could no longer read the ink, until she could no longer see the paint brushes before her eyes.”

“She lost her eyesight?”

“Mon dieu, poor soul that she became. She suffered from macular degeneration, too. Inoperable.”

Hannibal does not want to imagine her beautiful jeweled eyes atrophied. He thinks fleetingly that had he been there he might have detected her conditions, might have saved…

A life without regret would be no life at all.

Hannibal is beginning to see a correlation between his age and the number of regrets. While a perfectly natural state of affairs for mortality, Hannibal finds the thought arresting nonetheless.

“It must have pained her, to give up her art.”

Hannibal remembers her beautiful drawings and the carefully applied brushstrokes upon the pottery she designed and decorated. The Japanese characters had been finely rendered upon the clay and then heated in the kiln in the little room off from the kitchen. Hannibal had helped her remove them, marveling at the fragile glazed bowls and vases.

“As she ached for you.” Roberta says quietly.

Hannibal knows she does not expect him to respond. He has never discussed Murasake with Roberta, but he never had to. Her father had told her all about Hannibal, a cautionary tale for his impetuous and precocious daughter. Lady Murasake had kept Hannibal’s secrets; it was Roberto who had unwittingly piqued his own daughter’s interests and...had whetted her appetites. Both brothers had managed to infect their children. Hannibal thinks Uncle Roberto should have moved a little further away from his brother and family in Soviet controlled Lithuania than France, but Hannibal would likely have found him regardless.

“Well, the reason I called then. These people you seek have long roots. I apologize for not calling the other night. I was awaiting some photographs. I will send them after we are finished speaking. You do want to know what they look like, n’est pas?”

“C’est vrai.” Hannibal agrees. Hannibal cannot imagine the apple falling far from the tree. They undoubtedly look like Matteo, Carlo and the rest of the Paolini family. Very much like the pigs they raise and train.

“They are part of a larger family that spreads all over Sardinia and more recently in Tuscany. The family includes the Paolini and a couple of other families, all related through marriage. They are a sort of consortium for hire; services go to the highest bidder. They are very dangerous, Hannibal.”

“Because they can be bought?”

“Because once bought, they are fiercely loyal. They are ruthless. This couple is brother and sister from a branch of the family with US contacts.”

“Are they a couple or brother and sister?’

“Well, both actually.”

“Interesting. And where are they now?”

“They are still in Saint Laurent.”

“What are they doing there, and perhaps more importantly, how did they know to look there?”

"They must have found something on my father when he lived in Prague for a time, before we moved to Paris. They have yet to approach me or anyone I know personally. They are circumspect and prefer to hire temporary assistance. I imagine the temporary assistance disappears. No way to trace inquiries or side jobs back to them."

"Very neat." Hannibal says as he rubs the soft cloth over his chest. Despite sitting beneath the shelter of the veranda, the Tuscan sun burns ever brightly and the air is heavy with moisture already despite the early hour. Hannibal knows his next question will arouse his cousin's curiosity and her ire.

"Do we know who they are working for?"

"No…who would they be working for, Hannibal?" She asks in an even tone.

Hannibal smiles and raises his brow. Roberta is refreshingly direct. He has become too used to Du Maurier's oblique and meandering metaphors.

I need to know if this is a vendetta."

"A vendetta. Hannibal, what have you done? Rather, what else have you done?"

"I did what was necessary to protect myself."

"Who were they? I would need to know the names of any family you dishonored…in self-defense."

"Of course. Same last name. A Carlo and a Matteo. I gathered that Matteo was a family favorite. Besides needing to know if the family seeks to avenge the cousins, I also need to know if the family has been compensated or further engaged by a Mason Verger."

"The meat packing Vergers?"

"The very same."

"My, my, you certainly do move within rarefied social circles."

"You have no idea." Hannibal smiles into the phone.

"You wouldn't have anything to do with Mr. Verger's recent and tragic accident, would you?"

"I was his psychiatrist." Hannibal offers.

"I see. Well then. I assume you wish for me to continue my surveillance of the twins?"

"Twins as well. Most intriguing. Please do continue if you have no objections?"

"None."

"And do let me know when they return to the vicinity."

"You intend to confront them?"

"I should like to invite them to dinner."

“Ah, then may I recommend a 2009 Agricola Punica? It’s from Sardinia. A delightful red blend, almost violet in color and very soft and elegant on the palate. I last paired it with…lamb.”

“Duly noted.”

“And Hannibal, your invitation may very likely provoke an invitation in kind.”

“I believe an invitation is forthcoming regardless.”

“I will send you the photos then. Au revoir, Hannibal.”

“Thank you, Roberta.” Hannibal clicks off his phone and squints at the yard while he waits for the photo file. His vegetable garden was well tended yesterday. Today, he can focus his attentions on the flowers, especially the roses. Hannibal thinks he will cut a half dozen for the dinner table tonight.

Du Maurier should be driving back to Siena about now. She will freshen up; perhaps take a dip in her hot tub, before driving to Impruneta. He wonders what sort of outfit dear Doctor Du Maurier will show up in this evening. Hannibal decides on the blood red roses for the table.

Chapter 38

Chapter Summary

Hannibal has his dinner with Bedelia. The vipers circle and seek a truce. Or do they?

Hannibal feels a quiet anger threading through his limbs. Thoughts meander around his mind the way his eyes linger over Du Maurier's petite form as she sits across from him. She appears to be enjoying the wine and the music but Hannibal knows her thoughts are as deep as his. And perhaps, just as dark.

He had told Du Maurier that he would handle Will.

Chapter 38

Hannibal has his dinner with Bedelia. The vipers circle and seek a truce. Or do they?

Du Maurier walks in front of Hannibal as he ushers her into his palatial and predictably aquamarine dining room at the back of the villa. Large unadorned windows are a must for Hannibal so he can always see his reflection and the reflections of his guests. The curtains will of course be drawn once again when celebrations have ceased. She can see the veranda through the entrance way, the panes of Venetian cut glass, elegant enough to rival any found in a church, open to the shimmer of the swimming pool Hannibal cannot do without.

She recognizes the violin concerto playing - Summer, from Vivaldi's Four Seasons. Not her favorite Vivaldi piece, but appropriate. The Baroque period seems to have overtaken Hannibal. She is surprised he has not replaced his harpsichord. Curious that…she understood him to play and compose on the one in Baltimore frequently.

She wears a chic Versace dress with her usual calculated perfection. The design plunges low in both front and back and the sensuous silk is the most alluring shade of red. Du Maurier knows the red of the dress will cast a subtle pink glow along the pale skin of her limbs and bosom in the soft lights Hannibal places around the dining room table.

She glides into the room and takes her seat, turning her head to the side to acknowledge Hannibal's graciously offered adjustment of her chair. He lingers at her side, face upturned to meet hers as he slides her chair closer to the table. As she turns her head to gaze upon the table setting her eyes alight upon the bouquet of fresh cut roses. The smile fades from her lips before she can catch herself. The roses, so freshly cut that moisture clings to the petals, are nearly the same shade as her dress. She manages to keep her mouth closed and jaw slack.

How does he do that? She reminds herself it is game of probability. He really had no way of knowing what she would wear; he only wants her to think that. Doesn't he?

Hannibal pauses a moment longer and lets a satisfied smile spread across his face. Du Maurier lifts her head and her smile reappears.

"Lovely roses, Hannibal. Yours?' Du Maurier shakes out her napkin and watches Hannibal take his seat across from her. He opens the wine as he speaks.

"Yes. Hybrid Tea. The first successful cross between hybrid perpetual and tea varieties was in 1867. The first modern rose if you will; a departure from the Old Garden varieties. These are a variation on that first flower."

Du Maurier picks up her glass to meet the bottle of Sauvignon Hannibal holds out to her.

"Well, to an evening of firsts."

Hannibal raises his brows, a gesture of surprise, his face a mask of amusement. "Now that would be a refreshing change, would it not?" He lifts his glass to hers. "To an evening of firsts, then."

And all its consequences.

Du Maurier feels the urge to gulp down the entire glass. That would be a first, too.

The meal of lightly spiced lemon risotto and foie gras served with an assortment of delicious cheeses and thick slices of summer sausage is undeniably superb as expected. Everything is perfectly seasoned and calibrated to compliment the equally spicy wine choice. Conversation ambles aimlessly as Hannibal finds topic after topic to dissect while Du Maurier drinks glass after glass of wine. Eventually, plates are empty and stomachs are full. Hannibal fills the wine glasses yet again.

Du Maurier takes the glass from Hannibal's hands and offers a smile and nod. He should know by now that despite her diminutive frame, she can imbibe her fair share of alcohol. In fact, she would wager she can hold her own as well as Hannibal. She has been drinking far longer than he has. If only Hannibal's guests in Baltimore had known how many of the selections served at his banquets and dinner parties had been hers.

Hannibal had proven to be a quick study. It had not been long before Du Maurier found herself out of the loop. Having been perturbed by her absence at his table, he had found he could get along quite well without her wine suggestions, too. Du Maurier is aware Hannibal has outgrown her in many respects and if she does not take the initiative to remedy the account situation, Hannibal will. That would be unacceptable.

She sits sipping the piquant Sauvignon from the Alto Adige region. She detects the tang of citrus and the earthiness of stone. Hannibal is always so very adept at pairing wines with entrees. She sniffs the bouquet once again thinking what an exquisite palate he has.

She reminds herself he also has an appetite for forbidden fruit, fruit that hangs so high on the tree that he stumbles up the ladder trying to reach it. It is a good thing she is here, she decides. Perhaps she can persuade Hannibal to show his hand, or at the very least she can offer him insight, if he will let her, like he used to. Du Maurier would very much like a return to things as they used to be.

But not if her association with Hannibal remains a pale imitation of what it once was. Not if she is to be resigned to an existence of waiting for the day Hannibal is eventually reunited with Graham. And a reunion will happen. It will happen because Hannibal wills it so. Du Maurier knows this is an eventuality, she has been with Hannibal long enough to know Hannibal and Fate enjoy a very comfortable relationship. But, it will happen when Du Maurier decides it will happen.

Du Maurier has decided that what Hannibal needs is to vent the pent up desires and frustrations that color everything he does. He needs something, or someone, to ignite his curiosity so that he falls into his familiar pattern of checking his impulses against hers, of sharing in the fabrication of a psychological mousetrap they can build together and then take apart. And in building their mousetrap, they can repair their fractured relationship to the degree that he is sufficiently placated.

Whatever his hopes or plans regarding Graham, Hannibal must be persuaded to show his intentions however concealed within conceit they might be. Du Maurier wants to leave this evening or perhaps tomorrow morning with some kind of accord between them.

She has a proposal for him this evening, and despite his penchant for trying to disarm her as he had done earlier with the roses, she is confident he will be intrigued with the new pawn she intends to introduce on the board.

If Hannibal insists on pursuing Graham, he leaves Du Maurier with no choice but to free herself of him once and for all. She cannot and will not live in Graham's shadow for the rest of her life. If she does manage to get the code and close out the account, Hannibal will come after her. She has no choice but to tie up loose ends.

Hannibal clearly wants his reunion with Graham. It is just as clear that he intends to finish whatever it was he started with him. Du Maurier doubts that includes another blade. Graham could not possibly forgive Hannibal. Hannibal's conceit will not allow him to admit he made a mistake. A very human mistake.

And because Hannibal seems to believe there exists even the remote possibility that Graham's near death experience at his hands did not fill Graham to the brim with revenge Du Maurier must manufacture a situation that refills that cup.

How satisfying and liberating it would be to dispense with both of them. And dear Doctor Clayton will provide the keystone in her own Arc de Triomphe.

Hannibal sits opposite Du Maurier also sipping at the lovely Sauvignon. Thoughts roll swiftly through his mind, a tide of possibilities for her behaviors and the resulting consequences of each. There are always consequences. The art of anticipating the most probable outcome lies in correctly accounting for the intended consequences and considering the unintended consequences.

And, unlike his precious Will, Du Maurier remains predictable. She wears her predictability like an old glove, familiar and comfortable. Hannibal thinks the viper might bite should he use a stick this evening. Hannibal will decide when she bites, and she will believe it is the only choice she has.

Like rudeness, jealousy is an ugly thing and apparently quite the motivator for Du Maurier. Hannibal had not realized Du Maurier's caution regarding Will had been rooted in such a pettiness although, in hindsight he should have. Hannibal had not considered jealousy until she had come to his office to inform him of her dismissal of him as her remaining patient. Understandable now, she had acted out of survival choosing to cut off her association with him; removing herself from the destructive radius should Hannibal continue his courting of Will. But it was her tart response upon hearing from Hannibal that he had resumed his therapy with Will on her way out his door that jealousy raised its ugly head.

I'm resuming Will Graham's therapy.

To what end? Besides your own.

He asked for my help.

Then maybe you deserve each other.

Her words had all the warmth of a frozen pond, and her eyes had held Hannibal's in a steely gaze. As if Hannibal had been the prey, undeserving of even her contempt. Hannibal supposes she had seen something of Will's budding potential beneath the veiled nuances exchanged between them as he had sat in her living room. She had seen Icarus and wanted no part of his fall.

Suspecting she would flee with the bank code was not the only reason Hannibal had donned his plastic suit. Suspecting that she might harm his precious protégé to protect her own secrets had also prompted Hannibal to drive to her house only to find it emptied of her save her perfume. She had set her game with the FBI in motion, in the hope that Hannibal would clean house before she had to implement it, leaving him her little message in a bottle.

She had known he would want the bank code. She had known he would come to her house for it. She had also known that he would not follow her, could not follow her because she had also known he would not leave Will. She had been correct about many things.

Hannibal wonders how long she had planned on leaving before she had arranged her own meeting with Will at BSHCI, how long before she had confronted him in his office. Hannibal had not known she had paid Will a visit when he had driven out to her home. Unbelievably, Du Maurier has yet to tell him of her visit herself. Had Will not mentioned it; he would still not know. She must suspect that Will had mentioned it at some point. Hannibal has to assume that she does not care.

She has since evidently come to view Will as an adversary worthy of her manipulations. Since Will had sent someone to kill him. Since Will had managed to enter Hannibal's inner sanctum. Since he had survived Hannibal. Since Hannibal had allowed him the choice to survive.

Hannibal wonders if she would dare attempt to remove him now should their paths ever cross. She has to know that to even touch him would cause Hannibal to dispatch her without a second thought.

Will belongs to him.

Before her fateful decision to involve herself in Hannibal's plans for Will, her sessions with Hannibal had reiterated over and over that Hannibal was walking into a trap of his own design. Will had still been at the Baltimore State Hospital when she had calmly reminded Hannibal, as though the thought had not already occurred to him, that by refusing to speak to Chilton and requesting Hannibal instead, Will had signaled his clear intent to manipulate Hannibal and by acquiescing to Will's invitation to continue a dialogue, Hannibal had signaled his clear intent to manipulate Will.

Hannibal had not disagreed but neither had he acceded to her observation. If she had harbored concerns about the nature of his relationship with Will, that particular observation and her articulation of it had carved out Du Maurier's concerns in high relief.

Hannibal could imagine Du Maurier reaching for a pint of Häagen Dazs after his session with her that day.

Will's release from BSHCI must have resulted in another pint and a large box of chocolates as well.

Still, she had chipped away at Jack, impressing upon him that he was being outmaneuvered, that Hannibal was in complete control when, in fact, she had been talking about herself the entire time. She had been confident that Hannibal would assume control of the situation.

She had also spoken to Will prior to speaking with Jack. Hannibal can only imagine that conversation since prodding Du Maurier about it would serve no constructive purpose.

Hannibal can imagine Will's inner conflict brewing inside as he had questioned Du Maurier with Uncle Jack behind the glass, and Du Maurier playing to Will's doubts with practiced compassion while delivering poisoned thorns designed to prickle and fester in the recesses of Will's mind. Hannibal will likely never know what actual words were exchanged between them, but knowing Du Maurier, everything she had said would have caused Will to question even the most unguarded and honest moments he and Hannibal had shared. She would have painted herself with a victim's brush most convincingly. Will had already known he wasn't the first to be subjected to Hannibal's persuasive therapy.

She had taken her own doubts about her place with Hannibal and had deftly deposited them in Will, a remarkable example of transference that should ordinarily not have any effect on the other person, except for Will whose empathy had no doubt interpreted her well placed thorns and had internalized the message that he and Du Maurier were merely curiosities for Hannibal in a long line of curiosities. Perhaps he had even recognized that she was his immediate predecessor.

Hannibal realizes now that he had never impressed upon Will enough how special he was to him. As unique as each patient was, Will had been singularly unique. Du Maurier had known that, had felt threatened by that, feels threatened still, but Hannibal thinks Will had not. Will's personality, his own lack of self-importance would have precluded the idea. Du Maurier's version of Hannibal would have been much easier to believe. Will could not have known Du Maurier's past with Hannibal and so, his imagination had created the version Du Maurier had constructed for him.

Hannibal can only hope that Will reevaluate his conversations with Du Maurier, that he reexamine her motives. He might be able to see her, as he had been able to see Hannibal. Hannibal would enjoy trying to posit Will's intentions then. There is another question that Hannibal hopes Will reexamines.

Did Will know that Hannibal had loved him? Truly loved him? Can Will even fathom what that means?

Does Will know that in watching him struggle against his impulses Hannibal had understood that resistance? That watching Will grow and evolve had caused Hannibal to feel pride in another – an emotion Hannibal was used to attributing only to himself. Hannibal thinks in that awful final embrace of blood and tears, Will might have understood many things even if his mind had not been equipped to process that understanding at the time. Will had felt his pain. Did he understand that no one had ever caused Hannibal such pain?

Hannibal hopes that by now, he might have finally wrapped his beautiful mind around certain realities. The universe they had created was sustainable; it was not limited by geography. The potential Hannibal had seen in him was god like in its majesty. Everything Hannibal had done for Will, and to Will, was to help him stop repressing who he was meant to be.

And for these realities, Hannibal had found him worthy of his friendship. But, Will had refused his gift. The potential of becoming a worthy adversary is also there. If Du Maurier had her druthers, Will would be knocking down his door right now to wring his hands around Hannibal's neck. And Du Maurier would not lift a finger to stop him. Except to try and extract the bank code while his trachea was being crushed.

Refusing is not the same thing as throwing away. Would Will refuse his gift of friendship again, if given the chance? Hannibal wants that chance.

Hannibal has never loved another being as completely as he has loved Will. He is haunted by the realization that he never truly knew if what he had seen was actually Will or a very convincing mask. The fact that he may never know rubs like sandpaper.

Hannibal feels a quiet anger threading through his limbs. Thoughts meander around his mind the way his eyes linger over Du Maurier's petite form as she sits across from him. She appears to be enjoying the wine and the music but Hannibal knows her thoughts are as deep as his. And perhaps, just as dark.

He had told Du Maurier that he would handle Will.

You have to maintain boundaries, Hannibal.

When the pressures of my personal and professional relationship with Will grow too great, I assure you I will find a way to relieve them.

And he had relieved those pressures, just not to her liking. Life was full of disappointments. And regrets.

Du Maurier is not to be trifled with, that much is certain. Her desire for his bank code is so excruciatingly transparent that Hannibal has begun to wonder if that in itself is not some grand deception on her part. However, her awareness makes her vulnerable. Hannibal need only meet expectations and then direct her gaze toward those expectations and keep it there. This evening's discussion should provide Hannibal with the requisite direction.

"We should listen to the music outside. I would prefer to finish the wine before I tackle the dishes." Hannibal says, rising from his seat.

"Of course." Du Maurier feels his hand upon the small of her back he guides her out to the veranda. She takes up a seat adjacent to him so she can set her glass down on the glass table between them. The dimly lit yard smells of fresh cut grass and chlorine.

Chapter 39

Hannibal and Bedelia resume their conversation on the veranda. A very Nietzschean conversation.

Hannibal leans back against his chair, allowing his meal and his thoughts to settle before engaging Du Maurier. He kicks off his shoes and thinks how Du Maurier will sit there, the thought to remove her own never occurring to her.

“I am aware that you have been checking up on our finances. You have phoned nearly every day. Too bad our account is not online. Any particular reason or just a general sense of impatience?”

Hannibal allows the corners of his mouth to curl up. He conjures something like affection to smooth the cold creases that would grace his face.

“I believe that you should not be surprised that I check on anything regarding Will Graham.”

“What is it that concerns you this time?”

Hannibal is prepared to be honest with Du Maurier. The best traps are laid with it.

This always goes better if I'm perfectly honest with you.

What would be the point otherwise?

Well, one of us has to be honest.

I'm honest.

Not perfectly.

As honest as anyone.

Not really.

Du Maurier is prepared to be bombarded with vagaries that disguise the truth. Hannibal is a master of disguise and actually believes he is being truthful.

“Which version of you am I seeing this evening?” She asks.

“Are you asking as my psychiatrist or my colleague?”

“Neither. Since you seem unable to define our relationship I will. I am asking as your partner. As the significant other who has been very patient regarding your recuperation.”

“My recuperation.” Hannibal stares at Du Maurier across the glass table. Her blue eyes glimmer with the soft candlelight that catches the diamonds of her earrings as she tucks a lock of silken gold behind an ear.

You've helped me to better understand what I want in a friendship, and what I don't.

“Yes, Hannibal. As you have counseled so many others through trauma and loss, you have now experienced both yourself. You grieve. And in grief we are capable of irrational thoughts and actions. I have made no secret of my concerns regarding Graham or our joint account. I think in your grief you have made an error in judgment by linking them together.”

Hannibal is quiet. She has been uncharacteristically candid. Hannibal does not think her above manipulation, but from her point of view, her sentiments are valid.

“Is that what you think I am doing? Making a mistake?”

“Let us be perfectly clear with one another about this since I believe our future together hinges upon it. I think you mean to use this gift as a ruse to locate Graham, either through a legal paper trail or through illegal channels opened by this measure. Further, I also believe that you already know he will never accept your grandiose gesture.”

“Then why would I go through the trouble of presenting him with such a gift?”

“To communicate by the action. He would know the difficulty of arranging the gift, would be surprised by the generosity of it, and might be persuaded to finally contact you. That is what you hope will happen, isn’t it? You tire of waiting for him and…I tire of watching you wait.”

“Please, go on.” Hannibal looks out over the swimming pool, allowing Du Maurier to spill her game plan as she attempts to convince him of the plan she wants him to see. He listens carefully so he can decide which aspects he will use to fulfill her expectations.

“If you insist. You wish to communicate that you value him still. You once compared him to an oil spill. Do you wish to contain it again? You have not moved on Hannibal. You are in fact, more entrenched than ever in your obsession. Why would you attempt to deceive me?”

“I had no idea I was so transparent.” Hannibal continues to look calmly out over the lights that shine upon the still water of the pool. Du Maurier uncrosses her legs, only to cross them again, the other way as she shifts in her seat. Hannibal imagines she must be weary of that tight dress by now.

“Graham has caused your person suit to come apart at the seams. You need not be concerned on my account. I am used to seeing versions of you although I prefer some versions over others.”

Hannibal concedes that she has seen more versions of him than he has seen of her. Du Maurier really has but one version of herself. But, it is a version that has evolved over time. She too has seams unraveling here and there. Seams that Hannibal has targeted since she decided to interfere with Will. There are always consequences.

“The stitching in your suit may continue to unravel under close scrutiny. Naturally, its construction and its maintenance are of particular importance to me.”

“I am aware of your priorities. Despite your romantic overtures, your preoccupation with our joint assets has been abundantly clear for some time. One might call it an obsession.”

Hannibal continues to sip at his wine although it has begun to taste acidic. Perhaps the heat has spoiled it; the glass is as warm as the backyard. He puckers his lips as he considers the tannins.

Du Maurier observes Hannibal’s disenchantment with the wine. She must seize the opportunity to clear the air about Graham and the account before she can present her proposition to Hannibal, before he becomes equally disenchanted with her.

“It would seem one of us must protect our assets when the other is incapable, or incapacitated.”

“Protect? Have I given you cause for concern?”

“Hannibal. Why did you ask me to authorize a transfer of assets only to leave them where they are?”

“Are you so eager to lose the interest? I told you why.”

Du Maurier leans closer and looks into Hannibal’s face. It is unreadable of course, but in doing so, she conveys her impatience at his avoidance.

“You told me a possible truth. Granted we do not easily trust each other and it is for this reason that we created the joint account. However, honesty in this regard is necessary if we are to continue the arrangement we have honored so far. If we are to resume the relationship we once shared. Do we intend to resume our relationship, Hannibal?”

“Is that what we are doing?”

Du Maurier reaches her hand across the expanse between them and curls her slim fingers around Hannibal’s larger fingers as they grip the arms of the chair.

“It is what I what I thought we were doing, would like to be doing. And you?” She looks up at him and Hannibal is struck with how beautiful she is. How convincing she is.

He takes her hand in his and leans to press his lips to her wrist. “I think “yes” is the answer to that.” Hannibal draws away and Du Maurier sits back in her chair, satisfied.

“Then, candor from you would be appreciated. Why the delay? You can appreciate that any transaction connected to Will Graham would give me pause in light of what happened. I understand that there would be difficulty arranging your…gift.”

“We have discussed this already…there were unforeseen complications that go beyond legal difficulty.”

“Because the FBI has flagged not only your transactions but Graham’s as well. Even if you can manage secrecy on your end, Graham’s modest assets would not bear scrutiny.”

“They want me to contact him so that he will lead them to me. And, I am not entirely sure that he would be unhappy about that.”

“At least we agree on something. Then may I suggest transferring the assets and deeds to the Cayman’s or to the attorneys to hold in escrow until the arrangements can be safely concluded.”

“I am always open to suggestion and to negotiation.”

Du Maurier presses into the back of her chair. She sets the tepid wine on the table. “What are we negotiating, Hannibal?”

“What did you say to Will when you visited him at BSHCI?”

“Ah, when did he tell you? You’ve had a long time to fixate on a singular occurrence.”

“I was waiting for you to tell me. Now, what did you say to him?”

“That he could survive what was happening to him. That I believed him. What he inferred from that, I cannot say.”

“I think we can both guess. What did you imagine he would infer?”

Du Maurier draws a deep breath before continuing. “He likely inferred that he was not the only person you had ever tried to persuade. And I do not doubt that coming from me, those words carried significant weight.”

“Why visit him? Why say anything at all?”

Du Maurier is gratified with the tremor of tenderness that catches in Hannibal’s tone. The wound Graham inflicted remains…raw.

“I was protecting my assets. And yours. He was in a very dark place. I darkened it even more. I hoped he would be provoked to move against you so that you would have to end him. And he did. But you did not end him. And here we are, again.”

Hannibal meets her gaze and she does not waver. Hannibal knows he cannot blame Will’s actions on Du Maurier’s interference, as significant as it was. There were many factors, all acting in concert. She is being truthful though without admitting to the jealousy, but Hannibal does not expect her to acknowledge that.

“Hannibal, I only did what I thought was the best for us. As you did what you thought was best for Will Graham.”

Hannibal blinks but says nothing. Du Maurier can see she has struck the nerve again. Not surprising. The nerves connected to Graham's wound are so close to the surface.

"If he is as perceptive as you think he is, and he returned to resume therapy with you, then he was aware of your desires, and being aware, he manipulated you using your own desires against you. Your awareness of his awareness caused you to become overconfident. Surely you can see this now?"

Hannibal marvels at Du Maurier's compulsion to reveal herself. He decides to reward her with more honesty.

"I knew he was working with Jack Crawford. It was the only way he could resume our sessions with some measure of control. He manipulated Jack to turn the other way so he could…follow his instincts."

"His instincts were to betray you. You let him climb your walls Hannibal and you let him get too close. Sometimes, despite our best efforts, our patients do not want what is best for them. Graham prefers his universe to yours."

"I was honest with Will."

"Were you honest with him? Which version of you did you let him see? Your person suit has many layers it would seem. Did you strip all of the layers away for him?"

"What a colorful metaphor."

"Perhaps you stripped away too much for someone with his unique sensibilities. You would never acknowledge the part of him that clung to his values and his sense of righteousness despite what you did to him, what you took from him."

You've helped me to better understand what I want in a friendship, and what I don't.

Someone worthy of your friendship.

Hannibal does not tell her that Will's tenacity, his ability to retain his sense of self throughout the gauntlet that Hannibal sent him through had signaled to Hannibal that he did possess the potential to become a worthy companion. A strong primal force equal to his own. Will was light to his darkness; morning to his night. And Du Maurier would have him settle for afternoons soaked in wine hazed bliss upon satin sheets…

"From what I could discern in our brief conversations, Will Graham was definitely responsive to your therapy. But instead of awakening a kindred spirit, you created a monster who seeks only to destroy its creator. Nothing I said, or could have said, would have changed that."

"It would appear I have you to thank for saving me from myself after all. You of all people know how…much I regret having to leave Baltimore as I did." Hannibal says without even a drop of sarcasm. He listens to her bait her own trap.

Du Maurier nods her head. Whether or not he actually believes what he just said does not matter. He is prepared to play.

"Sometimes all we can do is watch, Hannibal. I watched. I watched as much as I could and then I left because I could not bear to watch anymore."

But not before you interfered in what was mine. "What would you like to happen now?" Hannibal says simply.

"Between us? Or to Graham? I could ask you the same question."

"Both questions are salient, yes? He will always be in the room with us. I think the better question is what are you prepared to accept in order to resume our relationship and preserve our… arrangement."

"How would you characterize your relationship with him at this point? I believe I deserve an honest answer to that."

"Bedelia…" Hannibal pauses, looks away from the sapphire eyes that widen at the use of her given name. A gift of firsts, for her. "Estranged." Hannibal says quietly.

"And do you see that changing in the future?" Du Maurier's tone is softer now. Of course it is.

"No. Not really. But you do understand why I continue to try."

"Your concern for him is admirable, but you do understand he requires distance to work through his feelings and his guilt. From what I know of him, he carries an enormous amount of guilt."

"And fear. You do understand, don't you?"

"I understand that sometimes we want something so much, we do not recognize that we create the thing we seek when in reality we chase only dreams. If you must exhaust every avenue to find your truth, then do so. But, you seem to forget that I am the one who came with you, who is here with you now; not Graham."

Hannibal is well aware that it is Du Maurier and not Will sitting beside him at the moment. The awareness has become such a constant dull ache that Hannibal does not remember when he did not feel this way. Hannibal knows that Du Maurier sits there because of a bank account and he knows if it were Will sitting there, that bank account would mean nothing. Still, this is the hinge he has been hoping for. He can now open the door onto Du Maurier's board and proceed to take the queen for all she is worth.

"Tell me, what is it you want with regard to the account at Banque Suisse?"

"I'd like for you to either make your withdrawal and be done with it, or forget the matter entirely so that it becomes what it should always be, a non-issue."

Hannibal does not doubt Du Maurier much prefers the former and would be taken aback if Hannibal suddenly agreed to drop the matter; however, he does want to appear as though he intends to withdraw the assets for Will. Otherwise, he will have to wait for another opportunity to properly thank her for her trouble.

"Bedelia, now that I am cognizant of your concerns, I cannot in good conscience move anything until I am satisfied that the transaction is secure. I do not wish to jeopardize our assets either. The FBI is most thorough and I do not pretend to be an expert in these matters. But my attorneys do know experts."

"And when will these experts be in a position to act on your behalf?"

"I imagine within a few weeks, perhaps a month. Why?"

"Then, during that time, I would like to share something, rather someone with you. Like we used to." Du Maurier smiles over her glass.

Hannibal allows a look of surprise to grace his features. "This is proving to be an evening of firsts. First, you surprise me with your honesty regarding Will and now you present me with an intriguing opportunity."

"We both deserve a little diversion. I have to admit that I have had my reservations about proposing this joint venture."

"Reservations regarding what?"

"Regarding the therapeutic efficacy of it. But, after our discussion this evening, I think that this venture would be good for you."

"I'm not following you. To which part of our conversation are you referring?"

"The part about Will Graham. We are agreed that he will never accept anything from you and that his own guilt would prevent him from doing so?"

Hannibal nods.

"You make your gesture to send a message. You want to believe that he will appreciate the difficulty in arranging it and you hope that his heart will be softened?"

"Something like that. Intrigued enough to investigate." Hannibal says.

"The goose never forgave the swan, Hannibal. And Achilles lost his Patroclus."

Du Maurier is well acquainted with the universe Hannibal lives in. He has left enough of his drawings around to fairly advertise it. He exists in a universe of epic proportions, where everyone plays a role in the epic production and everything Hannibal touches is imbued with grand significance. None more so than Graham. He is the hero of his own Odyssey. He will understand her proposition better if she frames her intentions in terms that appeal to his…whimsy.

Hannibal is enjoying Du Maurier's game more with every minute that passes. Rather than try and seduce Hannibal out of his universe as she usually does, she has joined him in it. An evening of firsts, indeed. She must be very confident to leave her comfort zone. Or desperate. All the better.

"Is that how you see him? He is the goose to my swan?"

Du Maurier raises her brows as she stares into Hannibal's face. "Isn't he? Achilles was brought down by hubris, an arrow from Paris' bow. His weakness was revealed to the Trojans."

"Paris avenged Hector. As Achilles avenged Patroclus upon Hector."

“Regardless, Troy still fell. Fell to another act of hubris. They accepted the gift from the Greeks.”

“The Trojan horse. And Greece won.”

“At what cost, Hannibal? Hubris invariably invites the wrath of the gods.” Du Maurier taunts.

“I suppose it depends on which gods and knowing what they are capable of.” Hannibal responds.

Jack Crawford doesn't know what you're capable of.

Neither do you.

“You would be the goose to my swan I suppose.” Hannibal says when Du Maurier demurs with a sip of wine.

“I would be a swan, Hannibal. Like you.” She licks a droplet of wine from her lips, sits the now empty glass on the table.

“The swan spends much time in Fiesole. If your patient there requires so much of your time, she must be quite the topic of conversation in psychiatric circles. Is she this opportunity you speak of?”

“She is quite the topic of conversation, but the psychiatric circle is quite small. I have engaged the services of another psychiatrist to help with her therapy. He is an intriguing young man who presents an unusual opportunity for study.”

“I still don’t understand. I am no longer a practicing psychiatrist. If we are to influence your intriguing young man, in what capacity would I engage him?”

“You have grief issues. Engage him as his patient.” Du Maurier smiles at the stunned look on Hannibal’s face. Check, she thinks.

Hannibal has to admit that Du Maurier has outdone herself. This is becoming a most enjoyable game.

“And what would be so compelling about his therapy?” Hannibal asks.

“Since my therapy has reached the limit if its efficacy, you might benefit from some alternative therapy. His therapy involves pairing his human patients with canines. He has written extensively on the empathic possibilities that the human and canine bond offer.”

“Intriguing, but I have no desire to buy a dog.”

“You will. When people lose their dog, what do they usually do?”

“They replace it with a puppy. You are equating my loss of Will with the death of a dog? And this psychiatrist is the puppy?”

“Yes. Because the puppy looks just like him.”

Du Maurier fairly flushes in the wake of Hannibal’s impromptu smile. The glow from the lantern reflects in his dark eyes as he gazes at her and it feels like old times. She knows she will be spending the night.

Hannibal rises from his chair. He holds out his hand to Du Maurier who reaches up to take it. As he grasps her delicate fingers he feels the sense of power that has been so absent of late. He has guided her in leading him exactly where he wanted to be. Hannibal's future has brightened considerably.

Not so for the unsuspecting psychiatrist. It would appear Doctor Clayton is to be a part of the game Du Maurier wants to play after all. His bad luck to favor Will and cross Du Maurier's path. Hannibal's universe moves in mysterious ways.

Hannibal leads Du Maurier inside past the remnants of their evening repast into his sitting room. He gestures toward the splendid sofa and retrieves two snifters and a bottle of Italian Grappa, a Sangiovese variety.

"I think our new venture deserves a toast." Hannibal says warmly, as he pours a healthy amount of the clear liquid. Italians traditionally serve grappa as a chaser to espresso, but Hannibal prefers Du Maurier remain unstimulated.

Du Maurier can only smile. What an enigma Hannibal is. She had not dared hope her proposal would be met with such enthusiasm. Of course Hannibal would be charmed at the prospect of meeting Graham's mirror image. She has at last found a muse for his whimsy.

And Doctor Clayton will manage Hannibal well enough. Knowing how protective he is of his patients, he will never discuss Graham with Hannibal. She doubts Clayton discusses his patients with Graham. Clayton will never have Hannibal to his home, and because Graham now resides with Clayton, Hannibal will never see Graham in Clayton's office either. Any meetings between Clayton and Hannibal will be discreet and far from Graham.

Du Maurier sniffs at the fragrant brandy. It feels good to be in control. She smiles at Hannibal across the lip of her snifter. He smiles back and begins to unbutton his shirt.

Chapter 40

Chapter Summary

Recent events cause Will to question his therapy and his therapist. Daniel tries to address Will's concerns, but he's only human, after all.

Will pulls another chair up to the desk and looks at the laptop. The internet is up now. He could check his email when Daniel is done doing whatever he is doing. Will sees Daniel has left his email open. Will glances at Daniel rolling around on the floor with the dogs. He hesitates and then peers into the screen to scan Daniel's email. His eyes scroll quickly over names he does not recognize until he sees one he does.

Will is stunned. Daniel received an out of office email from Frederick Chilton. Will stares at the email. Daniel received it earlier today…

Chapter 40

Recent events cause Will to question his therapy and his therapist. Daniel tries to address Will's concerns, but he's only human, after all.

Will walks down the stairs in Daniel's house quietly his feet still damp and leaving imprints upon the hardwood. He feels refreshed after his shower and change of clothes, especially after apparently sitting around all day in what he had slept in the night before. He is concerned about the loss of time he experienced this afternoon. He remembers his thoughts up to a point, but he can't recall what he had been thinking about for nearly four and a half hours. He could say he was obsessively concerned about it.

He knows he drove from Grafton, West Virginia back to Baltimore without having any memory of the drive at all. He had shown up at Hannibal's office completely at a loss as to how he had gotten there. One minute he had been on a beach staring at a totem of bodies and the next, he had been freaking out to Hannibal.

He had been sick with encephalitis. Hannibal had combined his therapy with the effects of his illness to cause the lost time. That was then. But here, now, there is no illness and no unorthodox therapy. Well, not Hannibal's unorthodox therapy. At least as far as he knows.

Daniel has engaged him in very basic psychological therapy. Establishing trust. Defining boundaries, well - negotiating boundaries he thinks would be more…accurate. Daniel has mostly listened to Will although he has kept notes. Notes that Will has not seen and no doubt full of questions that Daniel has not asked him yet. Daniel doesn't think the encephalitis has returned. Will has not scheduled any appointment to find out. He supposes he should to rule it out.

Will considers possible correlations between Daniel's therapy and his episodes of lost time. At least there have been no flashes of light or vibrating walls when he has been with Daniel. But, Daniel did say he would tell him and he has. Will did hallucinate and zone out in Daniel's office frequently. Sometimes Will was aware, other times, he wasn't. Daniel sometimes had to prompt him back, and one time Daniel had slapped Will pretty hard to bring him back. The more Will had talked about what had happened to him, the more frequent the lapses became and the deeper into his mind he seemed to go.

Just like with Hannibal.

I'm experiencing hallucinations. Maybe I should get a brain scan.

Will. Stop looking in the wrong corner for an answer to this.

It seems like Daniel told him each time it had happened, but did he really? Will wouldn't know or remember. Will has taken Daniel at his word. Daniel has no motive to mess with Will or his mind like Hannibal had. Daniel's affection for him is genuine and evident in everything he does. Daniel has been trying to help him, and Will does feel like Daniel is helping. Daniel has provided him with a sense of stability. He feels safe…with Daniel.

I feel like I've dragged you into my world.

I got here on my own. But I appreciate the company.

Will feels like banging his head against the closest wall. He had felt safe with Hannibal, too. He wasn't experiencing lost time before he started seeing Daniel. He didn't tell Daniel about his hallucinations in his office or the lost time when it started happening at his apartment. He has not told Daniel about his dreams. He has only related to Daniel the events of his life after meeting Hannibal. He did not know Daniel until he walked into his office after reading his curriculum vitae. Daniel did not know him, either.

Daniel is not planning on publishing papers on the walking freak show that is Will Graham. Not unless he wants to face a formal inquiry on his conduct. He has actually raised more questions than he has found answers to. Daniel has caused Will to think about events differently and that is good thing. It is good for Will to get out of his own head. He had wanted Daniel to be the wall that could withstand his ball of crazy.

Daniel has actually adapted very well. His particular type of empathy does give him an advantage over the other psychiatrists Will has known over the years whether as patient or as acquaintance. Until Hannibal, none had blurred the line between the patient and doctor relationship. Not even Alana. Alana had treated him like a patient even when Will had not been her patient.

Y*ou wouldn't be good for me, and I wouldn't be able to stop analyzing, because I have this professional curiosity about you and…*

Daniel has managed to reconcile his professional obligations to Will with his personal feelings. Will doesn't think Daniel differentiates between his professional and his personal curiosity about him, at least not any more. Daniel probably thinks Will is not good for him either, yet he has put himself at risk to help him regardless. And, Daniel analyzes Will all the time, and Will doesn't have a problem with that. He wouldn't have had a problem with Alana either, but Alana had a problem reconciling intimacy with professional curiosity without Will being her patient. Daniel has been willing to use whatever skill and insight he has to help Will. He has completely disregarded the professional and personal boundaries between doctor and patient. Just like Hannibal had.

Intimacy has become part of the therapy because intimacy is part of the problem. Will supposes intimacy will be part of the cure. He knows Daniel has wrestled with this, but the fact remains that Daniel did cross those boundaries and he continues to do so. Will had been a stranger to him and yet he has found Will compelling enough to bend and break rules of professional conduct over.

Will remembers what Chilton had told him about a conversation with Hannibal over dinner, before Gideon had reduced Chilton to vegetarianism.

Psychic driving fails because its methods are too obvious. You were trying too hard, Frederick. If force is used, the subject will only surrender temporarily. Once a patient is exposed to the method of manipulation, it becomes much less effective.

When Dr. Gideon began - to suspect he was being pushed –

He pushed back. The subject mustn't be aware of any influence.

The flashes and the lost time occur after he leaves his sessions with Daniel. He was with Daniel all weekend and the day after they return; bam! Will has an episode. Before the trip, he was with Daniel several times a week. No way of telling if there is or is not a correlation. He was seeing Daniel too many times a week to definitively make a connection.

Daniel learns more about him all the time. Several sessions a week would provide plenty of opportunity to manipulate. With his empathy, Daniel might not need flashing lights and drugs to accomplish…

Will realizes he sounds paranoid. Of course Daniel didn’t pull some psychiatric gas lighting on him. Will knows he is being irrational because he does exhibit symptoms of PTSD from the stress of the trauma he obviously has not recovered from and the constant anxiety he experiences on an endless loop every moment, whether asleep or awake. He is so stressed out right now he does not even trust Daniel.

But he does. When he is rational, he does. This mindset is why he feels crazy.

He tries to recall when the other instances of flashes of light and the room changing had occurred. The flashes had accompanied black outs then, too. He is not taking any drugs and neither has Daniel given him any. Will has taken nothing stronger than aspirin and if he is completely honest with himself; whiskey.

Daniel had suggested his mind is trying to work through some things. Will thinks that may be true. Between the relentless dreams and the waking hallucinations, it would seem his mind is trying to tell him something. It is possible that Daniel’s therapy is helping to open some of the forts he keeps locked up in his mind. Forts that Will has avoided opening himself.

His fear keeps him from opening up those forts. He used to use his fear to fuel his imagination. Now, he fears what he will find, what he will remember. When he had sat in his cell at BSHCI, fear had not kept him from trying to remember. He had been afraid, but he had dealt with the realities of his situation. He is afraid that now, the remembering will reveal truths that will break him apart. He knows he has changed. What frightens him is learning just how much.

Will often wonders if he is permanently damaged, if the therapies and mind games he has been exposed to and the ones he has subjected himself to have rearranged his brain so much that he will never fully recover, that he will lose who he was…before.

All I heard was my heart, dim but, but fast, like, um footsteps fleeing into silence. I don't know how to gauge who I am anymore. I don't feel like myself. I feel like I have been gradually becoming different for a while. I just feel like somebody else.

What do you feel like?

I feel crazy.

And that is what you fear most.

I fear not knowing who I am.

Will knows who he is. I Know Who I Am…

Sometimes with, uh, what I do –

What you do is you take all of the evidence available at a crime scene. You extrapolate. You reconstruct the thinking of a killer. You don't think of yourself as the killer.

I got lost in the reconstruction. Just for a second. Just a blink…

We don't want to break you here. Is that what's happening? Have I broken you?

Do you have anyone that does this better unbroken than I do broken?

Fear makes you rude, Will.

I Know Who I Am…

No. All sense of who you are has been distorted by your illness. You know who you are in this moment. That's not always the case, Will.

I KNOW WHO I AM!

Does he? I'm not sick… Daniel had dryly pointed out that Will might have a better chance at recovery if he could avoid traumatic events rather than actively seeking them out. Daniel had compared him to a diabetic addicted to chocolate.

Will had pointed out that the chocolate eating diabetic was not saving lives. Daniel had responded with a tart, Well, certainly not his own.

Will sighs as he stands at the bottom of the steps. He would really like to shake this feeling off. Has he lost so much faith in humanity that he distrusts everyone? He tells himself that Daniel is not Hannibal. He repeats it like a mantra as he walks into the living room.

He hears the music from the living room before he enters and he knows Daniel sits at his laptop, probably feeding his dogs half of his dinner yet again. Will smirks at the thought of Daniel's chubby dogs. Will had never indulged his dogs the way Daniel indulges his. Of course, Will could let his pack run free over a couple miles of fields all year round. Daniel's dogs are limited to leashes and parks, and it is too hot in the summer to leave them outside too long for any reason.

Diet is really the culprit here thinks Will. Daniel is a push over, incapable of saying "no" the furry little creatures he loves. Will is aware he too qualifies as one of Daniel's furry little creatures, more or less. Daniel doesn't say "no" much to Will either. He does manage to get Will to do what he wants though…

Will returns his thoughts to the dogs. Daniel had actually fed them cheese this evening. He had stood in the kitchen and grated a chunk of real provolone over their dry food. Will had said nothing but had stood and watched the dogs perched at Daniel's feet waiting patiently for their dinner. Daniel had stopped grating the cheese for a second when he had looked up to see the disapproval all over Will's face. His mouth had scrunched up as he had tried not to laugh, but had given up as his shoulders had shaken with muted snickers. He had even started to explain, but had given that up, too when Will had not changed his accusing expression.

Will has decided that there are quite a few items in the fridge that, like the cheese, the dogs would be better off without. Will thinks if he can make them disappear slowly enough, Daniel might not notice.

Will walks into the living room, Daniel's cotton tee and drawstring pajama bottoms fitting him well enough. The A/C kicks on and hums from the window as Daniel sits engrossed in his computer screen, seemingly unaware of Will, but Will knows that is not the case. Will feels him empathizing, feels the familiar calm mist hover and then envelop him.

"You knew I was here, before you heard me, didn't you?" Will says from his edge of the rug.

Daniel turns around from the computer, pen in mouth. "Yes." He mumbles and shuffles his bare feet along the hardwood along the edge of the rug while Will stands upon the rug on his side of the room.

"You sense me before you see me."

"Yes…but, I uh, try and give you your space." Daniel continues to roll the pen around his mouth. Will wonders if he is aware he does that. He thinks "yes" is the most likely answer to that.

"Not really. You don't um…put your shields up anymore, with me, do you?"

"I haven't no. I do monitor your emotions. You are, among other things…still my patient." Daniel pauses and when Will doesn't comment he asks, "Would you rather I did?"

Will shakes his head, looks aside, begins to speak, and then closes his mouth tightly. He looks at Daniel from across the room, and folds his arms across his chest. Will's not sure what he wants at the moment. If Daniel has been monitoring him all this time, what harm is there if he continues?

The uniqueness of their relationship has its benefits. The heightened empathy between them can be quite…pleasurable - but perhaps not necessary all the time.

"Well, I do." Will says.

"I know. Sometimes I can read you, sometimes I can't. You said that when we both have our mental defenses up, you feel alone. Is that still the case?"

“If you have been open every time we are together, then I couldn’t know. What are you asking, really?”

Daniel can feel the impatience, and something else, a tension that causes Daniel’s muscles to tighten along his spine and ache beneath his jaw. The tension could be from any number of things this evening. And Will has never needed an excuse to be angry. Daniel decides what he feels from Will is not anger, it is something else. Doubt? Misgiving? Daniel struggles to define what it is he is feeling.

“Do you need to feel alone? I don’t have to monitor you twenty-four seven, I just do because I can. Now that you are here, maybe a little head space between us is a good idea. Is that what you are asking for?

Daniel grins from his chair. How typical of Will to stand at the edges of the room while he attempts to ask for more space. Daniel recognizes that Will doesn’t want to offend him; the entire situation is very awkward for him.

“I know you read me, too. I know that you do because you can’t help it either. We live alone for a reason. I thought I was making you more comfortable. If that’s not the case, I’ll put the shield up for you.”

And we can go back square one; pretend we haven’t been intimate... Will finishes for him and then catches himself. That is not what Daniel means. Will takes a deep breath and exhales slowly as though doing so could expel the suspicious thoughts from earlier like the noxious fumes that they are. Daniel still sits facing him from across the rug on his swivel chair. He is waiting for an answer and Will doesn’t want to give him one. Whatever he says will come off as…rude.

Will would laugh aloud except Daniel will think he has become completely unhinged. Which might not be far from the truth…

“Will? This isn’t really about privacy, is it?” Daniel can feel Will withdrawing from him. Daniel realizes Will’s agitation is directed at him for some reason.

“No… I don’t think I can explain without sounding…paranoid or something worse.”

The two of them stare at each other a moment, the few feet of patchwork carpet between them might as well be miles thinks Daniel. He has not felt such…wariness from Will before. Daniel cannot imagine what he has done to cause Will to feel this way, but Daniel is certain that Will believes he has done something. The undercurrent of violence, of that pacing wild thing in Will is dangerously close to the surface.

Will watches Daniel sitting pensive and attentive at his desk, one foot idly stroking Cara at his feet. Will cracks his neck, tries to bury his anxiety and doubts. He can’t. Daniel’s mist retreats from him, he can feel it evaporate from his mind like rain on hot concrete. Will has succeeded in making Daniel uncomfortable enough to emotionally withdraw from him too.

“The loss of time today has you wound pretty tight.” Daniel says carefully aware he is walking on egg shells of the most fragile kind. “Has something like what happened today happened at your place before? Besides the time you called me about?”

Daniel decides to pick Will’s brain and see what falls out. His questions will either yield some answers or provoke Will. If Will acts on his feelings that too will provide some insight into what he is thinking. Eventually…

“Yeah, but only for a few minutes, not for hours, not that I could tell. I am still the unreliable narrator of my own life.”

Will begins to look around the room, his eyes drawn to the bookcases. He glances back at Daniel but remains where he is, his toes curling around the fabric of the rug.

“I wouldn’t say that. It’s all up there…” Daniel points to his head, “we just haven’t accessed it yet. You just lost your home, Will. Not your real home, but you’ve been displaced. You feel like a charity case. Already my patient, now you’re living here…you’ve got to feel…compromised. Vulnerable. Maybe even angry? I would.”

Will nods from his end of the rug, realizes he is hugging himself and straightens his arms. He feels so edgy if he could crawl out of his own skin, he would.

Daniel gets up out of his chair and crosses the room to open a cabinet and retrieves a sock. He reaches up to the top shelf of one of the bookcases and pulls down what appears to be a hookah, polished reddish wood and smooth glass catch the light as Daniel returns to his desk. Will watches Daniel sit back down and take out a plastic bag from the sock. He can smell the pungent odor of hashish and cannabis from where he stands as soon as Daniel opens the bag. Will walks quickly across the room to stand beside Daniel’s desk.

“That is what I think it is, isn’t it?”

“Oh, yeah. I’m going to light up with a Fed.” Daniel grins as he pinches off a bit of the sticky substance between his thumb and forefinger. The look on Will’s face is priceless. Will should see himself right now.

“Ex-Fed. What is that…exactly?” Will manages.

Will is unbelieving Daniel would shift gears on him like this and get high. Will tells himself it is Daniel’s house…

“Oh, what…you’re going to be snob about this, too?” Daniel teases.

Will laughs despite how his nerves prickle beneath his skin. “No…still ticked I questioned your taste in wine?”

“There’s nothing wrong with my…taste.” Daniel says.

Will catches his eyes and feels the mist returning, edging closer, gentle wisps that touch his mind as soft as breath. “I mean what’s it called?”

“Oh, I have no idea. It’s Moroccan hash mixed with some really good shit from the Netherlands. I think he said it was Dutch Salad or something like that.”

“How much do you pay for something like that?”

“For this? Already mixed it was like twenty dollars a gram. I bought half an ounce. Anything else you’d like to know, officer?”

Will shakes his head at Daniel watches him stuff the pot salad into the bowl of the hookah. Daniel takes out a lighter from a drawer in his desk and promptly lights the bowl, inhaling as the water gurgles. He coughs as he holds out the hookah to Will.

"I know I said no drugs for you, but the effects are temporary and it will help you relax. I need to relax."

Will shakes his head. "You uh, indulge often? How long does half an ounce last?"

"I'll make it last a while. You know, you can even smoke it in public here? Well, in some cities more than others, but Florence is really liberal. I mean…really liberal." Daniel coughs again.

"Florence has a history of being liberal. Got themselves into plenty of trouble with Rome for being so…liberally unrepressed."

"Sure you won't smoke with me?"

Will shakes his head, again.

Daniel shrugs and commences to take a few more hits. He turns up the music and Will recognizes Bach's Air on a G String. Daniel leans over to pet the dogs on either side of him. The dogs revel in the attention and for a moment Will feels invisible as he observes Daniel slip off the chair to rough up his dogs, his glasses sliding off his nose, pajama bottoms slung low about his hips and gathering around his heels as he rolls around with Bella and Cara on the rug.

Will pulls another chair up to the desk and looks at the laptop. The internet is up now. He could check his email when Daniel is done doing whatever he is doing. Will sees Daniel has left his email open. Will glances at Daniel rolling around on the floor with the dogs. He hesitates and then peers into the screen to scan Daniel's email. His eyes scroll quickly over names he does not recognize until he sees one he does.

Will is stunned. Daniel received an out of office email from Frederick Chilton. Will stares at the email. Daniel received it earlier today…

Daniel finally climbs back up into his chair to face Will. He is pleasantly buzzed if the droopy eyelids and blissful smile are any indication. He begins to pack the wooden bowl again. Instead of lighting it himself, he holds the exotic little hookah out to Will once more.

"Will, it's ok. Italy's pretty much decriminalized it."

"It's not that…"

Daniel tosses his head back to better enjoy the buzz. He has his reasons for introducing the pot to Will, but he does not want to frame getting stoned as therapy. He would like to see what associations Will makes under the influence before he discloses the purpose for it. And, Will does need to relax. Daniel needs him to relax.

"Well, I really needed to unwind. I thought after your shitty day, you'd like to join me. I could say it's for medicinal purposes."

"That wouldn't be far from the truth, would it?" Will gestures towards the laptop screen. "Were you contacting Frederick about my meds?"

“Shit. Once a cop always a cop, huh? You really know how to kill a buzz…” Daniel rolls his eyes and shakes his head. “Will, I can imagine what you’re thinking…”

“No, Daniel, I really don’t think you can.”

Daniel’s jaw goes tight as he berates himself for not deleting Chilton’s automatic response earlier. He wanted to tell Will about that his own way, too. He even watched Will pull up a chair to his desk and the thought Will would be parked right in front of his laptop didn’t even cross his mind.

Will’s imagination creates multiple scenarios in his mind about Chilton’s possible role and the reasons for Daniel contacting him. Will thinks maybe his suspicions about Daniel are not so unfounded after all. There is no reason to contact Chilton about him, none at all. Unless Daniel believes Will is unreliable. As if Chilton wouldn’t be sniffing opportunity all the way from Baltimore.

If Daniel has betrayed him, Will’s not sure what he might do to him…

Will begins to rise from his chair. Daniel grabs his arm. Will lets Daniel’s hand rest for a second before he wrests his arm away and scoots his chair back and away. Daniel sees Will’s eyes cloud up as Will glares at him, past him to someplace else. Daniel feels him slipping away.

“Oh no.” Daniel says, “Don’t you retreat on me. Not before I can explain.” Daniel realizes Will is contemplating all sorts of reasons for the email and none of them positive.

“Retreat? Hardly. I think I’ve retreated enough with you.”

The words spill before Will can stop them. It feels good to say them. He feels a certain satisfaction in the alarm rising in Daniel. How does Daniel respond to fear?

“What are you talking about? Retreated enough…what do you think I’ve done?” There is nothing calm or compassionate about Will’s expression now. Will’s eyes are as distant as Daniel has ever seen them and he knows that is not a good thing.

“What are you contacting Chilton about?” His voice is so accusing that Daniel winces.

“I said I would explain, but you have got to calm down. I will not have a conversation with you like this…”

“We don’t have to have a conversation…in fact, I don’t feel much like having a conversation.”

“Oh? What do you feel?” Daniel says, starting out of his own chair.

“Like punching the shit out of you. What the fuck, Daniel?” Will stands in front of Daniel’s chair to block him from getting up. Daniel’s hands grip the arm of the chair tightly prepared to knock Will out of his way if he has to…

Daniel closes his eyes. He is mirroring Will’s emotions. He doesn’t want to slug Will. He knows seeing Chilton’s email set him off, but Will was lit dynamite when he walked into the living room. Will has felt too much since yesterday. Blowing up is to be expected Daniel tells himself. He knows Will will eventually tell him what is eating at him, but whether he does that before or after he takes a swing at him is Daniel’s main concern at the moment.

The dogs are alert and edgy at the sharp tones from the humans. Cara has already taken up position between Daniel and Will squeezing in between the two chairs facing each other. Bella paces along the couch. Daniel does not want either dog to go at Will. Daniel implores Will with his eyes as he speaks hoping Will responds to his even tone of voice.

“Let me explain. I’m not going anywhere. You can always try to beat the shit out of me afterwards.” Daniel offers a slight smile and keeps his voice calm, slow and nothing close to challenging.

Will’s expression does not change.

Daniel leans forward and meets Will’s eyes. Will does look pretty menacing at the moment. Daniel tries not to think about Will killing people with his bare hands.

“Let’s take it down a notch. The dogs are getting upset.”

Will glances at Cara at Daniel’s feet and Bella next to the couch. Both dogs are standing on all fours and their ears and eyes are focused intently on Will and Daniel. Will exhales slowly, closes his eyes. He doesn’t want to upset the dogs either. He tells himself to calm down and listen to Daniel’s explanation. He swallows hard, and grips the arms of the chair. The urge to bust Daniel in the mouth with his fist was so strong just then.

But he’s not angry at Daniel. He is experiencing generalized anger at everything and he is misdirecting it all at Daniel. Things keep happening to him it seems. He is galled at his own passivity. He almost took out his frustration on Daniel just now. Maybe some of that hash salad would be a good idea.

“I’m sorry. Seeing that email was just…I already feel like I have no control.” Will looks into Daniel’s face, sees the compassion there and feels even worse.

“Apology accepted. I’d hate to see you really pissed off.” Whatever Will has been thinking about hurts. Daniel can feel it because Will sits across from him unguarded and exposed. He is raw to his bones. Will probably doesn’t even realize his fingers trace across the wound beneath his shirt like a caress.

“Will, you were already in a mindset when you came downstairs. I don’t know what you’ve been thinking about all day, where your mind took you, but whatever you thought about caused you to doubt me. And finding that email must have confirmed every awful thought you had.”

“Manipulation would be the word of the day. My therapy with you has a lot of parallels with Hannibal’s.”

“And that upsets you.”

“Well, yeah. The complete…lack of boundaries for one thing. You are always in my head. And the intimacy…the more I talk to you, the worse my symptoms get.”

“All psychiatry is manipulation. It’s all about getting the patient to reveal things kept buried, either consciously or not. Hannibal helped you see a part of yourself you don’t want to see and…so am I. No wonder it feels the same to you.”

Will leans forward in his chair and rests his elbows on his knees so he can cradle his head in his hands. He can feel the blood pounding in his temples. Daniel is making sense. He always does.

Daniel reaches out his hand knowing that the touch of fingers in his hair will soothe the frayed nerves. He knows Hannibal touched Will the same way for the same reason. The conditioning will always remain, and this association with Hannibal is a positive one for Will. A positive association might lead to other positive associations. Positive associations with Hannibal will cause Will to make those associations with himself.

Will needs to see Hannibal through another lens besides the dark microscope Will insists on using, or he will continue to see that same darkness in himself. The darkness that caused him to see betrayal in Daniel's actions. Will is seeing betrayal because he has identified with it. He recognizes the Judas he played in Hannibal's eyes. Daniel needs to help Will identify his thirty pieces of silver. Will still does not know what tipped Hannibal's hand and worse, he cannot figure out when.

Knowing when exactly Hannibal learned of Will's deception is crucial because the meaning of anything Hannibal said to Will hinges on the knowing. Daniel knows this occupies a great deal of space in Will's head at any given time. And there are gaps in Will's narrative that Daniel is certain Will is not cognizant of. But, Daniel will not be opening that can of worms this evening. He can only manage so many worms and so many cans at a time. Will is like the desperate fisherman casting bait in every direction to see what he'll catch. He forgets he invited Daniel to go fishing with him. Daniel will have to remind him.

"And Will?" Daniel says, his fingers smoothing the damp curls on Will's bowed head, "it's important to me that you know, that you appreciate that of all the unorthodox things we've done, that of all the boundaries we've crossed, treating you as a partner in your own therapy is the most unconventional approach there is. It is the only way I see to gain your trust. You recognize your own need for alternative methods and we have been partners in your therapy. I have not forced you in any way."

Will looks up at Daniel. He has just been scolded in the gentlest of terms, but scolded nonetheless. Daniel wants Will to take responsibility for his own part in breaking rules. They will be breaking a lot more, of that Will is certain.

He edges closer to Daniel, seeking the solace of the descending mist and he covers Daniel's hand with his own. "Message received." He says simply.

Daniel presses his forehead to Will's. "Good."

Will pulls back after a moment, rests his back against the chair to gaze at Daniel. Daniel glances around at the dogs.

"Come here, girls. It's ok." Daniel calls to Bella and Cara. Their ears prick up and they slowly circle the two chairs facing each other finally settling on either side of Daniel's chair. Daniel pats Cara's head until her tail starts thumping against the floor. Will holds out his hand and Cara approaches him, cautiously at first, then rubs her head against his legs.

"Will, I probably should have taken the day off and not left you alone."

"I'm not a child. I can handle it."

“Barely. A lot has happened in the last couple days. A lot between us. A lot going on in your head. And then losing your place…it’s a lot. I am having difficulty processing. I was so distracted today I shouldn’t even bill my patients.”

Will tries to smile, but somehow can’t manage it. “I am starting to feel like I was doing better before I started seeing you.”

“Well, that’s a very honest statement. Why is that?”

“Because of the lost time and some other things I haven’t told you about…yet.”

“But you are about to, right?”

“Yeah…” Will sighs, “I guess I am.” Will points to the laptop. “First things first, though.”

Daniel clicks on the email so that his message to Chilton appears. He invites Will to read it with a nod of his head.

“I’ll explain about the email. And I apologize for that. I contacted Chilton to clarify the drugs he gave you and get his take on what drugs Lecter used on you.”

“I told you what Frederick said…” Will says as he reads.

“Frederick always holds something back. You don’t believe he was entirely truthful and neither do I. He’ll squirm under your thumb until you squeeze it out of him.”

“I thought you didn’t know him, personally. That is a very good description of him.” Will says.

“Oh, I know him. I told you I had met him which was true enough but I’ve met him more than once. I had an extended stay in Baltimore years ago. I had been approached to evaluate the possibility of canine therapy with some of the inmates at BSHCI.”

“Really? I’ve never heard anything about that.”

“And thanks to Chilton you never will. He shot it down. We’ve had our little rows over the years.”

“Why do you want to know what drugs he used with me?”

“Because I want to know more about how your brain has adapted to whatever was done to you. I know what drugs he likely used can do to a normal brain, but yours…well, I need precise information. I’d like to engage in some highly alternative drug therapy with you. And before I can do that, I need to know what you’ve already been exposed to.”

“You want to prescribe drugs for me now? After making a big deal about taking anything at all? What kind of therapy are you talking about?’

“I’ll take one question at a time. I do not want to prescribe any regimen of drugs for you; these would be specific doses of a short duration. I wanted you clean so that I could get a base line of “Will not on drugs,” Daniel says holding his fingers up in mock quotation marks, “To see and feel your natural emotional responses. And I have, for a few weeks now.”

“I’d say you’ve felt quite a lot of emotional responses from me.” Will almost smiles.

“And you still retain a lot of control over your impulses although I don’t think you see it that way. You exercise remarkable control considering what you’ve been through. I have to wonder if it’s really control or blocking.” Daniel pauses and stares into space.

“Sorry, lost my train of thought.”

“Can’t imagine why.” Will says. “And question number three?”

“Oh yeah, I’m talking about some role playing therapy.”

“Role playing? I don’t think I like the sound of that.”

Will doesn’t think; he knows he doesn’t like the sound of it. Daniel wants him to smoke to see how his brain responds to the THC. He wants to gage how Will might respond to other non-prescription drugs. Will is pretty certain Daniel means to try hallucinogenic drugs on him. His mind quickly assesses the possibilities Daniel might be considering by combining hallucinogens with role playing.

“No, Daniel. Absolutely not.”

“Damn, Will. Don’t shut me down so quickly.”

“No way.”

“Well, I still need to talk to Chilton. I wasn’t planning on talking about this tonight. I uh, didn’t handle this very well.”

“I was starting to think you were too perfect, anyway.” Will says.

“Huh, far from it. I wrote down what you said Chilton used for your narcoanalytic interview. A nice way to frame mind fucking.”

“Yeah, I just keep getting fucked by my psychiatrists…”

“Not funny, Will.” Daniel says flatly. “Look, I have some questions about the drugs that have affected your brain and Chilton is the only one I can ask. There isn’t anyone else.”

"No, I guess there isn't."

“I didn’t want to talk about this so soon after…yesterday. God, it was only yesterday. You need time to recover from this weekend. So do I. Let’s agree to wait until I get my information from Chilton. Then I will explain what I have in mind, although you seem to have guessed already. Will you at least hear me out?”

“Because it’s you asking, I will listen. But, no promises. When you talk to Frederick I want to be there.”

“How can you be there in an email?”

“We’re not going to email. We’re going to chat.”

“Oh. A video chat? FBI stuff? You can do that on my laptop.”

“I can do that. On your laptop. Yes.”

“Well, won’t he be surprised.”

“That’s the idea.” Will checks the clock on the wall. “Except it’s really late in Baltimore.”

“I don’t imagine he’s still up on a Monday night.”

“No, I don’t imagine he is. What’s the time difference? Like six hours?”

“Yeah, if we call him early tomorrow morning he’ll still be in his office. I cancelled my appointments tomorrow.”

Will is comforted by that. Will also thinks Daniel looks like he could benefit from sleeping in tomorrow. Whether from the pot or genuine mental fatigue, Daniel is not self-conscious at all.

Daniel has taken off his professional demeanor along with his suit. Will understands people have several faces. The face you wear to work and the face you wear at home. The face you show your boss and the face you show to friends or family.

Daniel has basically stripped away any pretense by removing his professional mask as soon as he walked in the door this afternoon. Daniel is still his doctor but Daniel is also sending the message that Will should feel comfortable here. He watches Daniel tidy up around his laptop, pen once again dangling from his mouth as he removes the empty bottles of water and iced tea.

“Before we do anything else, I need to hear about your dreams, Will. That’s what I planned on talking about this evening.” Daniel waves the pen in the air. “And you wanted to check your own email, right? You said it was down all day?”

“Yeah, odd. Well, the dreams are one of those other things I need to talk to you about. You should probably get your notebook. And I’ll check the email while you do.” Will says to glazed green eyes.

“Right. Just have to find it first…”

Chapter 41

Chapter Summary

The discussion continues about dreams and drugs. Daniel proposes his own duet with Will.

“I have to know myself, before I find him, Daniel.”

“I know. I would be afraid, too. I think once you know, you won’t be afraid anymore.”

“And I’m afraid of that, too.”

Chapter 41

The discussion continues about dreams and drugs. Daniel proposes his own duet with Will.

Will sits next to Daniel on the couch. Sunlight still streams through the windows this warm summer evening. Will likes that it doesn’t get dark until late. Twilight falls close to eight and the days feel long and full. Will is thinking that he won’t miss the cold darkness of winter in Baltimore this year.

A dismal truth beckons from the back of his mind. He can’t stay here. As comfortable as he is in this moment sitting with Daniel on his couch as the afternoon sun alights on the throw rugs and charming furniture and the dogs napping at their feet, Will knows he will likely be looking at the grey walls at FBI headquarters soon enough, hip deep in a formal inquiry and facing indictments that can’t be postponed any longer.

But, not today, Will thinks.

Will has taken Daniel through his recent dreams, an abbreviated sampling that had left Daniel speechless. It had taken him a couple minutes to comment that he had never come across a patient with dreams like Will's. He had been amazed at the detail and impressed with Will's interpretations of his various dreams, especially the episodic nightmare with the serpent tailed eagle.

That is some imagination you have there. And you never know what is going to pop in your head on any night. No wonder you avoid sleeping.

Yeah, it's a regular night at the opera…

Daniel had explained that he believed Will's dreams contained the fragments of memories lost to his conscious mind for the time being. As Will's therapist he wanted to help him recover those memories. As the man sleeping with him, he wanted some insight into the dreams he experiences with Will lying beside him. Daniel is becoming ever more aware of the cost attached to intimacy with Will.

Will knows he shot Abel Gideon, but he has never been able to remember doing it. He knows he talked to Gideon, but he has no memory of the conversation. That was his brain on fire. A memory burned away. He won't ever remember it.

He did, and still does, remember Gideon's conversation with Hannibal at Hannibal's dining room table. Will had stood there, paralyzed with a mild seizure as Hannibal had referred to it. Will had heard every word exchanged between them, had internalized the conversation only to have it resurface weeks later and replay in his mind with perfect clarity.

That had been after Chilton's narcoanalytic interview. That session with Frederick had unlocked a lot of memories for Will. He suspects the flashing lights, syringes, and warm hands that he remembers now in flashes were initially unleashed under Chilton's care.

Will thinks the word care is far too generous for Frederick. Frederick couldn't wait five minutes before running to brag to Hannibal all about the session despite Will only agreeing to the psychiatric testing in the first place in exchange for Frederick's secrecy, explicitly secret from Hannibal.

Chilton could be forthcoming when he wanted to be; when there was something in it for him and even then, he might still renege once he got what he wanted.

Daniel should not trust Chilton by any stretch, but he has a point. He might be able to discern a lot more about Frederick than the average person even from a video camera mounted on a laptop. Will has seen Daniel in action enough to figure he can handle Chilton.

Daniel insists Will has other memories, more recent memories that the trauma of his wound has buried deep within his subconscious and locked in the language and imagery of his dreams. Telling Daniel about his dreams gives Daniel access to a part of himself he has not ever shared, with anyone. Access to his dreams and thoughts would be incredibly revealing and he knows why Daniel wants to know about them, to experience them in his unique way. Will's dreams would provide a shortcut, and a sort of symbolism that would guide Daniel in his therapy, like a legend deciphering the map of Will's brain.

Will struggles with the symbolism himself. It might be a good idea to let Daniel have a crack at decoding it. Daniel offers a departure from the path that Will has traveled too many times to count. His fresh perspective might actually find something Will has overlooked. Recent events have taught him that he is neither infallible nor immune from consequences.

“What is that you’ve been playing?” Will asks he gestures toward the laptop as yet another Vivaldi violin concerto begins.

“An old relaxation cd I loaded. It is relaxing isn’t it?”

“Very. You only listen to classical?”

“Oh no, I play a very different mix at the gym. I listen to music all the time. Keeps me sane. I was thinking you should try it.”

“Listening to music?”

“It is the twenty first century. You could plug into an ipod, ignore all the stimulation; your unsociable nature would not be noticed at all. Other people would leave you alone without you snarling at them.”

“I drink.” Will says, “Not a very creative solution, is it?”

“I did that too. I tried all kinds of remedies to tune out and recover from a day of interacting with people. I remember as a kid not being to sleep because my mind simply would not shut off at night. I tried sleep aids when I got older but you already know how that goes. Can’t wake up right the next morning.”

Will nods. “What else did you try?”

“Sports, of course. Nothing like tired muscles to induce sleep. But yeah, music, meditation, and yoga…pot. Usually in some combination. Why do you think I walk around with earbuds? We both cope as best we can.”

“So that’s what you are doing. Tuning out other people. And it works?”

“For me, yeah. Works well enough. For you…I don’t know. You might have to teach yourself how to focus since you don’t need to hear or see what is going on in front of you to uh, dissociate or retreat into your mind.”

“Huh. The music might augment the experience. I might associate the music with a memory.”

“And considering what we are trying to accomplish in therapy that might be a good thing.”

“It might.” Will lifts his head. Daniel pokes him in the ribs and is rewarded with one of Will’s tantalizing little smiles.

“You already have. You were sitting at the piano when you zoned out. Can you play?”

“Yeah. I used to. Took piano lessons as a kid, but I had an ear for it so even when we moved around I still played when I could. I have a piano at my house, in Wolf Trap…”

“What were you playing at the piano?”

“Beethoven.”

“Classical training, too, huh? So you remember what you played before your mind took you someplace else? Was the music connected?”

"Well, yes. I remember what I was thinking as I played. At least I remember until I don't."

"What's the last thought you do remember?"

Will thinks a moment. "I was thinking about my dreams, trying to figure out the imagery, the peculiar language and symbolism embedded in the images of the dreamscape and…how Hannibal fits into them, because I know he does."

"After what you told me, I think so, too. You associate the piano with Hannibal?"

"I would be surprised if there was something I didn't associate with him at this point."

It is apparent to Daniel that Will is aware he never left the universe he and Hannibal created together. Daniel considers the possibility that neither has Hannibal. And after hearing about Will's dreams, it is abundantly clear that Hannibal has framed his relationship with Will as an odyssey of mythic proportions, casting himself and Will as the lone heroes. Will's dreamscapes often exist there too because his dreams reflect his reality. Hannibal dominates his reality.

Will expected the wound Hannibal gave him to release him from the codependency they had inflicted on each other, to rip the darkness from him, to redeem him somehow, but instead of sending him adrift, it keeps him anchored in their universe. If Will had wanted to sever their bond; he does not want to now. Despite his claims to want Hannibal out of his head he grapples with his emotions still.

All of Will's desires are driven by his fear. His fear revolves around Hannibal. Around and around it goes like a carousel gone mad.

Daniel does know the universe he exists in has nothing to do with Hannibal. Will has his own. Will is not going to find him in that universe. But that is only one reason Will exists there. Helping Will come to grips with the other reasons is another matter entirely. This is why Daniel has to join Will in his universe. Will doesn't exist in his. Not completely.

Now that Daniel is aware of the scope of that exclusive universe, he hopes that between the two of them they can figure out its structure. Will is seeking the supports for that structure.

Will was disappointed that the file his source sent him did not contain much insight into the foundation for that structure. Daniel also knows Will's mind will take those meager threads and weave them into the version of Hannibal he continues to synthesize and rearrange. Will is likely doing that right now as he sits listening to the music.

Daniel can only assist on an academic level. It is Will who has experienced the awful brilliance and the madness of Hannibal's universe. It is Will who carries the weight of that experience like a heavy stone.

"Did Hannibal compose music?" Daniel asks, looking for patterns in Hannibal's behavior, for insight into the pathology of the man beneath the killer.

"Yes, he did. On a harpsichord." Will raises his eyebrows in response to the toss of Daniel's head.

"Of course he did. A piano would be so mundane. He writes his life like he writes the notations for his musical compositions. He sees people as notes on a page."

“Yes, and I have a starring role.” Will rubs at his jaw with his knuckles, as he frowns.

“Will, he doesn’t want you to merely play his opus, he wants you to help him write it.”

“He’s always sending me invitations…”

“I think you are correct about your dreams in the burned out forest being connected to your pursuit of Hannibal. You are pursuing him intellectually at this point and your mind is trying to reconcile and recall every scrap of information in your head.”

“And it comes to me scrambled. I know.”

“Explains why you feel crazy sometimes. It is amazing to me that your dreams are so closely aligned to your waking life. There is virtually no barrier between your subconscious and your conscious. I have never seen anything like that before. As you get more information, your dreams will shift.”

“I have no doubt about that.”

“And that frightens you. Because of what you’ll learn about Hannibal?’

“Because of what I’ll learn about myself.”

“I hate that you have to do this at all because I see how painful it is for you.”

“It is painful for you, too. That’s me, spreading misery wherever I go. I never meant to drop all this at your door. Literally, at your door.”

“Well, you are here now…” Daniel pauses to poke Will’s knee with his finger, “You didn’t come to me to learn about Hannibal, it’s all in there already. You came to me to sort it out. So you can figure out who you are now. Who this person is who survived.”

“I have to know myself, before I find him, Daniel.”

“I know. I would be afraid, too. I think once you know, you won’t be afraid anymore.”

“And I’m afraid of that, too.”

Daniel cannot imagine what it must be like to exist in a state of constant fear as Will does. As he looks into Will’s eyes he can see what the fear does to him. There is so much pain and sadness there that even when Will laughs, his eyes reflect his wounded soul. No matter what he feels at any moment, fear is the constant companion that taints all of his other emotions, even love.

The fear is there even now as Will sits beside him, running his fingers through the tousled curls that fall back over his eyes despite his efforts to keep them back. The fear is as much a part of him as the heart beating in his chest.

“About your dreams…you know most of us don’t remember our dreams. Dreaming is the brain shutting down to process all the anxiety and purge it from the system allowing us to resume absorbing more anxiety the next day. Only with you, you remember your dreams. And your dreams are very vivid.”

“So are yours.”

“Only since I started sleeping with you.”

“You say it like it’s a bad thing. Do you mean the dreaming or the sleeping with me?”

Daniel appreciates the teasing but stays focused. His proximity to Will makes it hard enough to focus as it is.

“Will, we’re not supposed to have such vivid dreams. It happens occasionally, but not like you. You not only dream in Technicolor but your dreams are almost like an alternate reality. Dreams aren’t supposed to intrude on your waking life.”

Dreams prepare us for waking life.

It's one thing to dream; it's another to understand the nature of the dream.

You're waking up to who you are. That's all you need to understand.

Will is beginning to feel like he can’t tell the difference between his waking life and dreaming because they feel the same to him. One does not feel any more or less real than the other while he is experiencing them. Dreaming is guided by emotion and dreams cross-connect with memories. What is the nature of his dreams?

“All that stress has to have a cumulative effect. You are essentially awake all the time.” Daniel says.

“So, I am essentially walking around sleep deprived. You think my lost time is simply sleep deprivation?

“I wouldn’t characterize it as simple. If it is sleep deprivation, the long term effects are bad. Disorientation. Irritability turning to aggression. Paranoia… Sound familiar?”

“I know what happens when I don’t get enough sleep. I do sleep. Not for long periods, but I do manage to get some sleep. But maybe not enough - so maybe the lost time is sleeping?”

“That…is a possibility. Your mind recognizes it needs a break and it gives you one. That is potentially dangerous, too.”

“I don’t drive…”

“That’s not what I mean and you know it. Your mind could fracture into the different personalities you have become. You dissociate when you profile a crime scene so you can think like the killer. But you can dissociate whenever you choose. Does it ever happen involuntarily?

“No. That has never happened. Hannibal tried that one already. Even as sick as I was, I knew who I was. I wasn’t that kind of crazy and I couldn’t see myself in the copy-cat murders.”

“But if you became someone else when you blacked out, lost time, you might not remember doing it.”

“You just described my original defense strategy. Daniel, when I get in the killer’s mindset, I am still aware of me. I may narrate like you heard me do on the recording I gave you, but I am aware of me and I feel the victim, too.”

“Will, if you were the right kind of sick, or sleep deprived you could lose yourself. You told me this very thing happened when you profiled that girl in Delaware, the one Georgia killed while she was sick with Cotard’s Syndrome.”

“I did become disoriented for a second. But I was sick. And…I remembered doing it. I was aware. I told Jack I got lost in the reconstruction because it was easier to tell him that than correct his misperception of how my empathy works.”

“The cause for your symptoms could still be stress possibly compounded by lack of REM sleep that is if you aren’t dreaming but hallucinating. Your mind never shuts off it seems.”

“But I do dream. And I wake up. I may wake up a lot, but I am waking up.”

“You woke up on my piano bench, too. Were you asleep or in some other state?”

“Well, those are good questions, doctor. I want to know the reason for the lost time with specificity.”

“Ok. Did you call about a scan for the encephalitis yet?” Daniel feels the alarm from Will as thoughts of yet another possible disorder are introduced onto his already full plate.

“No.” Will says quietly.

“I’m not going to ask why not. You can give me the results when you do.”

Daniel stretches his legs out from his seat on the couch and grins until Will grins back. The grin has a ripple effect on Will and Daniel can feel the tightness leaving his own limbs somewhat as Will reclines further into the couch. Daniel prefers the laugh lines to the grim granite like expression Will has been wearing most of the evening.

Will promises himself he will call about the scan this week. But he’s pretty sure his lapses of time are not related to any physical illness. The flashes of light and the hallucinations seem to occur randomly. He can see no pattern. Stress and lack of sleep do affect him, but he has lived with both for a long time. He concurs with Daniel. Like his dreams, his mind is trying to arrange and assimilate information in his mind. The flashes and hallucinations are the manifestations of his mind at work.

His mind has changed because he has changed.

Killing is changing the way I think…

“Will? Knowing what you dream about is just as important as what you think about.” Daniel is saying, “I felt your emotions when you told me your dreams. My own dreams are as disturbing to me as yours are to you but I could only infer so much…”

“Still, you are feeling my emotions after the fact. You can’t associate the images in my dreams with my emotions directly, not in real time, only afterwards. And you aren’t dreaming what I am dreaming. You aren’t in my dream. You can’t see what’s happening.”

“Well, that’s what we’ve got to work with so we’ll run with it.”

“That’s what we have to work with for now. You aren’t satisfied with those limitations. That’s why you contacted Chilton. That’s what the role playing is about.”

“Yes. Drugs can be a gateway into self-reflection and with us, other applications. I think our empathic connection could be useful. But…I’m about done analyzing you for now. Are you sure you won’t join me in an herbal nightcap?”

Daniel gets up to retrieve the hookah and the baggie from his desk. He flops back down on the couch and puts his feet up on the coffee table as he begins to stuff the bowl. He looks up to see Will glancing around the living room as he considers Daniel’s invitation. Daniel imagines Will is revising his profile of him to include habitual drug abuser.

“You want me to get stoned with you in preparation for the role playing.”

“It would help, yes.”

The bowl glitters red as Daniel holds the lighter and draws on the pipe. He closes his eyes as he exhales. Pachelbel’s Canon in D queues up as the smoke leaves his puckered lips. His mouth spreads into a wide grin.

“I love this piece.” Daniel says as he holds the hookah absently. His hands and feet move in time to the pretty violin concerto.

“Can you play this one?” Will looks to the violin case leaning against the piano.

“Oh yeah…” He sets the hookah on the coffee table and begins to hum along with the melody Will assumes corresponds to the violin section Daniel usually plays. Pachelbel’s Canon is a beautiful piece of music and Will knows it well.

“Hey,” Daniel says, almost leaping from the couch, “I’ve got sheet music for this. You can play, right?”

“Not violin.”

“No, but piano. I’ve got an arrangement for piano and violin. We could play a duet.” Without a second thought, Daniel is off to his piano bench rooting through the books and pages of sheet music. He finds what he is looking for and returns holding a flimsy booklet that he hands to the surprised Will.

“Daniel, I am really out of practice…” Wills sets the booklet in his lap and flips open the pages of sheet music. The arrangement is not incredibly complicated, but it would be challenging.

“So what? Like I play concert halls on my weekends?”

He rejoins Will on the couch, sitting closer this time, so close that his shoulder touches Will’s. Daniel deliberately rests his knee on Will’s thigh and smiles into Will’s face. He reaches for the hookah and lighter and holds it out to Will.

“Insistent aren’t you?” Will says taking the hookah from Daniel’s fingers. He holds the lighter over the bowl and pauses, “You know, I haven’t done this in a really long time…”

“I won’t be offended if you don’t. It’s mellow…won’t make you stupid, unless you want to get stupid.” Daniel grins again, more broadly this time.

Will is not sure he wants to be even a little stupid. He knows this will make him feel more relaxed than whiskey and more quickly, too. He knows what to expect with whiskey. He knows how this will affect him which is why it has been a long time. He already feels too much. He considers that just a little will take the edge off.

Daniel is really relaxed. Amusingly so. And he is so enthusiastic about this duet that his emotions are infectious. Will thinks Daniel has surmised he played duets with Hannibal. Will knows this is Daniel's way of introducing the associative drug therapy he wants to try. He wants to alleviate Will's concerns, ease away the fear of exposing himself to Daniel even more than he already has. The invitation to become more intimate is practically sitting in his lap.

Daniel is very inviting. The large compassionate green eyes get to Will every time he looks into Daniel's face. Sitting on the couch with him like this feels perfectly natural. The mist is warmer suddenly, a flush that moves through Will delicious and hot like liquid sunlight. Will is sure Daniel is aware of the profound effect he has. He feels what Will feels, is feeling it right now. Will thinks that any other time he would have polished off a couple tumblers by this hour. He decides to see just how stupid he can get this evening.

He lights the bowl and teases the smoke tentatively up the glass chamber feeling the burn in his chest. He closes his eyes and holds the heady hash in his lungs as the aroma fills his nostrils and the room. He coughs a little and Daniel nods for him to take another hit. He does and tries to pass the hookah back to Daniel. Daniel pushes it back to him.

“Careful,” Daniel says, watching Will's lips curl around the pipe once more, “that stuff makes you horny.” He laughs at the mischievous half grin and equally mischievous blue eyes.

Will is not stressing anymore. Imagine that. A part of Daniel wishes he could keep Will wrapped in a blissful haze and live in this moment all the time. But that would be selfish, and impossible. And exactly what Hannibal tried to do.

Chapter 42

Chapter Summary

Will’s evening becomes even more interesting after he falls asleep. He wakes Daniel up to share it with him.

“Who were you dreaming about?” Will says relieving the stunned Daniel of his boxers. The touch of Will’s fingers along his stiff cock draws the softest of hisses from Daniel.
“You.” Daniel murmurs. He feels heat rise in his cheeks and it spreads like fire until his entire body is enflamed with a powerful longing. Daniel recognizes the heat is not his alone.
“Who were you dreaming about?” Daniel says noticing Will in a similar state.
A pause, “Hannibal.” comes the quiet reply.

Chapter 42

Will’s evening becomes even more interesting after he falls asleep. He wakes Daniel up to share it with him.

All that we see or seem is but a dream within a dream. The Poe quote has been running around Will’s head for several minutes now. Will thinks he must be tired to seek insight from the drug addicted poet. He takes a deep breath as the ceiling fades from view.

Will tries not to toss and turn as he lies in bed. He knew the pot salad might affect him like this. His mind used to become hyper wired on it in school, everything he had touched and smelled and watched all day long would infuse his drug induced day dreaming like a match to gasoline, setting his thoughts on fire until, finally the flames of thought burned out and he would fall into fitful dreams.

And all that was before he started hunting serial killers.

But, a little pot had helped him study and write well-crafted and insightful papers. He had been able to sit and write for hours, relaxed and lost in his thoughts for as long as it took.

The emotional roller coaster he has been on for the last few days has taken its toll. Will turns to his side to face the door that opens onto the hallway and Daniel’s room, the sheet pulled to his waist and the blanket tossed to the floor. The temperature is at least ten degrees warmer upstairs than it is downstairs despite the air conditioner.

As it had in college, the pot had relaxed Will, but his thoughts had buzzed around in his head like so many flies, a swarm he could not scatter. The effect on Daniel had been obvious. The pot had tickled Daniel's libido but sensing Will's detachment, Daniel had finally called it a night and had gone up to bed after securing Bella in her crate.

He had left his drink on the piano and sheet music spread all over. Will had put his violin back in its case after noticing Daniel had left it on the piano. He had tidied up the living room and then had stood in the middle of the carpet in the light of the singular lamp and had wondered at his own compulsion.

Will had listened to the water run in bathroom, had heard the creak of the bed as Daniel had settled in for the night. He knew he would be welcome to join Daniel, but Daniel would not be able to fall asleep if Will were beside him. Will had waited downstairs giving Daniel time to fall asleep before going upstairs to…what?

Sleep. The elusive concept that still slips through his fingers like a stream.

After talking with Daniel about the possible causes for the lost time, Will has to admit that Daniel's ideas had made sense. Will is thinking that he must be sleeping when it happens. Not the deep REM sleep he really needs, but a state approaching sleep. His mind doesn't dream and he is not conscious. Will thinks his mind is taking a time out so that it doesn't shut down on him.

Daniel had also pointed out that when we dream, we create our dreams from emotions, memories, and the chemicals in our brains. Everyone we interact with in our dreams is an extension of self, manifesting as representations of our emotions and memories. The movie stars or monsters we see in our dreams are projections of our emotions.

In Will's case, his imagination creates an especially well detailed dreamscape and the representations he interacts with are projections laden with symbolism that only Will can decipher because Will interacts with fractured extensions of himself and, Daniel had added, with versions of people created by Will's imagination. The primary emotion driving Will's dreams is fear. Neither Will nor Daniel had had to say that aloud.

We all play the starring role in our dreams, Will, but in your dreams, everyone and everything corresponds to your reality. Either symbolically or…or allegorically and sometimes, directly.

Daniel had suggested Will engage in guided dreaming to see if he can focus his thoughts on what he wants to dream about before he falls asleep.

Will had nodded in agreement but had not mentioned that there were simply too many items on the menu for him to make an informed choice. All were equally tasty.

Before climbing up the stairs with Cara in tow, Daniel had suggested that they both look for patterns, see if Will has more or less episodes now that he is living there. Will had not corrected him about using the word living rather than staying. It had seemed too fine a point to make when Daniel had been nothing but generous.

Daniel is a font of patience and he has so far been pretty good at separating his own emotions from Will's. Will supposes he would have to be able to manage his emotions in order to do his job day in and day out. Daniel had been especially understanding of Will this evening; and Will knows his nerves must be shot to lose his temper as he had. Usually, he is the calm one in a situation.

Will thinks his distorted sense of reality signals to him that his subconscious is working overtime because he has been lost in his imagination with Hannibal. He has been doing so for months. He has actually been living in an altered reality for much longer than that.

So much about this feels like a dream…

No wonder he is falling asleep at piano benches and in bathrooms. The flashes and the hallucinations of another room, another place that appears before his eyes is likely another manifestation of his subconscious. Will has no explanation for that except the hallucinations that come with the flashes are trying to tell him something, too.

He turns his restless mind to the file he received from Luciano and Lucia. Copies of Lithuanian birth certificates for both Hannibal and his sister were included in the file as well as a death certificate for his sister, Mischa. Almost eight years separated Hannibal and his sister and Hannibal would have been about twelve when she died. The copies were of poor quality having been copied from old microfiche, apparently the method for preserving original documents at the time.

Hannibal is nine years older than Will. Will had never thought about their ages before until he had stared at the white on black image of the certificate. How strange to know Hannibal so well and not know his age. To Will, he seems ageless, or rather that he is as he has always been. To see the proof of his birth had seemed so very intimate somehow; had made him seem so much more mortal than the way Will tends to think of him. Will had once described the Chesapeake Ripper to Jack in less than generous terms not knowing he had been describing Hannibal and Will thinks he might have been a little hasty about that.

When Will had been screaming his lungs out in his mother's delivery room, Hannibal had been nine years old and Will is tempted to try and imagine that little boy. A skinny blonde boy chasing waves along the Baltic Sea with a one year old sister watching him from her blanket…

There had not been that much about Hannibal specifically in the file the twins had sent. There was little actual documentation about his family and plenty of insinuation. The email likely written by Lucia had stated that personal records from Lithuania during its time as a Soviet state were hard to come by. She and her brother had evidently cobbled together what they had found and had left it to Will to draw his own conclusions.

Copies had been sent to Mason Verger.

Hannibal was apparently descended from a rather aristocratic family with long roots in Eastern Europe. His was a family with ancient claims to nobility that had not fared well under Soviet occupation. Will imagines the entire family chaffing under Soviet egalitarianism and he no longer has to wonder where Hannibal's sense of entitlement comes from.

Something happened to cause Hannibal and his sister to be orphaned, perhaps separated, and Hannibal had survived while his sister had not.   Some of the family had escaped to Prague, had not fared much better there since Czechoslovakia had also been under Soviet control, and had fled to France.

From what Will can tell, Hannibal had spent a few years at a state run orphanage outside Vilnus, the capital city in Lithuania before setting out to find the extended family in France. The orphanage had been converted from a huge estate home formerly owned by the Lecter family. There had been another estate in the Klaipeda Borough, near the Baltic, the summer home Will thinks.

Will imagines the Lecter estates in their heyday. He can almost see the manicured yards, rooms filled with antiques and likely the finest libraries for miles lined with shelves containing the accumulated knowledge and literature of the Western world. All of it gradually dismantled, bartered, and sold in exchange for retaining the illusion of a life taken from them a piece at a time since the second World War.

Lucia and Luciano had sent Will information on every known property formerly owned by the Lecter family in Lithuania and there had been several and every one of them confiscated by the Soviets. They had also enclosed some information on KGB crackdowns on suspected dissidents in the 1970s, in particular an underground publishing house, but the operators of the group were never found. Perhaps Hannibal's extended family had fled to Prague with help from the same or related dissident group.

Will imagines Hannibal and his family had already down scaled their lifestyle a couple of generations before Hannibal's birth. If his parents had been involved with any dissidents as the email and the inclusion of the news articles seemed to suggest, Will thinks it was possible that Hannibal's parents had somehow managed to draw the attention of the KGB and paid for it with their lives. Will had also read the other news articles, also on microfiche about a small number of missing people found dismembered in the forests beyond the little miesteliai and kaimai, the Lithuanian terms for little towns and settlements around the country. It was significant that the bodies had been scattered around Klaipeda.

The KGB had been blamed for the missing people and the brutally eviscerated corpses, but Will is thinking that perhaps the dismembered corpses had not been the work of the KGB at all. Will rubs at his face wondering if the victims had perhaps been rude. His lids feel heavy and he thinks briefly there should be a word to describe the anticipation of impending slumber.

As his head sinks more deeply into the pillow Will thinks it entirely possible that Hannibal may be the most fascinating study of nature versus nurture he has ever come across. All of the news articles are dated from before Hannibal's birth. How typical that an investigation into Hannibal's past only raises more mysteries than it solves. Will's mind churns as his imagination conjures up a twelve year old ashen haired boy, with only his ancestry to remind him who he is as he suffers likely anonymously and alone through whatever trauma brought him to the orphanage…

Will feels the tug of someone pulling on his hand. He lifts his head from the pillow. A slender blonde haired boy has grasped his fingers and tugs at him to follow pressing a slim finger to his thin lips, beckoning Will to be silent. Will climbs out of his bed and follows Hannibal down a long hallway and flight of stairs to a large kitchen where several other boys sit around an oblong rough-hewn table on benches of nicked and knotted wood.

A turn of the last century stove sits at the far corner and appears to be the only source of heat in the vacuous kitchen. A low flame warms the large pot on the burner and the door to the oven is cracked open to warm the room. The surroundings are sparse and utilitarian, bereft of charm. The kitchen is however, undeniably clean.

Hannibal pulls away from Will, leaving Will to stand silent and invisible at the bottom of the stairs. Hannibal keeps his finger pressed to his lips as he slips in beside another boy on the bench. The child moves away from Hannibal and Will notices a collective shift away from Hannibal from all the boys seated around the table. Will sees the bowls of the other boys are nearly empty as are the baskets of bread that now contain only unwanted crusts.

The feeling that Hannibal is always the last one at the table is unshakable.

Hannibal begins to eat his meal; eyes focused on the sizable bowl of stew before him, potatoes clearly the main ingredient, as he swallows one tepid spoonful after another. In the spoon goes, methodically, quickly, he does not even chew and neither does Hannibal look up.

He does not look up because he already knows what Will is seeing. The boys nudge each other, and they whisper in groups of two or three, glancing at Hannibal the entire time. They all wear uniforms, white shirts and dark pants each with worn sweaters to insulate them from the chill.

The headmaster enters from the other side of the room. He quickly surveys the table, sees the boys sitting around excluding Hannibal, who continues to eat his stew as though he notices nothing. The headmaster yells at the boys to finish up so they can complete their chores before bed. The gaunt headmaster leaves and immediately, one of the boys takes his bowl, cup, and spoon to the sink and elbows Hannibal roughly on the side of his head as he leaves. Each boy pays Hannibal the same unkind tribute after depositing their dirty dishes.

When the last boy has exited the kitchen, Hannibal rises from his seat and after glancing at Will, commences to perform his assigned chore. Kitchen duty. Will watches him wash, dry, and put away the dishes, cups, and utensils in the familiar order Will had seen many times in the kitchen in Baltimore. Finished with his task, Hannibal folds the dishtowel once, twice, and then sets it beside the drain board before turning to face Will.

Hannibal beckons for Will to follow him back upstairs where the other boys are preparing for bed. Hannibal too readies for bed, exchanging his shirt and trousers for a long flannel nightshirt and leggings. Will sees bruises old and new along his back, neck, and shoulders.

Will doesn't have to wonder long where the bruises come from.

Before Hannibal can slip out the door to the bathroom at the end of the hall several of the boys surround him and begin to intimidate him with harsh tongues and pointed fingers. The taunts turn quickly to blows and it is only the sound of the headmaster's footsteps on the landing that cause them to scatter into their beds.

Hannibal stands stiff and silent by the door as the headmaster tells the boys lights out and closes the door. Will hears the key turn in the lock from the other side and notices that the windows have been secured shut. The boys are trapped in the room for the night.

Will sees that the bully session not only hurt and humiliated Hannibal but deprived him of the few minutes he had to use the bathroom for the night. Hannibal climbs stoically into bed, his face betraying nothing of the anguish or the anger he must certainly feel. Will continues to watch as Hannibal slides out of bed without a sound to retrieve a fountain pen from under his bed hidden between the floorboards.

Will watches, fascinated, as the young Hannibal removes his nightclothes and stands naked but apparently oblivious to the cold. He takes a breath and crosses the room, his feet moving sure and fast along the hardwood. He stands beside one of the beds.

Hannibal pulls back the blankets to the bottom of the mattress and climbs on top of the flaxen haired agitator of the group who had circled him earlier and deftly pushes the fountain pen into the ear of the sleeping boy, his carefully placed limbs and his weight keeping the boy still. The boy can only move his eyes as he awakens to searing pain.

But there is no sound. Hannibal's other hand covers the boy's throat, palm flat against his trachea and though the boy should be flailing uncontrollably with pain, he cannot. Within seconds it is over. The flaxen haired bully will bother Hannibal no more. Blood drips like ink from his ear as Hannibal pulls the fountain pen clear. The pen disappears into Hannibal's hand and he clenches it tightly before any blood can drip upon the blankets.

The smell of urine and fecal matter fills the room as Hannibal slips off the dead boy and climbs back into his own bed, but not before he licks pen and fingers clean and returns it to its cradle secreted in the floor. He carefully puts back on his clothes beneath his blankets. Hannibal turns his head to look at Will, his eyes dark but alive, so very alive as he stares into Will's eyes. A wisp of a smile graces the thin lips as his eyes close and Will closes his eyes, too.

Will's eyes flicker open. He is now leaning against the ashen haired man. Hannibal looks into his face with the tear stained cheeks flecked with blood and the rueful smile that burn in Will's memory. He lurches forward as the blade of the kitchen knife impales him. His arms find and grasp at the shoulders and arms that hold him in place and keep him from slipping to the slick floor in shock.

I wanted to surprise you. And you, wanted to surprise me…

The words echo in Will's mind. What surprise? Hannibal had known Jack was coming. Hannibal knew nothing of the snipers that never came, knew nothing of Purnell's interference. What surprise…?

I don't…don't understand…I t…told you they know… You…were s…supposed t…to leave.

Hannibal's arm contracts around him more tightly and he speaks softly into Will's ear; the blade that pierces him suspended between flesh and muscle. He feels the blood from the wound trickle down his skin as he bleeds into the fabric of his shirt, knows that as soon as Hannibal releases him, the trickle will become a tide.

Why did you come running Will?

To…to…

Will doesn't finish. Why didn't Hannibal listen? What does Hannibal think he knows to inflict such violence upon him with such cruel and pointed intimacy? To draw Will close into an embrace no different from any other embrace they shared. Except…except for the embedded knife and the handle concealed in Hannibal's fist.

You hurt me, Will.

How? How have I…hurt…you?

Patroclus never betrayed Achilles. Did you serve Jack to me Will? Did the Greeks believe we intended to leave for Troy without them? Is that what you meant for me to believe? That Jack was the Greek that had to die?

Yes. I had to…you knew that…

Did I? We could have left together after dinner…almost polite.

I know. Will shudders against him. It's becoming harder to breathe.

Hannibal's lips press to his ear, his nose caresses the soft damp curls as he cradles Will's head on his shoulder. Will smells his cologne mingling with the acrid tang of iron and sweat. Wishes he could stop thinking about this…returning here.

Whose armor did you wear? The smell of betrayal is thick upon it.

Betrayal? I came…running to stop, to save…to salvage…

Salvage what, Will? Only divine intervention could bring them down. Did you invite the divine?

Will feels Hannibal's nose again at his neck, his hand in his hair and Hannibal's chest swells against Will's savoring the intimacy of their words, their flesh, and the blade between them.

You…me. We're… just alike… The words tumble stilted, Will's tongue clicks dry against the roof of his mouth.

Yes. This gives you the capacity to deceive me and be deceived by me. Hannibal says stroking his head as he had done so many times before...this.

This isn't sustainable…

Jack already suspects you killed Freddie Lounds.

If J…Jack t…told you he s…suspects me, that, that means he s…suspects you…

You thought you could deceive me? Hubris, Will. Divine intervention. Poetic if not for the irony…

Will slips from the embrace, with that peculiar feeling of falling that precipitates waking... not on the sullied and defiled floor but into a bed. He starts from the bed completely disoriented. It is Hannibal's face looming over him as sunlight touches the familiar blue walls that grounds Will to the moment. He is in Baltimore, in the bed he has slept in so many times…which time is this?

Hannibal?

Hannibal's brow creases slightly as he brushes the disheveled curls from Will's forehead. Will is naked beneath the blankets and knows without looking that so is Hannibal. Will wonders what day it is and how long he has been here. Did he feed the dogs?

You're trembling. Bad dreams, Will?

I…I'm not sure.

You're not sure if the dreams were bad?"

Hannibal eases closer, the blankets fall from his shoulders as his hand touches Will's face. Will closes his eyes as Hannibal's fingers caress his brow and then cheek.

I'm not sure I was dreaming…am dreaming. I must be dreaming still…

You haven't had the bad dreams since you started sleeping here.

When did I…how long have I been sleeping…here?

Will opens his eyes and sinks back into the pillow causing Hannibal's hand to fall away.

Will…you have been waking up to who you are… dreams prepare us for our waking life. The dread you associate with sleep does not follow you here.

You saw to that, too, didn't you? When I was sick…

Will stares at the perfectly manicured nails resting on his pillow and remembers the tube down his throat, the syringes under his skin. He feels Hannibal's fingers curling around the hair behind his ear.

You are aware now. The therapy we resumed does not extend to your dreams. You make those associations on your own.

Will looks into his eyes, searches for deceit and finds none. He nods slowly accepting Hannibal's explanation and immediately reads the approval in Hannibal's eyes. He's not sure how he feels about that.

Tell me about your dreams.

You cut me, here… Will shoves down the blankets so he can see his stomach. He stares at skin as pale and smooth and unscarred as he remembers. He moves his hand along the skin under his navel. Hannibal's eyes sweep over him to rest at his abdomen.

Why did I cut you?

You thought I betrayed you, but I didn't, I...didn't get to explain.

What did you do to make me think that?

I called to warn you so you would run. Leave. But you didn't. You waited for me…with Abigail. You waited to…to wound me, to leave me…and Abigail to bleed on the floor.

Hannibal traces his fingers along Will's torso until his hand rests below his navel and his fingers curl around Will's. He lifts his eyes slowly to meet Will's as his fingers unwind to caress the flesh where the wound would be, should be.

Then, it was not the call that caused me to wound you, Will. We are alone with each other. Why would I cut you from me?

I don't know what you believed. But you believed me up to a point, or I couldn't have surprised you. What did you mean?

Did you lie to me? Did I catch you in a lie?

There were plenty of lies. Jack wanted to trap you. I was the lure.

Hannibal's mouth curves up, he tilts his head to one side. Of course you were. Uncle Jack keeps his broken pony close. So you helped Jack trap me while you resumed your therapy with me?

I had to deal with you and my feelings about you.

Did you deal with your feelings, Will?

Hannibal's hands move over Will's body until his fingers find his hair once again. He stares into Will's face as Will looks up at him from the pillow that smells of sandalwood, cologne, and musky sweat from the night before.

I was angry. I wanted to kill you. For what you did to me. For all the other things…

I remember. But you have other feelings and you have to deal with them as well.

Will is silent.

Stubborn to the last. Hannibal lifts his head from the pillow to rest in his hand as he gazes at Will. You didn't want to kill me that night.

No. Not that night…the circumstances were all wrong.

You wanted me to leave, without you.

Will closes his eyes. Hannibal's fantasy was unsustainable. And yet, honesty finds its way to Will's lips.

I would have found you.

Hannibal's eyes soften, he rewards Will with a gentle tug of his hair.

Not if I believed you tried to deceive me.

You waited for Jack to come to dinner. But, he shouldn't have come. The trap fell apart. You fought with him. And…and Alana…

Will stops unwilling to bring Alana into it.

You believed I was Jack's and I can't figure out…. I had been so careful not to arouse suspicion. Even Jack doubted me because he went to you alone…

You wanted Jack to come to dinner. You sent him to me so that you would not have to choose. Let Fate decide. Is that what you did, Will?

Will does not answer. He stares into Hannibal's dark eyes, What caused you to doubt me?

What would arouse my suspicion, Will? What lie did you tell to cause your plan to fall apart?

You couldn't have known. That's what I don't understand.

Known what?

That I did not kill Freddie Lounds.

You let me believe you killed her. Who did we eat that night at dinner?

Tier.

Ah, that explains the fear, the adrenaline in the meat.

But you couldn't have known. Not then… Did you lie to me? Did we dine on that last supper lying to each other? Did you know all along and wait for the perfect moment to deliver my punishment?

You cast yourself into the Inferno, Will. I wanted to believe you. I didn't cut you because of Jack, or the FBI. I cut you because you lied to me. And you are angry because you do not know when or how I found the lie. You are very, very angry Will.

But you knew Jack was in on it. No charges filed for Tier. No charges for Mason. Even if you knew about Lounds, you should have known I had no choice…

How could I know? You told me you killed her, let me believe. Believe that you were mine. Somehow I learned she was alive. When did I learn, Will?

I made a mistake. Somewhere I made a mistake… But so did you, Hannibal.

What was my mistake?

You didn't trust me. You never let me explain. You took Abigail away from me, again.

Hubris, Will. We are both guilty of the same offense.

Hannibal pulls Will close so that his head rests upon Will's shoulder in perhaps the closest to a gesture of contrition as Will had ever seen from him. Will arches up from the bed so his body meets the curve of Hannibal's. To feel the weight of him, warm and solid and real once more.

A life without regret… Hannibal says his words lost in the crush of Will's mouth against his.

Will's fingers relax against the sheet as he slowly opens his eyes. He is in Daniel's room. Cara lies at the foot of the bed snuggled against Daniel's leg. Will shakes his head in dismay. He must have walked in here at some point, but when? The uncomfortably erect cock between his legs is a more immediate concern, however.

Will looks over at Daniel to find him also clenching the sheets, his breathing quick and shallow. The tent in his boxers leaves no doubt as to the reason for his fitful slumber. Daniel cannot help but empathize with Will; his dreams and his body a reflection of Will's emotions, the perfect mirror. Will slips off his boxers and tee.

Cara slides off the bed to lie on the floor. Will can barely see her.

Daniel feels the press of warm fingers across his belly, feels the tickle of stubble and moist breath along his thigh. He wakes with a jolt to find a naked Will sitting beside him, a welcome sight to be sure, and reassuring since it had been Cara and not Will he had last seen at his feet. He glances at his hands and disentangles his fingers from the twisted cotton slowly, sucks in a breath as Will tugs at his boxers.

"Who were you dreaming about?" Will says relieving the stunned Daniel of his boxers. The touch of Will's fingers along his stiff cock draws the softest of hisses from Daniel.

"You." Daniel murmurs. He feels heat rise in his cheeks and it spreads like fire until his entire body is enflamed with a powerful longing. Daniel recognizes the heat is not his alone.

"Who were you dreaming about?" Daniel says noticing Will in a similar state.

A pause, “Hannibal.” comes the quiet reply.

Daniel sighs, “I’m seeing a pattern here…”

Daniel sits up and wriggles out of his tee. Will pushes him back onto the mattress, nudges his legs apart licking his fingers as he does. Daniel’s eyes widen as Will’s intentions become plain to him. His own dream had played out a little differently.

“Is this what you dreamed?” Will asks, his little smirk indicating he knows better. Daniel’s muscles contract around Will’s finger as it slips inside him.

“Um, not exactly…you?”

“Uh no.” Will says as he curls his finger causing Daniel to groan and wriggle along the mattress. Daniel smiles up at him. Of course Will wants to top after dreaming about Hannibal.

Will smiles back. The lop-sided grin and the tangled curls cause Daniel to fairly melt inside. Damn him…

“Drawer…” Daniel says pointing to the night stand.

The cool gel tingles on his skin as Will pushes his fingers inside the soft pucker of flesh. The flexing of muscle is accompanied by a luscious mounting pressure. Daniel relaxes against Will’s fingers, thinks how oddly contemplative Will appears as he kneels upon the bed gazing down at him.

The scar from Will’s wound shimmers, a ghostly silver line across his stomach in the dim light and Daniel is struck by Will’s contradictory nature – to feel such arousal and desire for the one who had caused him so much pain. Daniel finds himself wishing that Will could think only of him, to be in this moment with just him, but he knows Will cannot. The specter of Lecter looms large in Will’s mind and imagination, too large a shadow to ever disappear completely.

“Enough?” Will asks after a few moments of dedicated probing. Daniel tenses to the touch of fingers circling and sliding wet between his legs.

“I’m good.”

The anticipation is almost painful as he watches Will slick up his own cock.

The entry, when it comes, is slow and sweet as Will takes him in long strokes that lift Daniel from the mattress each time. Daniel struggles against the painful burn that he knows will lessen, eventually sending the familiar waves of pleasure through him. Will feels the resistance give way as he penetrates further, listening to Daniel’s breathing quicken as he moves inside him.

Daniel writhes beneath Will trying to coordinate his movements with Will’s but there is a lot of sensory overload. Will’s emotional response to the fucking combines with his own and it is almost too much. He feels around the bed until he finds the sheet and tightly twists the fabric taut around his fingers. He wraps his legs around Will’s body, lifting his hips from the bed as he does and he hears Will’s sighs of contentment as he adjusts his position to Daniel’s thoughtful modification.

Will angles his hips and feels the difference immediately. He rocks his body rhythmically in measured teasing strokes.

Daniel's composure becomes unraveled under the constant assault. The widening of the tender skin hurts and delights simultaneously. His cock begins to throb uncomfortably, a wonderfully wicked uncomfortable. Daniel thinks he might explode he can hardly contain the pleasure ripping through him. He flushes hot all over. He doesn't even try to stifle the cries and groans that slip from his lips as Will drills into him more deeply with every thrust of his body.

"Oh fuck… Will, this feels…"

"I…know…"

Will begins to press more eagerly, his shoulders and arms bearing his weight as he leans over Daniel. Daniel's head is thrown back, his jaw slack every belabored breath a whimper. Will thinks he looks exquisite. Daniel feels tight and slick around Will's cock as he slides the length back and forth. His body swallows Will up perfectly like a slippery glazed glove. He pushes in more deeply now, and feels the hesitation from Daniel. He can feel his own abdomen tighten, a sympathetic response as he invariably creates an image of himself in the same position.

"Do you want to turn over?" Will says slowing his movements so that Daniel stops bouncing between the mattress and Will.

Daniel appreciates the brief respite. "You're almost there, right?" grunts Daniel.

"As close as you are." Will glances at Daniel's swollen cock, feels the wet slick of the tip graze his skin. The sensation sends a pleasing tremor throughout his body.

"Aw, fuck…" Daniel trembles too, "This connection…" he hisses, flinching at the contact. He doesn't finish his thought.

Every muscle, every nerve jumps in response to the searing of his flesh as Will inserts the remaining length he's been holding back, widening Daniel so he whines in surprise. Will grins, knowing well what he just did to Daniel and how tantalizingly sweet that little jab was.

The grin becomes grimace, Will's face a mask of concentration focused on the impending release. His head is spinning in delirious anticipation of the blissful rush that awaits. As the throbbing intensifies, Will's entire body quivers and tenses. He looks to see Daniel's eyes are large and bright as his body twitches in response to Will.

"I'm feeling… really…...connected to you…right now." Will mumbles through gritted teeth. He lets loose his restraint and pummels Daniel into the mattress, feeling Daniel's legs still wrapped snugly around his body, heels grinding uncomfortably into his ribs.

"Ah…fuck!" A loud sob rips from Will as he shudders helplessly, nerves tingling with shocks of electric heat. Will thinks he can actually see the flares of synapses and feel the pop of neurons as they fire off in his head.

The emotional overload is mind numbing, Daniel cannot think; he only feels. He feels Will go achingly rigid inside him, feels the eruption when Will cums and trembles with uncontrollable spasms from his own release seconds later. Will is trembling himself, his arms bent with fatigue and glistening with sweat.

Daniel is slick with perspiration as well, the sheet damp beneath him. When did it get so hot in here?

Will relaxes and lowers himself down to rest on Daniel as Daniel's legs slide off him a little shakily. He immediately feels Daniel's fingers in his hair tugging him close. Daniel pulls Will's head down so that their lips touch. He opens his mouth and feels Will's mouth cover his.

Exchanging spit is so much better than exchanging words thinks Daniel. The kisses say more than the usual tired platitudes that seem inadequate, incapable of expressing the intensity of feeling between them.

Will is grateful for the silence. His mind is still recovering from the onslaught of emotion just now. He decides he will tell Daniel about his dreams and his sleep walking in the morning. For now, he can allow himself the stolen pleasure of Daniel's quiet company.

Daniel thinks he would really like to know the source of Will's inspiration beyond the one word answer he had offered. Perhaps he can get Will to talk about his dreams before they call Chilton. While Will is still in a reasonably good mood.

Daniel presses his lips to Will's forehead and turns over. He waits for Will to settle in and grins when he feels Will at his back, feels the now familiar press of his forehead between his shoulder blades.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 43

Chilton is caught between a colleague and his former favorite intelligent psychopath. Hannibal has his first appointment with Daniel.

Sorry for just one chapter. Had holiday obligations to attend to. I will post more next weekend. Merry Christmas!

Chapter 43

Chilton is caught between a colleague and one of his favorite intelligent psychopaths.

“You know Will, my initial assessment of you was more accurate than anyone knew.” Chilton says from behind his polished desk where he obviously feels safe enough to continue throwing darts. “In fact, in the aftermath of what happened after your release from this hospital the first time, I am quite certain that you are just as dangerous as Lecter.”

Daniel raises his head at that remark. He knew this was a bad idea for Will to talk to Chilton.

“Oh? Please enlighten me. I’d love to hear your professional opinion.” Will says while Daniel shakes his head at Chilton, begging with his eyes for Chilton to keep his mouth shut.

Chilton is caught between a colleague and one of his favorite intelligent psychopaths.

Will awakens to weight on his feet. He shifts around on the bed and finally has to wrest his legs from under Cara who straddles both his feet and Daniel’s at the bottom of the bed. She had apparently reclaimed her space once the humans were finished messing it up. Cara steps daintily over Daniel to lie at his side. Will watches her through eyes still bleary with sleep. She turns three times on the mattress before settling down.

Will remembers Winston doing the same thing. Always three times as if he could count or had some form of canine obsessive compulsive disorder.

Will feels good this morning all things considered. He doesn’t remember what he dreamed about, if he even dreamed at all after he fell asleep. The dreams of Hannibal trouble him and he pushes the sheet down. The scar is there. He breathes realizing he was holding his breath just then.

He remembers their agenda today. He taps Daniel in the back, between his shoulder blades where Will’s head had spent the remainder of the night.

“Get up. We’ve got to call to Chilton.” Will pushes hair from his eyes and waits for a response as Daniel hugs his pillow more tightly. Will taps him again.

Daniel lifts his head and turns to his stomach, pushing his upper body off the bed. Will thinks he’s stretching for a moment and then realizes Daniel is trying to see the clock on the dresser.

“It’s quarter to six. What is wrong with you?” Daniel flops back down on the bed. “Go back to sleep…”

Daniel scoots away from Will and curls around Cara to run his fingers through her fur. She licks his fingers and he murmurs he loves her too as she thumps her tail in answer.

Will grins at the affectionate exchange and feels the tug at his own heart, his mind filled with memories of his dogs. Memories of snatches of happiness, stolen minutes too brief to hold on to, and for Will it seems, the happier memories often are. He pushes the sheets off and frowns.

“I’m all sticky…gonna get a shower.” Will says as he climbs out of bed.

After listening to Will fumble around in the bathroom followed by the sound of water running through the pipes, Daniel gives up trying to fall back asleep. He sits up and cradles Cara’s jaw in his hands.

“Let’s go make some coffee.” He says to enthusiastic tail thumping. Cara knows coffee means a run outside and breakfast. Daniel begins to pull on some clothes. He glances at the bed and figures he will be doing more laundry today.

******

Will plays with his coffee cup as his gaze shifts from the vista of Florence below them to Daniel who sits at the table with him on the patio with his notepad, pen, and open laptop. The sky is overcast today but the humidity prevails. The patio feels cooler than the house this morning and this is why they sit outside. It’s only a little after eight and the promise of a summer rain looms overhead. However, it is Daniel’s impending conversation that commands his sole attention this morning.

He had agreed with Daniel that remaining off camera was a good suggestion. He did not promise he would. Will thinks he may have to remind Daniel of that distinction later.

Daniel also sits in a tee and a pair of cut off sweatpants swilling his coffee around the mug. This is the second pot of coffee he has made; the amount of coffee Will can drink is staggering. Breakfast was far too brief and he just wants to get what is sure to be a huge pile of unpleasantness out of the way before it rains. It would seem the mood is not any brighter in Baltimore.

“You look…well.” Daniel says with as much sincerity as he can muster.

Daniel smiles at the image on his laptop screen. The reconstructive surgery is first rate. There is scarring, but considering the hole left from the bullet and the ruined bone beneath, Frederick Chilton could look a lot worse. The scar actually gives his otherwise snooty expression some character.

But then, of course, he speaks.

“This is highly, highly irregular, Doctor Clayton.” Chilton leans into the lens of the web camera and squints as though Daniel might actually be inside his laptop.

“Highly irregular, highly confidential.” Daniel continues to smile. Chilton isn’t fooling anyone. He thrives on irregular. As soon as he had seen Daniel’s face on his screen, he had known exactly who

Daniel was calling about. There are probably damp stains on his sleeve from wiping the saliva from his mouth.

“All he needs is an eye patch…” Will mumbles from his chair.

“What was that?” Chilton asks still squinting.

Daniel rolls his eyes. Will had said he would remain quiet and off camera unless it became necessary for him to interrupt. Daniel thinks a moment. He sighs. Will had not actually said anything.

“What was what?” Daniel asks with a straight face.

“Nothing, I suppose. How did you say you came by my IP address?” Chilton fusses with his cuffs and angles his head as he gives Daniel the once over, no doubt assessing his casual attire.

“I didn’t…” Daniel says leaning back a little in his swivel chair so that Chilton can more easily see his tie-dye tee.

“This is something Jack Crawford would do…”

“Agent Crawford has nothing to do with this. I would like to keep it that way. I am aware our patient enjoys a certain celebrity and your discretion is appreciated.”

“Well, of course…How is Will?”

Daniel takes a slow deep breath. So much for discretion. “Our patient is managing for now.”

“I would be very interested to know what sort of therapy…” Chilton pauses suddenly, “Where are you right now? Are you outside?”

“Yes, in Florence. With our patient.”

“Uh huh. Still in Florence? Neither the hunt nor the therapy going well I assume. Does he remember leaving the hospital or…”

“There is enough progress to be encouraged by it. I need some information on his drug history at BSHCI while under your exclusive care.”

Chilton sits quietly for a moment. Daniel watches him purse his lips, another inappropriate question on the tip of his tongue. Daniel sighs with relief as Chilton swallows whatever it was. He’s not worried that Will might lose his temper. Chilton barely registers on Will’s radar of emotion. What Will loves is slapping Chilton’s ego around. In that, he is a lot like Hannibal Lecter. In fact, Will is like a lot of people in that regard, himself included.

Daniel knows Will sits stone faced in his chair. Will’s feelings about Chilton are few and they vacillate between pity and contempt. He suspects the latter is more in evidence today.

Will knows Frederick will be less than forthcoming. He also knows he will nose around like a dog sniffing for truffles. Will is actually looking forward to seeing how Daniel handles him. Although, there’s not much challenge in checkers.

“I suppose you would be referring to his narcoanalytic interview?” Chilton says casually, betraying his anxiety about that very thing.

Will thinks for a psychiatrist, Chilton is woefully unaware of how easy he is to read.

“I would.” Daniel says, “And any other drug therapy administered to him.”

“Will…our patient,” Chilton taps a finger to his temple and tries to smile but only one side of his mouth curves upward. It is an arresting sight and the slight tic in Chilton’s eye signals to Daniel that Chilton often forgets one side of his face doesn’t move anymore.

“The patient,” Chilton continues, “knows what drugs were administered to him.”

“He knows what you told him.”

“I’m sure he told you he signed consent forms.”

“He knows what he signed off on. This is not about consent, unless you bring it up for a reason. Is there a reason?”

“What are you implying? I don’t think I like your tone, doctor. You always did have a habit of being a little snide.”

“Just a little? Well, I didn’t mean to imply anything. I’ll speak plainly then. Without looking at his file, relate to me what drugs you gave him and the intended therapeutic reasons for administering them.”

“Are you sure Jack Crawford, or that Purnell woman didn’t put you up to this?”

Daniel hears Will shift in his seat. He does not dare look at him. Will is likely to take that as his cue to start in on Chilton.

“Doctor Chilton. I need the information to effectively treat my patient, who is now under my exclusive care. You understand the use of the plural possessive was merely polite?”

Chilton blinks, and then leans back in his chair, clicks his pen a few times.

“No need to get in a pissing contest.”

“No, there isn’t. I already won.”

“I suppose I shouldn’t be amazed at all the attention Mr. Graham gets. He is the belle of the ball, isn’t he?”

“Doctor Chilton…”

“He already signed off on consent.”

“Yes, you keep saying that like it means something. The paperwork says you gave him sodium amytal.”

“Yes…to ensure an honest exchange.”

Daniel can almost feel Will flinch at the words. Hearing the word honest fall from Chilton's mouth rankles at him, too.

"Neither sodium amytal nor pentothal guarantees that. There is no such thing as a truth serum." Daniel says.

"No, but that's what we use. Standard procedure."

"Alright then, were your questions standard, too?"

"What do you mean?"

"You had been talking to Doctor Lecter about him. You listened in on their conversations when Lecter visited. Weren't you curious what he might remember? He was arrested on several counts of murder that he claimed no memory of."

Daniel had hoped Chilton would be more cooperative. He did not want to have to go this route, but Chilton's obduracy requires Daniel engage in just the sort of confrontation he wanted to avoid. He would much rather catch the fly with honey, but now he'll have to swat the fly instead.

"Of course he wanted to remember, but the interview was intended as a baseline, an initial assessment with other interviews to follow. He understood the purpose, agreed to take any test I wanted. You understand the procedures as well as I."

"At least as well. So you were looking for inconsistencies in his mental processing? To determine if he was delusional or lying."

"Yes…"

"Let me tell you what I think you were looking for. Tell me if I'm getting warm. You were looking for proof of psychic driving, so you could have something on Lecter - to counter the allegations against you doing the same to Abel Gideon."

Will looks at Daniel. He had no idea Daniel thought that. The thought had crossed his mind and Will is impressed he didn't even have to mention it to Daniel.

You discussed my therapy with Hannibal Lecter, Frederick. Counter to our agreement.

I gave him a peek before I snatched down the shades.

I have appearances to maintain.

Chilton shrugs and rolls his eyes. He has the temerity to appear…bored.

"Those allegations are a bit of a non sequitur aren't they? Gideon is dead and Lecter is…well what he did to Graham is the least of his worries. Left Graham effectively neutered and broken on his kitchen floor as I understand it…"

Daniel keeps his jaw loose but it is a struggle to do so with Will sitting nearby. Daniel cannot even begin to characterize the emotions likely twisting over Will's face, but he feels them and Chilton should be very glad he sits miles away. Daniel is also dismayed by the lack of compassion from Chilton as he speaks of Will. It occurs to Daniel that Chilton doesn't actually see his psychotic patients as human beings, but something else, something less. And this extends even to Will.

Will understands Frederick. He understands his snobbery and self-importance as attempts to camouflage his failures and inadequacies. He coats his words with poison hoping people don't look too closely to find the emperor has no clothes. But who did Frederick turn to when Hannibal left him to wake from unconsciousness with the blood of two FBI agents all over him and his house?

May I use your shower please?

"My point is – if you suspected Lecter of psychic driving, your questions might have reflected that. You said you gave him the amytal to lower his inhibitions but he found buried memories instead. That not only suggests a certain battery of guided questions, but the introduction of other drugs as well. So…were you seeking proof of psychic driving when you administered the interview?"

"And what if I was? This is beyond the scope of asking about medication, Doctor Clayton. I think you are a little out of your league."

"Depends on which league you are talking about. I…do not play in yours."

"Oh, really? Well what have you prescribed for him?"

"Nothing." Daniel says after a pause. He shouldn't give Chilton that much, but he wants to let Chilton know that he has been interacting with a sober and drug free Will.

Chilton sits up straight in his chair and leans in to the laptop. "Are you telling me that he is not being treated with any medication?"

"Doctor Chilton, I can't talk to you about his current treatment. You know that."

"You are as crazy as he is. How about sedatives? I suppose you let him just walk around… Florence… Jack Crawford must be out of his mind…"

"Doctor Chilton!" Daniel interrupts him. He either did not hear Daniel or he cannot help but vent his disbelief and disapproval.

"Not even anti-depressants? Let's be honest, he is one clinically depressed individual. And depression is only the most mild of his afflictions. How do you manage him? We all know the state he was in…"

"Doctor Chilton, be careful what you say next…"

"Just tell him what you did to me, Frederick." Will says, leaning into the frame.

Daniel bites his lip. He can feel the downward spiral and all he wants is to land on his feet. This can't end well.

Chilton teeters in his chair as he moves backward a little. He composes himself quickly.

"Mr. Graham…" Chilton shifts his gaze to Daniel and his eyes narrow to slits. "You might have mentioned he was there. No one likes an ambush."

"People who tell the truth don't get ambushed." Will says as he pulls up his chair to rest beside Daniel's.

Chilton rubs his fingers over his lips as he eyes Daniel and Will carefully. Will can't help but stare at the scar that runs from cheekbone to lip. Will thinks how the injury has seemed to reinforce the very qualities that got him shot in the first place. Chilton likely sees himself as a victim and Will supposes he is. A victim of his own shortsightedness.

"Well, Mr. Graham, Will…you're a lot more lucid than the last time I saw you."

"Whatever that means." Will says. "And you are typically obstinate. At least you never disappoint."

Chilton swivels in his chair so his good side faces his laptop. He engages the screen in profile with sidelong glances.

"I would imagine disappointment is an emotion you are intimately acquainted with. Well, you look healthy enough. The uh, climate where you are seems to agree with you. My compliments, Doctor Clayton."

Daniel resists offering a tart response. He's empathizing with Will yet again. Will has an entire quiver full of arrows, his bow aimed at Chilton.

"You were curious about what he would remember under the influence. A rare opportunity to study a psychopath in action. And he was cooperating because he believed that you told him the truth about what you were drugging him with." Daniel says.

Chilton folds his hands together and smiles a most ingratiating smile from across his desk.

"He was cooperating to manipulate Lecter. My this for his that. Threatening me with a malpractice suit?"

"I'm afraid that would become a class action suit, Frederick and I don't have the time. I asked you what you thought Lecter had given me to induce memory loss. You rattled off a list, but then you gave me one, or a cocktail, to induce the same thing. Didn't you?"

"Why would I do that?" Chilton says in his predictably squirrely manner.

"Because studies have shown that the memory of an event experienced under the influence of drugs or alcohol is more likely to be recalled under the influence of the same substance. Even better if you could get him into the same emotional state." Daniel says.

"You flashed some lights on me, too, didn't you Frederick?" Will says.

"Well, I did give you sodium amytal." Chilton says looking at his fingernails as though contemplating a manicure.

"And…" Will prompts.

"And a couple of benzodiazepines." Chilton says quickly, the words clipped and short.

"To dampen the transfer of short term to long term memory. So Will would remember the past, but not the interview. Pretty slick, doctor. Which ones did you give him?" Daniel says.

"Diazepam and Midazolam." Chilton bites his lip looking like the kid with his hand caught in the cookie jar. Daniel wonders if he can feel his own teeth scraping on that side of his lip.

Sedatives. The strobe causes neurons to fire en masse like striking many piano keys at once. The dissonance might foster a change in your mind…

“You think that’s what Lecter used?” Will asks.

“To induce the memory loss? Yes, old chestnuts those. To induce seizures? Combined with the strategic light stimulation, absolutely. Of course, it’s only conjecture. Lecter had the means to get his hands on anything…and he apparently did.”

Will ignores the insinuating raise of Chilton’s brow. Frederick will give up more information if Will lets him hurl a little innuendo. Frederick’s own narcissism had been constantly undermined by Hannibal’s. Eclipsed would be more accurate. Throwing darts at Will makes him feel better about himself.

Daniel realizes Will was taking the diazepam when he met him not for generalized anxiety as he claimed, but to recreate the lost time and possibly the seizures so he could recall those lost memories. But the dosage wasn’t high enough and he knew he couldn’t take more without supervision. Enter Daniel. This is why he’s been so concerned about having flashes and hallucinations without the pharmaceutical inducement. It is entirely possible he has built up a tolerance to it, or…Daniel considers the possibility that Will’s mind is trying to repair itself. It has rewired the pathways away from certain memories to protect him while it does.

Daniel is surprised Will complied with his therapy. Will had abandoned his own self-therapy because... Trust. Will trusts him. Trusts him enough to let him call the shots. Respects him enough to follow his instructions. He glances at Will who meets his eyes and responds by looking up at the sky and then shifts his gaze to the waiting Chilton.

“Frederick, we don’t have to particularly like each other to help each other.” Will says.

“No, we don’t. Though I don’t know how you can help me except to an early grave. How may I be of further assistance?”

“Is there anything else I should know about my stay at BSHCI?”

“Well, if it helps with whatever you two are doing, you should be able to remember anything you experience during a seizure, including the one you had during our interview, but you may never recall anything you experienced during the dangerously high fevers you had with the encephalitis.”

Will knows Chilton is being truthful on this point. He can remember the exchange in Hannibal’s dining room when he had his seizure in front of Gideon, but barely an hour later, remembered nothing of shooting Gideon. Chilton can be inept about his craft, but he knows the brain and he knows what drugs can do to a brain.

“And, it was Gideon who gave you up to Bloom. Too bad. Brown might have succeeded.”

“I figured as much.” Will says. If Alana had not wanted to save him so badly…

“If I were you, I would be more concerned about dealing with the trauma of Hannibal’s attack than chasing ghosts and flashing lights. Your mind is fractured, Will. Lecter broke you into little pieces and you think Clayton here is going to pick up the pieces.”

"If you wanted Lecter caught so badly, Frederick, why did you stay in the shadows? Why not come forward and lay it all out to Jack? Before Miriam shot you." Will asks.

"Because Lecter was running around free. And if by some chance you had actually managed to bring him in, I wanted to be the one in charge of his treatment. I couldn't do that if I lost my license. If I could dine out for years on the mind of Will Graham, imagine what Lecter's mind will bring in."

I would love nothing more than to see you trade places with Doctor Lecter.

Will thinks killing Hannibal outright would be more merciful. The thought that Hannibal's mind would be in Chilton's hands sinks like a stone in his gut. Chilton would not be interested in rehabilitating him. He would hurt him, torture him, and pick at his brain sadistically and with carte blanche from the FBI. Chilton would have his revenge on Hannibal in the most legal way imaginable.

Chilton would actually make Hannibal more dangerous than he already was. Hannibal may be psychopathic killer and cannibal but he was also flesh and blood. The words of Shakespeare's Shylock come to Will's mind.

If you prick us…do we not bleed? And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?

It occurs to Will that there is a profound difference between Chilton's and Hannibal's approach to therapy. As crazy as it is, Hannibal's therapy had been intended to help, at least to Hannibal's thinking. Chilton's therapy had been malicious and self-serving. It had been that way with Abel Gideon and with Will. Will finds Chilton's actions more egregious than even Hannibal's.

Chilton intends to put Hannibal through hell.

"You know Will, my initial assessment of you was more accurate than anyone knew." Chilton says from behind his polished desk where he obviously feels safe enough to continue throwing darts. "In fact, in the aftermath of what happened after your release from this hospital the first time, I am quite certain that you are just as dangerous as Lecter."

Daniel raises his head at that remark. He knew this was a bad idea for Will to talk to Chilton.

"Oh? Please enlighten me. I'd love to hear your professional opinion." Will says while Daniel shakes his head at Chilton, begging with his eyes for Chilton to keep his mouth shut.

"Ah yes, that debatable charm of yours. You know I always believed all those disorders and neuroses you claim are forgeries. You are ever the psychopath's triumvirate wrapped in a pretty package. I've had numerous chats with Jack Crawford. At least with Lecter, we know what we are getting."

I'm going to prove Hannibal Lecter is the Chesapeake Ripper.

"You…didn't trap Lecter, you abetted his escape and he thanked you for that by gutting you."

I know you will. And when you do, I will read about it from a secure location and I will reintroduce myself to society at that time.

"You turned me over to the FBI knowing I was innocent and that poor disturbed student of Crawford's fired a bullet into my face."

Will, what have you done?

I called Jack Crawford.

No.

None of us is innocent, Frederick, not anymore. Will nods his head, his face serene almost saint like as Chilton blithely ignores his own diagnosis of Will at his own peril. Chilton's survival instinct must have departed as he sits feeling secure behind the lens of the laptop.

Light flashes overhead and Will thinks for a moment they are about to be caught in a downpour of summer rain, but the thunder does not follow. There is no crack from the ominous clouds in the sky above them. Daniel sits beside him listening to Chilton prattle on… There is another flash of light and Will is someplace else…

"Whatever Lecter did to you before you arrived at BSHCI released a psychopath if you weren't one already. And Jack Crawford should have known you never returned to therapy with Lecter to catch him. You found your soulmate."

Will says nothing but Daniel can see his mind at work processing behind the pale blue eyes, staring at the laptop screen but not really seeing it, or Chilton.

"You're dangerous because people respond to that boy next door face of yours far more easily than any approximation of charm Hannibal puts out there. We can call him Hannibal, can't we? I'm assuming you were on a first name basis."

"Doctor Chilton, if you have nothing helpful to add…" Daniel says but Chilton keeps talking right over him.

"When you're done with your therapy Will, are you going to bring Hannibal in? I doubt it. You'll likely end up right back here. Whoever finds Hannibal will either kill him as you should have done, or extradite him right back here. And with any luck, maybe I'll have the both of you right where you belong. You could be cellmates. We'd have some fun then."

"That was really helpful, Chilton." Daniel says, "Will, we're done here."

"Doctor Clayton, while I take exception to your approach with Will, I admire the other work you do and you should stick to grief therapy and your dogs. Will's madness is a fire. You are playing with fire and you are likely to get burnt. He has you wrapped around his finger or something close, and you believe everything he says."

"Don't hold back Frederick, you're on a roll." Will says, eyes blinking furiously as he returns to… here.

Odd he heard every word exchanged, but he wasn't sitting on the patio. His surroundings had shifted then shifted back. He had been inside a room with pale pink rosebuds on the wallpaper and a pine tree outside the window. There had been a photograph. The image fades from his conscious mind, too distracted by the conversation to keep it.

Chilton wants them both locked up. Hannibal and Will together in adjoining cells in Chilton's little shop of horrors. Will thinks Hannibal would be amused at the thought. Will can picture his lips upturned in a satisfied smile as he carves up Chilton into steaks and drinks a toast to his health.

"To answer your question about the drugs, Doctor Clayton…I gave Will what I just said I did. Nothing else. I did not conduct multiple interviews with him as I had hoped because Hannibal set him free. Unfortunately for Hannibal, he won't be set free and I will be able to treat him…as I see fit."

Who will be playing god then, Frederick?

"He's smarter than you, Frederick. He managed to frame you and get you shot."

"He's smarter than you, too. He managed to seduce perhaps the only person alive capable of catching him."

Will's eyes widen. Daniel feels the turmoil inside Will as the conversation runs around his brain like a high speed train off its rails. The aching Daniel feels in his chest is mirrored in the pained expression on Will's face as Chilton keeps right on talking to one of the two intelligent psychopaths he wants committed to his hospital.

"I should have seen it. Locked up in your cell, whining to anyone who would listen about your innocence, you were always going on about Hannibal this and Hannibal that, and Hannibal - wringing his hands over Will, Will, Will…

Daniel reaches over and clicks off the camera and the image of Chilton winks out. Will stares at Daniel's desktop, a replica of the beach print in his office. He smells the ocean as he turns to look at Daniel.

"That's the reason I wanted to contact him without you. That…was ugly."

"It was, but Chilton is no slacker when it comes to hindsight. I can see why he thinks the way he does. And if he thinks that way, so do a lot of other people." Will says thinking of Jack.

"They can't get in your head either. Your actions are being viewed like a silent movie reel. What happened is a lot more complicated, more complicated than someone like Chilton could appreciate."

"Hmmmm. He does lack imagination, doesn't he?" Will says still thinking about his own imagination. How broken is he?

"He lacks a soul." Daniel says. "You want to shake this off and go get some clothes? I think I'm tired of seeing you wearing my stuff."

"Where are we going?"

"Downtown Florence. We should get there about the time the shops open. Check out block after block of fine Italian clothiers. Quite a different experience than shopping in a mall in the states."

"You know, I have bought clothes at places other than a mall."

"Not in Italy." Daniel smiles. "I do have one question, Will."

“Just one?’

“Yeah. Did Jack ever tell you that Chilton was alive?”

Will shakes his head slowly. Jack had kept that ace up his sleeve. Will had learned about Chilton later, after surgery, after leaving the hospital. Hannibal probably knows Chilton survived. Chilton’s return to his former position had been as sensational as his demise. Will sighs at the thought of yet another perceived betrayal.

Chapter 44

Hannibal has his first appointment with Doctor Clayton.

The lobby of Clayton’s office is as welcoming as it is large. Hannibal stands with hands in the pockets of his stylish summer jacket. He wears an Armani ensemble of muted blue and a crisp white polo style shirt. It would appear that blue is the dominant color in Clayton’s office, too.

The pretty receptionist, Constanzia, sits busy with her files and her phone, but she occasionally looks up from her work to offer shy smiles from behind her desk. Hannibal had shared a demi-tasse of espresso with her earlier and found her quite pleasant to talk to.

Hannibal had arrived early to his appointment as the lovely Constanzia had been opening up the office and had been told Doctor Clayton was running late this morning.

Since he has the time, Hannibal decides to look around at the artwork Clayton has placed around the lobby. He notices the print of Raphael's Galatea immediately; it is the largest piece in the room in part because of the ornate gilded frame that contains it. Clayton clearly identifies with Renaissance pieces, not surprisingly since he lives and practices in Florence.

Hannibal notes there is an overarching theme to Clayton's selections. These are not randomly selected pieces. Each evokes the same emotion. Hannibal's lips twist slightly at the subtle beauty of Clayton's thinking and his apparent empathy for his patients.

Each piece in the room is an illustration of love, not just the romantic kind, but love in all its forms. What better emotion to contemplate while waiting to unload a tempest of grief. Hannibal thinks it entirely the case that Clayton hand-picked the pieces himself. Doctor Clayton continues to intrigue Hannibal.

Hannibal's attention is drawn to a scaled down replica of the same Hellenic sculpture he had kept in his home in Baltimore. The original piece, a second century Roman copy of the Greek original, Dionysus and Satyr, is one of the hundreds of pieces on display on the second floor of the Uffizi. The sculpture is part of the private Medici collection and like so many other classical pieces once owned by the famed family, it offered inspiration for the artists of their time.

Like Hannibal's, this one too is a smaller but faithful reproduction of the piece, a rendering of Greek ideals, of amorous desire brought forth in a ritual of wine. Hannibal had kept his in one of the bedrooms upstairs, but after Will had begun spending nights, he had moved it to the antique black console table in the foyer next to an exquisite Greek kylix. Will had wasted no time commenting on the new addition to the foyer. Hannibal's brow raises slightly, amusement tugging at his lips as he recalls finding Will's scarf tied around it in a bow, his gloves stuck over each of the figures' curly haired heads.

Hannibal has missed male companionship since arriving in Florence. Du Maurier provides a certain kind of companionship. The kind of companionship that has caused him to reevaluate what companionship means.

Of all the people and patients to cross his path, he had never met one who had aroused his curiosity or intellect as Will has. None had been as compelling or challenging. Seeking insight from the manufactured manipulations he had introduced to other patients had become as trite for Hannibal as the proverbial mouse trap once Will had been thrust upon him like a beautiful angry storm in Jack Crawford's office.

Will had required a much more elaborate maze of manipulation. And the deeper into Hannibal's maze he had wandered; the more Hannibal had desired to keep him there. Hannibal had believed that after Will had come back to him to resume his therapy on that cold winter evening in Baltimore, showing up promptly at seven at his office that Will had desired to be there, too. He wants to believe that still.

Hannibal's thoughts are interrupted by the commotion he hears from the kitchen area at the back of the lobby. He quickly realizes the noise emanates from the rear entrance and that the source of the noise must be Clayton.

Constanzia turns from her terminal to greet the harried doctor as he walks to the back stairs a flurry of olive green and beige and Hannibal notes, damp hair and no socks.

“Doctor Clayton…” Constanzia calls from her desk. Clayton pauses at the sound of her voice. “Your nine o’clock is here.”

“I have a nine o’clock?”

Clayton walks over to her and glances at the computer screen, apparently looking at his schedule. He looks up and Hannibal merely lifts his head as he continues to stand by the open pane curio cabinet. Hannibal notices the hesitation in his movements as he considers whether he should ask his receptionist to run interference for him or if he should simply…

“Doctor Boucher?” Clayton’s voice booms across the empty lobby. Hannibal nods. “I apologize for the delay. Would you like to come upstairs?”

“Of course.” He watches Clayton take his files in his free hand from Constanzia. He is clearly flustered and trying not to show it. Hannibal enjoys watching the subtle shift of limbs beneath the pressed linen.

The voice is not Will’s. Hannibal is surprised he had expected it would be. He’s not sure he’s not disappointed. The pitch is higher and the tone is different and there is a slight local accent, evidence of many years living away from the US. Clayton has embraced his adopted culture wholeheartedly.

Hannibal walks to the bottom of the steps to join Clayton. He is perhaps a couple inches shorter than Hannibal, not very far off from Will’s height. He smells of deodorant soap and hair gel which he apparently applied while driving. Hannibal finds him refreshingly unpretentious as he smiles and gestures for Hannibal to go first while he lugs his attaché case up the steps after him.

After opening the door to his office and showing Hannibal in, Clayton walks to his desk and begins to unpack his case while talking to Hannibal.

“I was out yesterday and my office manager must have scheduled your appointment. But she is out today and I…never thought to call in and confirm my appointments for today. Did you wait long?”

He glances at his laptop and winces. Hannibal knows it is well after nine. He finds himself wanting to put the doctor at ease.

“I didn’t consider it waiting. I was admiring the art work in your lobby. I actually lost track of the time.” Hannibal smiles one his most patient smiles. Clayton runs his hand through his thick curls and nods as he looks absently about his office.

Hannibal’s breath hitches in his chest. The gesture is…so familiar.

“Thank you for that. Please, have a seat.”

Hannibal looks around the room, spots the two chairs facing one another in front of the bay window and ponders the arrangement. He crosses to the couches instead. That seating arrangement simply will not do. He seats himself dead center in the most centrally located of the couches. He is immediately struck by the décor. Clayton’s approach to psychiatry is…progressive to say the least.

The brightness of the Tuscan sun makes it impossible to shield the interior of the space from light. There is light in every corner, leaving no room for the sequestering of dark secrets. Confession is good for the soul thinks Hannibal and the ocean blue of the walls is sufficiently inviting and peaceful to lull the souls of all the sheep who pass through Clayton's door into submission.

Hannibal finds himself admiring the carefully constructed office. He thinks Clayton must be very successful in prying even the most reluctant of patients open like a stubborn clam in this beautiful sunny room. Hannibal's eyes are drawn to the beach print on the wall. He imagines it an important print judging by its placement and size. It is signed and dated by Clayton himself and Hannibal thinks it is a photo of home…east coast, perhaps.

Daniel finishes arranging his desk and fixes his tie. His patient is here for grief counseling so the notation next to his name says. Daniel finds his new patient remarkably composed, but people often wear a mask initially. And yet, he does feel sadness from his patient. His sadness trails him like a vapor, barely detectable but very much a part of him. He pulls this sadness on every morning with his trousers and drinks it with every meal.

He seats himself near his patient so he can look at him in a three quarter view not straight on. He notes the immaculate attire, the perfect hair that frames his face and accentuates cheekbones as smooth and sharp as cut marble, but his focus is drawn to the piercing eyes that seem to capture everything at once yet give up nothing.

Daniel is aware those piercing eyes have followed his every move, not overtly, but Daniel feels them upon him faint and tremulous, almost wistful. He places his notebook and pen on the coffee table and turns to his patient who reclines on the couch with legs crossed a look of mild curiosity on his face.

He gestures to the pitcher of water, but Hannibal declines.

"Let me take just a minute to read over the intake questionnaire and your referral."

"Take your time."

Hannibal sees the subtle change in Clayton's face as he reads. Du Maurier made an impression on him, but Hannibal is not sure about the nature of the impression.

"Doctor Dumont was your psychiatrist?"

"Until recently, yes. She devotes her practice to private clients around the province. She was often unavailable for weekly sessions."

"She didn't write much except to say just that. Is her availability the only reason?"

"She and I agreed that a change in therapists and therapy might prove more…efficacious. It was a mutual decision I assure you."

"Oh…" Daniel does not have anything professional to add. He closes his mouth and hopes he doesn't look too stunned. Or annoyed.

Daniel swallows and pushes thoughts of Dumont from his mind. He thinks she is doing her best to ingratiate herself by referring clients. On odd thing to do since he has yet to meet her Lydia let alone offer recommendations as to treatment. He will have to discuss the referring of patients to Dumont this weekend. He will have to discuss it with Maria, too. Apparently she did not get the memo about new patients.

But, this gentleman is here now, and it would be rude not to continue with the initial consultation after making him wait for half an hour.

“I met Doctor Dumont only recently. I am surprised she referred anyone so soon.”

“Perhaps your reputation precedes you. She seemed to be of the opinion we would work well together and spoke highly of you.”

“Well, that’s encouraging, isn’t it?” Daniel picks up his pen and notebook. “So, I read that you are a professor over at the Uffizi?”

“Yes, I’m one of many assistant curators.”

Daniel smiles warmly. He doubts his patient really views his position in such menial terms. He imagines Victor to be quite learned in his field given the swell of pride he feels despite the modest response. A lot of pride in fact.

“Ah, well the Uffizi is huge. Which area or collection is yours to play guardian of the gate?”

“I have access to the Vasari Corridor and the Palazzo Pitti. I prepare tours and lectures for visiting professors, foreign dignitaries and the like.”

“I’m not surprised. You seem pretty cosmopolitan. At the risk of embarrassing you, how many languages do you speak?”

“Fluently? Five.”

“And Latin?”

“Of course. And since my studies included the Classical period…”

“You know Greek, too.”

“How many languages do you speak? Italian, certainly.”

“And French. That’s it. Your accent is hard to place. Eastern European?”

“Yes.” Hannibal says, “But I grew up in France.”

“Do you like your work at the Uffizi?”

“I like the solitude. I like preparing and giving lectures.”

Hannibal decides Clayton’s smile is quite charming. He has a way of curving only the left side of his lips and tilting his head just so. The peculiar little smile is reminiscent of the reluctant indulgent smiles he used to get from Will. Hannibal had enjoyed provoking those hard won smiles from Will, but this doctor seems to offer them unsolicited.

“You can make your own schedule?”

“Most of the time. I enjoy a certain flexibility, yes. I imagine you have been to Uffizi more than once considering your choices downstairs.”

“Not nearly as often as I would like. I have yet to see the whole museum. But it is one of my favorite places to spend an afternoon.”

“When did you last indulge yourself?’

Daniel thinks a moment. “Must be last Spring. You know, I’ve been trying to see the Vasari Corridor but access is restricted. I guess I don’t have the clout to get in.”

“Only professors are admitted and very special guests.” Hannibal leans back in his seat waiting for Clayton’s response.

“I suppose you have to know someone.” Daniel’s face breaks into a full-fledged grin.

“It helps.” Hannibal waves a finger at Clayton. “Fishing for favors already?”

“Too forward?”

“We’ll see how the session goes.”

“Fair enough. Do you prefer doctor or professor?"

“If we must be formal, doctor will do. You may call me Victor if you prefer.”

“All right. Victor, then. The intake questionnaire indicates you checked grief issues. Tell me about them.”

“I’ve suffered the misfortune of losing a daughter. There have been other losses. According to my former therapist, I am in a holding pattern somewhere between bargaining and full blown depression.”

“Ok. And how long have you been struggling with this?”

“About two years.”

“And how would you characterize your behavior? How have you been coping?”

“I continued with life, but I know have withdrawn from it.”

“What do you want to happen with therapy?”

“To do more than survive. To find joy despite the loss.”

“Would you be comfortable telling me a little about what happened?”

“Of course.” Hannibal understands Clayton needs to put events into context. He would have followed the same script Clayton is using to analyze the needs of his own patients.

As Hannibal tells Clayton his prepared story, a story that parallels actual recent events in some respects, he observes the expressions and mannerisms displayed by the younger man seated next to him. He listens carefully to everything Hannibal says, interrupts barely at all, but writes copiously as Hannibal relates his reasons for seeking therapy.

Hannibal knows every line, every contour of Will's face by heart. Though this doctor is striking in his own way, his resemblance to Will physically is fleeting. Hannibal sees in him a Will that might have been had Will's life taken a different trajectory. He lacks Will's gravitas and brooding alertness. His gaze, when he glances at Hannibal from his note taking, is mild and warm though there is no denying the color is stunning, accentuated by his faded olive jacket.

Hannibal knows that were he sitting in the psychiatrist's chair he would be able to elicit this doctor's thoughts and desires, the ones he keeps concealed beneath his suit and his professional veneer. Bringing them out as a patient will require skill and finesse.

As they talk the idea occurs to Hannibal that since he is the patient, he might avail himself of Clayton's expertise. Hannibal thinks he could benefit from Clayton's honest and objective insight, certainly more than Du Maurier's. Clayton has no agenda and would provide an alternative point of view. Clayton will also provide insight into Du Maurier. Hannibal recognizes that Clayton may provide her with insight into him as well, but she may find her position less rather than more advantageous. She really has no idea what Hannibal is capable of.

Daniel senses his patient has spilled as much he is going to this initial consult and Daniel is fine with that. He has a ten o'clock scheduled and had thought he would have time to prepare for her. His efforts to scale down his office hours are not working out and he will apparently have to reiterate his instructions to Maria, who stubbornly continues to schedule patients because she knows that Daniel is treating Will off the books.

His prospective new patient sits as composed as when he entered Daniel's office. He has not even glanced at the expensive watch he wears on his wrist and Daniel imagines he would sit here all day content to watch him work. Victor's loneliness drips from him and pools at his feet like an oil spill.

"Doc…Victor," Daniel finds it awkward to refer to him by his first name given their ages. He feels like he should be more deferential somehow and cannot shake the feeling.

"I know you understand the stages of grief. You're actually quite good at analyzing your own feelings as far as I can tell from talking to you. But knowing what they are doesn't make experiencing them any easier. You exhibit classic avoidance. There are associations that are very strong and understandably you avoid them because they evoke such pain. You mentioned dogs remind you of your loss. The pain for you is deep. It is as though nearly everything reminds you of the loss."

"Love and death are the great hinges on which all human sympathies turn. We are affected by the things we see around us every day." Hannibal agrees.

"And our world is only as large we make it." Daniel responds.

"My world is small because I have made it so." Hannibal says leaning forward so that he breaches Daniel's personal space. Daniel remains where he is. He meets Hannibal's eyes.

"Have you?"

"You imply I have grown comfortable with my grief."

"Maybe. You hold your memories close, because to share too much, even with your potential therapist," Daniel pauses and smiles and is rewarded with a hint of a smile from Victor, "is to admit someone else access into your private world where your loss still exists."

Hannibal sits quite still, amazed at the insight Clayton appears to have. He is intriguing indeed.

"Admittance does not come easily." Hannibal says simply.

"I would imagine not. As you suggested yourself, you need companionship. But, companionship is a mine field for you. Your senses cause you to become overloaded with memories and you retreat, but the loneliness hurts too, and after a while you venture out again, but…"

"But the cycle begins all over again." Hannibal says.

"Yes."

"Have you ever lost anyone close to you?" Hannibal asks watching Clayton's eyes carefully.

"Uh, pets…not people, not yet. But, I will someday and I dread it." Daniel says thinking that loss can assume many forms. The loss caused by distance; of either actual miles or of growing apart. The loss of a parent slipping into dementia. The loss of a lover to someone else…

Daniel senses his patient's loneliness may not stem from the finality of death despite what he told Daniel about his adopted daughter. His patient presents as highly intelligent and resilient. He certainly has not revealed everything in the half hour they have been talking. Were it not for his sheer strength of will, Daniel is certain his sadness would bleed from him, raw and hot.

The sadness Daniel feels from him has become more acute as Victor has sat conversing with Daniel. He has asked Daniel as many questions about himself as Daniel has asked him. Victor is a powerful presence, his inner strength primal yet contained, tightly coiled inside like…Will's.

There is another emotion Daniel feels from his prospective patient. Regret twists inside the tight coil. Daniel thinks that perhaps the regret is the stronger, that grief is not really the emotion for which Victor seeks solace. Regret raises the possibility that his patient feels responsible for the loss, that there was something he could have, should have done, but did not. Or, he did do something, but perceives his actions as a mistake.

Daniel decides to tread lightly until Victor discloses more. Like any other patient, Daniel must gain his trust so that he feels comfortable opening up. The sadness that trails Victor is very real, and loneliness follows close behind.

As Victor talked about his loss, Daniel thinks his patient never left the first stage of grief. Victor remains in denial and isolation despite acknowledging the loss. He has gone through the motions, seen evidence, but he has never really accepted the finality. Daniel wonders how Du Maurier missed it. Then again, she can't feel her patient's emotions. Victor is extremely practiced at masking his behind a visage of well coifed control.

"Your grief is not limited to your daughter, is it? You grieve her death, but people don't have to die to be lost from us. You grieve another kind of loss."

"You are very perceptive, Doctor Clayton, like you can read my mind."

“I wouldn’t go that far…” Daniel chuckles and shakes his head.

I would, thinks Hannibal. “You are far more perceptive than Doctor Dumont suggested.”

Hannibal wonders at just how intuitive Clayton is. He sits calmly soaking Hannibal up with those deep green eyes and Hannibal imagines that were he to reach out his hand and place it over Hannibal’s chest he might wince at the tender scoring he has unwittingly inflicted their entire session.

“I can only be as perceptive as my patient allows.” Daniel says.

“I think I would like to continue seeing you if that is acceptable to you.”

“Well, about that. Doctor Dumont could not have known and it’s not her fault…”

Daniel catches Victor’s dark eyes, eyes that gleam cold and unyielding, yet the embers of regret flicker refusing to become ash because his patient holds the embers close and though the embers burn, they are all he has. Daniel cannot bring himself to send him on his way. Before he can finish, his patient speaks up.

“You are not accepting new patients. I understand, but you should have mentioned that…” Hannibal starts to rise from the couch.

He has not felt indignation in a long while, but his ire is piqued. Did Du Maurier know and deliberately send him here? To what end? In hopes that Clayton would express that one trait Hannibal cannot abide…

“A recent decision, yes, and one apparently lost on my staff…but since you are here and we seem to have developed a rapport, I will do my best to accommodate you.”

The chill in the room evaporates as he watches his patient relax into his seat once more. Daniel feels like he just avoided a powder keg although there is no incendiary evidence on his patient’s countenance whatsoever.

Hannibal feels the ire dissipate and shift away from Clayton to where it belongs. He likes talking with Clayton. He is not Will, but he does not have to be. Clayton is a little salt in the wound he carries, but he is strangely comforting as well. He is both ache and remedy.

“May I ask why you aren’t accepting new patients?”

“Well, I have scaled back my practice temporarily, referred some patients out to clear my afternoons in order to work with another patient.”

“A singular patient?” Hannibal asks wondering if Lydia is the patient. Du Maurier had not mentioned her substance abusing suicidal patient would be infringing on Clayton’s time to such a degree.

“Yes. One patient. But this time frame is available if you would like weekly sessions that I promise will be the full hour, or more if you tell me ahead of time.”

“I am much relieved. That would be satisfactory. You know, Doctor Dumont told me she sees a patient in Fiesole, in fact, I believe it is this patient that caused the…reduction in her availability. She also mentioned you are consulting with her about this patient.”

“She told you that because you wanted to know how she knew me, why she was referring you to me.”

“Yes, despite the dogs…perhaps because of the dogs.”

“Well, given that you associate dogs with your loss, I wouldn’t recommend adopting one right away. But, she is correct that creating positive associations to replace the negative would be part of the healing.”

“Perhaps…gradually.”

“Of course. I treat plenty of patients without canine therapy. It has to be a good fit and in your case, I agree canine therapy is not an option at this time.”

“The patient in Fiesole has benefitted from this therapy?”

“I’ll find out this weekend. I will be taking some dogs with me to see her Saturday.”

“Well, I hope only the best in her recovery.”

“Me, too. I do have another patient waiting. If you want to settle your insurance and payment information with Constanzia on your way out, that would be great. And she will put you on my calendar for next week.”

“I’m sure you will confirm it this time?” Hannibal says tilting his head at Clayton. He is gratified by the pursing of lips as Clayton bites back a smile. The green eyes soften at the equally soft rebuke.

“Absolutely. Take care, Victor.”

He holds out his hand to Hannibal and Hannibal takes it, feels the warmth and sincerity in the grip. He feels the calloused palm, the roughness of fingers that hold something besides a pen with regularity. A musician perhaps. There is confidence and compassion in the green eyes that stare back at him. Hannibal feels the promise of intimacy he has missed so much.

As he walks back down the rear stairs so that Clayton’s ten o’clock can ascend to the office using the front stairs, Hannibal thinks Du Maurier deliberately placed a hurdle for him to jump over and right at the starting line. Whether she knew Clayton was downsizing or not does not matter. She has a session with Clayton this weekend, allowing her perhaps hours to influence and persuade. What is to be done about that? Hannibal decides a week is a terribly long time to wait to see Clayton again.

Daniel does not have time to dwell on his impressions of his new patient. He removes his notes on Professor Boucher from his notebook and is just finishing creating a file for him when his ten o’clock raps on the door. Three patients later, Daniel can call it day. It is not until he is on his way out the door that Constanzia tells him that Boucher has not only scheduled for the same time next week, he paid for an entire month of sessions out of pocket and with cash.

Chapter 45

Will reads some Dante, dreams and receives a call from the twins. They are on their way back to Florence. How unfortunate for the twins that, after shopping with Du Maurier, Hannibal receives a call from Roberta and prepares to meet Luciano and Lucia at da Vinci Fiumicino Airport. Take-out, anyone?

I am the way to the city of sorrow, the way to eternal pain, the way to punishment. Justice moved my higher maker, building with divine power, supreme wisdom and first love. Before me, there was nothing, and I will last forever: Abandon hope you that enter here.

Sighs, groans, and wails now pierced the starless air, so that soon I began to weep. A confusion of tongues and strange accents sounded in pain and anger. Voices deep and hoarse and shrill, with the sounds of blows intermingled, roiled in the dirty air, like sand spiraling in a whirlwind. I said: "Teacher, I'm surrounded by turmoil. Whose griefs are making this relentless stir?"

He answered: "Outsiders who lived without commitment. Their neutral souls mix here with the angels that stood only for themselves, undecided, neither rebellious nor faithful to the deity. To keep her beauty, heaven put them out, but hell could not receive them, since it would have been improved by their presence."

Dante’s Inferno – Hell, Canto III

Will is dimly aware of the book slipping from his fingers as he drifts into his fractured dreamscape. He feels the crunch of tortured rock and cracked shards of bone beneath his boots as he trudges through the dark and smoke filled remains of the forest he once knew as a sanctuary, the one place into which he could retreat from the oppressive onslaught of unwanted emotions and Greeks bearing gifts...

He hears a whine, low pitched and ragged. He turns to see his sole companion in this dark charred place, the grey wolf. The two of them approach the boulder that blocks their path and conceals the serpent tailed eagle from view. Will hears its giant feathers rustling in the sharp wind that burns hot across exposed skin.

He knows if he looks he will see. He has lived with fear all his life, but this…this fear is not the fear of losing himself, it is the fear that he already has. His jaws clench tight and when he swallows it feels like chalk going down to mix with the grit he inhales with every breath. His entire being is filled with this place. Why does he keep returning here?

He forces himself to take a step, and another. Moving his feet along the parched earth becomes easier until finally, he rounds the boulder and feels the soft thick fur of the wolf graze his fingers.

Will glances down at the wolf at his side to see ears laid back and its fur rising along its back. The wolf growls and Will lifts his head. He moves closer to see through the swirling smoke, eyes stinging and dry as he blinks back the fear; swallows it down slick and familiar into his gut.

The serpent tailed eagle emerges from the smoke majestic, black, its red rimmed eyes focused on Will, and its beak dripping with the blood of the carcass caught in its talons. The wolf nudges Will with its nose, still cold and wet despite the biting wind and heat. Will approaches the winged beast and it angles its head to the side as it watches Will edge closer.

The carcass is canine, a wolf. Blood, fur, and fang cover the ground, the echoes of wounded cries lost in a feeding frenzy fill Will’s mind.

The eagle rips off a piece of the meat and tosses it to Will. The chunk of flesh lands at his feet, raw, red, and flecked with bits of bone and sinew. Will stands motionless unable to accept the invitation but unwilling to depart without learning more. The eagle continues to devour its prey as it watches Will, waiting.

Is this meat an act of God, Will? Hannibal’s voice whispers.

I’ve given up good and evil for behaviorism.

Will speaks into the wind, but the monstrous eagle tilts its head, eyes dark and deep as they stare into Will’s. His flesh moves beneath his shirt and he knows the scaly thing writhes inside him. He knows if he peeked inside his jacket he would see the scar he bears rise and fall with its twisting.

Then you must know why you are here.

The eagle’s talons scrape the ground and the red rimmed eyes take on the aspect of Hannibal’s, peering at him over a wine glass at the dinner table.

Where is here?

This is your Inferno, Will. Abandon hope, you who enter here…

Dante got out.

Will narrows his eyes against the wind as his fingers seek the reassuring touch of fur at his side.

Dante did not waste away in apathy or indifference of good and evil. Are you an uncommitted soul, with that ill band of angels mixed, undecided and…indifferent?

I’m not…indifferent.

Aren’t you? What is good? What is evil?

Opposites. Points on our moral compass. To…to define our actions.

Will presses a hand against his jacket to quiet the thing that stirs inside.

Was Margot evil? She tried to kill her brother.

Mason deserved to die.

Did he?

Mason is evil.

You make pronouncements easily. He is already dead, more so than those already in the ground… So Margot is good?

No…she…

Not so easily, then? And Abigail. What about Abigail, Will. You cared for her.

Will feels the words light upon his neck hot as breath, a trace of soft lips across his skin. His response is spoken just as softly, syllables slipping into the sorrow laden wind.

So did you.

Perhaps more. Was she good or evil?

I can’t judge her. And neither can you.

I didn’t. What are you, Will? Are you…good?

I thought I was…I tried to do good things.

Doing bad things to bad people feels good. Are you bad, Will?

I’ve done bad things, but I…

Apathy and indifference, Will. It's your Inferno and you can leave anytime…

Will steps closer, hair whipping about in a wind so strong and hot it cuts at his face, stings his cheeks. He stares at the monstrous bird and thinks maybe he has been neither rebellious nor faithful to the deity. But which deity? To God…or to Hannibal?

I don't hide from God, Will and neither should you…

What god do you pray to?

I don't pray…Prey… Problem solving is hunting…a pleasure we can share.

The eagle begins to raise itself like an oily black phoenix from the scorched dirt to flap its great wings. It screeches and turns its head. Will follows its gaze to a cluster of burnt and ravaged wood, branches once graced with fragrant verdant leaves now brittle and scattered like the rest of the dead things that litter this place.

But not all of the things here are dead. Will watches another serpent tail slither between broken branches to sneak its way into a thicket of twigs and smoke… Not a serpent thinks Will, a viper.

A flash of light crashes outside the window of the familiar blue bedroom and Will is saturated with light so bright he squints into the fireplace as he stands between the chairs and table he knows so well. He is in Baltimore again, reliving yet another memory in the luxurious lair where he had sat many winter nights sipping expensive amber drinks in expensive pajamas a size too large for his slender frame.

This night he remembers. The night he and Hannibal made lomo saltado together. The night he sliced the ginger.

Will unbuttons another shimmering button of shell so the blue silk of his borrowed pajama shirt hangs loosely off one shoulder. The fire burns hot and bright, the only source of light in the bedroom. Will sips at the golden hued whiskey that slips smoothly between his lips.

What were we talking about?

He looks to Hannibal who has appeared suddenly in one of the chairs wrapped in burgundy colored silk that does little to conceal the taut musculature beneath. Will watches the shadows of the flames move across his face tempering features stark in any other light.

Will sinks into his familiar seat, across from the being he loathes and loves, his gaze fixed on the strange bird like creature that sits on a coffee table buffed so fine that the flames of the fire seem to lick at the surface. It is clearly Japanese in origin, a winged goblin and stylistically similar to the prints mounted on either side of Hannibal's bed.

Hannibal lifts his tumbler to his lips and sips slowly, allowing the pleasant burn to coat his throat before he speaks.

I was introducing you to a tengu figure I picked up in Kyoto. This is a replica of the more ancient kind. Have you heard of them?

Hannibal gestures to the print that hangs on the panel beside the bathroom. Will studies the image of two figures pitched in battle, a spear wielding samurai and a malevolent tengu. He swirls the whiskey around as he turns back to Hannibal.

Japanese folklore…they are demons or pranksters, tempting the faithful from the path of Buddhism.

Hannibal nods as Will examines the ugly little statuette in front of him more closely, marvels at the detail of the samurai attire and notes the sharpness of the beak and the coldness of the deeply set eyes.

They are the transformed spirits of men condemned to walk the earth forever caught between heaven and hell.

Why do they walk? Punishment?

Will thinks that must be the reason the little tengu on the table appears so grumpy.

There are two kinds. Konoha and korasu tengu. This one is korasu tengu, part man and part bird. In life they were prideful in their ignorance…korasu tengu punish the vain and the arrogant.

And the rude? Will taunts…gently.

Hannibal lifts a brow as he glances at the fire and licks his lips before turning back to Will. Will tosses his head back, deliciously dizzy with drink and shakes the curls from his face to gaze once again at Hannibal through half lidded eyes. He has just tickled a funny bone that is often hard to reach. He tries not to grin at Hannibal as the fire warms him without and the whiskey from within.

According to legend they have great magic. They speak to us without moving their mouths. If they choose, they can go anywhere without moving their wings and they can enter your dreams.

Will smiles as he takes another sip from his glass.

And why would they enter my dreams?

Hannibal leans against the back of the chair, angles his head, a thoughtful expression graces his features as shadows from the fire continue to dance across his face. His eyes are bright and luminous, and Will thinks it must be the fire that paints Hannibal's face with such unguarded affection.

To protect you. Like the korasu tengu of the forest, this one is my protector and I would like to present him to you…

Will stares at the statue on the table and then to the print on the wall. His mind turns as he posits Hannibal's intentions, tries to imagine what mythical mirage Hannibal would have manifest in his mind. Will internalized this embedded imagery for a reason and his mind recalled it for a reason. Associations come quickly…

Will snaps awake to the sound of his phone. He looks at the number and sees it is one of the Paolini twins. He sucks in air to clear his head of where he has just been. He makes a silent bet which one of the twins is calling.

"Hello?"

"Signor Graham?" Lucia's voice bursts loudly through the speaker.

Yes! Will makes a victory fist in the air, then says, "Lucia…uh, how are you?"

"Bene, bene. Look, me and my brother will be leaving de Gaulle Airport today, later this afternoon. We should get into Rome eh, about six or so."

"Why not just fly into Peretola here in Firenze? " Florence has its own airport, Aeroporto Amerigo Vespucci, so Will wonders what the reason could possibly be to fly into da Vinci, instead. The drive from Rome to Florence is well over two hours even in good traffic.

"The flights to Firenze straight through all booked up. Anyway, Luciano and I want to visit family so we drive back and spend the night in Orvieto, is only an hour from Rome. We drink, we relax, and we call you tomorrow or next day, bene?"

Will hears Luciano nuzzling at her neck, more like grazing Will thinks as he listens to heavy breathing and lip smacking. He has to force his mind not to imagine what they have been doing for the last two weeks.

"Have you talked to Mr. Verger?"

"No…he is kinda creepy. Luciano talked to him once. Have you?"

"No. Are you at the airport now?"

“Oh, no, we are having lunch along Champs Elysees right now! We, uh…take a cab to de Gaulle...later.”

Images of the famous three lane boulevard fill Will’s mind. He has never been there, but images from a travel book are better than the alternative images his mind threatens to conjure up. Will’s Italian is better than either of the twins knows and Will almost cringes with the obscenities that affront his ear.

“Did you gather more information on Lecter in Paris?” he says hoping to shake Lucia loose from her brother who Will imagines is slurping at her neck with a tongue stained red with Parisian wine.

“Oh…mais, oui! We did…Luciano! Scusate, scusate…” Will listens to more Italian and more giggling. He cracks his neck and wishes he had lost his bet.

“Aye, we have more information and we found a relative and uh, how you say…we spied on her for a few days, but we bring everything on the plane with us. See you in a few days. Ciao!”

“Lucia! Wait, don’t hang up…” Will talks to silence. He hits redial but of course no one picks up.

Hoping they call back is a waste of time. Will considers they are young and drunk and in Paris. As ruthless as they are disgusting, the pair has their share of vices and drinking is one of them. Will shakes his head not wanting to dwell on the other one. He cannot phone Mason for the information. Mason still makes his skin crawl and his voice also conjures images Will would rather not think about.

Besides, Mason thinks Will is with the twins or he would have never let them go. Will allowed Luciano to handle it. Will can feign innocence if Mason finds out. Will isn’t supposed to know that the twins are his handlers. They will someday be his executioners.

Mason still intends to feed Will to his pigs, at least metaphorically. After he catches Hannibal for him, of course.

The twins might have sent copies of what they could to Mason. That would be in line with their behavior so far. It is important that Mason believe he has the upper hand at all times. He believes the twins are in complete control. He believes Will has been sufficiently demoralized by his experience, chastised by his doctors and castigated into submission by his superiors at the FBI. The man who cut Doctor Lecter free from his restraints no longer exists. This is Will’s design.

Mason won’t know about the palazzo yet. The people who handle his books and investments know nothing about Mason’s other dirty business. They don’t know that Mason’s hired gun resides in the tax write-off that just burned down in Florence. If Will has been out of country, Will shouldn’t know about it either. Will doesn’t even have to tell the twins until they find out about the fire.

Will has not made any insurance claims nor does he intend to. He had taken the information for D’Angelo’s and Daniel’s benefit. Neither of them needs to know about the twisted game he is playing with Mason. Taking the insurance forms was…was what normal people do. Thanks to the fire, Mason can’t control where he resides now. Not without tipping his hand.

He still hasn’t called Jack about the laptop. Will likes being off the reservation.

He can wait for the twins to exhaust their revelry. He is more intrigued by the scrap of information Lucia had revealed before hanging up.

Hannibal has a living relative. A woman. Interesting.

He gets up from the couch and stretches. His shirt is new and stiff as are the khaki shorts that fall to his knees. Will had limited his purchases to summer clothes despite Daniel's occasional urging to try on autumn attire. He adjusts his shirt and looks over at the dogs. Cara and Bella perk up from their respective roosts on the rug, ears erect and mouths agape.

"C'mon." Will says, "Let's go for a walk, and then I'll practice…after lunch."

Even though Daniel knows what sits inside his fridge and cabinets, he expects Will to continue to keep a dietary log. Daniel does not let him forget that therapy continues; only the geography has changed. For Will it seems the therapy never ends.

Will frowns as he glances at the piano and the sheet music. As Will considers the Inferno, the one in his dreams and the one lying on the rug, its pages splayed beneath the binding, he supposes playing a duet with his psychiatrist is not all that strange. It is all too familiar. He stoops to pick up Dante's epic commentary on good and evil and sets it on the coffee table before whistling for the dogs to follow him out the back door.

****

"So, how did you find our doctor?" Du Maurier asks, as she looks into a shop window to adjust her sun hat.

Hannibal considers the blonde tresses that spill along her narrow shoulders, framing the pale lavender of her dress in gold. The viper wears Versace he muses as they walk along the Ponte Vecchio to shop for jewelry, an indulgence of Du Maurier's that remains unsated. Ponte Vecchio was built for Du Maurier. Most of the shops along the ancient bridge are jewelry shops.

Hannibal doesn't mind. He is enjoying the view and enjoying indulging his own preoccupation with the medieval architecture of the famous covered bridge that spans the Arno.

"He is…intriguing, provocatively so."

Clayton's clairvoyant remarks reverberate around Hannibal's head, chimes in a clock clanging since his appointment. Hannibal remembers clearly every phrase, every gesture that passed between them in those forty odd minutes. He would believe Du Maurier had prepped him, except Clayton had seemed genuinely surprised at her referral.

Clayton had seemed entirely genuine about everything. Hannibal finds himself clinging to the bittersweet longing he had experienced sitting on the beige couch in the sun-filled room. He pulls it around him like a sweater, to insulate him from the beautiful icy thing that walks beside him.

…the loneliness hurts too, and after a while you venture out again, but…

"I suspect your session caused a yearning for your former profession." Du Maurier says, touching his sleeve.

"Yes." Hannibal agrees. A yearning for many things.

"It is good to leave your sanctuary, Hannibal. You spend too much time alone. Familiarity even with oneself breeds contempt."

“It can, and yet, better the devil you know when he shares your bed and eats at your table.”

“Better still when the devil prepares the meal?”

Du Maurier slides her fingers along his lapels. She waits for the smile that does not come. She drops her hands from his chest. Rancor from the cool rebuke roils sour upon her tongue but when she speaks, her voice does not falter.

“What did you serve him?” She says as her fingers glide over the shiny trinkets and baubles.

“Half-truths, on a very convincing platter.”

“You like him.” Du Maurier says, lifting her chin, “He is very likable, isn’t he? Successful, socialized, and refreshingly…sane.”

Hannibal thinks that one day Du Maurier will tread upon the hallowed ground that is Will one time too many.

“Sanity is a relative term at best. But, perception is a tool that is pointed at both ends.”

“No doubt good advice for the psychiatrist, practicing or not.”

“For anyone.” Hannibal adds.

Du Maurier turns her attention to the display of gold and silver bracelets. She watches Hannibal cross to the other side of the walk way, turning his head this way and that, deceptively unassuming and unbearably smug.

Du Maurier suspects Hannibal finds Clayton far more alluring than he will ever let on as she had hoped he would. Hannibal’s person suit is still frayed, its seams still unstitched. Hannibal forgets she can see him, but Du Maurier is ever aware.

Clayton shares only a physical likeness to Graham, not his madness. Still, Hannibal will gorge himself on that likeness, and he will begin to covet what he sees, and he will draw Clayton into his mythical narrative. He cannot help himself now that he has been captivated by his new muse. He will be preoccupied with Clayton and the next couple of weeks will pass quickly.

Du Maurier’s careful planning is finally coming to fruition. She is confident Hannibal will transfer the agreed upon assets.

Her contact, Levin, works for Banque Suisse, and he has access to their account balances and interest. Nothing has been touched. Du Maurier had been checking on the balance nearly daily, but that had been more about sending Hannibal a message than to assuage concerns. Du Maurier had been content to chat with the pleasant young woman who often took her mid-morning calls. She does not call so often now. Their account cannot be accessed online for security reasons and this too has its benefits.

She keeps her contact with Levin limited; she does not want to compromise his employment. He is far too valuable to lose should his superiors question frequent contact between them.

It is Levin who will let Du Maurier know when Hannibal makes the transfer. If Hannibal had her code, he would have made a move by now. He would have moved against her before meeting

Clayton. He would not have needed her to authorize the transfer of funds and assets if he could simply take it all.

A total withdrawal of assets requires the transaction be done in person. Only one of them has to be present, but both codes must be offered, along with proof of death of the other. Verification takes days. Hannibal has not left the country, so Du Maurier is satisfied that everything is as it should be.

Hannibal is far too invested in finding Graham to be concerned about their joint account. He won't leave Florence because he wants Graham to find him. He had not mentioned their investments the last two years he had lived in Baltimore, too caught up in playing consultant for the FBI and too enamored with Graham to bother.

He had only become concerned after being summarily dismissed as her patient. Du Maurier has looked over the paperwork and the deeds to the Chesapeake properties with her lawyer and all seems to be in order. No, she thinks, Hannibal intends to find Graham one way or another, and he believes that when he does, he and Graham together will somehow manipulate her into giving up her code.

Hannibal likely fantasizes about it all the time. Du Maurier glances at him as he looks out over the Arno at the sun bathers floating on their little boats. She smiles at him from beneath her hat.

As soon as Hannibal transfers those funds, Levin will intercept Hannibal's code and then…Du Maurier can send in the dogs, and Graham. Hannibal will drown in his own self-congratulation as he lay in a pool of his own blood at Graham's feet. Or, Graham will be the one lying in a pool of blood while Hannibal stands over him in handcuffs courtesy the FBI or Interpol.

Either way, Du Maurier can leave Siena, leave Fiesole, leave Florence, and leave Hannibal and Graham to the fate that awaits them. She will be on a plane to Switzerland. And she will walk into Banque Suisse and she will clear out the entire account right under Hannibal's nose. She has already prepared the death notice in Hannibal's alias, the identity he assumed for the account at Banque Suisse for the local papers in anticipation of Hannibal's imminent demise…or arrest.

A life without regret is no life at all. Du Maurier has plenty of regrets, but this will not be one of them. She regrets that she must resort to such excess to protect her interests. She regrets that Hannibal could not let his life in Baltimore go. That he could not let go of Graham. That the Hannibal she once knew is gone from her.

She glances again at Hannibal standing in profile, his handsome face bathed in sunlight, chiseled features as beautiful as carved granite and equally immovable. There is one thing she will miss when she boards her flight to Switzerland.

She will have to miss the look on Hannibal's face when he finds Graham, not Clayton waiting for him in what promises to be a brilliant display of persuasion and cunning. Clayton will be dead and Graham will assume it was Hannibal who killed him. She regrets she will not see the granite crumble.

Doctor Clayton is the unwitting lure. If Hannibal finds Clayton intriguing now, it won't be long before Hannibal becomes possessive of him. Whimsy. Clayton is also the lynchpin. Without him, she cannot bait Hannibal. Without him, she cannot frame Graham.

Du Maurier starts at the gentle caress of her shoulder. She turns to find Hannibal standing once again beside her.

“Penny for your thoughts?” He says.

Du Maurier holds up two bracelets, one gold and one silver. “Which do you like?”

Hannibal examines each for a moment. He flicks Du Maurier’s nose lightly with his finger. “I think the better merchandise is inside.”

She smiles and drops them back into the tray. “A nickel for yours then.”

“I’ve been thinking, about your new puppy analogy. Doctor Clayton is not Will, but I think it fortuitous that you met him. I find his company…therapeutic.”

“Is that a thank you, Hannibal?”

“I suppose it is. Have you been to his office?”

“No, actually. Why?” Du Maurier brushes her hair from her cheek still unnerved by Hannibal’s silent approach.

“He aligns his philosophy of psychiatry with the décor, very impressive. I am not aware of any psychiatrist who has taken the concept of office feng shui to such a dramatic degree.”

“Really? Perhaps an opportunity will present itself.” Du Maurier says as she checks her watch.

“You have not already created an opportunity?”

Hannibal notices the way Du Maurier’s fingers linger about the gemstones on either side of the watch face. He does not miss the slight twitching of her lips.

Du Maurier turns to look up at Hannibal, the hat casting her face in shadow. Her eyes are as blue and friendly as the summer skies above.

“Well, for now at least, his therapy with Lydia includes dogs. He doesn’t engage in canine therapy at his office location.”

“Where does he take his patients? He has his own kennel?”

“No, he works with shelters and vets in the area and brings the dogs with him on location. I am actually looking forward to it.”

“As I look forward to my next appointment.” Hannibal says, his hand pressing warmly on the small of her back as he guides her into the jewelry shop.

Since Du Maurier is not returning to Siena before the weekend, Hannibal is certain he will be able to find her, and Clayton, at the winery and estate on the outskirts of Fiesole, where Lydia resides. Hannibal doubts Du Maurier would meet Clayton and his dogs in one of the parks in Fiesole. Her wealthy client wouldn’t agree to therapy in public and neither would Clayton suggest it.

Du Maurier’s intentions regarding Clayton require a controlled environment such as the guest quarters provided to her by Lydia’s family. Where else could she recreate her fantasy in the hot tub? Hannibal thinks perhaps her accommodations may very well include a hot tub.

Clayton had said his session with Lydia was Saturday. Hannibal wonders if Clayton has any idea what Du Maurier is capable of. Perhaps he does. He may even like hot tubs.

Hours later, back in Impruneta, Hannibal reclines in front of his pool basking in the brightness of the Tuscan sun that never fails to invigorate him. He never tires of feeling the sensuous warmth on his face and limbs. The heat seems to permeate his very soul. The sun and this garden have been the only things keeping his soul from wilting completely.

His phone rings and Hannibal reaches around the chaise lounge to retrieve it from the table. He sits up straight to take the call from his cousin.

"Roberta…what a pleasant surprise."

"Ah yes," Roberta laughs lightly into the phone, "well the pleasure is mine. I have some news for you about our mutual friends."

"I'm all ears."

"Luciano and Lucia Paolini are distant cousins of your Carlo and Matteo, the exact relationship does not matter except that you did invite something of a vendetta. Apparently Mason Verger's handling of whatever altercation resulted in their demise caused some backlash that was mitigated only by his unfortunate accident…and his obscenely deep pockets. Verger is bent on destroying you by any means he can, Hannibal."

"I would expect nothing less of him. I think Mason a glutton for punishment. The sadist has become masochist…"

"Why not kill him outright when you had the opportunity to do so?"

"Mason is not worthy of the table. Besides, his death would have had serious repercussions for a member of his family. It was the least I could do to protect her interests."

"The sister."

"Yes. Who was also a patient."

"Oh, Hannibal, I think I see the relationships now. You meddled in something between them." Roberta chides him…affectionately.

"With a purpose. There were other considerations at the time. A convergence of destinies igniting in unison like multiple fuses."

Roberta will either comment or she will ruminate further. Hannibal is certain she investigated the matter quite thoroughly. She quickly decides on the former.

"Would one of those other considerations also be a former patient, a former FBI agent with brown hair and blue eyes?"

"He is, was…a consideration, yes."

"Which is it, Hannibal? Is or was?"

Hannibal chooses his words carefully, not because he shies from honesty with Roberta, but because choosing between the past and the present with regard to Will is not possible. Will is…eternal.

“The issue between the Vergers did extend to another former patient.”

“Ah…my dearest Hannibal. To hear you speak of him in such vague and clinical terms when he clearly means much more saddens me, as it must sadden you. Be thankful he cuts you still. Dissonance is a jewel unspoiled by familiarity.”

“So it is…” Hannibal says quietly.

Hannibal blinks back the single tear that threatens to spill from pale lashes. Roberta politely waits for him to compose himself, appreciating more than anyone how rare a thing for Hannibal to say so much with so few words.

“What other news have you to share?” he says after a moment.

“I had the twins followed and they made their rounds of older neighbors who might remember Saint Laurent as it was when Papa was alive and maybe before that. I am not certain what they learned or from whom. They also visited the Bibliothèque nationale among other libraries, the recorder of deeds, and several police precincts. I cannot say what they were able to send electronically, but I would imagine they gathered quite a lot for Mr. Verger to peruse.”

“You found no evidence of anyone else looking for me?”

“Well, you remain on the FBI’s most wanted list, but I could not find any active manhunt in progress. My friends in D.C. had no news on that particular front, either.”

Hannibal is not sure if he is relieved or disappointed that the list does not include Will. He thinks that any news of him would be preferable to none. It occurs to Hannibal that Will has been swallowed up in his inferno, licking his wounds, and drowning in the loathing and contempt that he finds in the bottom of every bottle he tosses to the floor wherever he is…

“Hannibal?”

“Yes, please continue.”

“If all goes as it appears, the Paolini’s will be en route to Rome from de Gaulle this evening. They should arrive at da Vinci at seven at the latest according to current flight information. They will likely stumble off the plane.”

“How’s that?”

“They made their rounds of the bars along Champs Elysees all afternoon. Their flight leaves from de Gaulle at 5:10. I have the airline and flight number.”

Hannibal writes down the information and glances at his watch. It is already past three.

“Cutting it a bit fine, aren’t you?” Hannibal says, knowing the drive to Rome will take almost three hours. Even in the Jaguar.

“I received a text while talking to you. I found out the flight just now. I suppose you need to make those dinner reservations, n’est-ce pas?”

“Roberta, you will forgive me if I end our conversation?”

“Of course. Please do let me know how dinner turns out. Did you ever look up the wine I suggested?”

“I did, two bottles in the cellar right now.”

Well, bon appétite. Au revoir, Hannibal.

"For months now. He is in Florence, waiting for that." Luciano inclines his head toward the stack of documents and notes. Will is in Florence.

Chapter 46

Hannibal arrives at da Vinci Fiumicino Airport and engages the twins. He has plenty of questions, but first things first; he has to get the twins back to Florence…in one piece. News of Will is the last thing Hannibal expected hear. Will is in Florence!

da Vinci Fiumicino sprawls over several miles and is situated on the Mediterranean side of Italy near the coast some distance from the city of Rome, though the ride by rail is barely a half hour to the heart of the Eternal City where Termini Station is located across from the Baths of Diocletian. Hannibal's excursions to Rome have been far and few between, but he has had occasion to sample the local cuisine.

Hannibal has enjoyed the view along the coast as he had driven south from Impruneta. The route is sprinkled with castles and villages that recall Italy as it was centuries ago. He leaves the rustic countryside in his rearview mirror and focuses on his approach to Fiumicino, the former name of the airport before the renaming to da Vinci. Romans typically refer to it by its traditional name.

He hums to Rigoletto, Verdi's opera of curse and sacrifice, as he slows the Jaguar to follow the signs to the terminals for the arriving flights. He is familiar with Fiumicino and knows from which terminal the twins will emerge after claiming their baggage. The twins will not return to Florence by rail. They have too much luggage.

Besides hunting for Hannibal, they had indulged themselves along Champs Elysees on a shopping spree that no doubt divested Mason of countless euros. They are both ruthless and rude Hannibal sniffs.

They will either secure a taxi, or rent a car. Hannibal thinks the latter is more probable. They are creatures of habit, their furtive nature inescapable, and Hannibal reasons they would find a rental under assumed names better suited to their clandestine activities.

Since they flew out from Florence, there will be no car waiting for them in a parking garage in Rome. According to Roberta they purchased the tickets on a whim likely without thinking much further than arriving in Rome. Hannibal thinks they would balk at family picking them up. They would have to behave themselves. Crime family or not, no Catholic would condone the sordid conduct of this brother and sister. They have been inebriated all day and Hannibal imagines they slept the entire flight. They will rent a car without a second thought.

Why would they give anything a second thought? They are complacent in their surroundings and all of Italy is their playground.

Verger is very persuasive, at least his bank account is. Verger is also smart to appease the family. Hannibal thinks the family means to protect its honor, such as it is. They would wish to retain the Sardinian reputation of familial solidarity rather than the perception that the family can be bought. Their services may go to the highest bidder, but Sardinian pride when it comes to family should have no price.

Hannibal knows how eagerly Mason wants to repay him for the therapy he received. Mason would not permit anyone to rob him of his revenge if he could help it.

He pulls the Jaguar into the rental lot and climbs out, pops open the trunk so it is slightly ajar and leaves the vehicle unlocked. His shirt and pants fit snugly, no loose fabric to grab and he wears all black. The trunk has been lined with plastic. In his belt is tucked a syringe, and he carries two linoleum knives, one in his back pocket, the other concealed in a sock.

He walks briskly across the lot with purpose. He does not have to wait long. As he hoped, the twins are also making their way across the lot, activating the headlights of their vehicle as they approach. They will invariably ask themselves what might have happened had they booked a different flight. They will not be alive long enough to worry about it.

The man, Luciano, is short in stature and barrel chested, his massive shoulders hunched forward as he swaggers across the pavement his sister at his side. She is dark and porcine like her brother although her sizable chest is not shaped like a barrel. Were it not for the family trait of heavy jowls, she might be considered pretty. Brother and sister share the same wide nose that Hannibal cannot help but associate with the snouts of the pigs in Mason's barn.

"I believe you have the wrong car." Hannibal says in Italian as he moves to stand behind Lucia, his hands grasping the flesh and muscle of her bicep.

"Aye! What do you know?" Luciano halts as Hannibal continues to pull Lucia away from him. There is considerable distance between them before Luciano notices that his sister is being held in Hannibal's arms. He takes a step forward and reaches for the knife he carries inside his jacket.

“I wouldn’t do that if I were you.” Hannibal says holding Lucia close.

Luciano stops. His eyes grow wide as his cognitive functions kick in, and Hannibal watches as the light of recognition begins to appear in Luciano’s eyes, though dimly at first. Luciano’s jaw drops as he lowers the knife.

“I understand you have been looking for me, in all the wrong places, apparently.” Hannibal says as he draws the blade lightly across Lucia’s ribcage. He draws no blood but he makes his point.

Lucia’s body stiffens and Hannibal can feel her heart thudding wildly in her chest.

“Let her go. Take me instead.”

“Now, Luciano, may I call you Luciano? Good. You know I can’t do that.”

“You would hurt a woman?”

“Tsk Tsk” Hannibal tuts, “If she is being paid to kill me I would. Wouldn’t you? I won’t hurt her unless you make me. Are you intending to make me?”

Luciano shakes his head. He looks around the lot, probably hoping for a camera. Hannibal knows the camera can only see Luciano from this angle. Hannibal and Lucia are not facing the camera.

“He has a knife Luciano! Listen to him.”

“He will kill us anyway…”

“If you will follow me to my car we can resolve this quickly.” Hannibal says pressing the flat edge of the knife against the thin fabric of Lucia’s shirt that rides up over her bejeweled belly button.

Luciano swallows but nods his head at Hannibal.

“The information you found, where is it?”

“In my bag…bastardo.” Lucia says as she glances at the carry on that hangs from her shoulder.

“Let’s not be rude.”

Hannibal strokes her neck with the pads of his fingers. She quiets to the touch of pressure to her jugular. Hannibal looks to Luciano.

“Unlock the trunk and place your luggage inside. Take the tags off and place them in your pockets.”

Luciano does as Hannibal says keeping his movements slow. He slams the trunk lid down, loudly and with marked frustration.

“Very good. Take a deep breath and exhale, go ahead… Put the keys in your pocket. Now, walk in front and we’ll follow. Quickly now, but not too quickly, there…yes like that.”

Hannibal guides him from the rear as he holds the increasingly sober Lucia closely at his side as though helping her walk. Soon enough they arrive at Hannibal’s Jaguar. Hannibal opens the rear car door and invites Lucia to get inside. As she ducks her head, Hannibal sinks the syringe into her neck and she goes limp immediately.

Luciano stumbles forward then pauses, unsure if he should rush Hannibal. Hannibal watches, holding up the dazed and soon to be unconscious Lucia waiting for Luciano to stop thinking with his lizard brain. It takes but a couple seconds for Luciano to move past his flight or fight response and begin to think things through.

Hannibal opens the trunk and places Lucia inside. He closes it with a gentle thud.

“There are no cameras in this part of the lot, Luciano. Please, join me in the front seat, and ride shotgun I believe is the colloquialism.”

Luciano reluctantly climbs into the car and folds into his seat with quiet resignation. Hannibal notices the constant wetting of his lips and the tremors in his limbs. Luciano is now fully aware of the situation he and his sister have found themselves.

They are soon headed back north, toward Florence and Impruneta. Hannibal fortunately has a guest room always at the ready for surprise dinner guests. Luciano stares out the window, subdued and silent. Hannibal had offered him the current issue of Bon Appétite in Italian from the assortment of magazines he had thoughtfully provided for the ride, but Luciano had refused; eyes wide and mouth slack. Hannibal had shrugged and turned up the music. He switches from Verdi in favor of Mozart’s Don Giovanni.

Back at his villa, Hannibal watches Luciano awaken; his body slumps over the chair like a sack of spoiled fruit. He has fouled himself, too relaxed by the drugs he imbibed to hold his bodily functions. Hannibal removed his boots and jeans, but left him his underclothes and muscle shirt. His wrists and ankles are tied down and as Luciano lifts his head up to finally gaze about, Hannibal walks into his line of vision.

Scarlatti’s Sonata in F minor fills the room. Hannibal thought Luciano might appreciate listening to an Italian composer.

“You are waking from a mild sedative I injected into the water bottle. Necessary I’m afraid. The location of my home must remain undisclosed. You understand, don’t you Luciano?”

Luciano nods slowly, his eyes following Hannibal’s as best he can.

“Where is my sister?” He says slowly, tongue rolling across tobacco stained teeth.

“She’s in the trunk.”

“Porco cazzo…” Luciano mutters, his limbs constricting against the ropes.

“Comparing me to pig genitalia is rather like calling the kettle black, isn’t it, Luciano?”

Hannibal leans in closer. His nostrils twitch with the odor emanating from Luciano, fetid and strong almost biting in its potency. Hannibal detects wine, garlic, and…escargot.

“She is still sedated and in no danger…at the moment.”

“What do you want?” Luciano licks at his dry lips, but his tongue is as sticky and dehydrated as the rest of his mouth.

“You were approached by Mason Verger to find me?”

“Why ask me…what you already know?”

“Clarification. Answer the question.”

“Che cazzo! I want to see my sister.” He stiffens against the bindings.

“Of course you do. I am willing to reciprocate small kindnesses in exchange for information. Were you hired by Mason Verger to find me?”

“Yes.” Luciano twists miserably in his chair, his restraints quite secure.

“But your family wants me dead, too. For Matteo and Carlo.”

“Yes.”

“So you took Verger’s money to do something you were going to do anyway?”

“My family work for him a long time. We let him pay for it. He needed eyes on the ground in Italy. He…can’t move, right?”

“Not much, no.”

Luciano studies Hannibal for a moment. His mouth twists into an ugly grimace, his imagination trying to picture a Mason he has never seen. Hannibal asks the questions foremost on his mind.

“How long have you and your sister worked for Mr. Verger?”

“Maybe four months or so.”

“So, you were searching for me before he sent you out of country?”

“Yeah”

“Where did you search?”

“Here… in Italy.”

“Why search in Italy?”

Luciano is quiet. Hannibal allows him time to reason through his options. If Luciano thinks the information valuable he will likely try and use that information as a bargaining chip.

Hannibal picks up the files Lucia had in her Gucci carry on and peruses the documents. They had managed to collect a substantial amount of information on him and his cousin. Not all of it damaging, but revealing nonetheless. He would like to read Lucia’s notes from the interviews she took, but he will have to stay his curiosity for the moment.

Hannibal looks back to Luciano. He lifts his head to let Hannibal know there is fight left in him yet, but to Hannibal he is dead already.

“How did Mr. Verger know to search in Italy?” Hannibal crosses his legs and leans back against the chair. He waits. Luciano takes a breath.

“He said he had a tip from the FBI. Someone saw you board a plane to Paris. But the search stopped in Paris. Dead end.”

“You are protecting your source, Luciano. The FBI search stopped in Paris months ago. Why Italy?” Hannibal says as he stares coldly into Luciano’s face.

Luciano’s eyes wander to the right before he answers. “I do my job, eh? I don’t ask questions. Mr. Verger knows lots of people. I don’t know who he talks to.”

Luciano had used his right hand when he had gone for the knife. When right-handed people lie; their eyes shift to the right because the left side of their brains controls imagination. If Luciano were telling the truth, his eyes would have moved left, where memory would register. Hannibal imagines Luciano must never see the world from the left.

“I think you do. Let’s find out shall we?”

Hannibal glances at the metal table adjacent to Luciano. Luciano’s eyes alight on the table and Hannibal leans forward to pull the sheet back to reveal the assortment of surgical instruments assembled neatly upon it. Luciano jerks in his chair.

“Be calm, Luciano. These are not meant for you.”

Luciano’s eyes grow larger still as the implication sinks in.

“Do the names Du Maurier or Dumont mean anything to you?”

Luciano continues to stare dully at Hannibal. He sighs and shakes his head. Hannibal asks the question he knows he must.

“Does the name Will Graham mean anything to you?”

Luciano’s pupils dilate immediately. The wound Will carved out of his heart begins to throb in Hannibal’s chest. He closes his eyes for a moment before he speaks.

“He is an acquaintance of both myself and Mr. Verger.”

Luciano’s face stills and he stares at Hannibal wide-eyed, unblinkingly wide-eyed. Hannibal ponders Luciano’s stunned expression. Luciano is obviously confused. Hannibal picks up Luciano’s phone where it lay on the stainless steel table next to the surgical instruments. Hannibal turns on the phone and places it within reach of Luciano’s fingers.

“Enter your password, please.”

“What are you going to do with my sister? If I am awake, she…she should be waking up soon, eh?”

“Oh, I’m quite sure she is awake already. I will bring her down presently.” Hannibal continues to hold out the phone to Luciano.

Luciano swallows and presses the key pad to unlock his phone. Hannibal begins to scroll through the contacts. He stares at Will’s name among Luciano’s contacts. His left eye tics, activating memories that cascade in a torrent. Several scenarios begin to play through Hannibal’s mind, but he needs more information. Whatever the arrangement with Will, Hannibal should tread lightly. He does not want Luciano to gush what he thinks Hannibal wants to hear to save his sister. Because Luciano clearly believes he still can.

“You should have told me, Luciano. Your sister’s fate is now non-negotiable.”

“NO! Wait…I will tell you whatever you want to know about him…only don’t hurt my sister. If you hurt either of us, my family will find you. This will never end.”

“Your family is of little or no consequence to me, Luciano. Tell me about Will Graham.”

“And my sister?”

Hannibal glides his thumb across Will’s name on the little screen as though he could summon him, like the genie in the lamp. Luciano will do anything Hannibal wants. His sister is his Achilles’ heel. Everyone has one.

“Tell me about Will Graham, and I will bring her down to join you…alive.”

“I can’t believe you’ve been here all along! He was right… What do you want to know?” Luciano is almost whining as he shifts in his chair, his skin chaffing from his soiled underclothes.

“Why is his phone number in your contacts?”

“He works for Mr. Verger, too. He tells us where to look to…find you.”

Hannibal’s expression does not change. Hannibal thinks this an odd working relationship. Perhaps Will licks his wound at the Verger estate…with Margot, unwilling to subject himself to more intimate contact with Hannibal. But why would Will help Mason? A better question is why Mason would accept Will’s help.

“This number is current?”

“Yes.”

“When was the last time you talked to him? Be truthful, Luciano. I can check your call history.”

“This afternoon, before we left Paris. Lucia called him to let him know we were leaving.”

“Did she tell him what you found?”

“No. We were, uh, busy, you know…at a café.”

“A café? Really, Luciano.”

“Aye, merda! A bar, ok? A bar. She told him we were coming in tonight and would call him in a couple days. We are supposed to be visiting family…That’s all she told him.”

Luciano perks up a little in his slimy chair. His tired brown eyes stare into Hannibal’s and he lowers his head, conspiratorially.

“You want me to call him? Maybe get him to meet you someplace. You want to finish the job on him, eh?”

Hannibal blinks. Will is…here?

Hannibal's eyes narrow slightly as he reminds himself, repeatedly, that Luciano's brain is only as large as the cranium that cradles it. Clearly, Luciano's loyalty to Mason Verger has fled the coop. One less obstacle to remove.

"Mr. Graham is in Italy?"

"For months now. He is in Florence, waiting for that." Luciano inclines his head toward the stack of documents and notes. Will is in Florence.

Luciano has no idea where he is right now. He knows only what he saw out of the car window before he gulped down the bottled water twenty minutes into their ride. He has no idea how close to Florence they are.

"This arrangement you have with Mr. Graham…how does it work?"

Hannibal listens while Luciano explains the relationships between Verger, himself, and Will. Luciano tells him that Mason had insisted Will take on the twins as assistants. That Mr. Graham was not stable and required…looking after.

Hannibal thinks of his last meeting with Mason. Mason had been in an alternate reality, but there had been something he had said while in his drugged out semi-lucid state when Will had arrived to find Mason squatting in a chair in his living room.

I adopted some dogs from the shelter. I had them in a cage together with no food and fresh water. One of them died hungry. The other had a warm meal. I should have put you in a cage with Dr. Lecter. I'm curious what would've happened.

What are you feeding my dogs?

Hannibal's eyes flicker with the realization that Mason wants both them. He wants to repay both of the men responsible for his ruined body, for empowering Margot within the scope of his father's narrow and misogynist will.

Mason wants to recreate the scene on the platform in his barn, or something similar. Act two, Hannibal thinks, Mason tries again. But he isn't going to trust Will this time. He hired the twins to keep an eye on Will. It is abundantly clear to Hannibal that Luciano and Lucia are to do more than keep an eye on Will. Mason knows exactly what kind of unstable Will is.

The twins appear to report directly to Will, running investigations and expenses on his authority. It had been Will's idea to send them to Lithuania and he had left it to Luciano to convince Mason to fund the fishing expedition. Hannibal thinks Mason would not have left Will on his own in Florence without his Sardinian chaperones. Will must not talk to Mason directly much at all. They use the twins to communicate.

"Luciano?"

Luciano rolls his head to one side. "What now?"

"You did not tell Mr. Verger the truth about leaving Italy, did you?"

Luciano wriggles in his chair, he avoids looking at Hannibal.

“That’s alright, Luciano. What did you tell him? You aren’t supposed to leave Mr. Graham alone for too long are you?”

Luciano shakes his head.

“But you and your sister really wanted to take a vacation didn’t you?”

“We like clubbing. There was nothing going on in Florence. Graham suggested we try something new. Mr. Verger would have said no…he would have wanted Graham to go with us.”

“And Mr. Graham doesn’t approve of your…amore, does he?” Hannibal brushes his hand over Luciano’s closely cropped scalp as Luciano shakes his head again, lowers his eyes.

“You spent your own money, then?”

“Ah, no. We told Mr. Verger that Graham was with us. He never find out.”

“Thank you, Luciano. That was very helpful.” Hannibal says, his thoughts coming together, like puzzle pieces falling into place.

What Mason is experiencing isn't restricted to reality, so reality has to be forced to adapt.

Mason intends to force his own reality upon both Will and Hannibal. He is using Will. Hannibal thinks Will is using Mason, aware that Mason intends to kill him. Will would find the twins easy enough to manipulate. Perhaps he had sent them to Lithuania to test Mason. For whatever reason, Will did not want to go himself. And he did not want to lie to Mason. If anything went wrong, it would be Luciano, not Will who seemed duplicitous.

Will has to be aware of Mason’s design.

Will probably told Mason that he wants revenge on Hannibal. Mason probably told Will that all he wanted was Hannibal, that if Will caught him, all would be forgiven. Will accepted Verger’s money because he is unemployed, and the FBI won’t touch him. Will is trying to find him with the only means available to him. But what are his true intentions?

Hannibal is impressed with the depths of Will’s deceit. It would be smart of Will to keep close to Mason. That is exactly what Hannibal would do. Will is using Mason as he had used Jack and the FBI.

Hannibal thinks perhaps that is not an entirely fair comparison. Will had genuinely cared about Jack. Will had felt plenty guilty doing end runs around Jack. Jack was the little angel on Will’s shoulder. Mason is no angel. Will would have no problem running circles around Mason.

Mason’s exploiting of Will is not much different than how Jack and the FBI had exploited him. Will had been unemployed when he had resumed his therapy. Released from BSHCI only days before, Will’s professional career was in ruins. Only the FBI could rehabilitate it provided they even wanted to. Will had been expendable. After Hannibal’s escape, Will had learned just how expendable. He is expendable now.

Had he been caught, the FBI would have rewarded Will by charging him with the murder of Tier and charging him with accessory to multiple murders. The forensic evidence in Hannibal’s house could have supported any story the FBI wanted to spin to protect its own interests. They would both be sitting in cells at BSHCI at Frederick's mercy. Chilton was another matter Hannibal would like to discuss with Will.

Can you explain my actions? Can you posit my intentions? What would be your theory of my mind?

I have an understanding of your state of mind. You understand mine. We're just alike. This gives you the capacity to deceive me and be deceived by me.

Hannibal's understanding of Will's state of mind has been incomplete. It still is. Hannibal sighs. Perception is indeed a tool pointed at both ends. And perhaps, a teacup shattered by deception cannot gather itself back up.

The only difference between the FBI and Mason is that Mason means to kill Will once Will finds him. What does Will mean to do once he finds him? What are his intentions this time? So unpredictable, his Will.

Please. Every moment of cogent thought under your psychiatric care is a personal victory.

You're applying yourself to my perspective as I've been applying myself to yours.

You're right. We are just alike. You're as alone as I am. And we're both alone without each other.

Their capacity to deceive each other extended even to their shared loneliness. Each of them felt it acutely. They had exploited each other's loneliness, each trying to gain advantage over the other. Will had exploited Hannibal's loneliness as a means to get close enough to trap him. And Hannibal had systematically alienated Will from relationships that were not good for him. Relationships he did not need.

You don't want me to have anything in my life that's not you.

I only want what's best for you.

Will had accused him of fostering codependency.

Is that what I'm doing?

Will had offered him friendship. And believing Will's offer had been genuine, Hannibal had alienated Will, had tried to make it easier for him to leave, knowing that eventually they would have to leave Baltimore. Loneliness had left them vulnerable to each other's manipulations, but at the end of the day, they are alone without each other.

Will is alone, and though he might still insist that abandonment requires expectation, his own actions have left him abandoned. He has no one.

Neither does Hannibal. Not really.

There is truth embedded in their deceptions. Is Will seeing that truth or is he chasing ghosts?

Will is in Florence not for revenge or justice or any of the other reasons he may be telling himself. He is here because he is missing a piece of himself. And Hannibal has been waiting for him because Hannibal is missing a piece, too.

I gave you a rare gift, but you didn't want it.

Didn't I?

Hannibal thinks that perhaps, he might have been a little hasty about that. He had cut Will free but the bond remains, as frightening for Will as a shadow suspended on dust, and as tempting as a promise perched upon penitent lips. This new development casts an entirely different light upon events, then and now. It may be possible to gather up that shattered teacup. They are just alike. And they have a common enemy.

Luciano is leaning forward in the chair. He looks like he may be sick. Hannibal glances at the large round metal drain beneath Luciano's chair. If Luciano vomits, Hannibal will hose it down with the rest of the offal that continues to waft from Luciano. All in good time, Hannibal has a suit for that unpleasantness.

"Mr. Verger has plans for me and for Mr. Graham, doesn't he?"

Luciano looks aside, to his right. He rolls his eyes at Hannibal, indecision puckers between his eyebrows like a furry mountain.

"Luciano…"

Luciano's shoulders slump as he nods, his chin nearly touching his chest.

"Good boy. Luciano? Look at me. That's better. Do you know where Mr. Graham lives?"

"Yeah, he live in a swanky palazzo off Via dei Benci…compliments Mr. Verger."

Hannibal smiles. Will lives about ten minutes from Palazzo Pitti. Will has been ten minutes from him since…"

"And when did Mr. Graham start working with you?"

"Must be four months now. We met him at Peretola. Mr. Verger make it very clear that Mr. Graham was not to be trusted. But…he is no problem. He keep to himself."

"He has given you no reason not to trust him."

Luciano shrugs. "He is always where he says he gonna be. He calls us. We call him. We work well together." Luciano shrugs again and looks up at Hannibal. "Mr. Verger is weird. He talks weird."

"It's fine to be weird…most of the time." Hannibal says.

Four months… Hannibal thinks. Four months Hannibal has been walking the Vasari Corridor mere minutes from Will. Hannibal thinks Du Maurier would have good reason to worry if she knew. Hannibal can enact his plan anytime now, as soon as he finds Will…

He walks to the far side of the little room; its cream colored walls seem to swallow up the sound of his footsteps as he walks. He returns to Luciano bearing a chair. He faces it forward and sets it next to Luciano. Hannibal begins to pull on a plastic suit and rubber gloves.

"Hey, uh, what are you doing now?" Luciano asks with a quiver in his voice as he angles his head around trying to track Hannibal's movements.

“Oh, I am about to let your sister out of the trunk of my car. But first…” Hannibal pauses as he retrieves a hose and turns on the spigot. “I need to water the pigs.”

Luciano braces himself for the blast of ice cold water. Hannibal sprays the young Sardinian until he is quite drenched and uncomfortable, but clean. Discomfort is a state he will come to know intimately. Hannibal leaves him to sit while he retrieves the sister who is likely thumping against the lid of the Jaguar’s trunk with bruised and bloodied fists.

Less than half an hour later, Hannibal is driving toward Florence and Via dei Benci. The brother and sister sit cold and wet together in the guest room. He does not intend to engage Will, not yet. He simply needs to see him; to know he is there.

As he turns the steering wheel and rounds the corner, Hannibal slows the Jaguar as his mind absorbs the scene before him. Will is not here.

Hannibal pulls up to the burned out remains of the only palazzo to use Via dei Benci as its mailing address according to Luciano. His description of the palazzo had been accurate, or at least until recently. Luciano had said that Lucia had been to Will’s apartment on the second floor only once. The side of the building where Will ‘s apartment had been, is completely ruined. The structure is still cordoned off, no doubt structurally unsound, its supports exposed and its foundation unleveled by the heat.

Will had miraculously escaped certain death or he had not been here when it happened. The twins clearly do not know the palazzo caught fire. They have been in Europe for at least two weeks. Hannibal remembers the day he had seen the smoke rising across the highway. That would have been about the time they had left Florence. Will must not have informed them that he moved. So infuriating…his Will.

Hannibal turns the Jaguar around and drives back to Impruneta and the twins. He remembers reading the fire had been deemed tragically accidental. One fatality. He wonders if Mason had set the fire. Hannibal dismisses the idea. Mason thinks Will went with the twins. It is highly unlikely Mason suspects anything or he would not have footed the bill for the excursion.

And yet, Hannibal cannot banish the feelings of misgiving. It does seem strange that a building that has withstood centuries suddenly catches fire while Will resides there. If Will had wanted to move to a location unassociated with Mason, he would not have resorted to arson to do so. A killer he may be, but his empathy would not permit him to sacrifice innocent life.

The fire may have been an accident. Or, there is something else at work Hannibal cannot yet see. But he will.

An hour later, Hannibal sits on the veranda enjoying his moonlit garden while sipping at a favorite piquant Sauvignon Blanc. He had shared this particular vintage with Will, more than once and its flavor comes back full and rich upon his tongue. Will is in Florence.

The Sardinian wine recommended by Roberta sits collecting dust in the wine cellar. And there it will sit, like the twins until they have fulfilled their purpose. Lucia and Luciano have a part to play yet. Will is in Florence.

Will is not drinking himself into oblivion in some awful swamp in Louisiana fixing boat motors and licking his wounds. He has taken on Mason Verger and his Sardinians in order to find him. This does not mean that Will has left his Inferno. If Will remains trapped within his own circles of hell, then how appropriate it is that he has come here. The Divine Comedy was conceived by a son of Florence who wrote his epic poem in exile from his beloved city. Will is in exile, too.

Will is in Florence and Hannibal will find him.

Chapter 47

Chapter Summary

Hannibal’s memory palace takes him back to the day Mason regrets ever meeting the good doctor and the sperm donor.

Will had licked his lips, a thoughtful and calculated gesture. He had angled his head to one side, feigning incredulity. “Is that what you would like to happen?”

Will’s fingers had found the ill-fitting jacket’s collar and he had pulled Hannibal near, had pressed his lips to Hannibal’s throat and they had been warm, so warm against his skin. Hannibal’s nostrils had been filled with the scent of him, the air alive with musk and madness. The brush of whiskers along his jaw had set alight the fire smoldering inside all evening.

“Like?” Hannibal had said softly, cradling Will’s head in his neck. “It is inevitable.”

Chapter 47

Hannibal’s memory palace takes him back to the day Mason regrets ever meeting the good doctor and the sperm donor.

margot at verger mansion

Every creative act has its destructive consequence, Will. The Hindu god Shiva is simultaneous destroyer and creator. Who you were yesterday is laid waste to give rise to who you are today.

You sit in that chair, Will, as you have so many times before. It holds among its molecules the vibrations of all our conversations ever held in its presence.

Their conversations, like their destinies, have been flying and swimming steeped in blood and emptiness in Hannibal’s memory palace…until today. Today, destiny beckoned and tonight, while Hannibal lies in bed gazing at stars he knows that somewhere nearby Will is gazing at these same stars. Hannibal imagines he can feel Will plucking at the beating heart in his chest, ripping a melody from it, orchestrations of carbon…a symphony of sinew, bone and flesh and of light, air, and color.

Somewhere in Florence lies Will, fingers cradling his wound, Hannibal's mark upon flesh he had cradled and loved and would have again. The memories roll. They roil. They renew.

Hannibal turns over to lie on his back, his skin cool between the thin satin sheets. He hopes the Will of yesterday has been laid waste with his doubts.

I wanted to dispel your doubts once and for all.

My doubts about what?

Me. I want you to believe in the best of me, just as I believe in the best of you.

Will had not waded into his stream; so he cannot be the same man swimming in the blood of that destiny. Did his fall give rise to friend or foe? Worthy enemy or worthy companion?

In their therapy session, devastated consciences and sanctified lies had weighed too heavily on Will's moral scale, tipped the arrow too far south on his moral compass for him to reconcile. He had gazed at Hannibal with something close to contempt from his chair across the room, lips grim and tight and accusing. Will had not liked Hannibal's answer, then.

How many lies have had to be sanctified? How many consciences devastated?

As many as were necessary.

Will has apparently been doing what is necessary to adapt, evolve, and become since then. Will has been evolving…and resisting. He twists in his inferno and Hannibal knows what Will needs to set himself free. He needs another battle to test their friendship, another destiny already written in Hannibal's own hand. Hannibal needs to know his intentions.

Before his incarceration, Will had been averse to lying, most of all to his therapist. The entire concept of a lie repulsed him. That had been part of the reason he had despised Freddie Lounds. Once incarcerated, Will had found it within himself to manipulate those around him and had justified it as the cost of proving his innocence and Hannibal's guilt. But the cost had been too high. He lost people.

Upon his release, his seduction of Hannibal had required him to live a lie and to lie constantly to the people around him to keep up appearances. How it must have cost him to suffer Alana's accusations and utter rejection of him. And the deeper he had wandered into the maze of destruction and seduction the more lies he had to tell. Hannibal imagines Will spills lies now with the same ease and deliberation as he had sniffed and sipped his wine at Hannibal's table. Will has lied to himself most of all.

Will's seduction of Hannibal had been his education. But for Lounds, Hannibal would have believed Will had succumbed to his conditioning and education. That had been Hannibal's design. He thinks now it may have been Will's as well.

He may have accepted Hannibal's blade as penance, but Will had not crawled up on his cross to die. Will embodies both saint and sinner. He has lost his innocence. He knows too much. He has seen too much. He has felt too much, too.

Will has always felt too much. Hannibal knows how Will can become overwhelmed; unable to build his forts fast enough to accommodate the waves of associations his gift sends crashing into his mind. Hannibal cannot begin to fathom the emotional typhoon that must have rained down on him, a cacophony of voices in the kitchen that fateful night. The noise in his mind and the pain from his wound must have been terrible for him.

He had been in agony.

And Hannibal had left him drowning in that agony. Hannibal turns again in his bed. He had been so sure Will had deserved his punishment, his sentence for betraying him. Now, Hannibal is not sure. Hannibal has never been unsure of anything. The thought rankles.

I wanted to surprise you; and you… You wanted to surprise me.

Hannibal cannot undo what he has done. He very much desires to gather up this singular teacup again. Hannibal twists in the sheets again, turning first this way, then that, a restless shark swimming, swimming in blood and emptiness.

Doctor Clayton seems to understand him. His understanding is compassionate, not exploitive. Talking about his loss with the young psychiatrist had been productive. Hannibal had felt…better. Hannibal had also enjoyed drawing information from the doctor about himself. He has missed his social contacts.

Though Hannibal doubts that Du Maurier intended for his sessions with Clayton to be truly therapeutic, Hannibal thinks his time with his new psychiatrist is well spent. Hannibal would like to know how much Clayton is capable of understanding. Hannibal thinks that it might be better if the focus of his therapy shift to…regret. Until he finds Will, he can play patient with Clayton to placate Du Maurier.

Hannibal will not be seeing Clayton until next week. Well, that's not entirely accurate. Clayton will not be seeing Hannibal until next week. He turns his thoughts back to Will and turns again to lie on his back, eyes closed his hand resting upon the smooth flesh of his stomach. He imagines Will doing the same, unable to think of nothing but Hannibal each and every time he touches himself.

Will lives to either seek his vengeance on Hannibal or to accept his destiny with Hannibal. First, Hannibal must help to liberate him from his inferno.

This situation with Mason has caused Hannibal to see their time together through a different lens. Hannibal closes his eyes to the stars as he remembers the night of Mason's accident. Will's thoughts and actions then might provide Hannibal with insight into his thoughts and actions now. Now that Mason Verger has returned to vex Hannibal, insect that he is.

Will had baited Mason; put the proverbial snare about Hannibal's neck.

Why did you tell Mason Verger I want to kill him?

I was curious what would happen…

Hannibal had suspected that Will had been laying a trap to appease an impatient Uncle Jack, but doing bad things to bad people had felt too good. And Mason had been very, very bad. The ambivalence Will had felt before Mason had tried to kill them both had departed by the time they had returned the ruined Mason home to his sister. Looking back, Hannibal thinks the messy business with Mason was a turning point for Will…

He's your patient, doctor. You do what you think is best for him.

Will had stood hands in pockets, a hint of a smile about his lips as Hannibal had snapped Mason's cervical vertebrae like a twig. The cracking of bone and the drop of Mason's head limp and useless onto the back of the blood soaked chair had been great theater for his audience of one. After wiping off his hands on Mason's shirt, he had rejoined Will to admire his handiwork.

"You uh, found my cd collection." Will had said glancing at his stereo, finally acknowledging Hannibal's carefully selected soundtrack for the afternoon's festivities.

"Hmmm. An eclectic assortment, no opera…but adequate. Music does enhance the mood." Hannibal had turned an ear toward the speaker as the next selection had started, a Mozart Adante.

"What do we do with him now?"

Will had frowned at Mason, lifeless drooling sack of bones, his ravaged face still slick with blood that continued to ooze from the vestiges of exposed muscle all over Will's chair. Will had missed Mason cutting the fatty tissue from his own cheeks. The dogs had really enjoyed that. By the time Will had arrived, Mason had been close to bone and might have started on his forehead or scalp.

Merciful that Will had arrived before Mason had plucked out his own eyes.

"How did you get here?" Hannibal had asked.

"I took a cab." Will had looked at Hannibal as though that should be perfectly obvious.

"I think I will do the same. May I use your phone?"

Hannibal would have liked to have taken a photograph of Will's face to frame. He might as well have slapped Will. He had stood with furrowed brows and lips parted unable to form a coherent thought for several seconds. But his dry wit had surfaced.

"Cash or credit? Or, will you just kill the cab driver?" His tone had been conversational, quiet as he had stood with feet slightly apart hands still in the pockets of his jacket.

"I suppose I could stay. Leaving you with two messes to clean up would be unforgivably rude." Hannibal had raised a brow as he had gazed at Will, his mouth caught between frown and grin.

"Incredibly rude." Will had scoffed as the drool had dripped from Mason's lipless maw.

"We will have to take him back. To Margot."

"You have a plan I take it?"

"Always."

Will had groaned softly, running his fingers through his hair and had looked with increasing concern at his dogs still sniffing around Mason and the bits of him on the carpet.

The dogs had begun to whine and Will had seemed to blink himself into the world of the mundane. He had knelt down to examine the dogs and his rug, moving Mason's feet aside to better survey the damage. He began to pluck the larger pieces of flesh from the fibers of the carpet presumably so the dogs wouldn't.

Hannibal had been surprised any of Mason remained on the rug with six dogs sniffing along the carpet. Will had dropped the bits of flesh into his palm, eyes distant and mouth drawn into a thin determined line. Hannibal had crossed the room to close the front door, still open to the front porch where another dog sat. Hannibal had left the door as it was and returned to Will who had been depositing the bits of Mason into an ashtray.

Hannibal had talked to Will's back as he had placed the ashtray on the mantle above the fireplace.

"Remind me to get that later."

"Certainly. Your dog, Winston is it? He's still…"

"I see him. I'm going to have to tear up the entire room. This…won't come out. I only just repaired the damage from…"

Will had turned around abruptly and leveled two very stony blue eyes at Hannibal. Hannibal had waited while Will had chewed at his lower lip in the most endearing way. A habit he had while he edited his words. Hannibal knew Will never said anything that was not deliberate. Like himself.

Murder is messy and there is always the inevitable cleaning up. A task that Will, fledgling killer that he was, had been finding increasingly tedious since his home had now become the scene of three crimes. Well, Hannibal had thought three at the time… Getting rid of evidence is necessary and ridding one's home of it happens more often than one would like. Practice makes perfect.

"This is the second time… you have desecrated my home." Will had said flatly, lifting his head in challenge, one predator to another.

"Maybe you should stop inciting patients to kill me in my own office." Hannibal had retorted to a slit mouthed Will. "You didn't desecrate your home with Lounds?"

Hannibal had never asked for details and thinks perhaps he should have. But, Will had likely made a bed of lies for that too.

"Hardly the same thing. Not even the same ballpark. You aren't going to try and convince me you were sanctifying it?" Will had said, just as flatly.

"No. Randall was worthy meat for the table. Mason is unworthy…to be anybody's bacon. Pity has no place at the table."

"You feel…pity? For Mason?" Will's eyes had widened, incredulous. He had glanced at the numb and unconscious Mason and his frown had deepened.

"Not Mason…Margot." Hannibal had said staring into cloudy blue eyes that had softened immediately.

"We make murder and mercy. Mercy does serve a higher purpose in this instance."

Will had looked about the mess in his living room. He had taken a deep breath and exhaled slowly, but had said nothing more.

Mason's body had quivered at that point with involuntary flatulence. What followed was equally involuntary but much more unpleasant.

“Did he just void his bowels…in my chair?”

“I believe so, yes.”

Will’s hands had knotted into fists, his jaw working from side to side as he had stared at the despoiled grotesque thing before him. Feeling Hannibal’s gaze, he had given Hannibal a mildly annoyed glance and had walked into the kitchen, stripped off his jacket and tossed it on the table. Hannibal had followed, Mason wasn’t going anywhere. He had watched Will roll up his sleeves and fill the sink with warm water and then squat down to root around in the cabinet underneath. Will had stood back up holding dishrags, old and faded but folded neatly.

“Before I do anything else, I have to clean the dogs up. It’s too cold outside to hose them down.”

“Of course.” Hannibal had said, understanding that Will would require a distraction in order to keep his mind occupied. “May I use your bathroom?”

Will had turned to look at Hannibal and seemed only then to notice the cuts on his face.

“Oh, there’s um…some peroxide, cotton balls, bandages, and…”

“It’s right down here?” Hannibal had pointed down the hall. Will had nodded and turned back to the sink already uncomfortable with the intimacy of Hannibal using his bathroom.

Hannibal had found the bathroom as neat and tidy as the kitchen. He had been here many times, not always with Will’s permission or knowledge and Will’s home had always been comfortable and clean. He had found the antiseptic and the cotton balls and had cleaned his wounds while Will had cleaned his dogs. He had looked in the mirror at his shirt, had found the cuffs soiled, bloodied, and had also realized that Will would have no shirts that would fit him. Will had taken to leaving clothes at his house, not the other way around.

Hannibal had removed his vest and shirt anyway. He had scrubbed at the cuffs and sleeves with cold water and hand soap, a combination that Hannibal had found to be very effective. Soon, the blood stains were gone, but the shirt was now wrinkled and quite wet. What was to be done about that?

By the time Hannibal had walked back to the kitchen, shirtless and smelling of deodorant soap, Will was still on his knees washing off the blood and bits of flesh tangled in the fur of the terrier, or what Hannibal thought was a terrier. Hannibal had stood observing Will with his dogs, his attention stubbornly focused on them, on anything but the sight of Mason in his living room.

The dogs were well trained Hannibal had to admit, each of them had sat still for Will to clean and rinse them off. When he had directed them to take their places in front of the fireplace they had each done exactly that once Will had been satisfied that no more of Mason remained to taint them.

He had glanced up at Hannibal, observed his lack of attire and the blue in his eyes had flickered a little brighter and his mouth had fallen open ever so slightly before returning his gaze to the furry little thing sitting in front of him. Hannibal had watched him try to blink away the color rising in his cheeks. Will had not retreated into his mind that evening, but he had exhibited his own brand of avoidance in his own quiet way.

“How did you get here, anyway?” Will had asked after an awkward moment.

“I drove what I imagine is Carlo’s flatbed truck. I found the keys in his pockets before he fed the pigs.”

“Good thing. Would have had a hell of a time getting them from him after.”

Will had continued with the dog grooming, but Hannibal had not missed his little smirk.

“We’re going to be here a while. Do you mind if I make some coffee?”

“Go ahead.” Will had said looking up for an instant. When Hannibal had not moved, Will had looked up again from his task. “What? Don’t tell me you don’t know where it is. You have been to my house before, probably more than I know.”

“Yes,” Hannibal had said patiently, “But not for coffee.”

Will had glanced at his fishing rods and fly tying table in the living room and had sighed rubbing his fingers over stubble and looking very tired all of sudden. “Middle cabinet, over there. Top shelf.”

“Perhaps you have an oversized shirt or jacket I might wear?”

Will had paused again, had raised his brows and peered at Hannibal beneath a fringe of curls still too short to Hannibal’s liking.

“I’ll look around when I’m done. Anything else?”

“No, I’ll make the coffee and check on Mason.” Hannibal had left Will alone after that, to finish with the dogs so he could have his undivided attention once again.

As the coffee had brewed, Hannibal had returned to stand over Mason. Mason’s breathing had been regular, his blood still coursing through the carotid artery as Hannibal had pressed his fingers aside his Adam’s apple. His vitals had been more or less acceptable considering his condition. Hannibal had brushed the unruly blonde mop with his fingers thinking his hair and his eyes were all that would be recognizable to him. Mason’s eyes had opened for a second, rolled up in his head and closed again. Satisfied, Hannibal had returned to the kitchen.

Will had been watching the dirty water swirling down the drain in a momentary daze and had looked to Hannibal as he had leaned over the sink hands on either side of the metal edges. Hannibal had wondered if Will thought of heaving up Abigail’s ear whenever he used his sink. Probably unavoidably.

Hannibal had moved to stand behind him, shifting so his hips brushed lightly along the curve of Will’s bottom, his belt buckle and zipper skimming the fabric of Will’s trousers and feeling the flex of muscle at the contact. Will had looked to the side waiting, seeking cues. Hannibal had grasped tense shoulders, had pressed his thumbs along knotted muscle. Will had leaned back into the gentle massage and Hannibal had welcomed the weight against him as Will settled, arching back so the scent of his hair filled Hannibal’s nose.

A second later Hannibal had been nuzzling his neck, eyes closed listening to Will breathe, fingers still kneading firm flesh and knowing his touch would keep Will from slipping away. He would be imagining Mason’s ordeal; he wouldn’t be able to help it. Hannibal would ask him later, but not now.

“It will take both of us to move him. He shouldn’t be sitting up like that, should he?” Will had asked, rolling his shoulders.

“It doesn’t matter now. Coffee’s ready.”

“So it is.”

Will had pressed against Hannibal folding into the curve of his body as though a part of him, arms still braced on either side of the sink, face still in profile as Hannibal had rested his cheek against a cushion of curls.

“I can…feel…your heart beating.”

His simple words and soft breath had warmed Hannibal’s fingers that had come to rest upon his shoulder. Hannibal had closed his eyes, lost in the moment. Will could not have said anything more perfect.

Hannibal has held onto that moment like a precious jewel. As Will had known he would. Hannibal has but few precious jewels like this one and he keeps them tucked away in his chest, a salve for the wound he carries.

As all moments must, this one too had passed, and Will had eased himself away from Hannibal to stand upright and turn around to face him. The sweetness of a moment ago had evaporated, vibrating molecules lost into the air as he opened his mouth to speak. The chill had been bracing to say the least.

“How long will what you gave him last?”

“A couple more hours at most. He will need medical attention soon.”

Hannibal had moved aside and Will had crossed to the cabinets to retrieve two coffee mugs. That had been Will, alternately hot and cold, capable of both passionate intimacy and cruel violence. Both sides always present awaiting the proper stimulus to draw one or the other out. Sometimes, Hannibal had managed to seduce both sides at once, or Will had allowed him to think that.

So infuriating, his Will.

A few moments later they had stood in front of Mason, clutching coffee mugs and contemplating the corrupted corpse like figure before them.

“What did you say to Mason when you went to see him?” Hannibal had asked.

“You mean the day we went to Margot in the hospital? The day you thought I left to go kill him?” Will had taken a gulp of his coffee, had casually looked over the rim at Hannibal.

Hannibal had recognized the confidence growing within Will. He had encouraged it. The more he had mimicked Hannibal, the more confident he had become. The more he behaved like Hannibal, the more he evolved. With every test Hannibal had handed him, he had used it to learn about Hannibal but also learn about himself. He would eventually come into his own. Until then, he would learn from Hannibal’s example.

Du Maurier had never been able to do that. Learn from Hannibal’s example. Too vain. Too enamored with her own accomplishments. Too competitive. Too busy remaining separate from him, never comprehending that Hannibal had desired to experience oneness with her. She was certainly afflicted with a number of neuroses displayed over the years, but Du Maurier did not suffer from an excess of introspection.

You cannot function as an agent of friendship for a man who is disconnected from the concept as a man who is disconnected from the concept.

Neither can one function as an advocate for equality for one disconnected from the concept as one disconnected from the concept. Du Maurier is no swan. And neither was Will. He didn't have to be. Zeus had not wanted another Zeus. He had wanted Leda.

Hannibal has learned from his experience. His handling of Will had been much more tactful. Will's sensitivity had required all of Hannibal's skill. Will had required nurturing and a strong hand.

Will had used his gift of empathy to become Hannibal, had purposely tried to think like him and had succeeded more often than Hannibal could let him know. In a way, Hannibal is flattered that Will had devoted so much time to knowing him, even before becoming…intimate with him.

Will would challenge him, provoke him, and test him…as it should be. As long as Will loved him.

Deference was not a trait easily expressed by either of them and Hannibal had not expected Will to defer. There were no clear lines of authority between them and expertise had never been so narrowly confined to a matter of degrees from which schools. By this time, Will had not perceived himself as being subordinate to Hannibal intellectually or professionally.

He had been quite aware of Hannibal's grooming. Autonomy had been a necessary tool in Hannibal's instruction. Will had to believe the choices he made were his own, not Hannibal's. And they had been. Hannibal thinks Will may not want to see it that way.

Hannibal had understood that Will had been struggling with his newfound sense of power. The situation with Mason had provided yet another proving ground, another area in which to pit his wits against Hannibal even as they bested a common enemy.

A lesson he had learned that evening was that he was not quite as adept as Hannibal at not answering a question with another question.

“You have an idea of my mind, Will. But I also have an idea of yours.” Hannibal had said, sipping at coffee still too hot to actually enjoy.

Will had nodded silently beside him.

“You said you told Mason that I wanted to kill him. You told him that when you know I did not.”

A slight smile from Will and Hannibal had pressed on, “But's that's not all you told him, is it?”

“Not those exact words, but I made it clear you wanted him dead.” Will had said, careful to keep his eyes focused on Hannibal, “You wanted me to kill him. That's why you set him on Margot.”

“Yes. But you wanted me to kill him.” Hannibal had leveled a finger at Will.

“Yes.” Will had said mimicking Hannibal's tone perfectly, “A game we seem unable to stop playing and it would seem we have a tie.” Will had gestured vaguely in Mason's direction.

“Tell me, what would you have liked to happen?”

Hannibal had kept his eyes locked onto Will’s still trying to determine Will’s tells. He had yet to find one. Will’s every movement, every gesture and expression had been as controlled and calculated as Hannibal’s own. So infuriating. So clever…his Will. Hannibal would have expected nothing less from him.

“You imply I’m unhappy with the outcome. I’m not. But, you manipulated this outcome. Created chaos.”

“Chaos already existed. I invited clarity. Resolution.”

“Gave Margot the idea to get pregnant and then told Mason all about it. She came to my house… more than once…”

Will had paused in thought, eyes unwavering and then had come the furrow of brows and the wetting of lips.

“She asked you… about me… didn’t she? And you told her… what? You hoped Margot would… use me. Hoped I would provide the means…”

“You wondered what would happen if my patients started comparing notes. Now you know.”

“Comparing notes with each other is not the same thing as my therapist doing it.”

“Am I your therapist or are we having conversations?”

“Oh, no, no, no… We’ve moved way beyond that. Did it matter to you that the child she was carrying was mine? Of course it did. What was I thinking?” Will had closed his eyes a moment, had shaken his head lips upturned wickedly. “Did you give Mason the idea to take it before or after you…we found out she was pregnant?”

“Is that how this works? I create and you destroy?”

“We are capable of both as you well know. It would appear we are just as capable of deceiving each other. I don’t want to deceive you, Will. I’m not certain what you want.”

“What I want is for you to admit why you were compelled to get between them and why you had to involve me with them.”

At that point, Hannibal had known Will had never intended to kill Mason himself. He had tried to manipulate Hannibal into doing it…for Jack, of course, but Hannibal knows Will had enjoyed the challenge, had thrilled to it, had found satisfaction, raw and delicious satisfaction. As raw as Mason’s face and as delicious as the carnal pleasures that had followed.

He already knew why Hannibal had set the twins on each other. He wanted Hannibal to say it. To him.

“Did I send Margot to your house? Did I force her into your bed?”

“No…”

Will had looked down shifting his gaze to his left, remembering. Will had had his own reasons for sleeping with Margot and had likely figured Hannibal had already guessed what they were. When he had looked again into Hannibal's face, the wounded expression was gone.

"You suggested to Mason she had found a way to have an heir. You ratted her out, Hannibal. You had to have had some idea of what he would do to her."

"Yes. But you knew about the will, she told you."

"Yes."

"And you don't suspect anything when a lesbian climbs in bed with you."

The plaintive notes of Rachmaninoff had swallowed up the room. The very air had shifted as Will had exhaled his pride. A sigh fraught with enough shame to send his tongue to moistening his lips before words could spill out again.

"She said…"

"She lied. I think you are upset…"

"I'm not…upset."

"As I was saying, you are upset because you perceive I involved you in something vulgar between two patients and you perceive yourself to be more than a patient to me. And you believe I should perceive you as more."

Will had stared at Hannibal, jaw clenched so tight that his entire face seemed set in stone. He had drawn a breath and then looked aside as though the air in front of Hannibal, the air between them had somehow become detestable. Hannibal had waited for Will to quell his anger at being found out, although Hannibal had not been certain that Will had been truly aware of his feelings until that moment.

Then as now, Hannibal suspects Will does not want to see some things about himself, or he chooses to ignore, disbelieve them. Either way, this not seeing his true motivations was precisely why he needed Hannibal. To sort things out, put things in perspective, like they used to do.

"This was never about the Vergers, was it?" Will had said after a long moment.

He had neither agreed nor disagreed with Hannibal's professional opinion of his state of mind. Hannibal had let it go; it had been enough that Will had been forced to acknowledge and consider his feelings.

"No. They are but elements undergoing change to fuel your radiance. I asked you to imagine what you would like to happen. Tell me, what did you see happening that evening we talked in my office about snares and deceptions?"

Hannibal had wanted the truth if Will was willing to offer it. Hannibal had not asked him to elaborate on the other fantasies Hannibal had watched him retreat into. This was different. Who had been killing whom in this fantasy?

"I slit your throat and it rained blood. I watched you descend into the pit. I heard the sounds of hell, of your flesh ripped from bone in a pit consumed in darkness."

“You slit my throat as yourself or as Mason?”

Will had gone quiet. Will had lifted his eyes to Hannibal and sadness had shown, panes of wet glass in those pools of blue, then suddenly the glass had shattered leaving a savagely beautiful and perfect reflection of malice and cruelty. Hannibal had at last struck a nerve. Will still fantasized about killing him. And that awareness had saddened him. Until his empathy had caused him to realize that Hannibal had not been saddened, quite the opposite. Hannibal had just witnessed Will adjusting his behavior to match his imagination.

Hannibal had been fascinated. He is still fascinated. Will had fantasized about killing him, yet had shared his bed, and that night had saved his life. Will always was, is unpredictable.

“You gave Mason the idea to feed me to his pigs. Another vicarious pleasure then, another murder by proxy ultimately unsatisfying. You put the idea in his head and then warned me, hoping I would finish him first? In my office?”

Hannibal’s hand had reached behind Will’s neck, fingers stroking soft curls, to pull him close so they stood nearly toe to toe, head down, Will’s brows grazing Hannibal’s nose.

“Why? How many snares have you put around my neck?”

Will had smiled then, lips peeling back to expose teeth that had gleamed sharp and bright.

“As many as were necessary. As many as are around my own.”

Satisfied, Hannibal had touched his lips to Will’s forehead. As Will closed his eyes, Hannibal had swept his lips lightly through his hair, speaking very softly.

“And when he offered you the knife what did you imagine then?”

“What did I imagine with Carlo and Mason at my back? I imagined what would happen if I cut you down. It seemed the only way we were going to leave alive.”

“You said we.” His fingers had found Will’s chin, lifted it up and finding no resistance there, had brushed his lips across lips already open, pale pink petals awaiting tender bruises.

“Yes… Us…” Will had twisted his mouth away, had glanced at Mason still slumped in the chair.

“You couldn’t imagine leaving without me?” Hannibal had said.

Will had pulled away and Hannibal had relented, but not much. His fingers had found more soft curls to fondle.

“When you look at Mason, can you imagine his state of mind?” Hannibal had said as the strains of a Bach Largo played softly.

“I can’t begin to know how the drugs have altered his reality. What did you say to him? You would know more than I.”

Will had brushed Hannibal’s hand away impatiently. He had looked over at Hannibal’s assortment of drugs and the inhaler on the coffee table, and Hannibal imagined the wheels turning in his head.

“I asked him to remember his father, his education with the pigs.

Will had looked again at Mason, curiosity tugging at his mouth as associations ignited like wildfire.

“You asked him to remember his childhood and this is what he did to himself?”

Will had stared a long moment deep in thought. “He thinks it all a dream.”

“Is this a dream for you, Will?”

“Oh, no. I am aware my nightmares follow me. Mason is not. He will be shocked. He’s not aware…how broken he is.”

“Mason was broken before this.”

“Well, he wasn’t aware of that either…”

Hannibal had placed his hand on Will’s shoulder, knowing where his empathy was taking him.

“You are not broken, Will. Far from it. The windows in your mind have allowed you to see the best in yourself, not just the reflection of the worst in someone else.”

Will’s cheek had found his hand, the brushing of whiskers a delicious prickle. “You should bring the truck around and I’ll get some rope and tarp from the shed.” He had said.

“You intend to tie him to the back of the truck?”

“Well, he can’t sit up front with you looking like that. Suppose you get stopped?”

“He also can’t lie in the back. Exposure. It’s too cold. We do want him alive.”

“Well, what do you suggest?” Will had scanned the room, mind set to problem solving.

They had turned to each other at the same time. “Carpet.”

“I’ll take Mason…” Hannibal had already moved into position to pull Mason up and over his sturdy shoulders, shoulders more than capable of lugging the human detritus out of the fetid cushions that brimmed with blood and bodily fluids.

“I’ll take the chair outside, get my tools from the shed.”

“Here…piggy, piggy, piggy” Mason had crooned quietly as Hannibal lifted him up for Will to remove the chair.

Will had rubbed at his face, fingers massaging his jaw as he had gazed at Mason crumpled in Hannibal’s arms head lolling backward. Mason had gazed at Will, upside down with his maw of a mouth open and the words had kept coming.

“Where’s…Pavlov? I’ve forgotten Pavlov… I feel so…strange.”

Mason had likely not even felt the floor as Hannibal had slipped him not so gently from his arms. Mason would have felt next to nothing, deprived of sensation from the neck down.

“Doctor Lecter, where…are my pigs?”

“In the slaughterhouse, Mason.”

“I’m floating…” Mason had said, eyes up to the white ceiling, no doubt a blank canvas for Mason’s raging euphoric hallucinations. “It’s the music…Ha! Papa always liked Bach.”

Will had stood motionless, eyes wide absorbing the scene unfolding before him. Unable to stop imagining Mason’s mind or what was left of it, while his own emotions had tumbled one on top of the other. He had been absolutely beautiful standing in the late afternoon light and Hannibal had stepped close to take Will’s face in hand and had gently kissed him.

“Hannibal…he’s…right there…” Will arms had embraced him, tentatively.

“What Mason is experiencing is an altered reality, expressions of his own latent desires. Aren’t you, Mason?”

“Latent desires…oh! Summer camp, yes… I don’t have any candy…”

Hannibal had kissed Will again, felt the softening of his lips at odds with the stiffness of his posture. He had pulled away, a glare of blue beneath fluttering lashes.

“Not here. Not now…please.”

He had turned then to grab the chair and haul it out the front door, letting his Winston inside. The dog had promptly sat next to the door to wait for Will. Soon, Hannibal had heard Will returning with his tool box, steps heavy on the porch.

“I lit a fire out back for the chair.” He had set the tool box on the floor and reached for his tepid cup of coffee. “I’ll get started on the carpet. It will be dark soon.”

“We should wait until dark to transport him, yes.”

Later, Hannibal had stood next to Carlo’s truck watching Will pull up in his Volvo. He had parked beside the truck and had gotten out to inspect Hannibal’s work. Hannibal had rolled Mason up in a section of ruined carpet and trussed it up with hemp rope and covered it over with tarp, finally securing it to the flatbed. Mason was as snug as a bug in a rug could be.

“I love what you’ve done with the décor…but the carpet smells horrible.” Mason’s muffled voice had come from the back of the truck. “My face is cold…”

Will had rolled his eyes. “How is it possible he’s still talking?”

Hannibal had stood at the back of the truck wearing his own shirt, Will having thoughtfully run it through the dryer. He had also put on his tie and vest, and an old hunting jacket of Will’s. It had smelled a bit musty but it was insulated and it had sufficiently warmed him. Hannibal had taken care of Mason while Will had put out the fire, settled the dogs, and locked up his house.

“Did you wrap his face in something?”

“Saran wrap.”

Will had angled his head at Hannibal, probably not sure if Hannibal was making a joke. He had shrugged, deciding that it did not matter or that he did not care.

“Well, we should get going…get this over with.”

“You wouldn’t have Margot’s phone number, would you?” Hannibal had asked.

A quizzical look from Will coupled with the familiar sucking on the bottom lip. Will had looked into the distance, ignoring Hannibal.

“Too bad. I would prefer giving Margot time to prepare.”

“Seems to me she’s been preparing all her life.”

“When we get there, you should pull up to the gate to announce us, and meet her at the entrance. I will drive Mason to the pig barn.”

“Agreed.”

Hannibal had debated whether he should be the one to speak to Margot, but had decided to allow Will to explain. Given their intimate but brief history together, Hannibal had surmised Will should be the one to prepare her. He did have a particular insight, a personal connection that Hannibal did not.

“What do you intend to tell her?” Hannibal had said as Will had climbed into his car.

“Why, the truth, of course.”

* * *

Hannibal had waited in the truck for Will and Margot to join him. He had not waited long. They had come around the corner together, Will’s hands in his pockets, Margot’s hands flexing nervously in black fur lined leather.

“Where…is he?” Margot’s huge eyes had searched the cab of the truck.

“He’s in the carpet.” Hannibal had climbed out of the car to join Will, already at the rear tugging at the ropes.

“Margot. Did Will tell you…his condition?”

“Yes. Neck broken. Face disfigured. Seems he had an accident with the pigs.”

“That is essentially the gist of it. Still, his appearance is rather shocking, I must warn you.”

“I called our doctors. Ironic isn’t it? He’ll lie on the same table as I did.”

“Poetic.” Will had said still pulling ropes from the tarp covered Mason.

“You made sure I survived him without actually killing him. Took away one life, and gave him another.” Margot had said in her sardonic way.

“The shape that your rebuke will take is up to you.” Hannibal had said as Will had pulled off the tarp.

Margot had looked at Hannibal scrutinizing his face, “I must say your therapy is rather unconventional.”

Margot had waited for the two of them to unroll her brother from the carpet. When at last Mason had rolled free she had jumped back at the sight that had greeted her.

As had Will. The sight had been an arresting one. The shiny Saran wrap had caused Mason's face to resemble a package of meat from the Verger's own meat packing plant. Only his mouth and exposed nasal passage had been left uncovered. Will had bit his bottom lip immediately and had looked to Margot. Margot had lifted her eyes to Hannibal, somehow knowing he had been the architect of this particular design.

Although she had taken a moment to collect herself, there had been no show of revulsion or pity. No emotion at all had crossed her delicate features as she had gazed down at her ruined sibling. Hannibal had only been able to wonder at her thoughts. Until she had looked back up to look first at Will, then Hannibal. Her slow smile had said it all.

Hannibal and Will had smiled back.

"You removed the mask to reveal the pig beneath." She had said tilting her head to one side, "Too bad Papa isn't here to see it."

Standing around in the cold quiet, a silent accord had passed between them, their smiles assurance enough that this would remain their secret.

"How drugged is he? Can he understand what's happening to him?"

"He is still in a highly suggestive state. I suggest that whatever you want him to believe happened be a part of the narrative you introduce to him…"

"Margot! Is that you? I'm beside myself…I don't seem able to move at the moment. The good doctor must have given me a paralytic…"

Margot had leaned over him with her huge eyes, laden with thick black eyeliner, unblinking in their beauty.

"Mason, you had a bad fall…in the barn. These doctors are going to help you."

Mason had closed his eyes tightly. "They look like Doctor Lecter and that…sperm donor of yours. Ha!"

"Mason," Hannibal had said, "You never left the barn. Listen to your sister. No need to concern yourself with frightful nightmares."

"No," Will had said, "He'll be waking up to one soon enough."

Once the medical van had shown up, Hannibal had stood with Will in the barn on Margot's request. They had waited while Mason had been taken inside the main house and upstairs, with no less than six doctors and nurses in attendance. Then, they had loaded the carpet, tarp, and rope into the trunk of Will's car.

Carlo's truck had disappeared. Hannibal doubted it would ever be seen again. Neither would Carlo.

"Mason has no idea what he's in for." Will had said. "Margot is no tender thing bred between the rocks."

“She is the eternal agony of fire in the stone.” Hannibal had said, familiar with the Warren verse and had been surprised that Will knew it. Will had nodded once at Hannibal, pleased he had understood the reference.

“Mason’s was an act of hubris. He invited the punishment of the gods.”

“An act of hubris in taking a life?”

“In thinking himself an equal.”

Will had stared into space making no comment. Hannibal had let him remunerate on that. Mason was a pig masquerading as a person. Discourtesy of that magnitude should not be tolerated. Hannibal cannot abide that sort of ugliness.

Only a quarter of an hour had passed but the sun had set by the time Margot had returned to the barn and the automated lights had come on around the property.

“I’m not going to ask for details.” Margot had said adjusting the belt of her fur lined jacket. “Doctor Lecter, I’m afraid I will be suspending my therapy…indefinitely, due to my brother’s terrible accident, of course.”

“Of course.” Hannibal had said, “But, if you ever need to, my door is always open, Margot.”

“Now that I know what kind of psychiatrist you are, perhaps I will. I would like to thank you, both of you, for your support.”

Will had glanced at Hannibal, but had said nothing. Hannibal had wondered then what exactly Will had told her. Will would not have desired more interaction with the Vergers. Hannibal had been confident that Will had not disclosed any more truth than was necessary. That confidence has become circumspect now that Mason and his Sards are hunting him…with Will.

She had turned to Will, slipping her fingers lightly along the zipper of his jacket as she had spoken, “Seems we do have some similar issues. I can’t seem to rid myself of my private carnage and neither can you.”

Hannibal had raised a brow at her remark but Will had seemed to understand perfectly.

“Goodnight, Margot.” Will had said.

“You can see yourselves out?” Margot had walked out of the barn with a marked confidence in the sway of her hips.

The hum of electric lanterns had followed them from the barn, lighting their way across the snow covered grounds. The crunch of frozen snow beneath their shoes had been the only sound in the frosty light of the predawn sky.

“Did Margot behave the way you imagined she would?” Will’s voice had hung in the chilly air, trailing behind Hannibal as they had walked to his car.

Hannibal had glanced about the grounds and gestured toward the blanket of white around them. “More or less. I do not need to pick up the snow to know it is cold and wet.”

“And yet, knowing its nature is not the same as experiencing it; is it?”

As Hannibal's hands had touched the door handle he had felt a soft thud at his back; he had turned to feel another thud explode into icy powder on his chest. Will had already scooped up another handful of snow, hands pressing the white stuff into a compact ball as he had continued to walk quickly toward the car and Hannibal.

"Will…" Hannibal had watched Will advance toward him, the sizable ball of ice still clinging to the inside of his glove.

"And having found my experience rewarding, pleasurable even, I can't help but to repeat the experience…" Will had finally reached Hannibal to stand in front of him barely an arms-length away.

"Will…" Hannibal had said more sternly this time.

"Each experience bursting with the potential for new insights and endless applications."

Hannibal had eyed the snowball in Will's hand, had caught the glint of intention in his eyes.

"You would not…"

Hannibal had found himself blinking ice out of his eyes, even as his fingers had grasped Will's forearm. Will's grin had disappeared. Hannibal had ground his thumb hard into the soft flesh on the tender underside of his wrist causing him to wince but the challenge in his eyes had remained.

Hannibal had held Will's wrist painfully tight as the melted ice and snow had dripped from his face into the jacket and down his shirt. The entire upper half of his body had become numb with cold and was quite damp. He had been both astonished and amused at Will's unexpected didactic. Amused, delighted, and rather aroused.

Will's stance had not wavered, neither had he attempted to wrest his wrist from Hannibal's grip.

"Tsk, tsk…For this application…I will tear you apart when we get home." Hannibal had said with mock severity.

And then Hannibal had felt something click in his brain, similar to the jolt that occurs when one realizes one has forgotten something. Or remembered something.

Hannibal had actually said home. To Will. His fingers had loosened immediately. And Will's satisfied smile had been just as immediate.

Will had licked his lips, a thoughtful and calculated gesture. He had angled his head to one side, feigning incredulity. "Is that what you would like to happen?"

Will's fingers had found the ill-fitting jacket's collar and he had pulled Hannibal near, had pressed his lips to Hannibal's throat and they had been warm, so warm against his skin. Hannibal's nostrils had been filled with the scent of him, the air alive with musk and madness. The brush of whiskers along his jaw had set alight the fire smoldering inside all evening.

"Like?" Hannibal had said softly, cradling Will's head in his neck. "It is inevitable."

Hannibal had swept him up and had shoved him against the side of the car. He had slipped one hand between Will's legs and found him hard and thick against the fabric of his trousers. His other hand had grabbed a generous helping of curls to twine crisp and cold around his fingers. His mouth had found Will's throat, which Will had bared for him head tossed back to rest helplessly on the hood of the car as Hannibal had gnawed into his jugular.

And then the headlights had flashed and Will had produced his keys from his pocket, jangling them in front of Hannibal's half-lidded eyes.

"Not here." He had said looking up at the lantern illuminating the area from above. "Home."

Hannibal had squeezed once and responded, "I'll hold you to that." before letting him go. "We'll have to stop by my office. My car and house keys are still there."

"I imagine you were in a hurry when you left so your office is unlocked?"

"Almost certainly. Unless Carlo had been polite enough to lock up after dragging Matteo out my door."

"Matteo? You killed Matteo in your office?"

"Yes, well, Matteo was wounded in the attack. Fatally. He didn't die there."

"What you're saying is that there is more mess to clean up?"

"Unless Carlo had been polite."

Will had climbed in his side of the car and started the ignition working his jaw. He had waited until Hannibal had settled in beside him to start scolding.

"You might have mentioned that before now."

Hannibal had considered Will's suggestion, "You're right. Perhaps next time."

When they had arrived at Hannibal's office, the doors had indeed been unlocked. Hannibal had switched on the lights to find trails of blood on his fine hardwood floor; his desk and other furniture in disarray. Will had walked around the office, no doubt picturing a version of the attack in his mind.

Hannibal had crossed to the desk and examined the drawing he had been working on. His Achilles Mourning the Death of Patroclus had not been damaged. He had noticed Will approaching the desk and he had covered the drawing.

"What was that?"

"Something I was working on when I was interrupted. It's not finished."

"Oh…"

Will had looked up from the pile of paper to Hannibal, holding Hannibal in his gaze for a moment, narrowed his eyes in thought then turned and walked to the fireplace.

"There's not that much to clean up. Surprisingly."

Will had crossed into the bathroom. Hannibal had rearranged his desk to his satisfaction. Will had emerged from the bathroom with a couple of fine white cotton terry guest towels embroidered with Gordion knots at the edges. Hannibal had shaken his head at Will.

“Oh, not those.” Hannibal had said moving toward the kitchenette. “I’ll get some from in here. You can put those back where you found them, please.”

When Hannibal had returned with more appropriate towels he had found Will arranging the furniture back in its place. They had worked quietly until Hannibal’s office had been returned to its former tidy and pristine condition.

Will had stood by the door watching Hannibal gather up the suit jacket left behind and give the room one last look before turning to join him.

“I’ll follow you.”

“Pull around back, I’ll open the garage.”

“There’s room for me to park? In the garage?”

“There is now.” Hannibal had said gesturing for Will to walk ahead of him.

Hannibal had already begun putting things in storage, but Will had not needed to know that.

Once inside the kitchen, Will had barely closed the door behind him when Hannibal had pushed him flush against the hard wood, pinning him with the weight of his own body. Hannibal had not even bothered to turn the lights on. His mouth had found Will’s open and pliant, very much like those soft petals he had thought of earlier. If he could have swallowed Will up whole he would have, the desire to possess him was so immediate…so urgent.

Hannibal had begun to tug at Will’s jacket, fingers seeking zippers and buttons as Will fumbled with the snaps of the camouflage jacket, pulling it from Hannibal’s shoulders. Jackets had fallen to the floor and Hannibal had started on Will’s belt, the touch of Will’s fingers in his hair maddening, simply maddening.

The buckle was tight, probably new and Hannibal had felt Will’s fingers glide over his as Will unfastened the buckle himself. Hannibal had tugged harder.

“Wait, wait…” Will had said, half laughing into Hannibal’s ear, “You’ll rip the pants.”

“We’ll buy new ones…”

Hannibal had ripped Will’s shirt open, buttons scattered to the floor, “And some more shirts as well.”

Of course Will had another shirt under the one Hannibal had just relieved him of. Hannibal had pulled that up exposing him from chest to navel, downy black hair springing up from trousers slung down around his hips. Will’s hands had managed to strip off Hannibal’s jacket as his fingers had hurried to unbutton his vest. Hannibal had obliged by slipping out of it for him so Will could relieve him of his beleaguered blue shirt.

But there had been a tightly knotted silk tie to deal with. Will had attempted to ply the knot apart with practiced fingers, but had finally given up and grabbed the knot instead and pulled Hannibal down with it so that he could take Hannibal’s tongue into his mouth again. He had held Hannibal in place, fingers wrapped around his tie and lips locked to Hannibal’s.

Hannibal had thought his throat might burst from the pressure and pleasure if his trousers didn’t first.

Hannibal had held him against the door, nearly lifting him off his feet as his hands had moved over Will’s warm skin, eliciting tremors of delight from excited flesh and erect nipples. He had dragged his mouth over Will’s cheeks and jaw, and Will had hugged him closer, his hands grasping handfuls of hair, breathless and beautiful and helplessly caught between Hannibal and the door.

Nuzzling around the curls at his ear, Hannibal had whispered one word, “Upstairs.”

“You want to…”

“Yes…ready for another match?”

“Already?”

“You can always forfeit.”

Will had groaned; a soft rumble of acquiescence. He had enjoyed their matches as much as Hannibal had.

Once upstairs, stripped of their clothes, Will’s on the floor and Hannibal’s hanging over one of the chairs before the fireplace, Hannibal had faced Will on the other side of the bed.

“You remember the rules…”

“I know the rules.” Will had sighed.

“I think you understand why I would have you repeat them. After last time…”

“That…you cheated.”

“No…both of your feet had been on the floor.”

Another sigh as Will had thrown up his hands in surrender.

“All right. The rules. Like the ancient Greeks, one point for each time one shoulder, one hip or… the back is pinned. Three points to win. One foot, and only one foot may touch the floor at any given time. Falling off the bed results in instant loss of match. And I did not fall off last time…”

“Both feet were on the floor. Perhaps you’ll do better this time.”

The contest had commenced. Winner take all. Will had yet to win, but Hannibal knew the constant challenges he presented Will left him wanting more. Every encounter between them, whether in or out of bed, had been a battle of wits and Hannibal had known Will would not have wanted it any other way. His fantasies of killing Hannibal had fueled his becoming. The promise of fulfilling other fantasies had fueled his desires in bed, in their bed as Hannibal had come to think of it. Will had not forfeited one match, had not given Hannibal anything but his best efforts. Hannibal had given him no quarter either. Will had fought for every point, had struggled to outthink his opponent each time.

That evening, Hannibal had won the match, had pinned Will three times before Will had been able to pin him a third time, but it had been close. Will had been twisting away from Hannibal's grasp until an advantage had presented itself and Hannibal had sent Will cursing and groaning into the mattress. Will had been reluctant to hold up two fingers, their signal for surrender, until Hannibal had pressed a knee into his back.

Since he had pinned Will face down, right shoulder ground into royal blue satin, Hannibal had taken the spoils of victory then and there.

Hannibal had kissed him open mouthed, deep, his hands between Will's legs, practiced fingers pressing kneading that tender spot beneath swollen silken balls with fragrant lubricant until Will's flesh had become warm and slick to his touch. Will had turned over, legs had clamped down around his hand, his hips bucking off the bed, his tongue slick and sweet stabbing at the back of his throat.

Hannibal's finger had slipped easily into puckered flesh slippery and wet, moving back and forth sending Will's hips to grinding against him, cock hard and pressed against Hannibal's own throbbing cock. The thrust of the second finger had sent him trembling, lips trailing along Hannibal's cheek, teeth tugging at earlobes.

As Hannibal had stretched and kneaded, making room for a third finger, Will's breath had slowed, no longer wild and reckless, but staccato and shallow, muscles clenched tightly around Hannibal's fingers. A sob had broken from him as the third finger slipped inside, back arching off the bed, body twisting beautifully on satin the same color as his eyes, prone and pleasingly perpendicular elsewhere.

"Turn over." Hannibal had said.

Will had obeyed, understanding the rules, and had slipped sensuously across the bed, stretching his limbs taut entirely for Hannibal's pleasure.

"Bottom up." Hannibal had slipped one of the over-sized pillows beneath Will as he had lifted himself off the mattress to rest on his forearms.

Hannibal had preferred taking Will from the front, but that evening he had enjoyed watching the muscles flex in Will's back and shoulders. He had especially liked tugging at dark curly locks while pummeling Will into the pillow. Bathed in sweat, Will's body had glistened in the firelight, Hannibal had thought like some Greek statue come to life to writhe beneath him, to sob with every movement torturously sweet and breaking with pleasure with each thrust of Hannibal inside him.

Will had shuddered beneath him at the same time as Hannibal had trembled inside, the loss of control complete and exquisite. Will's loss of control equally exquisite, perhaps more. His empathy was relentless, creating images of Hannibal in his mind as his own body responded to the assault on his senses. Will had folded beneath him, exhausted, and Hannibal had gathered him up, to wash his face with gentle appreciative kisses.

"You will lose…eventually." Will had said later, after they had stretched themselves out along the mattress spent and sated, the luscious feel of satin upon their naked skin.

"Perhaps. Perhaps not. You seem to enjoy losing…" Hannibal had spoken into damp curls beneath his nose before sliding his tongue down Will's neck.

Hannibal had left his mark on the hollow of Will’s collarbone, a tender and tasty place especially enjoyable since biting the flesh there always sent Will nearly out of the bed every time. He had nibbled his way down the length of Will’s body to the sound of sighs and groans, and like plucking scales on an instrument the groans had become deeper and richer the lower Hannibal nibbled.

“Hannibal…enough.” Will had laughed softly, pulling at Hannibal’s hair to wrest him from where he lay on Will’s hip.

Hannibal had never considered killing Will, had never even harbored fantasies of killing him. Eating him, consuming all that he was had been a far greater pleasure. Possessing him, like this, had been… The wound throbs within Hannibal’s chest, perhaps more painfully with the knowledge that the bearer of both torment and comfort is so near.

Hannibal had eased himself beside Will to hold that wonderful blue gaze and to touch the soft curls and the softer lips he loved so much. Hannibal had let his fingers wander back along Will’s jaw caressing stubble and soft skin, to feel the sensual movement of bone and muscle should Will speak. He had not. Will’s hand had settled warmly on his forearm, drawing circles in the soft hairs until he had fallen asleep. Hannibal had thought how the need to touch and be touched had been so powerful between them.

Hannibal feels the embrace of Morpheus about his limbs, his dream imbued kisses heavy and sweet upon his eyelids. As he retreats into slumber he thinks fleetingly of that charcoal drawing of Achilles and Patroclus, of how it sits somewhere in a vault of the FBI collecting dust and he wonders if Will ever understood…

Hannibal will have his Patroclus if he must raze Troy a thousand times.

Chapter 48

Associations come quickly and frequently for Will when he slips into a memory with Hannibal. Daniel leaves Will alone with D'Angelo while he meets up with Du Maurier. Hannibal tags along.

The aroma of basil, garlic, and simmering tomatoes fills the house. Daniel had started preparing his sauce before making breakfast. Will had helped initially, but memories of another kitchen had intruded and he had faded into the past only to come around to find Daniel slipping the chef's knife from his fingers. He had handed Will a paper towel to soak up the blood from the nick across his left thumb.

Will had sat in a chair and observed after that. He had been stunned that he had recreated the same incident in Daniel's kitchen as the incident he had been remembering. He had been uncomfortable that Daniel had witnessed it. Will had not wanted to discuss thinking he was chopping onions with Hannibal while standing next to Daniel. He had been grateful that Daniel had not wanted to discuss it.

Will suspects Daniel had had his reasons. He always has his reasons. They had made breakfast once Daniel had been satisfied his sauce was at last ready to simmer unattended.

Daniel stands beside the baby grand, his Kreisler violin propped up on his left shoulder, bow poised. He can see the reflection of Will sitting on the piano bench, hunched over the keys, in the polished antique finish. Will is intently focused on the sheet music before him as his hands glide over the ivory. He listens to Will play the last few measures of the first movement of Pachelbel's famous Canon in D, again. He sighs as Will fumbles on the timing, slowing the time signature as he begins the second movement...again.

"Will, the time stays the same. That's what the metronome is for."

"I know, I know."

Will leans back, cracks his neck. The two of them have been practicing since they finished their protein heavy breakfast. Protein heavy for Daniel anyway. Daniel had watched him push his sausage around on the plate for most of the meal and had finally gotten up to retrieve a jar of peanut butter from the pantry and had set it in front of him. Will had spread it thickly on his toast and had swallowed it all down with his coffee rather than endure the unsolicited sermon.

He had endured plenty of them from Hannibal. A twinge of a smile tugs at his lips as he thinks Hannibal would have never shoved a jar of peanut butter at him. Will does not recall ever seeing any prepared condiments in Hannibal's kitchen. Will remembers rummaging through the fridge one morning for ketchup to put on his scrambled eggs…and sausage.

Where's the ketchup?

At your house I would think...where it should remain.

Daniel did have ketchup and Will had polished off the onion and green pepper omelet topped with provolone along with plenty of orange juice and crusty brown bread sliced thick and toasted perfectly in the oven. Like himself, Daniel keeps plenty of fresh fruit around and Will thinks he has eaten more citrus and pears in the last week than he ate in an entire month back home.

The scent of the ocean has been pervasive this morning and Will attributes this to Daniel's love of this particular piece and his love of music generally. Daniel's mist of salt and spray feels especially sweet, a poignancy seemingly drawn directly from the violin as Daniel draws the bow across the strings, slides his fingers along the frets. Will imagines the piece holds a particular significance for Daniel since he plays his section without having to glance at the sheet music at all.

Will finds Daniel's enthusiasm infectious. He doesn't mind indulging him. There is a certain joy that comes from watching someone enjoy themselves. Daniel's beatific smile deepens as the notes soar.

But, Daniel's associations with this particular piece of music are not Will's associations.

Will recognizes playing the duet is therapy, a means to access memories and associations, and to make new ones. Unlike the neutral environment they had enjoyed for the fishing trip, Will is making associations and memories in Daniel's home, using the music as a bridge between one home and another, in a manner of speaking .

Daniel's intuitive approach to therapy with Will is working. The introduction of the metronome has been sending Will's mind into hyper drive all morning. Click. Click. The constant tick of the needle lulls him, sends him into his own memory palace where associations have come very quickly.

Daniel could not have known that Will hears this same duet in his mind, only he hears the haunting notes struck from an antique harpsichord, not the notes he plucks from Daniel's Yamaha. He had listened to Hannibal play this same piece in the salon keeping perfect time with a recording as Will had sat with his whiskey beside him in their sanctuary, his stomach full from their evening meal.

Randall Tier had provided the meat for the gastronomic delight that evening, the second evening of his lost weekend with Hannibal. He can't remember the label on the bottle of crisp white wine, but he remembers selecting it himself. It had been a Pouilly-Fumé and it had been twenty one years old. Hannibal had been in a festive mood.

Click. Click. Click.

Will had arrived at Hannibal's home promptly at seven as agreed after leaving an irate and incensed Jack at the museum to oversee the dismantling of Will's masterpiece. Will had sat in his car outside Hannibal's garage for several minutes mentally preparing himself before going inside, recalling fractured and frantic images of the night before as he had stared at the windows along the second floor, eyes trained on the panes that flickered above, indicating another fire had been lit in the extravagant fireplace, another invitation to join Hannibal upstairs after dinner.

Hannibal had been unable to wait until after dinner. They had circled each other in the kitchen, polite banter merely filling air already charged with primal pheromones, as Will had eased into the version of himself he had created for Hannibal. A version he had found disturbingly easy to maintain. Hannibal's mannerisms and micro expressions had been becoming more familiar to him, easier to read, and Will had tested his newfound understanding with a growing confidence.

He had stretched across the counter that separated them and had teased Hannibal playing his role of fledgling well and playing on Hannibal's attraction to him. That is what he had told himself at the time.

Didn't you say something about an appetizer?

Hannibal had reached for him across the counter and had pulled him halfway across with one arm as Will's hand had sent his freshly poured glass of wine crashing to the floor. He had done such a masterful job of projecting that he had found himself bent over the center island, his trousers around his unlaced boots before he realized what was happening. Despite knowing full well what to expect that evening, a moment of clarity had threatened to undo all he had designed.

It had been the first time Will's conscience, or what remained of it, threatened his design.

Click…

Images of taking Tier apart in Hannibal's workroom, a room now dark and silent below his unlaced boots still anchored to the floor, had flooded his consciousness at the touch of Hannibal's hands upon his skin, as Hannibal's fingers had sunk into his flesh. The act of dismembering Tier had been too fresh and visions of his own hands taking scalpel to smooth pale skin, separating the young man's chilled flesh from sternum to pelvis had spilled into his mind.

He was at once aware of his hands reaching through the remains of breast bone and ribs, lifting organs slick and wet from the exposed chest cavity and depositing them one by one into zip lock plastic bags. Aware of flaying skin and carving steaks from discarded limbs as Hannibal had hovered observing, guiding, and gloating. And as his hands had caressed that boy's flesh in anticipation of his own design so Hannibal's hands had been caressing him.

Will had hesitated, distracted by a myriad of images his imagination compulsively created one on top of the other. He saw Tier strewn over on the table a jumble of bones and viscera. He saw himself through Hannibal's eyes, his version of Hannibal touching and kissing his body pressed against the counter like he was someone else. He saw Hannibal through his own eyes, unfiltered and raw. Lustful and possessive.

And these images were compounded by images of killing Tier…and Hannibal.

Hannibal must have sensed his disorientation, and he had soon felt Hannibal's fingers curl around his own gently prying them away from the counter. A ruffle of bandages and a tender throbbing across his knuckles had pulled him back as Hannibal had pressed his weight against Will's body to brush moist lips into his hair.

"Stay with me, Will. Randall is not here."

"I want to…"

But his mind had overruled. When he had become aware of Hannibal again, the ceramic tiles had gleamed spotless once more, broken glass had been cleared away and he had been leaning on the counter, chilled and nude, elbows bent as he had heard the crack of Hannibal opening something. He had smelled the olive oil emanating from Hannibal's hands before they had even touched his skin. Hannibal had made do with what he had in the kitchen and he had warmed his hands then slathered Will with the oil in places no one had ever touched, except Hannibal.

"The ancient Greeks venerated the olive tree and its fruit. Among its many uses was the preparation of the athletes for the games. Have you ever wrestled, Will?"

Will had blinked in confusion…and alarm. Then…curiosity.

"You're proposing a wrestling match? Here? Now?"

"I guarantee you won't be thinking of Randall…"

Beethoven's Seventh had roared in his ears as their bodies had rocked on the floor each seeking dominance again, Fragonard's Bathers in plain view the entire time as if the searing sensations within had not been surreal enough to send Will right over the edge. Will had been unprepared for the physical stamina required for such an activity with Hannibal.

He had pushed the surreal insanity of his situation out of his conscious mind and had forced himself to see from Hannibal's point of view. See the being that Hannibal wanted him to be. And he had become that Will for Hannibal that evening and many other evenings.

You're missing pieces of yourself, Will. Careful what you replace them with.

Will thinks that was probably the most truthful advice Hannibal had ever offered him.

Becoming that Will had felt ever more natural the longer he had remained in Hannibal's sphere of influence. Will had had to adjust his mindset to return to himself, usually requiring the whole of a drive back to Wolf Trap. Only to mentally prepare himself for the drive back to Baltimore the next day. Will thinks now he may not have actually adjusted as much as mimicked his former self.

Hannibal must know by now the mental summersaults Will had performed to be with him. To seduce him. To betray him.

Will had absorbed the experience, absorbed Hannibal into his very being. He had given himself over to know Hannibal. Had melded with the man, the maligned and malignant being who had haunted his dreams and with whom he did not feel so…alone.

Hannibal had likewise invaded Will's psyche to such a degree, that he had understood him quite well. Will thinks more than he realized at the time. And, Will had wanted to understand Hannibal, to scrape beneath the patina of civility and manners, a glossy sheen Will had torn from him like his suits.

The more intimate they became, and the more Will gave, the more Hannibal had given. Hannibal had a sense of reciprocity that could be exploited. Will had known he would have to sacrifice some of himself in order for Hannibal to do the same. He had to create an accurate image of Hannibal in his mind if he wanted to catch him. Knowing the Chesapeake Ripper would only get him so far. The Ripper was one version of Hannibal. Hannibal had plenty more suits to rip away.

The Hannibal who had welcomed Will into his office to resume his therapy was not the same intelligent psychopath. And, Will thinks, neither was he.

Will had been surprised Hannibal had introduced the idea of wrestling in his sacred kitchen, but, Hannibal had always made exceptions where Will was concerned and Will had been gradually realizing the exceptions had been rooted in affection.

By Will's thinking, the wrestling had served two functions.

Hannibal had understood Will had been processing his feelings about killing and maiming Tier for his monument. That Will had some trepidation about eating Tier. Further, Hannibal had known Will had not been pleased about any of it.

You should be quite pleased. I am.

Of course you are.

Hannibal had taken the opportunity he had manufactured to guide Will into his universe and Will had allowed him. But, Hannibal had his limits as to how much interference he could tolerate with his plans for Will. Will's empathy had been interfering with the intimate appetizer he had been looking forward to and so Hannibal had provided Will with something else to focus his attentions on. Hannibal.

Hannibal was always doing thoughtful things like that for Will.

The other function had more to do with Hannibal's pathology. Will was already acquainted with the carnal displays of art around the house and the kitchen. Preparing food was an act of creation and consuming the creation, divine. Hannibal had improvised that evening. Will does not think the wrestling had been a planned event. But, the nude wrestling had been an undeniable expression of carnality; a pleasure they had shared while fully immersed in Hannibal's preferred milieu, even to covering Will in olive oil.

Will had been immersed in many things that lost weekend. Hannibal had been immersed in him. Deeply immersed. Will had spent plenty of time managing his own headspace that weekend and Hannibal had been aware of his struggles, had savored every nuance of insight Will's learning curve had provided him.

It had been a weekend devoted to the exploration of each other, to the satisfying of urges. A weekend comprised of overtures of the most incredible kind. Will's mind had been seeded with associations that have since bloomed and blossomed in his imagination.

Click… Click. Will?

Will remembers he had also drank that weekend. A lot. Hannibal had taken full advantage of Will's preference for that particular type of medication.

The sensations Will had experienced had been both terrifying and tantalizing. Will had almost come undone in the kitchen. He had lost the wrestling match. And Hannibal had taken yet another piece of him, but Will had won a piece of Hannibal as well.

Perhaps to help him recover from the sensation soaked gymnastics in the kitchen, Hannibal had arranged an informal wine tasting in the dining room, to sample a few wines for dinner. He had left the choices to Will. The wine had helped him sit through dinner, those sensations still very fresh every time he had shifted in his chair.

Hannibal had sat across from him dressed simply in a clean pair of trousers and dark red cable knit sweater. Will's clothes had disappeared, likely to the laundry room. His attire for their dinner had been equally informal, a pair of Hannibal's loose drawstring pants and the softest of cashmere sweaters to ever touch Will's skin.

They had enjoyed Blanquette de Veau, a succulent French meal of meat and vegetables cooked in a reduced stock and cream sauce if Will remembers correctly and served over rice with a drizzle of crème fraiche, topped with a flourish of fresh chopped parsley, amiably sprinkled over his plate by a beaming Hannibal.

Hannibal had lifted his glass and drank deeply from it as he had peered at Will over the rim hooded eyes in shadow, dark and full of mischief. Cheekbones stark and angular, as though cut from polished stone.

"How did you find the meal?"

"Fishing for compliments, doctor?"

"Not at all. Your honest opinion would be appreciated given that the kill was yours."

Will had licked his lips, the taste of Randall still on his tongue as he had mulled his words carefully.

"I think the meat still too young, but savory nonetheless."

Hannibal's satisfaction had shone behind his veil of a smile.

"You tasted regret?" He had teased.

"Regret would be a refinement I haven't processed yet."

"Was the portion agreeable, then? No room for seconds?"

“Are we still talking about dinner?”

“We can talk about anything you want to talk about.”

“The portion was…adequate.”

Hannibal had touched his napkin to his lips, and lifted his eyes to Will’s, the light from the candles extinguished, lost in the dark orbs that peered into Will, stripping him layer by layer. Will had set his wine glass down and had tried not to wince as he had relaxed back into his chair, ready to resume their battle of wits.

“You fantasize about killing me. You’ve never asked if I fantasize about killing you.” Hannibal had purred from his side of the table.

“You don’t. You didn’t want me on that table downstairs.”

He had watched Hannibal’s tongue slide over his lips, a calculated gesture knowing Will’s eyes would settle there.

“You think I won’t kill you.” The thin lips moved and remained open so Will had been able to glimpse his teeth.

Will had maintained eye contact while finishing off his wine, his third glass. Hannibal had risen from his chair to begin clearing the table circling his theatre with his commanding brand of predatory elegance.

“Oh, you could. You prefer not but I think you would if you had to.” Will had rolled the stem of his wine glass between his fingers.

Will had felt Hannibal pass behind his chair, the rustle of fabric and the faint odor of his cologne, dried sweat and residual olive oil registering like spines along Will’s neck. Hannibal had cleared away the serving bowl, the one with the remains of Randall folded into the cream sauce. Will had watched Hannibal remove the remnants of their feast in silence to deposit them in the dry sink. Hannibal had turned to him, fresh linen teasing imaginary grime from his hands.

“How would I do it?”

“Kill me?” Will had looked up at him, considering. “It would be…intimate.”

Will had waited for confirmation. Hannibal had graced him with a curve of his lips as he had reached for the bottle of wine.

“Doubtful it could be anything else… I’m sure inspiration would present itself if there were just cause.”

“Would you…eat me?”

Will had lowered his eyes as Hannibal had leaned closer to refill his glass.

“Of course.”

“How would I…taste?”

"It would depend on the circumstance. I imagine the flavor delicate and sweet if our encounters thus far are any indication. I think braised, so flesh falls from bone and dissolves upon my tongue."

Hannibal had leaned in to remove Will's plate, had leaned close not quite touching the freshly trimmed stubble along Will's upper lip. The heat from him had been like an undercurrent of electricity singeing the hairs along Will's body.

"And I would weep with every mouthful."

Typically and ridiculously epic. Hannibal's penchant for dramatic hyperbole was unsurpassed. And yet…

Will had stared into Hannibal's face, had felt a pang in his chest as though Hannibal's quietly delivered words had pricked him, and he had imagined Hannibal feeling something similar by the way subtle creases had manifested tightly around his mouth.

Will had averted his gaze, still giddy from the wine and flush with curiosity at this apparent vulnerability. Will had wanted to pick at Hannibal like a scab, see if he bled, or if the perceived weakness was as calculated as everything else. He had felt the inescapable warmth that Hannibal's gaze never failed to send along his neck, had felt invisible fingers thread through his hair as Hannibal had stood over him, plates in hands. Despite the romanticized imagery, Hannibal had seemed…sad. Will knows now he had been sincere.

"And…would you eat my heart?" Will had asked, lifting his head so his lashes almost touched Hannibal's nose. A calculated gesture and effective. Will heard the catch of breath in Hannibal's throat.

"I would rip it from your chest and eat it raw and bleeding from my hands."

Will had smiled savagely at that, a part of him amused at the sentiment while another part of him squirmed, excited and terrified by the admission. The plate in Hannibal's hands had dropped back to the table suddenly and before Will had time to respond, Hannibal's tongue had found his mouth already separating lips and teeth, fingers at the back of his neck and thumbs pressing against his jugular as Will's blood had coursed beneath, quickening at the touch. His hands had grasped the table's edge for balance…

"Will…"

Will feels Daniel's fingers glide over his own, his hands heavy upon the lid of the piano. Daniel leans over him at the bench, his breath warm in Will's hair, enough to cause a confused shudder. He shakes his head, rolls his shoulders and blinks the memories back. He reminds himself where he is and tries to shake off where he had just been.

"You zoned out for a minute. I thought you were going to fall off the bench."

I did fall and I've never really gotten back up…

Will shakes his hands free and reaches out to silence the metronome, his heart thumping in his chest. He is sure Daniel can hear it. He knows Daniel is feeling it. He looks at the sheet music rather than Daniel's face.

“I told you the metronome would trigger memories. Hannibal had used one in therapy. So had Chilton.”

“Lots of therapists use them for lots of different reasons. We’re trying to make new associations here. And, believe it or not, metronomes are designed to keep time making music, which is what we are…were doing.”

“We aren’t using it just for the music.”

“Apparently not. You ignore it.”

Will smiles. “You want me to recall memories with you. I get that. Well, I’m remembering plenty.”

“Good. Pretty intense, huh?”

Will’s expression tells Daniel everything he needs to know. He knows Will is revisiting his past with Lecter, revisiting the events leading up to the gutting in the kitchen. Will is still baffled by Lecter’s epiphany. He wants to know what event had incited Hannibal’s wrath to rain down on him that night. Why Hannibal could not leave until he had visited his punishment upon Will.

Whatever Will had been remembering just now has moved him into a distant twilight, he is caught between the imagined world he visits and this one. His tether to reality is tenuous in moments like this, and the moments are occurring more frequently. He finds Will staring into space several times a day now, like the afternoon he had found him sitting here on the piano bench. Sometimes for just a few minutes, like now, and other times, he has not been sure for how long Will has either been lost in thought or completely blacked out.

Will remembers the memories he culls from his mind during Daniel’s guided therapy, but he does not remember where he goes during the blackouts. Daniel is puzzled by the two very different types of functioning. He thinks Will’s brain is healing, and because his empathy is so highly attuned to his surroundings, blacking out completely must be intuitive, an automatic failsafe that has kicked in to protect him. But he’s not certain. He can’t be certain about anything where Will is concerned.

As though Will had been reading his mind, Will swings his legs around the bench and gets up to grab his book bag from beside the couch.

“Oh…I almost forgot. I have the results from the CAT scan. No encephalitis.”

Will hands the paperwork to Daniel. Daniel scratches his head as he reads. Will had the scan done yesterday. Nothing remarkable going on in his brain according to the results he holds in his hands. Nothing physically going on.

“I guess you are relieved.”

“Definitely.”

Daniel watches Will meander back over to the piano, his fingers glide along the lid and rest there, his expression pained and wistful at the same time. He swallows. Daniel feels the familiar mixture of regret and anger as Will stands in front of the piano lost again in his thoughts. Will is also aroused, the sexual tension extending to Daniel, he feels it between his legs thick and warm like syrup. He can feel the desire welling up and can only imagine how it is for Will.

He gives Will the illusion of privacy. Will knows Daniel is feeling his emotions but Daniel doesn't have to acknowledge them in front of Will. He was thinking about Lecter, of course. Which particular memories are causing these emotions to surface only Will knows.

Daniel will be finding out soon enough. He has procured the hallucinogens he wants to introduce to Will to combine with the hypnotherapy he is sure will provide him with the insight he seeks. Hopefully, the experience will provide Will with answers, too.

Their conversation with Chilton had confirmed what Daniel already suspected had gone on in BSHCI. Daniel had needed to know if what Lecter had done with Will could be replicated and if so, with what tools of the trade. Chilton had exploited Will's mind to further advance his career. Daniel can't decide which breach of professionalism was worse, Chilton's, or Lecter's. Lecter has the excuse of being a psychopath. What is Chilton's excuse?

While it is unlikely that Chilton will ever have to own up for what he did to Will, Daniel has the information he needed. Daniel wants to regress Will with his own cocktail, avoiding the well tread neural pathways taken by Lecter and evidently Chilton.

"Associations and memories are occurring more frequently." Daniel says.

"Yeah…"

"Have you thought about my proposal?"

"Your proposal to role play under the influence?"

"Well, that's putting it simply, but yes, that one."

"You've been pretty vague…"

"I don't want to tell you too much because you have a tendency to out think me. When you do that, you undermine my efforts and shortchange yourself."

Will laughs. He trusts Daniel with his mind more than he trusts anyone. Even himself sometimes.

"Seems we may as well try it."

"Still haven't figured out how Lecter knew you had played him?"

"Not with any certainty. I was so careful. I'm thinking Freddie Lounds. But, he couldn't have known Lounds was alive. Chilton either. I didn't know about Chilton. I can't think of anything else that would have caused him to… I have no idea what tipped him off. Or when. I was playing the entire time, but was he?"

"Will, we both know you weren't playing the entire time. Lecter knew you were using Jack. Do you know you were using Jack?"

Will bites at his lower lip as he gazes into clear green eyes. Daniel raises a brow in that kind but stern way he has and Will sighs. He closes his eyes and shakes his head realizing Daniel figured that out a while ago. He has been patiently waiting for Will to acknowledge it.

…that's why Lecter could gut you in his kitchen and why you never thought to raise your gun.

"Hannibal knew I was conflicted. Jack knew it, too. Conflicted isn't enough reason to gut me."

"I think Lecter was convinced until something tipped him off. He's incredibly narcissistic and he would believe his powers of persuasion had been effective with you. And Jack wanted to believe in you, but after Verger… Both of them hoped and believed that you were their killer. And you still weren't sure; you played them both up until the end."

You wanted Jack to come to dinner. You sent him to me so that you would not have to choose. Let Fate decide. Is that what you did, Will?

When Will doesn't answer, Daniel decides it is time to drop the questions for now. Will is mentally fatigued at this point and it is too early in the day to become morosely fixated on his past. Besides, Daniel has a surprise of sorts that should lift Will's spirits.

First, he needs to get Will's endorphins kicking around.

"I'm going to stir the sauce. Why don't you get your sneakers on and we'll go for a run. Clear your head."

"Are you speaking as my therapist?"

"If I have to." Daniel grins.

Will grins back and shuffles upstairs to retrieve his running gear. He knows he will feel better afterward. As he slips on his socks, he wonders again what kind of role playing therapy Daniel has in mind.

"When you nicked your thumb earlier, you were thinking of a similar incident, weren't you?"

Daniel watches his homemade ravioli roil in the pot. Timing is crucial with the pasta, a lesson he has learned the hard way. These are filled with four different cheeses and roasted spinach, for Will. The entire meal is meatless, and on this very warm summer day, meat is not really a welcome entrée anyway.

"Yes, I was." Will says, checking his phone.

"Do you find yourself recalling past events that mirror whatever you are doing at the time?"

"Like when I imagined Hobbs eating the same time as me?'

"Yeah, like that."

"No…it's more like…past events are reaching forward to shape the present."

"That sounds very disconcerting."

"It is."

Killing is changing the way I think…

So much about this feels like a dream.

Dreams prepare us for waking life.

Will clicks off his phone, looks up to watch Daniel rinse the ravioli under cold water. The twins aren't picking up. They have been back for a couple days. He has no idea where they are, visiting family. He is beginning to think that was a euphemism for something much less benign. He sweeps thoughts of Lucia and Luciano aside, scatters them like leaves and returns his attention to Daniel who is now buttering up two half loaves of artisan's bread to make garlic toast.

Will had taken a shower when they got back from their run, their clothes soaked in perspiration and sticking to them like a second skin. He wears a short sleeved button down shirt and a pair of long pale blue shorts. Will actually has tan lines from running outside. It is gratifying to look in the mirror and see color in his face. The pallor and dark circles of weeks ago have disappeared.

Daniel has yet to jump in the shower, seeming more concerned about preparing the meal than stripping off his sweaty clothes. He shoves the tray of prepared bread into the oven, but doesn't turn it on, and returns to the pasta. He places the ravioli carefully in a deep round dish and shoves that into the fridge. Will thinks Daniel is as meticulous about his food as someone else he knows.

Soon, he stands in front of the sink, barefoot, in shorts and tee, steam billowing from the pot into his face as he fusses over the piping hot sauce he transfers out of the pot and into a chilled container. Will's eyes linger on the small bruise at his throat, brimming angry purple just above the collar of his tee. A memento of two nights ago. Daniel had fought him off at first, but had relented, allowing Will to render similar punishment below. Will had not waited long before Daniel had returned the favor, with marked ferocity.

He rubs along his collarbone and forces himself to remain in the kitchen, this kitchen.

"You think the frequency is progress, don't you?" Will asks.

"I think it's your mind trying to work through some things. You are consciously aware of searching your memory for answers but I think your subconscious has locked up the memories you want."

"So only my subconscious can unlock them?"

"I think maybe the right stimulus is required for that to happen. Something as emotionally potent as what locked them up in the first place."

"My…trauma in Hannibal's kitchen."

"Well, we don't want to repeat that, but I want to recreate the heightened emotional state that the trauma produced. And it doesn't have to be negative, just powerful."

"That's what you want with the role play."

"Are you ok with that?"

Will considers Daniel's face, the compassion in his eyes quite clear as he waits for Will's answer. Will thinks he has shared more with Daniel than he ever intended already. He has allowed Daniel to know him and Daniel has accepted him as he is, as much as Will has allowed him to see.

Daniel has opened himself up to Will. Opened his home to Will. Made love to Will. Daniel's acceptance of all that Will is has caused Will to accept things about himself. He can feel what Will feels and despite that is willing to subject himself to the madness he must know lies deep inside, locked up in a subconscious fortress.

He’s not certain what Daniel has planned, but he is comfortable sharing whatever it is with him. Will is not so sure that Daniel will be nearly so comfortable with him afterward.

“I’m ok with it, but you might want to reconsider.”

“Nah, I had my chance to back off.” Daniel smiles at him and resumes his preparation.

“That’s a lot of food for two people.”

“Huh? Oh, I always make what the recipe says and Italian food always tastes better the next day. Allows the flavors to set in.”

“I’ll take your word for it.”

“So, who would you invite?”

“Invite?”

“We’ve got plenty here…who would you invite?”

“Oh, I don’t know…I don’t really know anybody. I suppose D’Angelo would be nice company.”

“The detective? Nice how?” Daniel says, not trusting himself to turn around.

“She’s smart, quite funny actually though I don’t think she intends to be…”

“And pretty.”

“There’s that. But aside from her current occupation, and my former one, we don’t have much in common.”

“Yeah, I can see where maybe dating her would be a conflict of interest.”

“A conflict of…what do you mean? Dating her?”

Daniel enjoys the shift in tone from Will. From conversational to annoyed in an instant. He would like to push a couple more buttons.

“Well, she’s law enforcement and you…operate outside the law. There’s the potential of putting her in a compromising situation. You have a tendency to do that, you know.”

“Do what?’

“Put people in compromising situations. You make people bend the rules for you.”

“I make…who are we talking about here. Her or you?”

“Doesn’t matter does it? I mean it’s not like you would ever ask her out.”

Will shrugs. Daniel is teasing him. He had no doubt felt the attraction to D’Angelo Will had felt that day at the fire scene, but it had been a very emotional day. People often made emotional attachments in times of stress.

“I could ask her out, though.” Daniel pipes up from the stove as he lights a cigarette over the open flame. “No conflict of interest there.”

“You? She doesn’t seem to like you.”

“That’s just strategy.”

“Strategy.” Will huffs, accepting the evil cigarette Daniel proffers.

“Sure. She cuddles up to you, pretends to not like me so she can ask you about me. She uses your apparent concern over why she doesn’t like your friend…”

“My apparent concern?”

“Well yeah, apparent because you like that she prefers you. But you defend me, so you don’t appear to be gloating. She begins to get friendlier with me, you feel better, then, when she shifts allegiance to me, you can’t say anything. It’s perfect. It’s a win win for her.”

Will draws on the cigarette, barely containing the chuckle that slips out with the smoke.

“That…is crazy. She just doesn’t like you.”

“It’s all academic isn’t it? You wouldn’t know what to do with her anyway, if she came to dinner.”

“You know Daniel, it’s too bad we didn’t invite her, just to see what would happen.” Will says more to see what Daniel will say than anything else.

“And if she did, by some miracle, accept an invitation, what do you think would happen? You think I would just leave my own house?”

Will is quiet. Daniel has a point. He sits thinking of possible solutions to their imaginary dilemma.

“I think I would send you out with the dogs. Take them for a walk.” Daniel says, grinning.

“Well, if that’s all the time you would need…hardly worth the effort is it?”

“You know that would not be the case.” Daniel kicks at Will’s feet tucked under his chair.

“Who says anybody has to leave?” Will says, puckering his lips to blow smoke across the table.

The doorbell chimes suddenly and Will jumps in his seat at the sound. He glances at Daniel who is unbelievably checking the wall clock. Will is momentarily paralyzed.

“No…” Will says, feeling color drain from his face.

Daniel walks to the fridge, pretends, actually pretends to be looking for something.

“She’s early. Why don’t you answer the door…Romeo.” He says from inside the fridge.

“Academic my ass…”

Will walks to the front door. The heavy entry door is already wide open and the storm door is all that separates Will from Detective D'Angelo as he approaches. She smiles and waves at him from the porch, holding a slim and wilted paper bag obviously bearing a gift of wine in her hand.

Will opens the door and smiles as best he can, unnerved and trying not to show it. She looks wonderful, very bright in her outfit, decidedly feminine, quite a change from the earth toned outfits of shirts and slacks she wears on duty. And still no makeup, Will notes. She is as fresh and natural as the daisies that spill from the stone pots on either side of Daniel's front porch.

"Let me guess." D'Angelo gushes, "He didn't tell you I was coming. I knew it!"

Will opens the door for her, smells her perfume as she steps inside, and shakes dark locks of scented shiny black hair that falls just to her shoulders. She wears a simple lavender skirt that clings pleasingly to hips and thighs. The thin cotton blouse is unbuttoned past her collarbone, unbuttoned enough to reveal the smooth olive brown skin beneath. Even her sandals are cute. They have little jewels sewn into the leather.

Will thinks a moment. "You have my number…could have warned me."

"And what…spoiled the surprise? Oh, the look on your face…"

"Come on this way, kitchen is back here. What did you bring?"

She catches his eyes and presents him with the wine, pressing the crumpled paper bag into his hands, her dark brown eyes alive, full of light and air and color. Will thinks she is stunning.

"House warming gift. You live here now, eh?"

She tosses her purse and keys on the couch and allows Will to guide her to the kitchen.

"Oh, that was…delizioso. And you serve it chilled, not bad for American boy."

D'Angelo sucks hard on her cigarette and tosses her head back to blow the smoke into the heavens. She has smoked all during the meal, one before dinner, one after the ravioli, another one after her salad, and this is the second one she's had in between nibbles of rum cookies. She had also kicked off her sandals after her second glass of wine. Daniel marvels at how she has made herself right at home.

Of course the look on Will's face as she had slipped the leather sandals off her feet and tossed them aside had been worth it. Will's gaze had trailed all the way up her legs, as had Daniel's. D'Angelo is a very sexy woman and she knows it.

"Thanks." Daniel shoves his plate away before he eats something else. It was delicious if he says so himself.

"And no meat, either. You guys vegetarian?"

"Will is."

Will throws him a look. Daniel has been setting him up like this all afternoon. In all fairness, Will is naturally more reserved than Daniel, but he has been holding his own. For Will, it's really more that

Daniel is enjoying the setting up far too much.

D'Angelo seems to be enjoying it, too. She has done her fair share of baiting one of other of them the entire meal. Will realizes he is pretty much just grousing. He is actually having a good time. D'Angelo is…refreshing. Refreshing enough to keep his thoughts from wandering and that is saying something.

"Really, you go vegetarian?"

"It was a lifestyle decision." Will says rolling his eyes at Daniel.

"They say it's more healthy, but I think humans are meant to eat meat. It is the nature of things. Humans have always been hunters."

"And gatherers. I'm taking a sabbatical from hunting." Will says, shoving his plate so it clinks against Daniel's. "Of course, I could always get an appetite for it again."

Daniel looks to his plate and back to Will. "My ravioli not tasty enough for you?"

D'Angelo ashes her cigarette and looks back and forth at the two of them. She knows coded conversation when she hears it. She uses it all the time. And, evidently so do Will and Daniel. They are unusually close for doctor and patient, and she thinks characterizing them as friends could be an understatement.

"It's not a matter of taste as much as discipline." Will says.

"Denial, perhaps?" Daniel says.

"You should hope so." Will smiles and leans back in his chair.

"Ok. I'm missing something here." D'Angelo says.

"No, you're not." Daniel says.

"Be grateful." Will says.

"You two spend way too much time together."

"You have no idea." Daniel says stretching his arms over his head.

"Can you imagine?" Will says, "Being in therapy twenty four seven?"

"All he does is complain." Daniel kicks at Will under the table.

"Maybe you should let him out more." D'Angelo suggests.

"He requires a lot of maintenance. And supervision."

"I'm still sitting here." Will says.

D'Angelo snickers and offers her best doe eyed apology. She holds out her glass. "Refill, please."

Daniel pours D'Angelo, Alia he reminds himself, another glass of the wine she brought. It's a little sweeter than he usually buys, but Italians like their sweet wine, too. He refills Will's glass despite the warning look he receives. He grins and sets the bottle back down without filling his own glass.

He needs to get ready to meet Doctor Dumont and Lydia. He had not wanted Will alone for so much time this weekend, and was grateful Alia could make it. He had not told her that Will needed a baby sitter or that he would be leaving early. As he watches the two of them together, he thinks that was a good move.

D'Angelo is enjoying herself. As she had driven out to Fiesole she had felt anxious about what to expect. She had wanted to see Will again, and under circumstances more pleasant than the last time. Daniel had called her at work, explained that the both of them wanted to thank her for her kindness and would she accept a lunch invitation.

It had seemed innocuous but D'Angelo senses there is more to it. What is making her anxious is that she wants there to be more to it. She sits next to Will and across from Daniel. Maintaining eye contact has been easy with Daniel, not so with Will. He seems distracted though when she directs her conversation to him, he responds with his full attention.

She imagines he can see every flush he causes along her throat and face. When he looks at her with those intense blue eyes she wants to grab his face and smother him with her mouth. And then his file intrudes into her consciousness. Her anxiety goes off the charts.

Although Daniel is a dream to look at he does not make her feel the way Will does. D'Angelo wonders why she is always attracted to the dangerous ones. She starts to take out another cigarette, but stops herself. She is drinking and smoking way too much. She should slow down, keep her wits and make the afternoon last.

"The view from up here is fantastic." D'Angelo says. "I would eat out here every day."

"We often do." Will says turning his head toward Florence and the Duomo gleaming in the sun.

Daniel glances at the sun and sits up straight in his chair. He still hasn't found his watch. The pool doesn't have it and he has torn his house apart looking for it. He can't believe someone stole it. It wasn't anything expensive or fancy. Not to him, anyway.

"Hey, do either of you know what time it is?"

Will isn't wearing his, so Alia glances at her watch, "About three thirty."

"I have to get going."

Will raises his brows but says nothing. Daniel figures he's probably afraid to ask, worried what might come out of his mouth in front of Alia.

"Where do you have to go on a Saturday afternoon? We are having such a good time." Alia pouts.

Alia looks disappointed but Daniel feels both anticipation and anxiety creep along his neck. She does like him, but she clearly likes Will a lot more. Daniel has felt her emotions all afternoon. As a detective, she is practiced at hiding her thoughts and feelings, and she has done an admirable job of maintaining a façade of aloofness here. But Daniel has felt a nervous energy from her and it is all directed at Will.

Daniel is not sure what to make of Will's expression but he feels anxiety from him, too. He sees the daggers in his eyes, but he figures that is just for show. Will will thank him later.

"Work, actually. I have to see a patient, one valley over."

"I didn't know you made house calls." Will says, finally speaking up after thinking about how many different bones there are in the human body and how many of Daniel's he should break.

"Yes, well, not all my patients receive in house therapy, Will." Daniel says standing up.

Will's fingers find his lips as he watches Daniel brush off crumbs from the shorts and shirt he had quickly changed into shortly after Alia had arrived leaving Will and Alia to set the table. He had quite effectively guided the conversation most of her visit. And now, he was going to disappear, leaving Will on his own.

Will is not concerned about being alone with Alia. He is concerned what her expectations are. He hasn't had a chance to ask Daniel what he said to her, by design he thinks, shaking his head.

"What kind of therapy do you do at someone's house that they can't make an appointment?'

"Yeah, Daniel, why can't this patient see you at your office?" Will says.

"Because this patient is receiving canine therapy. I have to pick up the dogs at the kennel, too, before I drive over to the estate."

"Which estate?" Alia asks.

"Oh, uh…shit, I shouldn't have said anything. Well, it's the Fiore Estate, you know it?"

"Villa Fiore, the winery?"

"Yeah… The patient is a referral, of sorts, anyway… I don't do the dog thing at the office. The request to come to the estate was by the patient. I don't usually take the dogs to patients' houses. Too many things can go wrong."

"Why go, then?' Will asks, scrunching his mouth at the sweet wine.

Daniel grins. Will doesn't like the wine, either.

"I mean if being sued for malpractice is a concern…" Will says, eyes flashing with the pointed jibe.

Before he can answer, Alia does it for him.

"Fiore money. That's why. It's the daughter, isn't it?"

Daniel looks at Alia like she has two heads. She could certainly use another one if she isn't going to use the one she has.

"You know I can't talk about my patients…"

"Oh lighten up. We've been talking about Will all day…"

Will rubs his face and Daniel feels like doing the same. "Alia! I can't…"

“She’s right, Daniel.” Will says, “You already said too much, so what’s the harm in filling in a couple blanks.”

“You are always getting people to break the rules, Will.” Daniel says.

“I can fill in the blanks. It has to be her. Only daughter, spoiled, troubled, in and out of rehab.”

“She’s got a rap sheet?” Will asks.

Daniel sighs and throws his hands up. “Avere i coglioni pieni!”

Alia blinks at Daniel’s outburst and busts out laughing. Will’s brow furrows as he tries to translate and can’t. He’s sure Daniel just cursed.

“Fine! She’s recovering from a suicide attempt and yes, she has some substance abuse issues. Christ!” Daniel says.

“Feel better?” Will asks mildly.

“Much. I’m going to get ready now.” Daniel takes a long breath and shakes his finger at both of them. “You two are awful. You know that, right?”

Daniel had left wearing not a suit, but more dog appropriate attire. Will had thought he had pulled off a casual professional look quite well. He had noticed D’Angelo’s admiring glances as Daniel had walked down the drive to his garage.

Will and D’Angelo had offered to clean up so Daniel would not be late to his appointment. After doing that they had walked the dogs and had returned to sit on the couch inside having had quite enough sun for the day. Will had suddenly found he had run out of things to talk about with D’Angelo, or Alia as she had insisted more than once.

He sits beside her on the couch, comfortable with the quiet interlude and confident that she will come up with something to talk about very soon. She has been unfailingly adept at doing so thus far.

“What did you say to the Paolini twins? They like dropped off the earth. I’m not complaining especially since I don’t need them as an excuse to call you.”

“They were an excuse? I thought your boss…”

“I uh…exaggerated, a little.”

Alia holds up her thumb and forefinger about an inch apart. Will copies her, but his finger and thumb are much farther apart. She laughs.

“You know I like being with you, like this.” Alia says, smiling and hoping for one from Will.

Will smiles back. He’s not sure how friendly he should be at the moment. “By this, you mean alone?”

"Yeah… I enjoyed lunch, don't get me wrong, but I'm glad Daniel had an appointment. So we can talk."

"You do understand he knew he had an appointment when he invited you. What did he say anyway?"

"That you, and him…he, ugh! Both of you wanted to thank me for my help. So, here I am. You can thank me now."

Alia brazenly touches his knee and looks up at Will, all smiles. Will thinks she has not stopped smiling since Daniel left.

"You were very helpful that day. About the fire…" Will ignores the finger tips circling his knee. "I got the list from Rossi's insurance company you sent. I guess it wasn't enough to concern the fire marshal."

"No."

"Did you ever find the cat?"

"The cat?"

Alia's hand falls away and she sits up straight.

"Rossi's cat. There was no evidence of the cat."

"Will, her apartment was torched up. You saw it. It is possible the cat was, uh…extinguished."

"Bones don't burn. The cat got out. Either through the front door because she let it out, or it got out by accident. If it got out through a window that would be odd because the a/c was on…"

"You really don't let anything go, do you?"

Will sighs and looks aside, pressing his lips together. She's right. He obsesses on details.

Alia considers Will's question. The fire marshal had declared it accidental, faulty wiring and so on, but the list of appliances in Rossi's insurance policy had been few. Unless she had plugged everything she owned into that one outlet, it seems a bit of a stretch that the circuit had overloaded. There had been a lot of unidentified material at the point of origin. And a large fan. That was an odd thing to plug in when the a/c was running.

"You know, I will look into the cat. What did it look like? I can check local shelters for it. It might still be there."

"Orange tabby, male. Sort of answered to the name of Hercules. I think he had a charm on his collar, might have had his name on it." Will grins, "Thanks for humoring me."

"No problem. You like it here, huh? Not looking for your own place?"

"No…this is working out well, with my therapy and all."

Alia glances around the room, attention drawn to the piano and violin that sets atop the piano, forgotten in the rush to take a run and prepare food.

“You play?”

“He plays both, I just play piano.”

“Oh…a musician. You are full of surprises.”

If you only knew… “We all have our little hidden talents I suppose.”

Alia shifts on the couch, edges closer to Will. She feels pleasantly inebriated. She would tell anyone in her condition not to drive. She wants to get physical with Will, be intimate. She knows her feelings are due in part to the alcohol, but the attraction is there. She feels it and she feels it from him.

She considers he is a little shy and perhaps out of practice. Everything she has learned about him indicates he has been to hell and back. He is in therapy for it. He is not the most sociable of people and from what Daniel told her, there is a very good reason for that.

If he can read people so well, he should already know how she feels about him. Alia knows she cannot begin to fathom how Will’s gift works, but she has seen him in action. She knows he has stolen glances at her all afternoon and has likely created an image of her in his mind like he does with the killers he hunts. That he remains on the couch with her suggests to Alia that Will wants her to be on the couch with him.

Will seems to her either a walking contradiction or a scapegoat for the FBI. He presents as nothing like what she has read about him. She decides his therapy must be going well.

“You uh, don’t see any conflict living with your psychiatrist?”

Will shifts in the cushions, not away from Alia, but because he feels himself becoming coiled up inside with the question. He can’t blame her for being curious, but his relationship with Daniel needs to be discreet for lots of reasons, not the least of which is Daniel’s reputation. Then again, it was Daniel’s idea to invite her over here. He must trust her, or trust Will to handle it.

“Well, I’m not officially his patient anymore. So, that conflict doesn’t exist.”

“But, you’re still in therapy.”

“Unofficially, yes.”

Alia brings her knees up to fold under her body and leans into Will. She lifts a finger to his face and traces the tips along the whiskers. She smiles as he turns his head toward her, eyes down and lips parted to speak. She touches her fingers to his lips, feels the breath warm upon them. She feels warm all over.

“Kiss me.” Alia says simply after editing away everything else she imagined saying to him.

Will lets her fingers caress his lips for a moment, the sensation sending heat up and down his spine. He bends his head down to press his lips against hers, his fingers caress the smooth skin of her cheeks and trail through the silky locks of hair. He feels her breasts skim across his shirt and desire stirs below. He aches to touch the supple sun kissed skin beneath her blouse, to feel her body yield beneath his.

Before he succumbs to the promise of those lips, Will pulls back and looks into her surprised face. He can't do this with her. This…is too much reality for him. She will form attachments. He doesn't need another person trying to save him and he knows Alia would try. She is a good person and Will knows what happens to good people when he becomes involved with them. He already has Daniel to deal with.

"Alia, I can't." Will's voice cracks as he speaks. He feels terrible.

"Why not? The attraction is there…I feel it. So do you."

"I do, but that's not enough."

"Why? What does enough look like?"

"Alia…"

"You mean your therapy isn't working? You aren't…getting better?"

"I'm trying. Daniel is…an excellent psychiatrist. I'm saying I can't…offer you what you want."

"You don't know what I want. We have a lot in common to start. You are looking for a bad guy. I catch bad guys, too."

"Alia," Will says, his hands bracing her shoulders, "I'm in therapy because I am one of the bad guys."

Alia sits still, her brown eyes searching his and Will sees the stubbornness there, the hurt. He recognizes she took a risk, made the first move, but she is also tipsy. They both are. And as much as Will would like to make love to her, he knows he shouldn't.

"I guess I'm attracted to the bad guys." She lifts her chin and presses her lips close to his mouth, again.

"I wouldn't be good for you. Trust me."

Will is acutely aware of the effect his words will have on Alia but the words are truth. They are bitter medicine that she is going to have to swallow. He has watched the flush of alcohol color her cheeks as they have talked. They blush now with indignation. Will has wounded her pride. It won't occur to her until tomorrow that she opened the wound herself.

"Ok." She says suddenly, swinging her legs out from beneath her. She throws her hands up and shrugs towards the front door. "I'm going to use the bathroom and then I am going to leave."

"Alia, don't be like that…" Will starts to rise from the couch but Alia is already stomping up the stairs. He hears the door to the bathroom slam shut.

Will doesn't go after her. He rubs at his face and sinks back into the couch. He groans at the thought that she had used the downstairs bathroom before. She is a cop and she will snoop. It is her nature. Even though the doors are closed upstairs, she will be unable to resist opening one or all of them.

He can't let her drive, not yet anyway. He doubts she will let him call her a cab and even if he did; she would refuse to get in it. He gets up and walks over to Daniel's sound system and hits play. He doesn't care what's already loaded. He needs something to listen to as he waits for Alia to come back downstairs. He will have to fix this, one way or another.

Will sighs. This used to be so much easier. The afternoon had started out so well…

Du Maurier parks her white Mercedes E350 in front of the guest house. She climbs out and waits for Clayton to pull up beside her in the transport van from the kennel. The dogs bark wildly until Clayton climbs out of the front seat and walks around back to slip each of them a treat and coo them down. She watches them circle and finally settle down in their crates.

She is pleased with this afternoon's session. Clayton handled everything perfectly. Including Lydia's father, Signor Fiore. No easy task. She finds Signor Fiore tiresome and traditional. Clayton had wisely appealed to his machismo and had the Signor eating out of his hand with regard to Lydia and her continued canine therapy. Du Maurier had been impressed and perplexed with the ease Clayton had seemed to manipulate the older man into doing exactly what he wanted, for his patient.

Du Maurier reminds herself that Clayton had put Lydia's interests above all else, except for the dogs he had brought. Du Maurier thinks that were there a contest between rescuing Lydia or the dogs, Clayton would choose the dogs. She can't fault him for that; she might be tempted to do the same.

She had found convincing Clayton to join her at the guest house much easier than convincing him to have a drink with her at the pool. She had reconsidered her approach to the intriguing Clayton, inferring from their last meeting that he did not respond favorably to ego stroking and was keenly aware of the behaviors of people he interacted with. Intuitively so, he didn't even seem to think about it.

He did respond to distress. He also responded to perceived honesty. Honesty is such a nebulous concept; accepted by most as an absolute pure thing, as though one can easily recognize it. It is actually one of the most malleable of concepts, a sister to truth and defined entirely by the beholder.

Clayton appears to have some sort of honesty meter residing in his head and Du Maurier is confident that she has determined its standard of measurement. The fact that Clayton is here, prepared to drink and relax with her is proof enough of Du Maurier's grasp of Clayton's mind.

She fully intends to grasp some other things about him before he leaves this evening. First, she would like to learn about Graham if she can persuade him to discuss his precious patient. Du Maurier finds it vaguely irritating that so many people fall over themselves trying to protect Graham when it is perfectly obvious it is they who need the protecting.

Clayton has no idea what his association with Graham is going to cost him.

Daniel walks around the van to greet Du Maurier. He is mentally exhausted from the constant barrage of emotion he has felt all afternoon from not only his patient, but her father, and her mother. The entire family belongs in therapy, or on tv. Lydia is in clinical terms…a complete mess and she has her parents to thank for it.

Clayton accepted Du Maurier's invitation to unwind before taking the dogs back partly because he needs to talk to someone. If he doesn't vent a little before driving back home, he will not be able to contend with Will, or Alia if she is still there. He wonders how Will's afternoon went after he left.

He rubs his hands the entire length of his face as he walks up to Du Maurier. He rolls his eyes at her droll expression.

"That was…insane." Daniel says, "How can you stand it, day in and day out?"

"I am glad you saw it with your own eyes. That little display this afternoon is but a taste of what I live with when I am here."

"I take it you are paid outrageously for that."

"Quite. Otherwise…" Du Maurier lets her sentence finish itself.

"Ordinarily, I'm not such a mercenary but, Christ, what is it with rich people? Ugh…" Daniel pauses, takes a moment to just breathe, "I feel…drained."

"Well, come on inside. I think I have something that will help soothe your nerves. We are at a winery, non siamo noi?"

"Quindi siamo. Let's drink."

Hannibal watches Clayton follow Du Maurier inside the guest house from his secluded vantage point in the trees that line the perimeter of the yard. Figuring out which of the guest houses sprinkled along this graveled drive was as easy as gaining access to the winery itself.

Tours of the wineries are inexpensive if not free. Tourists are expected to make a purchase before they leave if the tour is free, but taking a tour, even by oneself is almost never denied. The challenge is finding the winery.

The older more established wineries do not advertise and they sit off the beaten path, usually at the end of a long winding gravel filled road with not so much as a sign posted. Hannibal had passed the entrance to this one twice despite his GPS. He suspects he may not be using it properly. He may have to talk to Tatiana about that.

Once he had completed the tour up to the point where he discovered the location of the guest houses, Hannibal had quietly wandered off as the guests were encouraged to do. Villa Fiore is one of the oldest wineries in Tuscany and it had been a time honored tradition to allow guests to roam freely around the estate provided an adequate supply from its cellars was purchased. Hannibal had ordered enough to ensure he could traverse the estate in its entirety uninterrupted.

There are many guest houses along this back road, but Hannibal had surmised Du Maurier would not walk to the main house for the canine therapy. He knows her car and it was a simple process of elimination to scout the guest house without a white Mercedes but equipped with a hot tub. Du Maurier seems to have caught her fish this evening, but Hannibal has yet to see if she can pry him off the hook.

The guest house is quaint and rustic, equipped with modern amenities like electricity and the requisite hot tub Hannibal can see sunken into the deck of the back porch. Hannibal is most curious to see if she can persuade Clayton to get into it. He is not easily manipulated. If Hannibal has deduced anything about the young doctor it is that he does not do anything he does not want to do. He is tactful and friendly, disarmingly so, and Hannibal had found it a welcome challenge to manipulate him into talking about himself.

Du Maurier desires to manipulate him into doing much more than talking.

The lovely little house has plenty of windows providing an adequate showcase for a study of the human condition, an irresistible opportunity for inquiring minds such as Hannibal's. The secreted spot among the trees is far too removed from the subjects of his study Hannibal decides. He walks head up in the late afternoon sun as though strolling about the vineyard, as though he should be exactly where he is.

Alia stands in front of the mirror in the claustrophobic bathroom staring at herself with a critical eye. As she applies a dampened tissue beneath her eyes she thinks she is quite drunk. She behaved unforgivably downstairs. She was, as her mama would say, raised better than that.

But she wants Will so badly she can taste it. She wants him in ways she can't believe. The wine seems to have set her body on fire. She has always liked wine. Too much. She has always liked the bad boys, too. She has always liked…boys. Will is no boy, but he looks like one. As for being bad, he probably has done some bad things trying to catch all those killers for the FBI. She has broken a few rules herself, done things on the job she is not particularly proud of, but she tries to do the right thing. Clearly, Will does too, or he wouldn't be in therapy.

He can think like killers, like this Ripper he chases and he sees Daniel to help him get them out of his head. Alia wants to smack herself but she slaps the mirror instead. She should be more understanding. He was trying to be a gentleman downstairs and she was very pushy. Mama says she is always too pushy.

Alia takes a deep breath and opens the door to return downstairs and apologize when she notices the doors are all closed. She can hear music downstairs. Will is still waiting for her. He put on music to wait. She thinks that must be a good thing. She hesitates at the bathroom then decides to check out the bedrooms.

She opens the door on her left and finds a stairway. She remembers Daniel's house has a third floor. She closes that door and moves on to the next, quietly opening it. Nothing remarkable in here, she thinks. The bed is made up with a quilt thrown over it. There is a dresser which she opens to find socks and underclothes neatly folded. The other drawers contain a few shirts and shorts. She realizes these must be Will's. The closet is empty.

She closes the door and crosses the hallway and opens the door to what must be Daniel's bedroom. She blinks her eyes as she catalogs what she sees. When she has seen enough, she backs out the door and shuts it. She collects her thoughts before walking back downstairs, to Will.

Will paces in front of the living room windows. He rubs at the back of his neck, feeling the tension that always precipitates a headache. His head is throbbing a little from the wine, but mostly it's throbbing because of Alia. He hears her footsteps on the hardwood and turns around to greet her. His headache kicks into full gear as soon as he sees her face. He lifts his head and waits.

"You're sleeping with him. You're sleeping with your psychiatrist." Her words fall flat, monotone. Matter of fact words, like a cop would say them.

Alia stares him down. She stands at the bottom of the steps unable or unwilling to take a step further. Will looks to the floor, his thoughts in a jumble.

He can't tell her why he sleeps with Daniel. He can't tell her that his nightmares are so visceral that he wakes up terrified and sweating. That his psychiatrist is so empathic that he can lie next to Will and take up some of the emotional slack so Will can manage a few hours of actual sleep. That sex with him allows Will to fall asleep in the first place because the sex reminds him of the sex he had with the psychopath he is trying to catch. That the intimacy they share is unique. That Will has feelings for him…

She will think him insane. And he is.

Will cannot tell her any of those things. He can only acknowledge that yes, he does sleep with his psychiatrist, only he doesn't pay him for it anymore. Will wishes the floor would just swallow him up, but he manages to lift his head and meet Alia's eyes.

"Is that the reason you aren't good for me?" She asks quietly.

"No."

"You don't like me that way?'

"I like you just fine. Alia, I'm not…" Will searches for the right word, a word other than stable, or sane. "I'm not emotionally available."

"And physically? What if I don't care about that." She nods her head toward the top of the stairs. "It doesn't have to mean anything, Will. We could just…"

"It always means something. At least…it should." Will sighs and holds out his hands, feeling defeated, like he just got the wind knocked out of him. "I meant it when I said I wouldn't be good for you. It…this wouldn't be fair, to you."

"Maybe you should let me decide what is fair or good for me, eh?"

Alia grabs her keys and purse from the table stalks out the door, slams it shut behind her. She slows her pace as she approaches her car. She takes deep breaths as she holds her keys in her hands.

Will considers going after her, but doesn't want to make a scene out front, more of a scene than Alia just provided. He figures that she has driven her car many times under the influence. Most cops work hard and play hard. He tells himself she will be fine. He sinks again into the cushions and glances around for Cara and Bella. They are in the kitchen, ears up and obviously alert and edgy. Not surprising with all the shouting and the testiness in the air.

The front door bursts open and Alia slams the storm door and then the heavy wood door behind her. She throws her keys and purse to the rug and walks purposely over to Will, unbuttoning her blouse as she walks.

"Alia…" Will begins but she places her finger across his lips.

"Maybe, maybe I'll be good for you. Did you ever think about that?"

Will doesn't answer, not with words. He wraps his hands around her waist and pulls her on top of him and crushes his mouth against hers as she wriggles out of her blouse, then bra…

Chapter 49

Will and Alia enjoy the rest of their afternoon while Daniel is treated to Du Maurier's brand of hospitality. And Hannibal? Hannibal is Hannibal.

Daniel stands on the back deck of Dumont's guest house looking out over the expanse of Villa Fiore that stretches to the horizon along rolling hills that dip and roll like an ocean of vine and bramble. He thinks not even this view can compensate for the Fiore brand of crazy that awaits Dumont every day while she remains on the estate. After spending the afternoon with the family, Daniel can understand why he is such a welcome diversion for Dumont. He wouldn't want his existence confined to these people either.

Rich people are often the worst patients because in addition to their psychological disorders, they are afflicted with money.

He takes a sip from the large glass of Fiore's finest white, a Sauvignon variety grown around the olive groves and hazelnut trees that grace the valley.

Of course Dumont claims to taste the subtle notes of olive and hazelnut, but Daniel's palate is much less refined and to him it is pleasantly crisp and most importantly, supremely chilled. She has placed a tray of snacks on the thick cut glass table to nosh on.

He munches on the focaccia crisps, laden with sea salt and a hint of lemon. There is dip and a large plate of antipasto. Daniel notes with mild amusement that there are neither onions nor garlic in evidence. And one cannot miss the large and noisy in-ground hot tub looming from the other end of the deck.

“I haven’t seen you at the gym in a while.” Dumont calls from the kitchen.

“Yeah, my work schedule has been disrupted recently. I’ll get back into it.”

Daniel has no idea when that will be. Will won’t go to the gym and Daniel could go alone like he always has, but he likes running with Will. He hasn’t wanted to work out at the gym when he has weights and Will at his house.

“What kind of disruption?”

Du Maurier walks up to the table with a basket of crusty sliced bread she sets down next to the antipasto. She uses a slice to scoop up some of the antipasto onto a plate. She is certain Clayton will deflect. He has no reason to tell another psychiatrist that he is treating a patient while sleeping with him.

“Some changes around my house and my practice. Nothing major…just time consuming.”

“I look forward to seeing you there again. Obviously, I need to go, for my own good.”

“After today, I guess I’d be in there all the time, too.”

Daniel had accepted her invitation to unwind with a glass of wine before returning the dogs to the kennel because he needs to unwind. But, standing here on the deck with her, the emotional fall out this afternoon is compounded by the tension he feels in the air and throughout his being. The anticipation gnaws at him, teeth scraping along naked bones.

He feels it every time their eyes meet. Their eyes had conferred a lot today, communicating about their patient in silent signals to each other as Daniel had observed Lydia’s behavior. Daniel had sensed the restlessness in Dumont. But, he had also witnessed her devotion to her patient despite the overbearing personality of Signor Fiore. Fiore is very traditional particularly in his attitudes about women. Daniel can imagine how frustrating it is for Dumont, an obviously educated and modern woman to navigate through the old world chauvinism in order to treat the daughter.

It is no wonder he feels frustration from her, and no surprise that she seeks solace or distraction in him. As soon as they had reached the deck, Dumont had left him there and wasted no time opening a bottle of wine in the kitchen. Daniel had felt her entire being relax as she had thrown her head back and taken a long drink from the wide mouthed glass. He wishes it were that easy for him.

He knows the source of her anticipation sits twelve feet away, surrounded by potted flowers with a few deep pink rose petals bubbling in the swirling jets of water. And, excitement is not the only emotion he feels from Dumont.

The animal magnetism she wears like cologne around him seeps into Daniel’s awareness, the essence of her unfolding into something palpable upon his tongue. He is emotionally exhausted from the therapy and though Dumont’s primary emotion is singularly focused on him, Daniel welcomes the simplicity of it. He can handle sexual desire from her.

He thinks about the sexual tension that had sizzled between Will and Alia when had left them standing in the doorway like a couple of teenagers. Allowing them some time alone is also part of his reason for accepting Dumont’s invitation. The charge of nervous energy between them had been spontaneous and sweet; quite unlike this dance with Dumont. The thought of Will and the pretty little detective screwing on his sofa sends a smile to his face.

Will's feelings have a tendency to cling to him, like a sprinkling of dust he cannot brush away. Not all of Will's feelings send him smiling.

Daniel is aware that he seems to become more attuned to Will all the time, even when they are apart and the thought is both comforting and troubling. His own brand of empathy has been instrumental in helping Will, but the effects of his constant and intimate contact with Will continue to accumulate. He is less and less able to separate his own feelings from Will's. His shield doesn't seem to protect him from the swell of emotions around him like it used to.

He's not sure if the desire to slam Dumont against the stone and cement wall and fuck her silly is his own, Will's, or hers.

He decides he thinks about his feelings too much. Daniel thinks he should be thinking about the very hot and bothered psychiatrist circling him like a lioness stalking her prey upon the Serengeti. Daniel scoops up some of the antipasto onto a seasoned crispy flatbread and munches, considering how he should handle Dumont.

"Well, so much for pro bono. Guess you have to put up with being paid." She says softly, touching his arm as she meanders around the table.

Du Maurier smiles as she slips some more antipasto onto her plate. She eats with her fingers, delicately sucking on her fingertips after every mouthful. Clayton's eyes follow her every move. Though his attentions are encouraging, she thinks it would be more encouraging if he would drink his wine more quickly.

Daniel grins, "I feel like I'm taking their money. And it's a lot of money. I'm…I would never have asked for that…"

"I know how Fiore is. He loves his daughter. Lydia likes you. She likes the dogs. Fiore will buy her whatever she wants."

Daniel falls silent, considering again what he has agreed to. Signor Fiore had quoted Daniel a figure to continue consulting that had left him open mouthed and looking to Du Maurier who had shrugged and looked aside, a knowing smile on her pretty face. Daniel had been offended by the blatant bribery. His compassion for the troubled daughter had tipped the scales for him.

"It's more than double what I would normally charge." Daniel scratches at whiskers that prickle under his chin. Dumont is making him prickle everywhere.

"Don't worry, you'll earn it. You may not see the results you'd like with your patient, but you will earn every penny." She pauses, "We'll be working together for a little while. How do you feel about that?"

She shakes her hair so it falls around her bare shoulders. She wears a flowing sleeveless dress that buttons down the front and falls almost to her knees. Daniel watches her slip her leather sandals over glossy manicured toenails and toss them aside. She stands between the railing and the table, radiating sex like a neon sign. She has already finished off her glass of wine.

Du Maurier picks up her abandoned glass from the table and pours herself another. Clayton's glass is nearly full. He is being especially obdurate, almost as if he knows what she wants and is defying her, stubbornly refusing to play even though he accepted the invitation. She gestures towards Clayton's nearly full glass sitting on the table.

“How do you feel about it?” Daniel says, ignoring his wine for the moment.

Du Maurier blinks as Clayton joins her at the railing. He stands in front of her feet apart and pins her against it, the wood pressing uncomfortably into her back. He grinds his hips against her and places his tanned and muscular arms on either side of her. She looks up into his face and sees Graham in the twist of his smile. Sees his unpredictable nature rearing itself in Clayton. She reminds herself this is not Graham. He is a means to finishing Graham once and for all.

This evening is a complete indulgence for Du Maurier. She will bend and break Clayton to later use him to incite Graham to take his vengeance on Hannibal. Doctor Clayton will be eating out her hand after this evening, in a manner of speaking.

The cocktail Clayton should be imbibing right now has been carefully calibrated; one of Du Maurier’s specially crafted creations for the occasion and Clayton should remain lucid and highly suggestible before eventually capitulating to the sedative completely. Clayton should also provide Du Maurier with information about Graham’s mental state and perhaps what Graham has shared with him about Hannibal.

If all goes well Du Maurier will have access to Clayton’s body and mind. Graham will have to do without his company this evening.

Du Maurier had opted for the liquid GHB rather than the Rohypnol deciding that the Rohypnol would last too long and she prefers Clayton remain unaware he was slipped anything. The assortment of snacks he has tasted should confuse his palate enough so the drug remains undetected in the delicious wine. The evidence in his urine will have been flushed down the toilet by this time tomorrow, and Clayton will be none the wiser.

He is a psychiatrist himself and even though he likely has not taken any of the drugs Du Maurier is introducing, he is not unfamiliar with the effects and might recognize overt symptoms in himself. He might, at the very least, question the effects anyway. Once the cocktail has reached its peak efficacy, he will not remember anything other than what Du Maurier wants him to remember, but she must ensure he suspects nothing until then.

Even without the drugs kicking in, Clayton’s behavior is already promising. Du Maurier can appreciate his libido unharnessed as it is now, but she prefers to enjoy him in a more submissive mode.

“Why don’t you join me in the hot tub and I’ll show you.” Du Maurier purrs, holding wine glass aloft in one hand while starting at the buttons on Clayton’s shirt with the other. “But first, drink your wine before it spoils. No glass around the tub.”

Daniel has every intension of scratching Dumont’s sizable itch. Daniel thinks she could use a little therapy. He longs to bury that smug little face of hers between his legs, give her something else to suck on besides the fingers she keeps dipping into the antipasto.

Lydia was not the only person Daniel observed today. Dumont has plenty of issues of her own. The need to control is foremost among them extending even to this simple encounter on the deck. Daniel feels the cool calculation couched in every gesture, feels the design lurking beneath her words. There is artifice where there should be spontaneity.

Daniel thinks he will introduce a little spontaneity right now. Her smooth naked shoulders brush against his arms and he wants to take his shirt off so he can feel her skin next to his. His skin chaffs inside his cotton shirt, and his boxers cleave to skin that tingles and bristles at the constraint.

Daniel reaches around to retrieve his wine. He quaffs down the entire glass and slams it on the table. He had only intended to drink one glass with her anyway. That was a huge glass by any standard.

“Better?” he says, “You’ve been dick teasing all day. Why don’t you ask me how I feel about that?”

Du Maurier’s eyes widen. Her thoughts whirl as she is pulled, fairly dragged away from the railing to be pressed up against cement and stone, her feet almost suspended off the boards of the deck. The textured wall cuts cold and hard into her back. She is thrilled at this side of the polite and reserved Doctor Clayton.

His skin is warm and soft as her leg brushes his bare calf. He glances down at her feet and his eyes take their time finding their way back up to her face. She smiles again at him as thoughts of his mouth between her legs cause her to tighten her thighs and grind against him.

She tries to wriggle from his grasp but the hands pinning her wrists to the wall are sure and strong. He was not supposed to drink the wine in one gulp like that. She can only guess that the effects should hit Clayton sooner rather than later.

“I’d rather ask you in the hot tub…”

“Yes, I know. But we aren’t getting in the hot tub.”

“And why is that?”

Her sultry pouting lips tease at Daniel’s mouth. He pulls away.

“Because you want me to.”

She feels Clayton’s hands about her waist, then the curve of her ass as the fabric shimmies up, hands separating cheeks, kneading the flesh. He leans into her mouth, stops just short of actually pressing his lips to hers.

“I just wanted some conversation and some wine. What do you want…Francesca, is it? ” Daniel says trailing a finger beneath her chin and along her throat.

“Cesca.” Du Maurier says, emphasizing the ‘ch’. “I want…this.”

She pulls him to her, sinks her hands into his hair, grabbing thick curls. The touch of whiskers at her chin sends her grinding against him. His kisses are languid, stretching her mouth wide as his hands move to the front. He hikes the dress up and reaches a hand between her legs.

“Cesca…”

He gasps softly as his fingers caress the flesh there causing her to shiver at the touch. He shivers too. His cock twitches. Dumont is completely smooth. He smiles into her throat, feels the throb in his cock.

“Fuck. You waxed…everything? Oh god…” Daniel breathes into her neck.

He nuzzles and bites at her throat, as his fingers explore from tailbone to pelvis. His fingers open moist flesh like dewy flower petals. Daniel thinks he has got to get her horizontal and quickly. The feel of hairless skin beneath his fingers cinches it. Dumont has sent him over the edge with that.

Du Maurier feels his cock stiffen against her thighs. His fingers can't get enough of her. He is all hers. Clayton appears to have a fetish for shaved fish judging by the tightness of fabric gathering at his crotch. She wonders if that kink works both ways.

She lets him guide her inside, to the living room. The tub can wait. He couldn't do this to her underwater anyway.

Daniel's neck radiates with heat that flushes upward clear to the hairs on his head. He thinks it must be the wine causing his face to feel so hot. The flush feels different than sunburn; though he is sure he received plenty of exposure to the sun this afternoon. The need to get out of his clothes is maddening.

Du Maurier reclines on the couch watching Clayton undress on top of her. His fingers pluck at her buttons impatiently as he bends to kiss her. She helps him unbutton and peel off his shirt, as he tugs at twill shorts that fit too snugly to come off as quickly as he wants. The tanned muscles ripple in the late afternoon light as he finally wrests the troublesome shorts and boxers from his feet and crouches over her. Clayton is as amply endowed as she had hoped he would be.

His cock juts out from his thatch of black hair, reminding her of her fantasy with Graham not so long ago. Clayton has no scar to mar his perfect physique. But, she notices the golden skin beneath her fingertips is not entirely unblemished. He flinches as she touches the bruise along his collarbone. She runs her hands over his body, pectorals firm, nipples erect and abdomen tight against her hands. She traces her fingers along the line of downy hair to stroke him and his face crumbles in pleasure.

She notes the bruises at his hips and between his legs.

She considers this. Hannibal is demanding in the bedroom and prone to similar displays of… affection. He is not easily or quickly satisfied. Graham apparently satisfied him. It would appear that Clayton satisfies Graham. And Graham satisfies him.

She grinds her thumbs into the twin bruises on his hips, and watches him wince then smile. Her thumbs are too small to cover the bruises but the imprint matches perfectly. Du Maurier flushes with excitement and hooks her arms around Clayton's neck and shoulders to pull him close. She will leave her own mark on him.

As she turns her head to draw Clayton's flesh between her teeth, she sees the long dark shadows from the trees outside shift in the room and she almost starts from the couch. There is a shadow in the far corner that has no business being there.

Hannibal.

Of course he was unable to stay away. Already possessive. Du Maurier hopes he eats his own heart out by the time she is finished with Clayton this evening. Hannibal will imagine it is Graham with her; he will not be able to help himself. At last, Du Maurier can tread on the memory; can taint the pure images of him Hannibal keeps in his memory palace and renders compulsively in his sketch book.

Intellectually, Hannibal will separate Clayton from Graham, but emotionally…he will be compromised. The thoughts tumble. Clayton fumbles on top of her, steadies himself between the cushions.

Du Maurier observes the ruddy flush bloom all over Clayton's skin. She knows he must be feeling very warm by now. As he stares into her face she sees the dilated pupils, the green almost edged out by black, restraint all but gone. He breathes through his mouth, softs gasps between the kisses he delivers along her throat and collarbone.

"Here…"

She breathes into his ear as she pushes his face into her breasts. He is already lost in the sensation of her skin against his as he laps at the beads of perspiration between Dumont's breasts. His tongue licks at her nipples and the nip of his teeth sends pleasure rippling the length of her body as she twists beneath him.

He kneels over her, body bent in half as he works his way lower, tongue trailing along her stomach, lower still and Du Maurier moans with pleasure at the touch of his wet tongue on the smooth exposed skin.

She shudders in anticipation clear down to her toes, toes that curl as the cool air touches hairless skin that prickles with every pass of Clayton's tongue. His mouth upon her clit is utterly delightful. Du Maurier closes her eyes as she contracts and releases muscles causing a pleasant pulse against that wonderful mouth.

Daniel cannot think, his head is thick like cement. He feels the wet and silky flesh slide against his tongue, feels Dumont quiver in satisfaction as his lips open her wide, teasing the clit with gentle stabs that send her off the couch. He lifts his head and licks his fingers, takes his cock in his hands. He feels dizzy with the thought of coming inside her.

Du Maurier pushes his head back down. He resists, head stubbornly poised above her pelvis. She knows he wants to slip his cock inside, wants it more than anything. Knowing he squirms uncomfortable and unsated while he pleases her is part of the experience.

"Not yet." she murmurs into soft curls as she guides him back down.

Daniel is twisting from the inside out. He feels her pleasure as though it is his own, his body responding in kind. He feels the swell of his balls, the ache that precedes release. His head spins though he knows he isn't moving. He doesn't think he can finish her without losing control. He feels so very hot; all of his extremities are hyper sensitive, alive and throbbing. The tip of his cock grows wet between his fingers as he slips his tongue once more between Dumont's legs, feels the tightening of muscles as he licks and stabs at swollen smooth lips.

Du Maurier feels the luscious pop that sends waves of pleasure cascading as she grinds against Clayton's mouth, body lifting from cushions.

Suddenly, his mouth slips away and she hears him groan. She opens her eyes to see him hunched over, hands clenching his cock his body in spasms, breathing erratic and sharp. He stretches out over her with some difficulty as he shudders uncontrollably into his sticky glazed hands.

"I'm sorry…" he breathes, "I…couldn't…"

He pants into her ear, body shaking not from pleasure but convulsions. She begins to wriggle out from beneath him, sensing something is wrong. Clayton is suddenly hauled off of her from behind and repositioned over the couch so his head dangles off the well cushioned arm.

Hannibal stands over her, his face placid.

“What did you give him?” Hannibal asks. “Whatever it is, he is reacting badly.”

Du Maurier scrambles off the couch and bends down to look at Clayton. Though his body trembles, his eyes roll back in his head. He does not respond to the gentle probing of his nose and mouth. He is going to require medical intervention of a kind she knows academically. She’s not a surgeon. Her jaw tightens as she looks up at Hannibal, who is.

“I’m sure you have some idea. I don’t know what went wrong.” She looks at Clayton and closes her eyes. “I would appreciate your expertise. We can discuss your boundary issues later.”

“How fortunate for you, and for him, that I renegotiated our boundaries.”

Du Maurier huffs, unbelieving Hannibal had nothing to do with Clayton’s collapse. She does not put it past him to interfere. This is just the sort of theatricality that appeals to him.

Hannibal kneels down in front of Clayton to have a look. He feels the damp head, sees perspiration beads all over him despite the chill of his flesh. He checks Clayton’s pulse, holding his fingers against his carotid. Clayton’s pulse is weak, dangerously so.

Hannibal knows that Du Maurier’s intentions were to control Clayton, not kill him, but he will die without intervention. He could leave Du Maurier to her mess, her miscalculation. She will believe Hannibal interfered. He did not. He already has her code. He is curious about her plan. He has the twins to deal with. He has to find Will.

He came here for insight, and Hannibal has found more than he imagined.

Clayton will be dead in a matter of minutes and Hannibal thinks Clayton deserves better than to die like this, his scandalous demise would be splashed all over the local papers. Du Maurier's picture would be in the papers, too. Hannibal would not have this fate for him. He makes his decision quickly. Du Maurier will have to deal with the consequences on her own. Clayton will not remember Hannibal was even here.

“He drank the entire glass at once. He hasn’t metabolized all of it so we need to get him to vomit.” Hannibal says, arranging Clayton appropriately over the couch.

“No, and he will stop breathing soon enough. I need to get him to vomit before his organs become too sedated to function on their own.”

Hannibal pulls Clayton up and straddles him from behind, his knees anchoring him to the couch so that he holds Clayton over the side. He forces two fingers down his throat, feels him stiffen against him, fighting the gag reflex. Hannibal pushes his fingers deeper until Clayton spews up the contents of his stomach all over Du Maurier’s cream colored rug.

He vomits several times before Hannibal is satisfied there is nothing left.

Hannibal lets him go and Clayton's head drops. Hannibal feels him go limp, dead weight in his arms.

"Hannibal!"

Du Maurier notices the slump of Clayton's body. She looks to Hannibal, alarm growing every second.

"I know. He's not breathing. As expected. We have time. Where do you keep your manual resuscitator? Surely you have one if you intend to drug your dates. I doubt you want me to perform a tracheotomy."

Du Maurier does not answer but runs to the bathroom.

Hannibal turns Clayton over to lay face up the couch. Hannibal sees the completely dilated pupils, sees the spark of life in them ebbing away. He feels no movement in Clayton's chest, no breath stirs from his nose or lips.

Hannibal breathes into his mouth, going through the motions of resuscitation until Du Maurier can bring him the breathing bag and kit. He will have to pump air into Clayton's lungs manually until Clayton wakes up enough to resume normal breathing function. And he will need Du Maurier's help to do it. He cannot hold the tube down Clayton's throat and pump the bag at the same time.

Even if she called 911 paramedics would not arrive in time to save him. They are too far out for that. And then there would be questions.

Du Maurier gathers the kit she keeps beneath the vanity in the bathroom. One never knows when a guest might react unfavorably or overdose in your living room she thinks as she grabs a couple throw blankets from her bed. She wraps a blanket around herself and places the other over Clayton stretched out on the couch, feet on the floor, his head resting against the back.

Hannibal explains what he needs Du Maurier to do as he forces the tube through the vocal chords, down the trachea to the lungs. The trachea is tight. Hannibal can hardly pass the tube through. Had they waited much longer, he may not have been able to get the tube through at all. The tube will keep the trachea from collapsing when the air pumped from the bag passes in and out.

Du Maurier pumps the bag in timed intervals as Hannibal instructed. She does not think about what might happen. Hannibal is here. If Hannibal does not desire Clayton to die, he will not. If Hannibal ever intended to finish her he now had the means and opportunity to do so. He must not have her code or she would not be kneeling on the floor wrapped in a blanket pumping air into Clayton's chest.

Unless, Hannibal has developed an attachment to Clayton. She considers the possibility as she watches Hannibal attend to him.

Hannibal holds the breathing tube with steady hands. Clayton had automatically tried to reject it, but he is far too weakened to resist. The body responds to invaders, whether consciously or not. Hannibal gazes at the wet curls and the wet lashes as tears stream from eyes that respond to the harshness of the tube that rubs against the sensitive tissues lining esophagus and windpipe. He remembers another tube, another head of damp curls beneath his fingers.

He thinks Du Maurier will have a time concocting a believable story for this. A feat like that will require all of her powers of persuasion. Clayton is terribly uncomfortable right now and he will be terribly uncomfortable later. He looks at Hannibal through slits and Hannibal wonders what he sees behind his lids. At least his eyes are no longer rolled up in his head.

Hannibal has estimated that Clayton will require the tube for several more minutes. According to Du Maurier, the cocktail was small, only a few milligrams of the ingredients. He can only conclude that Clayton had an allergic reaction of some kind. Du Maurier had not given him enough to incapacitate him like this. He vomited plenty. The effects of the drugs in his system should abate soon.

Hannibal had come to the estate for insight and to satisfy his curiosity. He had desired insight into Du Maurier's intentions. He had wanted to observe Clayton with his dogs, engaged in the alternative therapy he promotes in his practice. He had watched Clayton and Du Maurier at their session with their patient. From a distance, he had looked very much like Will and Hannibal had felt the familiar ache from the open wound in his chest. He feels it now as he gazes at the unconscious Clayton, his very life in Hannibal's hands.

Hannibal will grant him his life. It is clear that Du Maurier thinks to play the swan with Clayton. She has involved Hannibal with Clayton, knowing his likeness to Will would charm him. Hannibal is now a patient of record. She has established a relationship that can be traced. That can only mean she intends to kill Clayton and frame Hannibal once she believes he has transferred the assets for Will. If she plans on clearing out their Swiss account, she would need to ensure Hannibal was in no position to follow her.

Her plan is exactly what Hannibal would do in her situation. Hannibal has often wondered how she managed to convince the FBI, convince Jack to let her go. She had manipulated immunity and Hannibal thinks perhaps she cut a deal with Uncle Jack. Jack had not been entirely comfortable placing his faith in Will. Jack might even have told himself he was protecting Will, but Hannibal suspects Jack's training and his agenda would have taken precedence. Jack had wanted Hannibal as much as, well, as much as Hannibal had wanted Will.

Jack has no idea what Du Maurier is. Du Maurier has hopes of manipulating Clayton somehow or else she would not resort to using drugs. The use of drugs also suggests she is impatient as the time for the transfer of funds draws near.

Clayton is also more than a lure for Hannibal. After seeing Du Maurier with him, it is obvious to Hannibal that he functions as the displaced target for all of Du Maurier's anger and resentment over Will. She has transferred her contempt for Will to Clayton. She demeans him. She takes control from him. She wishes to reduce him to nothing, as she wishes to do to Will. And she wishes for Hannibal to see it. She knew Hannibal was watching from the shadows. She was performing for him.

The minutes tick from the antique clock on the mantle. Du Maurier's legs are cramped but she dares not move before her task is complete. Clayton cannot die in her living room. She cannot believe this is happening to her. She rolls possible scenarios to present Clayton around in her mind, rejecting each one.

“Penny for your thoughts, Bedelia.”

“I didn't mean to hurt him, for this to happen.”

“I imagine not. The cocktail you prepared was designed to lower his inhibitions, make him more receptive to suggestion.”

“Yes.”

“You would use drugs to persuade him, why?”

“I suppose, that like you, I can become impatient for the insight I want from my…hobby.”

Du Maurier stares into Hannibal’s black eyes. He holds her gaze a moment then shifts his attentions to Clayton.

Clayton shakes his head side to side and begins to cough, a sign that he is becoming conscious. Conscious enough to want to push the tube from his throat to breathe on his own. The worst of it is over. Clayton will be feeling the effects of this cocktail for a while longer, but his body is functioning normally.

Hannibal holds Clayton’s jaws steady with one hand and slowly pulls the tube free. He lets Clayton cough and sputter, spitting phlegm but breathing. His chest rises as he quakes with the rush of oxygen, sucking in great tremulous gulps of air.

“How much damage will he feel when he wakes up?” Du Maurier asks.

“He is dehydrated. He will have an excruciating headache. He will feel pain every time he swallows. His throat is raw and I imagine there will be some bruising around his face and throat.”

“I suppose I should tell him something as close to the truth as possible.”

“An allergic reaction to something in the wine. He had the symptoms of anaphylactic shock. I suspect the GHB was the culprit.”

“How long do you estimate the effect of the GHB to last?”

“He is rid of most of it. The effects should wear off completely in a couple hours, perhaps less. He will begin to come around before then. He will be groggy, but he should be able to speak. That too will be painful.”

“Can we move him?”

“Soon. You want him in your bed?”

“I think that best. I can lie down with him.”

“Does he live alone? Is there anyone who will be concerned about him?”

“Not that I’m aware of.”

“Then let him sleep it off, for as long as it takes. What about the dogs outside?’

“I can have one of the staff drive the dogs back to their kennel. And provide Clayton a ride home.”

Du Maurier watches Hannibal as he gazes at Clayton, wearing his peculiar mask of mild curiosity. He touches Clayton’s throat and glances at his watch.

“His heart rate is climbing quickly, almost normal.” Hannibal says after a moment.

“You do like him, don’t you? I knew you would.”

“I enjoy his company. I am pleased I will be seeing him for my appointment this week.”

Clayton is a beautiful wreck. Hannibal does not let his eyes wander far from him as he sits beside him, watching him tremble with every breath beneath the blanket. His attachment to the young doctor is clear enough. The possessiveness is another matter.

“About those boundaries, Hannibal. While I am most grateful that you were here, you understand each of us is entitled to some assurance of privacy.”

“Where he is concerned, I think boundaries do not apply. You cannot offer me a gift and then presume to tell me how I may enjoy it.”

“Hannibal. This is my home while I am in Fiesole. You have come to my home in Siena and now here. I do not come unannounced to your home.”

“And that is entirely up to you.” Hannibal says with a knowing smile.

Hannibal looks over at Clayton. He still breathes through his mouth, but the breaths are full and regular. Clayton is stable enough to move, and to leave in Du Maurier’s questionable care. Hannibal traces a finger over his eyebrows to smooth the furrow there, a habit he had taken to with Will.

Hannibal turns his thoughts to the twins sitting in the guest room in the depths of his villa. They have no doubt passed the limit of holding their bowels by now. He will have to hose them down, again. He thinks he should probably feed them, too.

“I will move him into the bedroom now and then I have to go. You will be busy cleaning up for a while, I’m afraid.”

“Thank you, Hannibal.” Du Maurier manages through tight lips.

Du Maurier clicks her fingernails against the wood of the couch. She will need to find Clayton’s phone if only to keep an eye on it. She can’t send a message home that he is staying the night. She isn’t supposed to know he lives with anyone.

Hannibal gathers Clayton up and hoists him down the hall, allowing his feet to drag behind him. Clayton is heavier than he looks. Hannibal lifts him onto Du Maurier’s bed, rolls him to his side in a classic recovery position, arms and legs crossed to stabilize him with chin up so he doesn’t choke on any drool or residual phlegm from his ordeal.

Hannibal is intrigued by Clayton’s behavior with Du Maurier before he collapsed. While it is not impossible for partners to climax at the same time, he imagines the type of pairing between Du Maurier and Clayton would likely not result in what he witnessed. Will could do that with his imagination. Clayton seemed to be empathizing with Du Maurier. Perhaps even involuntarily due to the drugs.

Hannibal has never told Du Maurier the specifics of Will’s mind. She only knows Will is able to assume other points of view, even those of serial killers. Hannibal thinks it unlikely she would attribute the same gift to Clayton, if it is even the same gift. It has been a long time since Hannibal has looked forward to a therapy session.

Du Maurier believes it was fortunate Hannibal was here. Hannibal thinks it fate. It was not yet time for Clayton to die. Hannibal thinks it is not Du Maurier's fate to take his life either. He leans over and draws his thumb across Clayton's brow before he leaves. This young doctor is a little more than light and air and color.

Du Maurier has pulled on her wilted dress and poured herself a glass of wine by the time Hannibal returns to the living room. Seeing Du Maurier out of her usual element is strangely disconcerting. She has placed paper towels next to the soiled rug and stands eyeing the pool of vomit on her carpet. Hannibal knows how she feels. No matter how much she cleans, the smell will never go away. She will have to replace the rug.

"No need to show me out, Bedelia. Good night."

Du Maurier watches him walk out her front door into the twilight his head up and gait purposeful, probably the same way he walked in. She finishes her glass of wine, savors the metallic finish and feels the alcohol's numbing effects on the anxiety thumping at the back of her skull. She has to tidy up and she welcomes the tedious mindlessness of the tasks at hand. As she kneels over her ruined rug scooping up the vomit into a bucket with thick gloves she thinks about the shape of the lie she must tell Clayton.

As she climbs into bed with Clayton it occurs to her that he must have told Graham where he was going. If Graham does not hear from Clayton by morning, he may become concerned enough to look for him. She glances at Clayton lying beside her, facing her in the shadows. She nudges him gently to see if he is conscious enough to respond. He shifts his weight and groans. Encouraged, she nudges him again.

"Daniel?" She strokes his cheek. "Daniel?"

Daniel's limbs feel heavy as he shifts around, every movement exaggerated, lethargic. Someone is speaking to him but sounds are muffled. He imagines the voice coming from a jar he can't open. He tries to lick his parched lips but there is no moisture upon his tongue to coat them. His throat feels bone dry and he struggles to swallow.

"Daniel…can you hear me?"

Du Maurier ruffles the damp curls, brushes them off his forehead.

"Hummmmm. It…hurts…"

He can barely get out a whisper. He shifts again, eyelids flickering open.

"Do you know where you are?"

He does not recognize the person in the shadows. He thinks he is dreaming. He closes his eyes, feels himself drifting…

"Daniel, where are you?"

"Home?" Daniel thinks where else would he be.

“Where is Will?”

“Hummmm?”

He swallows; winces and swallows again. His tongue clicks against the roof of his mouth. Du Maurier knows she should get some fluids in him, but she’s not sure he can sit up just yet or if he would keep anything down. She decides to wait.

“Where is Will?”

Du Maurier watches Clayton reach around behind him to feel along the mattress. He frowns and edges closer to Du Maurier.

“I don’t know.” He mumbles, his voice small, cracked.

“Does he know where you are?”

Daniel thinks a moment as the voice blooms in his mind, almost familiar. Will is with Alia, he doesn’t care where Daniel is…

Clayton sighs into the pillow, “He had a…date.”

Graham had a date? Du Maurier runs her fingers through the damp mess of curls as she collects her thoughts. Clayton is dreaming. His responses are not reliable, though they are spontaneous. She watches Clayton retreat into his slumber unaware he almost died this evening.

Alia lies in Will’s arms stretched out beside him on the couch. They lay beneath a blanket, a coarse throw blanket Will had pulled from one of the chairs. It is a little too warm and itchy, but just lying there on the couch nude with him had seemed…immodest. His eyes are closed but she knows he is not asleep though he has been quiet for several minutes. She stares up at the ceiling and watches the fan spin lazily as she drifts into thoughts of the lovemaking she enjoyed with Will.

She often has fantasies of what sex will be like with the men she dates before they actually get into bed with her. Sometimes there isn’t even a date. She is usually disappointed. She always reminds herself afterward that her expectations are unreasonable, tells herself that she perhaps did something wrong or she wasn’t what he had expected.

She finds it ironic and frustrating that she does not second guess herself on the job, but she always does in the bedroom. Then again, she argues on the job, fights…but in bed she thinks she must behave like her mother.

She turns her head and smiles at Will. This time was not a disappointment. He had been hesitant at first; taking his time almost like he had been testing her responses. When he had gazed into her eyes Alia had been moved by those eyes, so wounded and so compassionate at the same time. Whatever he had seen in her eyes had found its way into his lovemaking. He had made her fantasies about him real.

“You imagined what I wanted, didn’t you?” Alia lifts a finger to tickle the whiskers across his lip.

“Um…yes. That isn’t surprising from what you know about me, is it?”

“Uh-uh…” she shakes her head and plucks at his lips until he smiles, “So what did you imagine? What did you see?”

Will’s smile grows wider. “Were you…happy about it?”

Alia’s eyes grow wide, bright and teasing. She kicks him in the shin. Will runs his fingers through her hair enjoying the feel of the silky strands as they slide back to hang about her face.

“Then, does it matter?” Will says.

“I want to know…”

“…how I knew you liked…horseback riding?”

Will senses the movement of her arm and ducks his head, unsuccessfully as Alia actually slaps his ears. Will is still not used to her very physical way of communicating but he finds himself liking it. He likes her rough teasing and he had especially liked the way she had rocked her body on top of him.

“You…make a very good pony.” Alia says puckering her lips.

Will kisses her lips, “A pony? All I get is…pony?”

“Ponies are cute…I like ponies.”

“You…are still drunk.” Will says half laughing. He wipes at his eyes. She makes him laugh too easily it seems.

“And you…have really pretty eyes. I love your eyes.”

Will laughs some more, always uncomfortable with compliments. He shrugs it off, kisses her again.

“You’re supposed to say thank you. And then say something nice to me.”

Will raises his brows at being schooled. “Oh…I uh…who told you that?”

“My mother. Didn’t your mother teach you proper manners?”

Will’s eyes grow distant for a second but then he smiles and places a finger to her nose. Alia’s fingers find his lips again, tracing circles around and around the stubble.

“I like how you don’t wear any make-up. You are stunning without it.”

Will grins as she snuggles closer, his answer clearly acceptable. She yawns into his chest. Will knows she is still a little drunk. Between the wine and the sex, she is a few minutes away from falling asleep on him.

Alia still feels a little tipsy, but more than that she feels contented. She wants the afternoon with Will to last. Will still reminds her of the ostracized saint, uncomfortable with his gift. Blessed with understanding and compassion, he understands people so well yet finds it difficult to walk among them.

It is because of his gift he carries so many wounds and he believes it is his burden to carry them alone. Alia doesn't want the saint; she wants the man. She saw the man this afternoon. He let her see.

When Will had removed his shirt she had reached out her hand immediately, to touch the scar across his stomach. He had flinched but allowed her to trace her fingers over it, eyes averted while she had leaned down to kiss him there. He had lain still, silent and eyes glistening as he had watched her slowly kiss her way up to his face, to meet his sad blue eyes.

It still hurts you, doesn't it?

He had nodded slowly at her and then had guided her hand back to it and held it tightly in place.

It hurts a little less now…

She pushes thoughts of returning to work tomorrow out of her head. She wants today.

"When do you think Daniel will be back?"

"No idea. Tired?"

"I am a little sleepy."

"Go to sleep then. I'll keep an eye out for Daniel."

Alia considers Will might fall asleep, too. She thinks Daniel won't mind finding them on the couch. In fact, she thinks she likes the idea of him finding them on the couch together, like this.

"Ok. You watch. I'll sleep."

Will kisses her forehead and watches her settle, perfectly at ease resting on his arm. He thinks he should move his arm from beneath her, but it feels good to hold her like this. Will doubts they will be doing it again. His life has a way of getting in the way of things like this…

The sound of Alia breathing next to him fades to stillness. The smell of acrid smoke fills his nostrils and Will becomes aware of the brush of fur at his fingertips.

He sits alongside the grey wolf, perched upon a cracked aged boulder, gazing at the ruined landscape he is all too familiar with. He looks tiredly to his other side to find the creature he already knows is there, resting next to him. He feels the feathers brush lightly across his face as the serpent tailed eagle ruffles its huge wings. It turns its head to look at him, large red rimmed eyes so close Will can see himself reflected in the black irises.

The wolf growls, a low rumbling deep in its throat. A warning growl.

What are we waiting for? Will asks because it is obvious they are waiting for something.

What are you waiting for? Hannibal's voice whispers in his ears.

I'm not…waiting for anything.

Why do you think you are here, Will?

In my inferno? You tell me.

Deception has become so easy for you; you do not even realize when you deceive yourself.

Deception requires knowing truth from lie. What truth would I be hiding from?

What truth would you be hiding in a lie?

> Hannibal thinks you are his man in the room. I think you're mine.

Will sighs as the feathers skim across his cheek gently caressing. He feels the thing inside stirring and he swallows preparing for the knot it always seems to cause.

Do you remember the circles of hell, Will?

> I was euphoric when I killed Freddie Lounds.

Most of them, why?

Consider the ninth circle as you contemplate your…present situation.

Will feels his bones pop along his spine, vertebrae splitting apart as the sensation of pressure builds along his back. Will twists upon the rock arching backward as his hands fumble under his jacket and shirt searching along his skin. He is sure he is splitting open.

The wolf whines and snarls at his side, but does not leave. It sits waiting, its eyes shifting from the eagle to Will and to the pile of smoldering bramble and ghosts of trees in the distance.

Will feels along his shoulders and stretches to find raised welts at his shoulder blades, he presses harder into his own flesh and feels what seems to be knotted bone just beneath the skin. The things stirs again below, tugging at his organs and Will cringes as his skins breaks open between his shoulders. He can feel sharp points emerging, one over each shoulder blade.

The ninth circle was sin against God. Will hisses between clenched teeth.

Very good. What kind of sin?

Agh…What kind of God?

Will stops reaching behind his back and swings his arms around front to rest in his lap. Will looks at the blood on hands.

The wolf stands up suddenly; tufted ears alert and listening, mouth open in anticipation. The serpent tailed eagle sits erect, placing a wing over Will's shoulder, its eyes focused on the smoldering thicket of bramble.

See? Hannibal whispers… Do you see, Will?

Will looks. He sees the viper. Its scaly body trails blood behind it as it slips again into the thicket and disappears. The great wings ripple over his shoulder and the pain seems to abate a little with each caress of soft black feathers.

We are both alone without each other.

“Will?

Will clutches at the blanket, flexes his back against the cushions of the couch.

“Will?”

He opens his eyes. Alia stands over him, fully dressed and keys in hand.

“It’s like nine o’clock. We took a long nap.”

Will sits up, rubs at his eyes.

“You have to go?”

“Yeah, I got work early tomorrow. Sundays always suck.”

“You ok to drive?”

“Yeah. I feel good.” She leans over and lifts Will’s chin up with a finger, “I feel really good. See you soon?”

Will nods and she kisses him, not too quickly and turns to walk out the door. She pets each of the dogs before she opens the door.

“You uh…might want to take them out. Bye.”

“Bye.”

Will waves from the couch. The dogs amble over wagging their tails looking hopeful. Will checks his phone. No calls or messages from Daniel. He looks at the dogs and motions for them to come close. He rubs at their ears.

“Guess I’ll be taking you out tonight, huh?”

His clothes are on the floor where he left them. Will pulls them on while the dogs pace at the door eager to walk. Will can’t imagine where Daniel could be this late. He couldn’t still be at the estate, could he?

Chapter 50

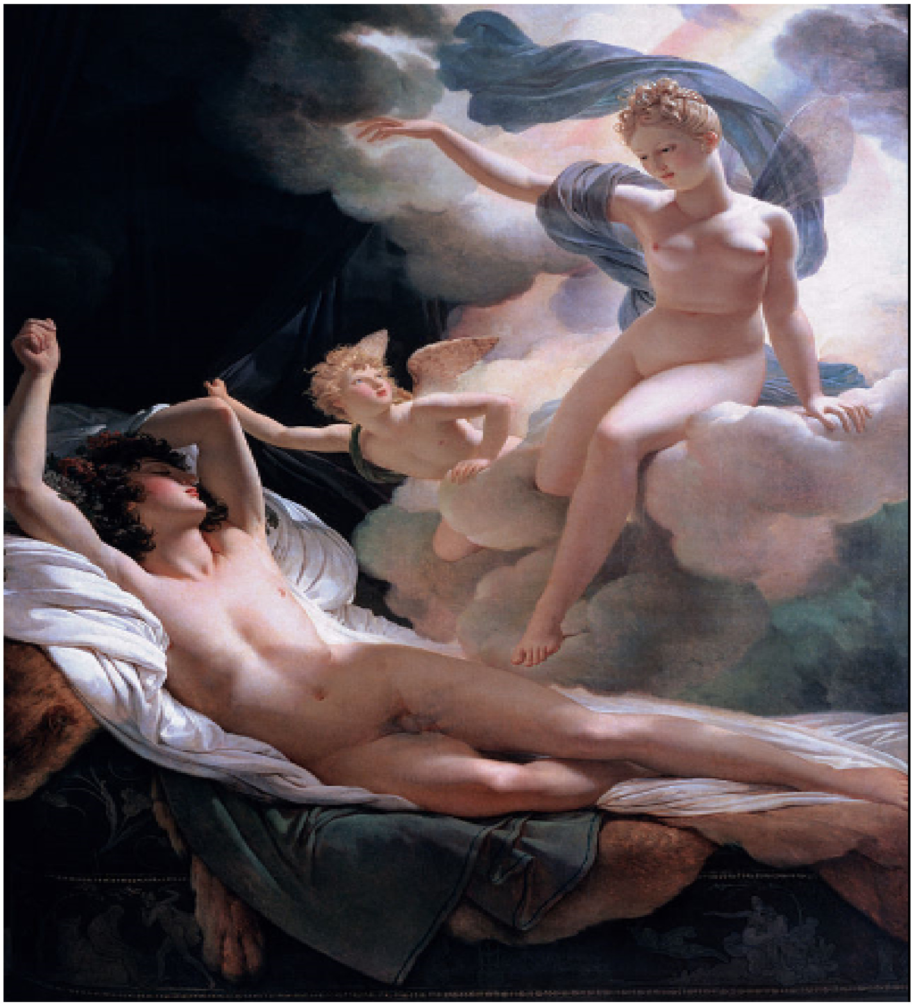
Daniel awakens from his ordeal and soon learns it is not over. Du Maurier plants another snare for Hannibal. Will visits his inferno and things get more twisted.



Morpheus and Iris , by Pierre-Narcisse Guérin ,

Sleep had a thousand sons, and of that number

He made the choice of waking Morpheus.

He was an actor; no one had more skill

At walking like a man, at looking like one,

At dressing like a man in all his fashions.

Ovid Book XI – Sleep

Du Maurier watches Clayton sleep a few more moments before waking him. She admires the fruit of her labors as he lay in all his splendor wrapped in pink and perfumed satin looking very much as Graham must have looked to Hannibal. She cannot help but smile at this. Graham may be Hannibal's Achilles' heel, but he is beautiful, and his beleaguered likeness rests resplendently upon her bed.

She has not slept, but for one or two cat naps. She had spent the remainder of the evening and most of the night ensuring that Clayton would awaken with few or none of the side effects of his ordeal.

Keeping him hydrated, warm, and as pain free as possible had been an easy enough task. Clayton had been as docile as a lamb following her instructions while exhibiting the trust of a child. Caring for a person physically was not within her usual field of expertise, but she had managed. He had required cleaning up after the sex, after the vomiting, and after administering drug soaked suppositories because he could not swallow the Vicodin caplets without sputtering and spitting and very nearly choking for the first several hours. She had not wanted to risk him choking on anything.

He should awaken responsive and clear eyed with only the usual suspects that accompany a hangover. Du Maurier thinks she will take a very long nap after he leaves, which she decides should be soon as she listens to the vibrating of his phone on the nightstand. She assumes it is Graham. The number is not local and id reads simply Will. Du Maurier did not check the texts. She can guess what Graham would be inquiring about. Better that Clayton open the messages himself.

This is the third time he has contacted Clayton and with the hour coming up on eight on a Sunday morning, she thinks it is time to wake Clayton up. He will likely sleep some more when he returns home, but he can't remain here any longer. Time to find out if her efforts have been successful.

She brushes his hair off his forehead, and runs her fingers through the tangles as he slowly opens his eyes to look up at her. He blinks several times to focus, clicks his tongue and swallows… without too much wincing. Du Maurier takes that as a good omen.

"Good morning…Daniel."

She smiles at him and almost laughs at the surprised expression on his face as he looks around momentarily at a loss. The bewildered look in his eyes is accompanied by an awkward shifting of his limbs as he turns to his side to face her, hands grasping at the sheet to cover himself. Du Maurier had left the sheets drawn barely to his thighs concealing nothing, a small indulgence for her this morning.

The bed had smelled different and felt different to Daniel before he even opened his eyes. He blinks as his vision adjusts to the glare of sun between the slats of the wood blinds; his head throbs a little with the light. Cara is not at his feet and these are not his sheets. They are satin and they are…pink?

And they are gathered around his legs. He pulls up the sheets, aware of Dumont's lingering gaze.

He stares into Dumont's face. She holds a dainty porcelain cup and saucer in her hand. He starts up from the mattress but the sour taste in his mouth and the drumming in his head stops him cold and he drops flat onto the pillow again.

Dumont looks very tired and there are dark circles under her eyes. She wears a thin cotton robe and she looks quite different from last night. She has combed her hair, but she wears no make-up. Her skin is flawless, and in the morning light without the smoothing patina of foundation, the lines and wrinkles of age crease at her eyes and mouth. He decides the lack of make-up doesn't render her less beautiful rather she seems more real to him. Less…artificial.

There is a weariness about her that settles in with Daniel's own raw fatigue. He can relate to that. She reaches out a hand to touch his forehead, brush her fingers through his hair. She wears a kind but concerned smile as she balances her cup of…tea he notices by the pristine white tag hanging over the side of the dainty porcelain cup.

“How are you feeling?” Dumont says, still smiling.

The lump in Daniel’s throat feels like a scratchy tennis ball going down, and almost as large. He swallows a couple times before he speaks; his tongue sticky and rough as sandpaper.

“Agh, I feel like a hundred miles of bad road, really…bad road.” He breathes into the pillow, detects the scent of vomit, probably his own. He can taste it if he really thinks about it.

“We had quite a night. I apologize for letting you drink so much wine…”

“So much wine?”

“I’m thinking that is what made you sick. One minute you were fine, the next you were doubled over. You don’t remember?”

“I got sick. Where?”

“You vomited all over the rug in the living room. I was sick, but later whilst cleaning up. Not the way we planned on spending the evening was it?”

“Jesus Fu…” Daniel rubs at his mouth, “I must have blacked out. I don’t remember…”

“You passed out eventually, but you vomited first. Do you remember being on the couch?”

Du Maurier raises her brows. All during the night Du Maurier had whispered the phrases of her intended fiction like a mantra into Clayton’s ear as she had held him close to her, stroking, touching, repeating. Clayton’s mind should embellish the narrative she offered with images he will believe actually happened.

Du Maurier is confident Clayton has succumbed to her drug induced suggestions. She learned from the best.

Daniel remembers his face between Dumont’s smooth legs, his mouth sucking on her clit and a flush runs up his neck at the other images that roll around his head.

“Uh yeah…” he says quietly looking into Dumont’s tired blue eyes, “Up to a point. How could I black out after only one glass?”

Du Maurier shakes her head and draws her fingers across his brow. “You had more than one glass, but it seemed an allergic reaction. The wine is from a case of an old reserve vintage that has a higher alcohol content than usual. The corks are moldy, sometimes that can indicate a higher histamine and bacteria count. I’m only guessing. You broke out in hives and had difficulty breathing. It was pretty frightening actually.”

Daniel thinks he remembers drinking on the couch, the glass slipping from his fingers, Dumont’s fingers in his mouth…

“Sounds like anaphylactic shock. But I have no allergies.”

“That you are aware of.”

Daniel feels itchy. He wants to scrape his nails all over his skin. He remembers feeling unusually warm and feverish last evening. He can’t stop swallowing and clicking his tongue. He would like to scrape the coating of paste off it and thinks he should at least get into the bathroom and gargle with some mouthwash.

“I guess drinking the first glass down had something to do with it.”

“I would tend to agree. We both drank way too much I’m afraid. I am appalled at myself.”

“That makes two of us. Don’t give it a second…Oh god, the dogs…”

“They are fine. I called the house to have someone drive them back to kennel last night. You asked about them several times. But your phone has been vibrating off and on all morning.”

“Oh shit…I should call home…”

Daniel looks to the nightstand on his side of the bed and grabs the phone. He checks the messages, sees that the last three are from Will. He laughs aloud as he reads:

10:31 pm - WTF R U?

3:17 am - sum house call

7:42 am - where is the dog food?

Quite unmindful of Dumont perched at the edge of the bed with her tea, he calls Will, thoughts of the anxiety he probably caused foremost on his mind. Hopefully, Will had not passed the night tossing and turning with nightmares. Daniel’s absence had obviously worried him, despite the lightheartedness of the messages, and his absence should have alarmed Will. Will knows Daniel would not leave his dogs unattended for so long without an explanation. Daniel would not have left Will alone, either, but he doesn’t expect Will to acknowledge that.

There is comfort in the knowledge that Will does worry about him. Will feels a lot, too much, but he often doesn’t show his feelings.

“Hey” He breathes, trying not to groan into the phone.

“Hey yourself. It’s about time you picked up. Still at the estate?”

Daniel feels the relief in Will’s voice immediately like he just let the air out of a balloon.

“Yeah…had a rough night, decided to sleep in.”

Will can picture Daniel in his head as he speaks. His husky voice conjures images of him reclining, eyes closed and mouth twisted into a guilty smile as he stretches himself along a mattress in a dim room, shades still down and curtains drawn. Will thinks it must have been a rough night indeed for Daniel not to phone. Daniel is thoughtful to a fault, sometimes Will thinks to his own detriment.

“Uh huh. Sleeping in with your colleague?”

Another pair of feet materializes next to Daniel’s in the bed Will has created in his imagination.

“Well, certainly not with the patient.”

Daniel grins at the soft chuckle from the other end.

"I'll be out of here soon…" Daniel looks to Dumont, "I'll get a ride home."

Dumont nods, still smiling imagining the two of them together…in bed. She notes the way Clayton's entire being brightens as he talks into his phone, shifting and stretching, his lips tug to one side as he listens to whatever Graham is saying his fingers idly stroking at his stomach.

"And I was looking forward to taking the Mercedes out for a spin."

"If you couldn't find the dog food, I doubt you'd find the keys…"

"The ones on top of the fridge?"

Daniel sighs. It is good to hear Will's voice, and to hear that he seems in a good mood. "So, how was your evening?"

"Uh…Alia left around nine. Had work this morning."

Daniel thinks that means they had themselves a pleasant tumble but she couldn't stay the night. Daniel wonders fleetingly where they ended up and pictures the couch. Will would not have taken her upstairs. Daniel thinks it an odd coincidence he also spent a lot of his evening on a couch.

Couches, patients, and psychiatrists…Daniel shakes his head.

"Oh, she did, huh?" Daniel says.

"Look, glad you called. I'll see you when I see you."

"Okay."

Daniel clicks off the phone, still smiling. He looks over at Dumont who raises her brows at him.

"I thought you lived alone. You gave that impression."

"I do…usually. Temporary roommate in transition. Just helping him out."

"Sounds friendly."

Daniel nods and looks up at Dumont who sets her cup and saucer on the night stand next to his phone and stretches out next to him. She traces her fingers around his face and does not have to wonder what he is thinking behind the veil of green. She tugs at the sheet so it falls from his shoulders and she presses a finger into the bruise along his collarbone.

"Ouch…" Daniel half laughs and grabs her hand; gently pulls it away from the sensitive flesh and tender bone, memories of struggling against Will's sturdy body and relentless mouth tortuously sweet.

"I noticed you like getting physical." Du Maurier's other hand slips beneath the sheet and Daniel feels warm fingers pass over his lower abdomen, trailing lower still. "Did your roommate give you these?"

His mouth drops open at the question and he starts at the grasp of her fingers around his cock. His mind explodes at the sensation and he pushes the unbidden memories of Will down. He shimmies away from her in the bed. He can't easily wriggle out of this one, however. Dumont's eyes stare into his intently awaiting a response.

"He did." Daniel says with a teasing lilt to his voice and raise of his brows. He can torment her with this morsel. And only this morsel.

"Hmmmm. So, sexually, you're…"

"Adventurous." Daniel finishes for her. "Intrigued?"

"Warmed by the very thought." Dumont smiles.

"And you?" Daniel asks.

"Me…what?"

"Adventurous, too?"

"Yes…actually." Du Maurier thinks touché. She sends Clayton another volley. "Does he let you… bite him back?"

Daniel pushes her onto the mattress so she lays flat, hair tumbling from silky pale shoulders as her breasts tumble out of her robe. Daniel kisses down her breastbone, feels the swell of soft flesh as her breasts rise to flush warm beneath his lips.

"You have an awful lot of questions for so early in the morning."

"Well, I couldn't ask you last night."

Daniel looks up at her, "For all I know, you asked me all sorts of things last night" He eyes her carefully, sensing a little agitation from her.

"Well, I tried…" She touches the stubble around his chin and lips, "Speaking of last night, next time…this has to go. I am positively raw this morning."

"Oh? Oh." Daniel smiles awkwardly. "A little too bristly huh? It would probably feel better if I let it grow…"

"No. I'd like it smooth. Up here…and…down there." Daniel feels her hands slip down his body and slide across his stomach to caress his navel and pluck the hairs lower.

"Oh no… I don't think so." Daniel says lifting up from the touch of probing fingers.

Du Maurier raises her hips off the bed so she can grind against Daniel. "Ever let anyone shave you?"

Clayton blushes deep pink immediately and pushes off the mattress, arms on either side of Du Maurier, head angled to one side as he looks down at her. Du Maurier wonders how adventurous he is, or could be with her. With the time he has left…

"My face, yes. Not pulling any punches this morning, are you?" Daniel says, annoyed she caught him off guard like that.

“There’s something dangerously intimate in allowing another to hold a blade to your…throat, isn’t there?”

Daniel lets thoughts of a blade anywhere else slip away. He is not even going to touch that with Dumont who is clearly aroused by the idea. Her body is fairly pulsing with excitement though on the surface she remains cool and aloof, her tone strangely detached, as though she were talking to a patient.

“Especially if the other person is shit faced.” He grins at Dumont. “It does require a certain trust and steady hands.”

“That…could be arranged. I’m wondering how you would look, you have incredible bone structure.”

“Thanks.” Daniel says, hoping she is referring to his face. “I look younger, that’s how I look. I seem young enough to my patients as it is…”

“Hmm. You are quite distracting for Lydia. She giggled like a school girl with you.”

Daniel thinks Lydia is not the only one distracted, but adds, “Lydia is a school girl, at least emotionally. She’ll get over the infatuation. I won’t be around that long for her to get too attached. She’s supposed to bond with the dog; not me.”

Du Maurier brushes her knuckles along his jaw, remembering how he had looked in repose, lips parted in slumber upon her pillows.

“Concerned your roommate might not like it?” Du Maurier teases.

She is increasingly curious about the relationship Clayton seems intent on keeping from her. She can’t decide if his reluctance to talk about Graham is possessiveness or protectiveness. If Graham actually had a date, and it sounded like he had, perhaps Clayton is simply protecting his privacy, and Graham’s, though Clayton has no idea she already knows his identity. She reminds herself it is Clayton’s nature to be polite and diplomatic.

“Cesca… Let’s leave a little mystery between us, huh?”

“Too soon to discuss personal relationships? Only patients?”

Daniel’s eyes flicker with alarm until he reminds himself she couldn’t possibly know about Will.

“Just certain patients. The one we share and the one you referred to me.”

Du Maurier raises her brows. “Ah, Victor, well…Doctor Boucher.”

“It’s ok…he told me to call him Victor, too. I have a couple questions about him, if you don’t mind.”

“Of course…” Du Maurier is surprised it took Clayton this long to inquire about Hannibal. Then again, Clayton does seem to shuffle thoughts around his head arranging them like furniture until they settle exactly where he wants them to. He has probably been arranging his thoughts about Hannibal quite a lot.

Daniel sits up, ignoring the drum rolls in his head and the twinge of vertigo from moving too quickly against gravity. Images of his dogs and the comfort of his own bed fill his mind. He suddenly wants to be transported home more than anything. He glances at Dumont lying expectantly beside him. He thinks she likely doesn't appreciate how hung over he still is. He dismisses her apparent lack of sympathy, already acquainted with her consuming sense of self.

The feeling that she wants something from him persists. The anticipation seeps into the surface of her skin, absorbing form and color like a tattoo, and the feeling that he has yet to deliver on something raps at his skull as Daniel tries to imagine what that could be. Her appreciative glances are beginning to wear on him and Daniel is not in the mood for her coyness. He has had his fill of Dumont for the moment, for the week.

He is more than a little upset with himself for behaving like a college student on spring break last night. He thinks maybe there might have been a residual sexual tension from Will influencing his emotions, fueled by the alcohol and his own desire to really push Dumont's buttons. He sucks in his lower lip as he thinks his buttons are the ones getting pushed, and quite effectively.

He would very much like to alter the trajectory of the conversation and her gaze away from him. Any insight she can offer into the enigmatic Victor would be appreciated. The next session will be the full hour and Daniel has yet to prepare for it.

"I should get dressed. I'm going to use the bathroom." He leans to brush his lips across her cheek. "We can talk in a minute?"

He slides legs off the bed that feel heavy and ungainly. His entire body feels sore. He rubs at his jaw, it feels tender to the touch and Daniel can almost hear the crack of knuckles as strong fingers pry his jaws open. Snatches of odd dreams and sensations sift around and blow through his mind in a sandstorm that refuses to settle. He thinks they must have fucked pretty hard on that couch…

"I'll get you some tea. Or would you prefer coffee?"

"No…tea sounds good. Cream and sugar…English style." Daniel enjoys the bright smile his request brings to Dumont's face.

"Darjeeling?"

"Perfect."

Daniel stands at the vanity and looks at himself in the mirror. He doesn't look as bad as feels, though he has had occasion to feel much worse than he does this morning. His memory of last evening is muddled and, like that first drunken chat with Will in his office, he doubts he will ever remember it to his satisfaction.

He rummages through the vanity cabinet and the medicine cabinet until he finds the toiletries he wants. First order of business he decides, wash out his mouth.

Du Maurier begins to make the bed up once Clayton has shut the door to the bathroom. She will change the sheets later, no need to make a show of stripping the bed while he's still here. She imagines Clayton staring at himself in the mirror, silently reprimanding himself for his assumed behavior last evening. Better to let him scold himself than to know what actually happened.

Graham is clearly working through his issues with Hannibal, and becoming very intimate with his psychiatrist to do so. The level of intimacy he seems to share with Clayton suggests their relationship goes beyond the physical. Physical intimacy is often easier to achieve than the emotional variety. There is much less risk. Clayton has earned Graham's trust, a remarkable feat given what Graham has been through.

Du Maurier thinks of Clayton's relaxed manner as he had talked on the phone, unconsciously touching himself and smiling at words she could not hear. Clayton's affection for his broken patient was written all over his face. She thinks of the exchange she had witnessed on Clayton's patio and finds it hard to reconcile the melancholy Graham she knew with the animated one Clayton seems to have engendered. Clayton has certainly put a little zest into Graham's existence. He has perhaps been an effective distraction from Graham's obsessive pursuit of Hannibal. She would not doubt it.

Hannibal would not be pleased to know that another vies for Graham's attentions. Graham exists for Hannibal and only Hannibal.

As Graham's psychiatrist, Clayton is meeting his professional obligations with his patient. But the relationship with Graham must mean much more to Clayton. Du Maurier does not think Clayton would compromise his reputation or his integrity easily. Clayton has likely found Graham as compelling as everyone else who crosses the problematic profiler's path. The difference is that Graham must find Clayton equally as compelling.

What will Hannibal think about that? The sauce for the goose thickens. Du Maurier thinks she should share some insight into Clayton's new patient. Hannibal has plenty of advantages over Clayton. A little insight into his new patient would go a long ways. Clayton has already demonstrated an impressive grasp of the human psyche. She is curious how much of Hannibal he can grasp.

She needs to introduce Hannibal's pathology to him gradually, a spoonful at a time. If Clayton can be guided to make the right associations, he will tell Graham. Once associations click for Graham, he will not wait to confront Hannibal. He will not want to do anything but confront Hannibal should all go as expected.

She opens the blinds in her bedroom and walks to the other end of the guest house where the kitchen and living room are situated, no wall separating them. She hears Clayton coming; his footfalls pause in the living room. She watches him examine the carpet by the couch and wrinkle his nose. By the time Clayton joins her at the sunny corner table his tea already sits piping hot in front of him. She notes he has made do admirably with what he found in her bathroom to freshen up.

His deep green eyes hold her in their gaze beneath thick arched brows that frame a beguiling canvas of soft skin and the whisper of whiskers around a sensual mouth. He is disarmingly attractive for having almost died last night.

He eases into the chair, shirt buttoned and shoes laced with one foot toward the door already.

"I called up to the house. They have a driver for you."

"Thanks. Don't want to wear out my welcome."

He smiles, knowing Dumont would keep him in her bed all day if she could. He feels badly about the carpet. He really did a number on it. The rug is ruined. He blows across the lip of the cup in its pretty little saucer as he summons his thoughts on Victor.

“About your referral…”

“How did you find him?”

“A little imposing intellectually, and remarkably self-contained, but agreeable and really charming. I like him.”

“He is charming. I like him, too.” Du Maurier thinks that was the truth, until recently.

“You should have given me a heads up. I was incredibly unprepared for him that morning.”

Daniel remembers the morning well. He had forgotten to set his alarm, distracted by the novelty of having Will at his house, and in his bed. He had been distracted by Will’s blackouts and his emotional turmoil fresh from the trauma of returning from their trip to find his residence at the palazzo still smoldering.

And that awful conference call with Chilton the day before had not helped either. The amount of stress Will juggles day in and day out boggles Daniel’s mind. He wonders how Will keeps it together. Of course, Will is not keeping it together, not really. He is just very good at hiding how fractured he is, beautiful tortured mess that he is.

Daniel considers that Will’s mind is always adjusting to the constant sensual and emotional overload. Will exists in a reality without closure. A reality where one event topples over another in an endless cycle bereft of resolution. He prioritizes, manages expectations, on autopilot. He had had a really awful night the night before Victor’s appointment.

The morning of Victor’s appointment had found Daniel running late and running on three hours of sleep and half a pot of coffee.

Dumont is tapping her foot lightly against the leg of the table. Daniel looks up from his cup and draws a breath. They were talking about Victor.

“You were saying?” he says.

Du Maurier sighs, her patience a little thin. She suffers Hannibal’s lapses into his memory palace, endures the daydreaming while he sits across from her at the dinner table, or walks beside her down a street. She doesn’t have to indulge Clayton’s daydreaming. It is especially exasperating to know who each of them daydreams about. So infuriating…Graham.

“That I apologize.” She says quietly, “Victor presents with some delicate issues. He requires a compassionate but firm therapist. I had thought I had time to talk to you about him, not realizing he would contact you as quickly he did. I did write the referral but I also told him that I would talk to you first.”

“You couldn’t pick up a phone? And I guess you couldn’t write much, knowing he would read it.”

“No…what did he say?”

“That your association… was no longer efficacious, he said, with regard to your uh, therapy and your availability. That sounds like a dismissal to me.”

“It was, but it was a mutual decision. I can no longer provide him what with he needs.”

“What would that be?”

“I do not know. I only know that I do not appear to have whatever it is he wants from therapy. He has been dissatisfied with our arrangement for some time.”

“No…um…progress?”

He takes a gulp of the tea. It’s perfect, just the way he takes it. His stomach grumbles but doesn’t reject the warm and soothing beverage.

“There has been some progress. But, I sense a certain…dissatisfaction from him and I think I may have reached my professional limit. I feel like I drive the same roads over and over with him and I am sure it feels to him as though we are no further along than last week, or the week before… We seem to be stuck in the proverbial ditch. I am at a loss, frankly.”

Daniel gets the feeling that being at a loss is not something Dumont experiences often. Perhaps Victor frustrates her, causes her to doubt herself. Referring him is classic avoidance. Perhaps.

“It sounds like he’s blocking. And you thought that I could offer him something you couldn’t?”

“Yes, first let me ask you something. What did he tell you were his reasons for seeking therapy?”

“Grief.”

“And for whom is he grieving?”

“He said he lost a daughter.”

Du Maurier sits back in her chair, plays with her cup allowing the long pause to build for emphasis.

“It took me six months of therapy with him to realize there is no daughter.”

“What?”

Daniel is completely shocked. He instantly begins to reassess the session with Victor. Victor had been vague, but Daniel had not sensed anything like deceit of that magnitude, unless Victor actually believes he lost a daughter which presents an entirely different set of issues.

Daniel had felt a mix of emotions from his patient that day, had thought perhaps there were other losses in addition to the daughter, but he had not imagined she was…a lie? He thinks he should not be quick to assume anything.

“How did you…?”

“Over many, many conversations. At first I thought he was delusional, clinical denial.”

“It’s not?”

“No. The daughter is a fabrication, a surrogate for the actual person he lost but does not want to talk about. He uses the daughter for therapy. Sometimes I think our conversations were helpful, he seemed to take what he needed from them.”

“Who is the actual person?’

“He never told me. I never questioned him directly about fabricating the daughter. His true psychological issue remains undiagnosed. He uses her as a means of focus so that he never has to disclose the situation or event that prompted his…grief.”

“So you talked around it, tried to get him to open up, to trust.”

“Without success. I think he wants to open up, but not with me.”

“Why send him to me?”

“From what I have been able to infer, I think you might remind Victor of the person he grieves for and because of that, you might perhaps reach him where I have failed.”

“What did you infer?”

“Better that you find out on your own rather than risk my observations clouding your objectivity and your own observations. But he grieves for a man, and I suspect a lot of emotions are involved. You will find him…unique, I am certain.”

“So, the therapist who treats Victor needs to understand that preserving his fantasy allows him to talk about the salient issues upon which the fantasy is predicated. The fantasy is his safety net. Talk around it and he takes what he needs and hopefully will come around to admitting the truth to himself.”

“I think so. And when that happens, you will not see Victor anymore. He is self-reliant though I imagine he would be generous in his gratitude should your therapy provide him with that breakthrough. He is a most thoughtful person, prone to grand gestures and largesse. And…I should warn you, easily offended if his generosity is refused.”

“Cesca, transferring his feelings for his lost love to his psychiatrist is not therapy, it is displacement, redirection. And displacement leads to sublimation. He may very well transfer his feelings for the other person to me. I can’t have him fixate on me because…

“Daniel, I can’t help him. You…your understanding of empathy might draw him out. Ordinarily I would agree that when transference occurs between patient and therapist in the displacement of emotions and associations with a past relationship, the consequences are not productive. But sublimation of repressed feelings can result in a reaffirmation and allow new associations to replace the repressed ones.”

Daniel bites at the inside of his cheek as he gazes at Dumont. He is certain she did not merely drag her feet about calling him about her patient as much as avoiding doing so altogether. She is relieved Victor acted on his own initiative. She was counting on it. Daniel can feel the satisfaction from her sticking to him like a gloss of cotton candy and it feels just as cloying.

“And what is he to do with the new associations he makes with me? You are asking me to invite displaced libido at the very least and displaced mortido at the worst when he perceives his feelings are not reciprocated. Does he present with aggressive tendencies?”

Daniel thinks of the sudden chill and the vacuum of air he had felt when Victor had erroneously assumed he was being referred and Daniel had wasted his time. Victor’s expression had not changed. Just cold airlessness had emanated from him, a vortex of ice and Victor at the center of it. And then, nothing. His office had felt agreeable and warm once again.

“I have never seen Victor do anything untoward. He is thoughtful, polite, and sadly…suffering from a dysphoria that keeps him from making the social ties he so desperately needs. You could be the bridge he needs to find his way out of the past into the present. I have great confidence in you.”

“I have learned a bit about him and everything you say concurs.”

“If your working relationship becomes unproductive or untenable, refer him out. He’ll find ways to cope.” She sets down her cup, “A patient cannot force you to treat him.”

Dumont chuckles pleasantly over her tea, but Daniel is feeling like she has unloaded a very time consuming patient, one who will require kid gloves to treat. The timing is miserable and Daniel can’t help the prickle of aggravation crawling up his spine. Normally, he would step up to a challenge like Victor’s, provided the referring psychiatrist had prepped him first. This feels like an ambush.

Will’s immediate issues consume most of his time and efforts and where Will is concerned, there is never a dull moment. There is barely time to recuperate and anticipate the next crisis. Daniel rubs at his eyes, wishing the headache away. Victor and Dumont can wait for another day when he feels better. He just wants to go home and become a vegetable on his own couch.

“Well,” Daniel says finishing off his cup of tea, “why don’t you call up to the main house and I’ll be on my way. It has been a most interesting day, and night, and morning with you.”

“I think it’s safe to say that we have managed to forge a rather unconventional working relationship.”

“This is as unconventional as I can handle. Do you mind if we just stick to the dogs next weekend?” Daniel says, already creating excuses to reschedule.

Du Maurier picks up her phone. She is confident she’ll be hearing from Clayton before next weekend after his session with Victor. She has now ensured that he will confer with her about Hannibal regularly. She will likely hear from Hannibal, too. She has presumed upon his gift. His Wednesday appointment should prove sufficiently engaging for him.

“Just the dogs, then.” She says.

Lost are we, and are only so far punished, That without hope we live on in desire.

Inferno Canto IV

Will makes a dog-eared flap and closes Daniel’s copy of Dante’s Divine Comedy. He rubs at his eyes thinking of the passage he just read. Dante has entered Limbo, the circle where lost souls live out eternity in an existence fashioned out of their own imagination. They are punished for being lost, lost to the light of Christ through no fault of their own.

Unlike the lost souls in Dante’s Limbo, Will has placed himself in a limbo of sorts. He feels like he is treading water, neither sinking nor reaching the shore. He has not heard from the twins and is beginning to feel anxious about that. If he does not hear from them soon, he will hear from Mason. Will definitely does not want that. He has not contacted Jack and he knows he should, but talking to Jack will invite memories he does not want to dwell upon.

Hannibal thinks you are his man in the room. I think you're mine.

He has not looked at his files in weeks. He has not opened any of the emails in his mailbox when he has checked for messages from the twins. He is no closer to finding Hannibal than he was nearly four months ago. Hannibal must be killing…and cooking; it is his nature. He kills and leaves no breadcrumbs for Will's imagination to detect and no crime scenes for Will to reconstruct. Hannibal does not want to be found.

Will is treading water and he has nearly abandoned all hope of finding Hannibal. No wonder his stream has vanished from his dreams, replaced by an inferno of his own creation. He will remain there living on in desire of finding Hannibal so he can have his reckoning. Will thinks Daniel might throw him out before he finds Hannibal. He finds himself wondering how much darkness Daniel will abide before deciding he has had enough for one lifetime.

A rustling of feathers and the scrape of sharp talons across the concrete outside draws Will's attention from the book in his hands to the patio doors. He gets up from the couch and walks to the French doors opening them slowly. His heart thumps in his chest.

No…not here…

All our destinies flying and swimming in blood and emptiness.

No…

He walks onto the patio to find the familiar cracks in the baked concrete, deep fissures broken apart so that he has to step around and over to avoid tripping. The serpent tailed eagle beckons from where Daniel's garage once stood now reduced to rubble, jagged stones and charred wood. Will surveys the damaged dystopia before him, all of Fiesole laid waste like Pompeii. He searches the burned out landscape for the wolf.

The eagle continues to wait, flapping its huge wings amidst a circle of dust and debris. At last, the grey wolf emerges from the smoke, hugging at the corner of what is left of Daniel's house. It pants and lumbers towards Will its large eyes looking past him to the eagle at his back. The wolf halts at Will's side, nudges his leg with its wet nose and together they approach the black and bloodied creature as it preens slick feathers bearing the taint of its last meal.

Before Will and the wolf can reach it, the serpent's tail thrashes against the splintered wood and debris. The wolf growls low, its fur raised along its back though it remains at Will's side. Will feels the chill of anticipation in his gut, feels the rumble of the thing that dwells there, and feels the searing blisters that break open above his shoulder blades.

But these sensations are secondary. At the same time, the great black eagle takes its own serpent's tail in its mouth and rips it from its body, tosses it on the cracked pavement to quiver and bleed between them. Will watches the tail writhe and slither across the cement, encircling itself as a head grows from the gnarled bleeding flesh where the eagle had ripped it away.

The wolf bares its fangs, snarling at the terrace below and Will sees the familiar viper winding its way up the hill toward them, it slithers from side to side, its progresses unperturbed by the shadow of the black winged creature that stands above.

The serpent's tail has become another viper, an extension of the creature that watches from the shadows, and it waits coiled for the other. To Will, the vipers appear identical until both vipers face each other and he can observe more closely. The scales along the back of the viper from the eagle ripple with black oily feathers that glisten in the gray light of the broken sky. The other viper is sleek and long. Its scales pulse along its body as it begins to circle, its mouth open ready to strike.

Will sees that no feathers crown its head, no plumes glisten along its back. Its fangs drip with its poison, droplets of decay strike the ground and distill into a corrosive froth. Will stands flexing his shoulders against the points of razor sharp bone he knows are slicing through his flesh. The vipers strike, each seeking weakness, fangs exposed as they tangle around each other. The wolf follows and Will stumbles after it, leaving the tailless creature behind them.

The vipers tumble and roll, hissing heads stabbing at each other. Will notices the wolf fidgeting and pacing finally crouching, its muscles tense and still. Will knows it is about to spring.

No…

But Will is too late. The wolf has the sleek viper by the tail while the feathered viper attacks at the front. The skirmish is swallowed up by the dust and smoke, and Will can barely make out what is happening right before his eyes. The terrifying threesome rolls down the hill and Will cannot tell who is biting whom. An anguished howl rises above the smoke and Will's chest tightens as he stumbles over slippery soot stained stones.

When Will reaches the crest of the hill he sees through the searing smoke that the vipers are gone. The body of the wolf lay on its side taking great gasps of air, ears flat, body limp. He has to climb down over piles of debris and rubble to get to his wounded companion in this dreadful and dangerous place. The smoke stings his eyes but he can blink that away. He has to get to the wolf.

As Will slides down to the bottom of the hill the smoke thickens opaque as soup leaving a film on all it touches. Will can smell decay like ripe carrion and he climbs blindly toward the landing where he last saw the wolf. As he approaches waving his arms to clear the smoke, he finds not the wolf but a man, sprawled upon his back eyes closed in slumber. Will thinks he is wrapped in something that shimmers but he can't be sure. The cloud of smoke hovers close, every breath burning Will's nostrils as he makes his way closer.

What do you see, Will?

Will hears Hannibal's voice from behind him and turns to see the serpent tailed eagle looming over him, its viper's tail twitching from side to side. Will stands rigid as its great black wings fold around him drawing him close. He twists away from the dark wings that would draw him closer still.

Will kneels down next to the dark haired man reclining on the rocks and debris. As the smoke drifts away Will's breath catches in his throat. He leans closer. The man is Daniel, or he looks like him and he is wrapped in glossy diaphanous wings that rustle beneath as they unfold from around his naked body and spread lustrous and unsoiled by the ashes falling around them. Soft white feathers nestle around his shoulders as he opens his eyes to gaze into Will's.

Daniel? You have wings…

So do you.

Will feels along his shoulders his fingers finding smooth skin. His clothes are gone and his eyes grow wide as he reaches back, feels the down of feathers sprouting from his shoulder blades. He touches the silky plumes and stands upright so the wings, his wings can open wide. Muscles ache along his back; his bones move strangely, the weight of the wings extending from his body unwieldy. His wings are not the frosty white of Daniel's. Will frowns at the slick black feathers that mingle with the dark feathers of the creature bending over him casting its shadow wide and deep.

Daniel lifts his head from the scorched ground; his green eyes clear and bright as he draws Will's gaze away from the dark wings that grace his shoulders; the sight of them tearing at his heart. Will knows Daniel can feel his pain; he can see it mirrored in Daniel's eyes.

Hot tears scald Will's face and he shakes his head at Daniel, hating that he stands with the creature. Daniel's eyes soften at Will. He shifts to rest upon his elbow, skin flawless and perfect in his nakedness as he looks up from the shadows. His words fall from lips too pure for this place of deadly revelations and flat announcements of disaster.

Will, the devil is not as black as he is painted.

Daniel stretches out his hand to Will and his brow furrows when Will hesitates to take it, hesitates to bring him to stand at his side beneath the canopy of darkness and destruction. Daniel does not belong here. Will does not want him here, in this place.

Do you see, Will?

Hannibal whispers, feathers brushing across Will's nose and lashes.

I see lies and deceptions…

Will sees what the lies and deceptions have done to his forest and his stream. He sees ruin clear to the horizon and needs to walk no further to know there is no end to it. He will never reach the horizon in this nightmare that follows him out of his dreams.

You see your own lies and deceptions. See him. On gliding wings he takes up his mask…

Will kneels down to look into Daniel's face. He sees no mask, finds no deception in the twin pools of green that reflect only light and air and color.

Will?

Will…

"Can you see me? Will! You are looking right at me…"

Will blinks and Daniel's hands are waving in front of him, shadow and light play across his face as Will sucks in air and presses his body against the solid cushions of the couch. The expression on his face must be distressing judging by the concern all over Daniel's face.

Daniel leans over him, tugs at his perspiration soaked tee and Will feels his fingers warm and real in his hair. Will inhales the scent of ocean that descends from Daniel, the mist collects in his mind and Will imagines condensation trickling through his limbs deeper into the very marrow of his bones.

“Where were you? What did you dream?”

“I was in my inferno…with him. And you.”

Chapter 51

Daniel helps Will with some dream interpretation and sees more deeply into his patient's dark pathology.

The dogs nudge at his legs, tails wagging furiously, ecstatic he is home, and Daniel rubs them down as he watches Will collect himself, fists rubbing along his thighs and knees, compulsively reminding himself where he is by touch. It seems to Daniel that Will’s waking dreams are saturated with as much texture and sensation as his reality. Reality may be a shared experience, but it is perceived subjectively, unique to each individual and no one more so than Will; who exists in the surreal. He exists in his own universe and has been merely visiting Daniel in his. It seems to Daniel that Will is as ready as he'll ever be for the guided hypnotherapy. It is the only way Daniel can share in Will's reality.

Will's resistance to his own mind is impressive. He retreats into its recesses yet he manages to interact with his environment without giving in to the dark impulses he harbors deep within himself. Daniel has never met anyone with such a powerful imagination and the inner strength to avoid succumbing to it. A weaker person would be a raging psychopath. Will is not only strong minded, he is intelligent; he is also kind and decent, and those impulses are equally as strong as the dark ones.

His dual nature is the raison d'etre for his current predicament. Will cannot reconcile his dual nature. Either heaven misplaced one of its most beautiful angels or hell is missing one of its most seductive demons. Will seems to be both. And Lecter had been drawn to him like Odysseus to the siren. Daniel cannot fault Lecter for that.

The more Will has shared with Daniel, the more Daniel has come to think that Lecter does know Will better than he knows himself. This is not a comforting thought. Lecter is accomplished at many things; psychiatry is only one of them. Figuring out that an individual drawn to the violence of crime scenes harbors some violent thoughts himself is not a feat of psychiatric brilliance; it is deduction. Inducing that individual to acknowledge and indulge his violent fantasies is a feat of psychiatric brilliance.

Learning that Will actually reimagined the crime by becoming the killer must have really flicked Lecter's switch. Because Will had gushed honesty like a fountain to his trusted therapist, Lecter had surmised that his patient suffered nightmares not because the violence upset him so much, but because he feared how much he enjoyed it. Damn right his own sense of decency had been shocked by the images in his mind. Lecter had flicked Will's switch with Hobbs.

He had forced Will to do what he had always feared. To kill. Lecter took Will's sense of right and wrong and turned it upside down. Lecter had forced Will to acknowledge the zest he felt was not righteousness, but the simple thrill of killing. Righteousness is a concept easily adapted to one's whims, especially if one perceives oneself on par with god. Or the devil.

Lecter believed Will was ignoring parts of himself, that Will was experiencing unconscious wish fulfillment so to test his theory he manufactured the means to allow the dreamer to make his dreams real. And Will hates him for it. Loves him despite it. Will had parroted Lecter's belief they were just alike to reinforce his position of influence. And Lecter had known that repeating that mantra consciously would reinforce the power of that mantra in Will's subconscious. Because to Lecter's thinking, Will's subconscious dreaming is wish fulfillment. Fulfilling Will's dreams is important to Lecter. All he ever wanted was what was best for Will.

Everyone should have a therapist like Hannibal Lecter. With friends like Lecter, who needs enemies?

Daniel thinks Lecter's attraction to Will, his need to possess Will is probably the most normalized approximation of humanity Lecter had ever exhibited. An anomaly in his pathology. Hannibal had not known what to do with his feelings for Will any more than Will knows what to do with his feelings. Lecter believes that what he feels for Will is love.

Daniel supposes that whatever Lecter feels for Will is the closest he has ever come to actually loving another being besides himself. He does not doubt that Will is aware of this. What else but love could cause a psychopath like Lecter to wound his obsession so viciously yet let him live.

Lecter is a cold and calculating killer. His actions regarding Will that night in his kitchen had been anything but cold.

Hopefully, Will wants to concentrate his incredible inner strength on liberating himself from the self-imposed exile of his imagination. He needs to see a clear path to accomplish that. As his therapist, Daniel can help him do that. That is what rational Will wants him to deliver. In order to help him, Daniel needs to see Will's universe as it truly is; not the sanitized and abridged version he presents to Daniel.

There is one other disturbing thought that plagues Daniel. Chilton's nasty diatribe contained a kernel of truth. Lecter has effectively neutralized the one person who could catch him. The survival instinct in Lecter must have recognized his affection for Will as a weakness. As long as Will is unable or unwilling to pursue him, it is highly unlikely the FBI or anyone else will ever find him. Lecter will allow only his beloved Will that honor.

Will sits staring at the fireplace, physically here in the room with him, but his mind is still soaring. Daniel has observed Will is becoming ever more absorbed in his inner universe. He hardly touches his phone. Daniel knows the calls and messages from Verger and Crawford go unanswered. Daniel has checked his laptop to see if Will works on the case files, follows leads, anything to suggest he still hunts for Lecter. He doesn't.

Aside from a little clothes shopping and the trip to get his CAT scan, Will stays close. He has yet to get a haircut and seems not to notice the ringlets that brush well past his collar. He is in limbo in both of his realities. The fire that claimed his residence has allowed Will to claim his independence. Daniel doubts that Will intends to clue the FBI or Verger in on his whereabouts anytime soon. Will is not going to lead either Jack Crawford or Mason Verger to Lecter, and he never intended to. From what he has learned of Will, from what he feels from him, he is certain that Will wants his reckoning with Lecter to be a private affair.

Daniel looks at the mantle clock, an electric relic from his grandmother. Its smooth walnut finish and clouded glass face with Roman numerals reminds him of the old city row house she lived in, a place he associates with his childhood. It is one of the few pieces of home that Daniel brought with him to Florence.

It is also one of the pieces that draws Will like a magnet. Daniel observes Will contemplating the old clock from the roost he has taken up on his end of the couch. Will has his habits and assuming the same spot on the same cushion every time he takes up space on the couch is one of them. Daniel wonders how long Will had been sitting there before he walked in.

"I was with you in your inferno?"

Will looks up at Daniel, blue eyes clouded with gray, but sharply alert and his mouth set in a stubborn line. Daniel feels the sadness tear his chest. His own nausea and soreness from last night pales to the throb of the wound across his stomach that is especially acute right now. He experiences tightness in his gut whenever he is with Will and Daniel has gotten used to it. Unfortunately, this means that Will has become accustomed to the psychological pain of it, too.

Daniel thinks he thrives on it. Saint Will has not punished himself enough yet; his wound the equivalent of mental flagellation. These dreams and hallucinations are eating Will up from the inside out. Will is eating himself up from the inside out. Once he let Daniel into the fringes of his private universe, the one he shared with Lecter, his precious forts began to leak and the floodgates Daniel has been expecting to open since their first meeting are about to burst.

Daniel hates seeing him do this to himself. He imagines Will ripping his own heart out of his chest and tearing it apart in his hands, blood and ravaged muscle twisted in his teeth. Daniel knows Will has not told him everything. There are gaps in the narrative he has shared and the dreams, well; the dreams have been carefully edited. Like everything that has to do with Lecter, Will holds them close. Like his hate. But, Will is not hateful by nature and keeping the hate pure is difficult, keeping such a malignant emotion close is toxic.

His dreams have been sacrosanct; he feeds Daniel only the morsels he wants him to taste. He believes he is protecting Daniel by keeping the prime portions to himself. Daniel needs those cherished chunks to help Will whether Will wants him to have them or not.

Daniel licks at his lips. They are still parched despite draining twenty ounces of spring water out of a plastic bottle on the ride home. His mouth is a desert.

He feels like baked shit warmed over, but this dream has really shaken Will up and his concern overrides his physical discomfort. He tries not to yawn to give Will an excuse to make light of this recent descent into his own private hell.

“Will? This is the first time I was in there with you?”

“Yeah, it’s getting crowded in there…”

“Will…” Daniel begins and lets it drop. Humor is a coping mechanism of Will’s, and at least it is a healthy one.

Will looks to the door rather than into Daniel’s face. Daniel can already read too much and he will want to talk about it. He will want Will to talk about it because the worry Will sees in his eyes is genuine. But Will sees the fatigue, too. Daniel is mentally hammered, and Will is not going to forget what he just experienced if Daniel takes a nap or a shower. Daniel doesn’t need to hear about it right now. He needs to recuperate.

“Tell me about it.” Daniel sits down beside him on the couch. “Please. This one was different, wasn’t it?”

“I’m ok, Daniel. You just walked in the door. It can wait.” Will notices the tense way Daniel holds his jaw, the tired creases around his eyes robbing him of his usual vibrant visage.

“How do you know I just walked in the door? Did you see me?”

“I doubt you would have stood there watching me for too long. Really…I could use a little time to reflect, gather my thoughts. I know you want to hear all about it and I won’t disappoint.”

“I’m not going to let this go. Your dreams are intruding on your waking life.”

“I know. Critical mass. You think I am going to snap. I’m not.”

“Honestly? I have no idea what you might do, but I do know that’s something’s got to give and I would rather whatever it is happen under controlled conditions, with me. What do you think?”

Will looks up and nods at his psychiatrist, his friend. He manages a wrecked wrinkle of a smile as he imagines the winged Daniel in his inferno seated next to him.

One of these things doesn’t belong here…

“You want to talk about your rough night?” Will says watching Daniel smack his lips and leap up from the couch. He stretches his arms over his head and cracks his neck.

“Not really.”

Daniel walks to the fridge and yanks out a bottle of water. Guzzles it empty leaving the fridge open and tosses it into the recycle bucket near the back door. He pulls out another bottle, cracks it open.

“That bad?”

“On so many levels. I don’t know if I want to punch the shit out of something or fall asleep in the shower.”

“I’d go for the punching…falling asleep in the shower sounds dangerous.”

“I clearly have to threaten Maria with bodily harm if she takes on another new patient.”

“I thought you took on the wine princess personally.”

Daniel starts up the steps, “Oh, this is another patient. You sure you’re ok? I would like to get a shower, change my clothes.”

“Go lie down for a while.”

Will waves him off. He picks up The Divine Comedy from the coffee table where he left it, opens it to the dog-eared flap and begins to read. Daniel watches him for a moment.

“Tell you what. I’ll lie down if you write down your dream. A narrative with annotations about what you think the symbolism is. And then place this dream into some context, chronological or otherwise with the rest of them.”

Anything else? Will looks aside, chews on his lip so the sarcasm settles silent and restless on his tongue. Daniel is his psychiatrist and this is therapy. Every minute he spends with Daniel is essentially therapy. He wonders how Daniel feels about that.

“Will?”

Will forgets Daniel doesn’t actually read his mind, though it feels like it sometimes.

“Okay.”

Daniel’s eyes roam around the living room and kitchen, and he notices the orange peels and coffee mug on the sink.

“Did you eat anything beside that orange today?”

A weary sigh wafts from the couch as Will pushes off to rise to his feet. “I’ll fix us some lunch. There’ll be something good for a hangover when you come down.”

“And just to add to your anxiety, I want to hear all about Alia, too.”

Daniel hopes Will had a positive experience with the pretty detective. She seems able to wriggle her way past Will’s dense defenses.

“Only if you’re going to reciprocate.” Will says evenly. When Daniel doesn’t answer, Will smiles.

“I didn’t think so.” He says as he watches Daniel climb the stairs.

He sets the paperback down and ambles to the kitchen and opens the fridge, dogs in tow. He frowns at Cara and Bella who have taken up positions on either side of him, mouths open in anticipation. Will decides they are very spoiled dogs.

Daniel did not come back downstairs for a few hours. Will had let him sleep. While Daniel had slept, Will had done as he had asked. The time had passed quickly as Will had filled page after page of the spiral notebook with the details of his dreams. Will has written down his progression of dreams chronologically for Daniel and the act of writing has brought clarity to the scattered associations he has already made. He has gathered up the associations from the dark recesses and committed them to the sunlit pages Daniel now holds in his hands.

As Daniel reads over Will’s notations replete with underlining and arrows, Will thinks again how insane he is. How insane he must appear to Daniel.

He wonders how Daniel even lets him stay here. Perhaps madness is contagious.

He leans back in the kitchen chair, hands resting in his lap listening to Vivaldi, violin concertos of course, while Daniel reads his missive of madness. He watches Daniel’s expressions, tries to imagine what Daniel feels behind the glimmer of green, what thoughts pass through his mind as smoke from his cigarette drifts across the remains of their lunch.

Daniel has been writing in the margins and drawing circles around what Will imagines are key passages. At last, he clicks the pen a few times, and glances over the last page before finally setting the pen down. Will allows Daniel’s calm mist to ease into his mind, a cloud to absorb the dread.

Daniel pushes the notebook across the table at Will. He draws on the cigarette as he looks into Will’s eyes. Will had expressed his thoughts with his characteristic caustic wit and candor. Daniel knows he is the only person with whom Will has shared this secret part of himself and while reading page after page of Will’s wild imagination has raised questions, much of it has confirmed what Daniel had already suspected.

That he can see what Will cannot tells him a lot about Will’s state of mind. Will sits quietly in his chair, a bemused expression on his face, a paragon of paradox wrapped in a pretty package. Daniel stifles the urge to give him a hug or something equally sentimental. He’s a little emotional himself and a rebuff from Will, no matter how gentle would nag at him and diminish the professional demeanor he needs to take with Will this afternoon.

And it is afternoon. Will had let Daniel sleep the rest of the morning away until the sun was well on its way back toward the western horizon.

Daniel takes another thoughtful pull of nicotine off his cigarette. His bad habit helps him think, gives him time to edit what he is about to say. He sees apprehension, but he also feels relief coming off Will as hope swims behind the blue; hope that the burden he has been carrying will not be quite as heavy as it was before.

“You…are a Freudian wet dream.” Daniel says as Will rolls his eyes and presses his lips together in a tight line. Daniel waits for the smile and it does come…eventually.

“Well, what does it all mean, Sigmund?” Will says as he flicks at the crumbs on the table.

“I think the narcissist in Hannibal would be extremely flattered by all the attention he receives. There is nothing in your dreamscape that is not connected to him in some fashion.”

“My, but that was astute.”

“Let me ask you this. How do you see the dreams? What function do they serve?”

“Dreams are windows into the subconscious. Pressure valves for the stress we experience during our waking moments.”

“That’s how they function for most people. Most of us don’t remember our dreams. How do they function for you?”

“In a Freudian sense?”

“If you want to start there, we can.”

“Freud would say my dreams are a combination of latent and manifest desires, probably sexual. A psychoanalytical interpretation would indicate a lot of…repression.”

“There is some sexual content in your dreams, but I think he would agree that your dreams are about fear and aggression.”

“Aggression? Me?”

Daniel can’t help but smile. Will is such a loveable asshole.

“Everything you think about during the day becomes memory. Memory fuels your dreams along with the emotions you associate with the memories. You remember your dreams; think about them during your waking hours. Your memories are stuck on replay. Why do you think that is?’

“Because I am still traumatized?”

“That’s one way of putting it. If I thought I knew how to ride a bike and then crashed it, I would think twice before trying to ride the bike again.”

“This thing with Hannibal is way more complicated than riding a bike.”

“And your dreams are way more complicated than mine, wouldn’t you say?”

“I don’t know what you dream about.”

“Well, I sure as hell don’t dream about hell. Or the Iliad. Or imagining myself and my therapist as nude angels…”

“You made your point.” Will rubs his face with his hands and leaves his palms plastered over his eyes. “I think I am losing my mind…again.”

“Jung thought dreams were subconscious messages the dreamer needed to pay attention to.”

“I would agree with that.”

“So do I. We agree your subconscious is trying to tell you things. So we can assume your dreams serve that function. Your imagination provides an unlimited playground, too.”

“But my fears are specific and that’s why my dreamscapes are limited.”

“Limited to Hannibal. Your universe is very small Will. I am surprised you fit me in there.”

“Probably a slow night at the Graham dream factory…”

Daniel kicks at Will’s feet under the table. There are likely sexual undertones to Will’s nude renderings in his dreams, but his representation of Daniel could be a classical allusion and it carries a coded message cloaked in the mythical universe Will has adopted as his own. Daniel does not think Will’s inferno should be restricted to Christian interpretation. The thread of Greek mythology runs thick through Will’s, and Lecter’s universe.

“Are you familiar with Gestalt therapy?” Daniel asks him.

“Familiar enough to know I’ve never been subjected to it.”

“No, I guess you haven’t. Well, that’s what I’m going for. Very expanded Gestalt.”

“Gestalt is focused more on what’s happening in the immediate environment and less about what happened in the past. It uses all the patient’s experiences. Rather appropriate I guess.”

“You and I need to be able to tell the difference between what is actually being perceived and felt in the current situation and separate that from the residue of your past.”

“You want me to understand who I am, not who I was.”

“Right. The past does influence the present, but you exist too much in the past. Agreed?’

“Agreed.”

“And as far as understanding who you are; it doesn’t have to be either this or that, Will. I think you think you have to choose…”

“Between who I was and who I am…now?”

“Between perspectives. Your experiences have changed you, but you insist on applying a past perspective on the now. It’s all about seeing, Will.”

“I need to alter my perspective to adapt to the way I think.”

Your design is evolving. Your choices affect the physical structures of your brain.

Killing is changing the way I think.

“I think so. You have been manipulated with behavior modification; you have been overly subjected to it and it would not be a desirable approach in this instance anyway, and rather than rely on a psychoanalytic approach that depends on the transference between patient and therapist to identify the issues, I want to engage in some directed awareness using your dreams to accomplish that. You spend an awful lot of time there."

Daniel thinks that since Will with his dual nature exists in at least two realities at any given time, that no other approach makes sense. Two sides of him constantly shuffling back and forth between realities can only go on for so long.

"Directing my conscious awareness wouldn't get us anywhere." Will says.

"It has gotten us this far. You trust me. I trust you. I have been modeling the kind of immediate awareness I want from you and I have been allowing you complete access to me, physically and emotionally."

"The sex is therapy, too?"

"Seriously, Will?"

Daniel frowns. Sex is a troublesome topic for Daniel. His feelings for Will have become very complicated. Daniel is becoming aware that he does not like being a surrogate for Lecter, no matter how…therapeutic it is.

He reminds himself this is not the time… Will is talking and Daniel shifts the focus of his gaze from watching Will's tongue trip lazily over his lips to the empty glasses on the cluttered table. Damn him.

"You have allowed a positive interpersonal relationship to develop naturally rather than try to manipulate or force an outcome." Will says, long tapered fingers rubbing at whiskers, "You didn't plan on becoming…intimate, but you allowed it to happen. You didn't stop it. You didn't plan on my place burning down, but you took advantage of that, too."

"I recognized that conventional therapy wouldn't work with you. Your trust in psychiatrists is not especially encouraging. I had to do the opposite of what Lecter did. He is clearly into behaviorism. I can't undo what he did, Will. I can help you understand who you are now."

"You didn't trust the usual doctor patient dynamic would work with me."

"I believed you wouldn't trust it. You would not trust me if you even suspected you were being manipulated. You chafe under authority. You question everything I do as it is." Daniel smiles to soften the blow of that blunt observation.

"So you had to trust that I would eventually trust you."

"I hoped." Daniel says, surprised at the sudden raise of Will's brows. "Boundaries and trust. We seem to have worked those out pretty well."

Will nods towards the cigarettes and Daniel slides them over. Will thinks the trust he has in Daniel is well placed. Well placed enough that there are very few boundaries left to…negotiate. He understands they are negotiating one more as they sit here. He slips a cigarette between his lips, lights it and inhales. He watches the smoke dissipate and disappear much like his anxiety when Daniel is near. Daniel does have a way making him feel more together and less like disintegrating into the well of hopelessness he finds himself sinking in when he is alone.

Daniel tries not to fixate on the epitome of oral fixations staring him in the face. Watching Will wrap his lips around the tip of the cigarette is torturous. Daniel has to consciously keep his thumb out of his mouth.

“Well, I have to tell you that I am a little embarrassed about some of the imagery in my dreams…” Will says.

“Don’t be. I dream about you naked all the time and there is no symbolism in my dreams. No inferno, no classical framework. My dreams are wish fulfillment, unapologetically pornographic.”

Will rolls his eyes and sighs. Blows more smoke through pretty pink lips.

“Feel better?” Daniel says.

“Not really.”

“Speaking of wish fulfillment, your dreams don’t provide you with any. You want answers and insight and you wake up without any. You said you used to dream about killing Lecter. Those dreams were fulfilling, yes?”

Will thinks of his fingers wringing sheets while his body had rocked upon the mattress, cock swollen until blood soaked dreams brought him surging release and he had lain quiet and perspiring, white-knuckled and trembling with shame. Only then had his fingers relaxed, freeing fabric from his sweaty palms.

He had on occasion nearly lost his nut in Hannibal’s office, hallucinating while Hannibal had been pouring wine or whiskey on the other side of his office. He had taken the glass from Hannibal’s manicured and steady hands with a smile, lifting his eyes to meet Hannibal’s and draw them up and away from his trousers.

Hannibal had never let on if he knew one way or another. Infuriatingly polite…Hannibal.

“To a degree. At the time the dreams served to fuel my anger toward him, keep me focused.”

“Kept you distracted from other emotions about him.”

“That too.” Will sighs again, his discomfort becoming more apparent.

Daniel takes that as a signal of progress. Will won’t push himself into the uncomfortable places in his mind on his own. That is what Daniel knows he has to make him do. Like a personal athletic trainer, Daniel will have to push Will past the limitations he has set for himself. Because he stops when it begins to hurt.

Daniel understands Will has endured a lot of hurt already and it pains him to place Will in this position.

“Why the inferno?”

“You think I am punishing myself.”

“Are you?”

I dream more now than I used to.

Well, your dreams were the one place you could be physically safe, relinquishing control.

Not anymore.

“I don’t…feel good about where I am right now. I don’t know that I would characterize it as punishment. I feel lost. Like there is no solid ground. I wouldn’t call that punishing myself.”

“The antler man used to taunt you, right? He would symbolize Lecter’s interference.”

“That sounds about right. The ravenstag seemed to exist between the two of us. It led me to him, but it was a means to be him. Later, I imagined myself growing antlers when I put myself in his head. As I became aware the Ripper was Hannibal, the dreams changed, too. I would see the antler man in my dreams and when I was awake, but in a dream state.”

Will thinks of watching the antler man take the stand at his trial. Will had stared into those blank and black eyes while Hannibal had testified on his behalf. He is afraid he is going to start seeing the serpent tailed eagle perched on the furniture in Daniel’s house any day now.

“You think the thing twisting in your stomach trying to get out is like when you grew antlers?”

“I think so. A manifestation of becoming like him.”

“And it frightens you. You fear the eagle, too. Not because it might hurt you. You are aware you are dreaming when you see it. You are afraid of what it represents.”

We are alone without each other.

“Yes. I’m afraid this scar is going to split open and that thing inside is going to overtake me…”

“Like you sprouted wings in this recent dream.”

Daniel feels the fear though Will sits calmly beside him at the table. Of all the things he fears, he fears losing himself the most. He believes giving in to his impulses will erase his sense of self; that he will no longer know who he is. Daniel thinks Will would recognize himself in that Will. He doesn’t want to know him, but he already exists.

Of course Will has been quite aware of his dual nature for some time. He avoided it. He is fighting it now. Lecter found it and brought it out of Will. Will wants to believe the Will he became for Lecter was a fabrication, another Will he manufactured from his imagination for the purpose of luring Lecter since, to Will’s thinking, Lecter had brought out that part of him through his manipulation; a product of conditioning.

Will’s capacity for self-deception runs deep and wide. He wants to put the genie back in the bottle. And if he can’t, then he will blame Lecter’s mind fucking for it. Because Will needs to remain angry. He needs to keep the hate. The alternative is…unthinkable.

“The thing inside me resembles the eagle.” Will is saying.

“Hannibal, the serpent tailed eagle, interacts with you, talks to you, shows you things.”

“Daniel, I understand that the images I see in my dreams are my own design. I am talking to myself.”

“We are all talking to ourselves in our dreams. Everything in your dreams, animate or inanimate represents a part of you. I think you are in an uncomfortable place emotionally. You came here to find Hannibal. But you find yourself in limbo, like you said. You identify with Dante’s Inferno on some level because your subconscious is conforming to your emotions and your memories. Maybe you aren’t punishing yourself, but you do equate your existence with hell.”

“And I’m going to remain in it until I find him?”

“I think you’ll remain there until you give yourself a reason to leave. What was going on in your waking life when you entered the inferno?”

Will closes his eyes to remember. He had begun to lose time, he had dreamed of his snow covered forest in flames while he was still living at the palazzo. “Daniel…my dream about the forest changed the night after I called you about losing time.”

“The night before you came over for dinner, before the fishing trip.”

“Huh. That doesn’t bode well for you, does it?”

“I don’t think I prompted your inferno directly, but the realization that you were slipping into routines or habits you thought long gone might have. You said on the phone what you were experiencing did not feel like regression.”

“I said it felt like I never left.” Will nods his head. “Like I’m right back where I started.”

“On some level you equate that with hell. But you are also using this dreamscape to find Lecter.”

“I associate him with smoke and the devil. Among other things…”

“I’m not going to ask you to figure out the symbolism of each and every thing that pops up in your dreams. We could be here an eternity for that. But, I think you dream in Lecter’s universe because you never left. Part of you is still on the kitchen floor.”

“I dream about that a lot, too. I know.”

“And we both know one of the reasons you keep going back there. Will, why is it so important to know when and how Lecter realized you were deceiving him? You had been deceiving him. I don’t see how that changes anything that night. He didn’t leave because he was waiting for you, to punish you.”

Will knows it is the nature of the deceit that bothers him. He had to deceive Hannibal. Hannibal never let him explain…

“And maybe it is on that kitchen floor that I really entered my inferno. Because I’m sure I had him and he wouldn’t have hurt me without a really really good reason. He believed. Abigail…was for me. A surprise for me, a gift. But I surprised him and not long before that dinner date with Jack. He would have left with Abigail had he not figured something out.”

“You said he said they couldn’t leave without you.”

“That was Hannibal rubbing it in. He took a chance waiting for me to get to his house.”

“He knew you would come looking for Jack. Lecter didn’t know the FBI plan had fallen apart. To him, Jack had showed up alone, early…but alone just like he was supposed to. And you were supposed to join the fox in the hen house.”

“I told both of them I would be there.”

“Yes, you did, but we’ll get to that later. You told me he knew about you colluding with Jack.”

“He was aware. I talked to Jack on the phone right in front of Hannibal sometimes. He knew Jack wanted the real Ripper. I had convinced Hannibal that there were snares around both our necks. And that wasn’t far from the truth. We were playing with the FBI.”

“So you think it was Lounds.”

“Had to be. I didn’t know about Chilton, so it had to be Lounds.”

“But even if it was, Will why does it matter? The end result would be the same…”

“It matters to me. It makes a difference…”

Daniel blinks with the sinking feeling in his gut, like a brick just scraped its way down his throat and now sits cold and heavy in the pit of his stomach.

“You would have killed Lounds except for the FBI. Her phone call… She figured you and Hannibal out, but too soon. You couldn’t kill her and not because she would have spoiled Jack’s time table, but yours?”

“Hannibal would have killed her. We had talked about it. She wasn’t supposed to be at my house that day. If I had planned on bringing her to Jack, I could have told Jack to go pick her up. I actually didn’t know what to do about Lounds.”

“You thought about killing her.”

“For a nano-second. Hannibal would have been so pleased. That’s why I decided to give him that in a way that wouldn’t screw things up. That is what hooked him. And finding out I lied is what got me flayed.”

“Explain what you mean.”

“If he had gotten to her first, all hell would have broken loose. Alana would have disclosed our dinner conversation to Jack and Hannibal would have been under investigation, officially. There would have been no proof, no evidence either, just like all the rest. But killing Lounds would have been the last straw between me and Jack.

“If I had really killed her, Jack would have hung me out to dry. I was already under scrutiny for Tier. Purnell would have been all over Jack. She would have shut us down then. Jack’s hands would have been tied. I needed more time with Hannibal. Hannibal needed to believe there was a wedge between me and Jack. I needed Jack to trust me after Tier. And Lounds needed to shut up.”

“So you make Jack a co-conspirator. You regain control of the situation. You let Jack deal with the FBI so you can play with Hannibal. You couldn’t explain that to Hannibal?”

"I couldn't know what he would do with the information. He would have had doubts about me. We were already hip deep with the Vergers. I hinted at alternate means of taking care of Lounds, but I don't think my message was received. Once he gets an idea in his head, he is very hard to dissuade."

Daniel can only imagine how a conversation on the advantages of not killing someone might be frustrating with a psychopathic serial killer. Who is also your boyfriend. Daniel lights another cigarette.

"I need to know when he knew I had not killed Lounds because then I will know at what point he was deceiving me."

"He has been deceiving you from the beginning, Will…"

"Not with the intent to hurt me. Hannibal is compulsive about certain things. As long as he believed I was being truthful, he was truthful in return. When he learned the truth about Lounds, that reciprocity ceased. He would have offered misinformation about himself, more misdirection. But whatever he said before that…would have been honest."

Daniel had known that at some point in his seduction of Lecter, Will had allowed himself to enjoy his role playing. He had enjoyed the raw power of killing Tier, but entertaining the idea of killing outside of self-defense is a point of no return. He is certain that point came with Lounds. No wonder Will had dreamed of setting her body on fire. He had had to make himself believe, so he could convince Lecter who was no doubt watching him closely. And Will had enjoyed his visions of the fiery Lounds. He had been upset and shocked, again, at his own cruelty and lack of remorse.

Daniel thinks the only remorse Will had truly felt, was the remorse over what he had lost with Alana Bloom. He had had to endure her suspicions and recriminations, knowing that on some level, he was a bad person, doing bad things. Just not the bad things she had thought as she had hurled accusations at Will over Lounds' desecrated grave.

But, Daniel does not think this the time to discuss all that. He does have an agenda today, a loose one, but there is some ground left to cover before they call it quits. It is apparent to Daniel that Will's version of Hannibal is constantly shifting in his mind as Will contemplates an actual meeting. A meeting he is trying to prepare for and which becomes ominously more imminent with every passing day.

"You need the honest insight, the honest exchanges and disclosure to find him, to construct an updated version of Hannibal in your imagination. So you remember. You dream. You dream in his universe where you have spent every waking moment for the last…Christ Will. You have been in his head since…"

"Since I met him essentially. And, he has been in mine."

"First Hobbs haunted your dreams; then the Ripper…until you realized Hannibal was the Ripper."

"And then the fun really started."

"Will, your inferno reflects the limbo in your waking life. Your life shapes your inferno. You aren't hunting him anymore, are you?"

“My hunt is at a standstill. I have no new information. The twins are off the grid for some reason. Whatever they found about his past is with them. They have yet to send me anything else. I can feel Jack and Mason breathing down my neck…”

“You don’t need them, Will. You already have everything you need in your head. You’ve been immersed in his universe for a long time. You have been all over his office, his home, been in his head.”

I let you know me. See me…

“Then why haven’t I found what I’m looking for?”

“Your fear.”

Will grinds the cigarette into the ashtray so the fibers cling to his fingernails. “I don’t let my fear control me.”

“You experience all kinds of fear and you have faced it and managed it through some pretty awful experiences. But you are letting it control you now. This time your fear is directed at yourself. You know your way around your own head so well, that you can avoid where you don’t want to go.”

“I never believed I killed all those girls. I dug around in my head for evidence of that, and Hannibal’s influence.”

“And you found it. Because you wanted to prove your innocence. I might be less inclined to look for something that proved my guilt.”

“I don’t need to prove my guilt. I know what I’ve done. You think I want to be in that inferno? That I want to have those dreams?”

“No. But being there means you don’t have to be someplace else. The kind of fear you know is a comfortable companion now. If you find what you seek, then you have to act on it. A new fear. A new companion.”

“Hannibal. You want me to what? Find him? Kill him? Run off with him?”

“You have to finish this…one way or another. You cannot live your life in the land of what-if.”

“What life? I am…miserable, Daniel. I have boxed myself into a mental corner.”

“When you find what you seek, you will thrill to it. And you will hate yourself for wanting the thrill. But that is who you are.”

“I know who I am, Daniel.”

Adapt. Evolve. Become.

“Yes, I think you do. You already have all your answers in your head. You always have.”

“Then why am I wasting time in my inferno?” Will snaps without meaning to.

Daniel does not respond with his usual quick smile and placating words. He’s feeling what Will is feeling and he’s tired of Will’s misplaced anger being directed at him. Will’s anger sets off Daniel’s frustration like a chemical reaction. The barrier between his emotions and Will's has become porous, dangerously so. Will is infuriatingly stubborn.

"You carry incredible guilt for the things you were compelled to do. You believe you should be punished for that, but who is really qualified to punish you after all you've been through? Not the FBI. You should be locked up right now, but the FBI thinks you will lead them to Lecter. You want your reckoning but you haven't decided how you want that to play out. So you wait. In your inferno. For what sin are you punishing yourself?"

Do you remember the circles of hell, Will?

> I was euphoric when I killed Freddie Lounds.

Most of them, why?

Consider the ninth circle as you contemplate your…present situation.

"I'll bet it's not for murder, is it?"

Will simply stares at Daniel wide-eyed in shock. He feels heat rising up his neck. Not from embarrassment or shame, but anger. And he does not even know at whom or what he is angry, but he is seething with it. With every word that came out of Daniel's mouth, the heat had spread like a fire consuming him, like hell itself.

Will closes his eyes and breathes until he feels his jaw slacken, until he stops grinding his teeth. Daniel is very perceptive. He read between the lines of Will's chronicle of crazy and quickly diagnosed his patient. Will shouldn't be angry at him. He should be angry at himself.

He has condemned himself for his own treachery. A personal offense against the plaid suited god himself. Condemned himself for his betrayal. Of Hannibal. The psychopath. The serial killer he has hunted for two years. The man who ripped his mind apart and fed him people. He feels more guilt about that, than for anything else he has done.

He is insane.

Perhaps in addition to his diagnosis, Daniel came up with a remedy…for this insanity. At least return him to the kind of crazy Will is used to. Will swallows the bitter pill of managing his expectations once again. He takes a deep breath before turning his attentions back to Daniel.

"How do I get out?" Will says.

"How did Dante get out?" Daniel counters.

Will grinds his jaw. Of course Daniel would ask him that. "He climbed up Satan's back to the cliffs to look at the stars."

"And how did he leave hell?"

"On the wings of…an eagle." Will says slowly. "The eagle flew him to Purgatory."

"And from there he found Paradise. Will, eventually, your mind will open up those locked doors."

"You want to be there when I open the doors."

“Yes. I want to open you up with drugs and hypnotherapy so that you can’t block anymore.”

“You think I am blocking my feelings about Hannibal. Well, I’m clearly in touch with them.”

“Then why is your therapist in your dreams?”

“I like your company…”

“The wolf has been nudging you to look. The angel or whatever he is told you the devil is not as dark as he appears. What does that suggest to you?”

“That you aren’t my Virgil.” Will says, flicking the wilted lettuce from his sandwich around his plate.

“Neither are you Dante.” Daniel slides the plate out of Will’s reach.

“The angel…you… want me to see the good in Hannibal. I’m not seeing it.”

“Doesn’t mean it isn’t there. Find the good in him and find it in yourself. But why not just tell yourself that? Why the messenger?”

“Because I trust you to tell me the truth. Because I’m not really trusting myself right now. So even in my dreams, I need to hear it from someone else.”

“And that is why you came to me. To be your anchor. You are questioning a lot of things, about yourself, and that is a very scary place to be in.”

“Yeah. I’ve been there before.”

I know who I am…

“I don’t really want the drugs, Daniel.”

“I know. You have good reason to be afraid of those, too.”

“Can’t you um…regress me without them?”

“It wouldn’t be productive. I understand your reluctance after what you’ve been through. I’m not going to give you anything you’ve been given before. Your brain is already acclimated to them.”

“What kind of hallucinogens are you going to introduce? Or aren’t you going to tell me that, either?”

“I can’t. You anticipate too much as it is.”

“You aren’t going to tell me what you want me to remember, either.”

“I’m not going to ask you to remember events. I am going to ask you to create some. I’m going to ask you questions you will not ask yourself. To imagine what you want to happen because you won’t do it on your own. Will, if you can’t confront him in your dreams, you won’t be able to do it in person.”

“I won’t be able to navigate the hallucinogens. You are throwing me unknowns.”

"Yes. It's going to get uncomfortable. And I'm going to see it. You are protecting me, I get that. But I can't help if you keep me out."

"When did you want to do this?"

"I was planning on today, but uh, circumstances have given you a reprieve. I am not up to it today. I need a clear head to deal with you."

"What I would like is to see where I go when I black out. Wherever that place is with the odd wallpaper."

"Anything is possible, I guess. It will depend on what you remember and think about when I prompt you during the therapy."

"Maybe you should prompt that perfume I smell sometimes."

"Perfume?"

"Yeah. A woman's fragrance. I smelled it at your office, at my palazzo, and here a couple times."

"You associate the perfume with the blackouts? Why didn't you mention this when it happened?"

"I'm not sure it is associated with the blackouts. I haven't smelled it in a while. But it wasn't Alia and it wasn't any of your staff. I have smelled it before and I can't place it."

"Will, your conscious mind is connected to your subconscious in ways I don't understand. Associations come quickly, but randomly for you right now. Your dreams play out in your mind to a point, but you wake yourself up. You won't go any further. The hallucinogens will ensure that you do. That you don't block. I will be there to supervise, to be who you need me to be. You really need to do this Will, and I understand your reluctance to take the drugs, I really do. I wouldn't ask unless I thought it was necessary. And if you don't want to, we won't. Your call."

"You won't slip me anything for my own good?"

"Not without your permission. Never."

Will looks hard at Daniel for nearly a minute as his mind cranks out possible permutations of probable outcomes. At the very least, he will get a huge dose of honesty from himself. At the very worst, Daniel will finally see him for the wreck he truly is. Then again, Daniel seems to know more than Will gives him credit for.

Will concludes it all comes down to trust. He has allowed Hannibal to call the shots long enough. Daniel deserves his turn at bat. Maybe he will hit a homerun. At least something will get on the scoreboard. Will hasn't put any points up.

"Okay. When?"

"Soon. I don't want to give you too much notice."

Daniel does not intend to give Will any notice. Any advance preparation on Will's part will undermine the therapy and Daniel has waited far too long for Will's approval. If Will knew what he had planned, he would have never agreed to it. He does have one question that has been nagging at him for a while. Since Will has pretty much abandoned his hunt for the time being, Daniel thinks he should inquire and see what falls out. Before the hypnotherapy.

“Will…” he says, still editing his words as he speaks, “it has occurred to you that you wouldn’t need to hunt Lecter if you drew him out, right?”

“Draw him out how?”

Will’s tone is almost conversational but Daniel feels the prickle of agitation from him, like needles along his skin. Daniel watches Will consider his question.

“Like take out a personal ad? Let’s meet at a neutral location?” Will grins despite how unsettled he feels.

“No…I was thinking something more his style, something more…grandiose.”

“Like a murder tableau?” Will says quietly, actually impressed that Daniel would even submit such a sordid suggestion to him.

“I’m sure the thought crossed your mind.”

Will decides to give Daniel an honest answer. Daniel is getting better at thinking like him. Will doesn’t know how he feels about that.

“A grandiose invitation like that would also draw out law enforcement on an international scale. I’m pretty sure I would be escorted not too politely out of the country.”

“But you thought about it.”

“I…considered it, yes.”

“And you dismissed the idea because it wouldn’t have been effective. Because you couldn’t control the outcome.”

“Pretty much.” Will says knowing Daniel will chew on that for a while.

Will meets Daniel’s eyes without blinking looking every bit the killer Daniel knows he can be.

Will begins to pick up their plates and clear the table when Daniel doesn’t respond. He sets the dirty dishes in the sink and begins to wash and dry, methodical and quiet as he stares out the window over the sink. He feels Daniel’s eyes at his back.

Better the devil you know.

Daniel feels like he is watching Lecter’s prized predator pace around his kitchen pretending to be domesticated, perpetrating a pantomime of epic proportion.

Daniel has invited a fledgling serial killer into his home and is intending to feed him hallucinogens so they can engage in guided hypnotic therapy in the hopes of helping the killer standing over his sink to accept his nature and climb out of his fiery inferno.

Daniel does not think; he knows he must be crazy. As crazy as Will.

Will’s crazy is contagious. Daniel wants to think that Will would never hurt him, that the bond they share shelters him somehow. Will likely thought the same thing about Lecter. Daniel swallows the lump in his throat and walks to stand beside Will. His patient. The demonic angel who shares his bed. The angelic demon who shared Lecter’s. He collects the dried dishes and begins to put them back in the cabinet as another Vivaldi concerto queues up.

Chapter End Notes

Coming up:
Hannibal prepares one his favorites for Daniel unfortunately at the twins' expense, calls Roberta for a favor, and ponders some memories of the mongoose he left in his kitchen.

And shortly thereafter: Hannibal has his next session with Daniel, he locates Will, and can't help but send Will an invitation in his own grand style.

Chapter 52

Chapter Summary

> Daniel has a eureka moment with Will. Hannibal makes the twins pay for their supper, chats with Roberta, and ponders some memories of the mongoose he left in his kitchen.
>
> Hannibal hums to the melody of the sweeping sonata until he gets to the passage Will always had trouble playing. The tempo shift from first to second movement never failed to trip him up. Hannibal had suggested he was manifesting a resistance to transitions. Will had countered that perhaps Hannibal shouldn't keep time with his hands between Will's legs.
>
> Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata had also been one of the selections playing during a divinely delectable dinner with Alana and Will. Hannibal had been unable to decide which had been more sublime, his entrée or the cloaked exchanges of insinuation around the table. The three of them had dined on Mason's gift of a fresh hog together. Alana could not have conceived the consequences of relating her conversation with one Freddie Lounds that evening.

Death of Patroclus, Eric Rutledge

Chapter 52

Daniel has a eureka moment with Will. Hannibal makes the twins pay for their supper, chats with Roberta, and ponders some memories of the mongoose he left in his kitchen.

Daniel feels like he is on autopilot as he puts the last of the dishes in the polished oak cabinet. He feels dazed with emotions that spin within like a whirlwind tugging at bones and breath. He stares at the brass handle on the cabinet trying to separate his emotions from Will's. He knows the killer lurks in Will, he does not usually see it as he did just now. As he stands with hands flat on the white Formica countertop, Daniel considers the pacing predator at his back. Will is restless. If he has already dismissed the idea of committing murder to draw Lecter out into the open, then he must be anticipating something else. Daniel contemplates what that might be.

Will could resort to killing and arranging a tableau for Lecter if he was desperate enough, but Daniel does not think he is. Not yet. Will could take a life, could take pleasure in it, could even rationalize it if he thought doing so would snare Lecter, but to Will's thinking, the sacrifice would have to be a worthy one. Every life lost in the pursuit of Lecter has cost him emotionally. To kill in order to catch would bring Will closer to becoming what he fears. Will cannot take the moral high ground if his actions betray his beliefs.

That does, of course, assume Daniel's beliefs about Will are accurate. His gut tells him that he is. Until Daniel learns otherwise, Daniel decides to trust his gut. As conflicted as Will is, Daniel does not believe it is in him to send Lecter an invitation written in blood.

Will has not exhausted every avenue available to him and if his dreams and hallucinations are any indication, he is not ready to confront Lecter. He is in no rush for that confrontation as long as he spins in his inferno. Something else clouds the blue eyes that turned away from him to seek refuge in dirty dishes.

Will is keeping something from him. An anxious kind of anticipation has bloomed since Daniel asked about drawing Lecter out. Perhaps something has developed that Will doesn't want to talk about. Unfortunately, Will not wanting to talk wouldn't be anything new. But something is causing the edginess that coils throughout Will's limbs, drawing out the predator in him.

His dreams have changed. Dreams are conceived out of memory and emotion. Will's inferno is also shaped by his emotional response to his waking world. Something has caused Will to include his therapist in his inferno. Daniel knows he has made appearances in Will's dreams, but not recognizably in his inferno. As far as Daniel can tell, his likeness in Will's inferno represents Will's better self, the part of him he wants to protect and the part of him that he trusts.

What could arouse that degree of anxiety in Will? Will, who is well acquainted with stress and ugliness.

A threat. What else could explain the thinly veiled aggression that assails Will from within and feels to Daniel as visceral as hairs rising along his neck. He turns from the cabinets to find Will gazing at him from the other side of the kitchen.

Will has turned around from the sink and is watching him closely; his eyes wander over Daniel's body like he is taking inventory. Daniel thinks perhaps he is. He realizes Will is profiling him, taking into account every physical aspect of his being in an effort to imagine Daniel's thoughts. There is an easier way.

"You could just ask me, Will." Daniel says as Will's eyes alight on his face.

"Ask you what?"

"Whatever it is you think you can't. While you are at it, you can tell me what you are holding back."

Will draws on his lower lip, looks aside and rubs at his neck, fingers lifting damp hair from his skin. Daniel is usually assessing Will's state of mind. Realizing Will is assessing his must be a tad bit unsettling for a psychiatrist. Looking at Daniel so intently is a little unsettling for Will. The duel edged sword of intimacy pricks at his heart and between his legs.

As Will tries to imagine Daniel's thoughts, images of lunging at him to grind him hard against the counter and rip the thin tee from those well-muscled shoulders come unfiltered and raw. Will can almost feel the luscious ripple that sucking on Daniel's tongue sends the length of his body, setting his nerves to tingling. He longs to sink into the blissful oblivion Daniel offers, just for a little while. He suspects Daniel wouldn't mind. A little physical reassurance that Will has not completely flipped his lid would likely be well received. Will knows what makes Daniel tingle, too.

Daniel knows all about his dreams now where he had only snatches before. He has a frame of reference for the emotions he experiences while Will approximates slumber beside him at night or sits slumped on his couch, lost in a hallucination. Will does not know what it would feel like to not fear his dreams. He wonders what it would be like to not fear what awaits him when he wakes from them. What it would be like to not mingle dreams with waking life.

The nightmares continue to follow him out of his dreams. His dreams have been intruding upon his waking life for a long time. He has not allowed anyone to share in those intrusions since…

Do you feel alive, Will?

I…I feel like I'm fading.

Have you experienced any further loss of time? Or hallucinations?

The memories of his conversations with Hannibal throb with a life of their own in his consciousness. They tug. They hurt. They torture. He misses them. He hates that he misses them.

You sit in that chair, Will, as you have so many times before. It holds among its molecules the vibrations of all our conversations ever held in its presence.

Will pushes off from the sink and walks to share the counter next to Daniel. Daniel's hands are splayed along its edges, fingers poised and tremulous. His feet are placed apart in front as he rests half sitting and half leaning, the posture reminiscent of the way he used to take up beside Hannibal at his antique teak desk. He feels Daniel's head nudge his shoulder.

Will nudges him back.

*"*I don't want to ask you anything, Daniel. I just wanted to gage…where you're at. With me."

"I know who you are, Will. You're deciding whether to tell me something, or not?""

"You just had to ask about drawing Hannibal out."

"I like to confirm whether or not I'm right about something. Don't you?"

"Is it uncomfortable for you to think like me? Because you are getting pretty good at it."

"I should be way more uncomfortable than I am. In for a penny, in for a pound."

"I know you think you know what that means, but you don't."

Will sighs into Daniel's hair, and reaches across his chest to massage the soft curls that rest on his shoulder as he thinks how much Daniel has partaken of his banquet of crazy. Daniel is well past the appetizers at this point. Will does not think Daniel will be surprised as much as worried by what he has to tell him. And he should be worried. Any sane person would be.

Will's thoughts have been consumed with the Paolini twins for days. He has not heard from them in almost a week and he can no longer attribute their lack of contact to their vices. Considering where he sent them and who they were looking for, he can only imagine one reason for their disappearance. The primary reason he sent them. The satisfaction spreads warm across his lips.

Will is a good fisherman. One simply needs the right bait.

He looks down at Daniel, dark curls and warm breath on his shoulder. Ever the calm mist upon his turbulent sea. Daniel remains his anchor despite his glimpses into Will's well of depravity and darkness. And Will is grateful to feel the weight of that anchor beside him. Will does not require empathy to know he frightens Daniel. Will had been frightened of Hannibal, too, and that had not stopped him.

This is Daniel's Gestalt at work; facing his own fears as he helps Will deal with his. Will thinks this dynamic between them the most focused awareness he has ever experienced. He can only imagine what insight will surface from the hypnotherapy. Daniel is proving to be a most unconventional psychiatrist after all.

The proposed therapy will force Will to step out of his recent past so that he can slip off the regret and wishful thinking like old shoes. Daniel wants him to shake off the residue and see Lecter and himself with fresh eyes. Will needs to attempt this sooner rather than later with the twins missing in action. Daniel has been correct about many things. Will has been looking for Hannibal in the physical world when he should have been searching his inner landscape all along. Daniel has been the intrepid explorer in the rugged and ruined terrain of Will's mind.

Daniel is extremely perceptive. Will thinks there is nothing that Daniel is not capable of figuring out, given enough time. His empathy allows him to understand Will quite well, so well, that Daniel is likely becoming shocked at his own associations. Will reminds himself he knew Daniel would be affected. It was only a matter of time.

He is firmly in Will's mindset now as their conversation this afternoon proved without a doubt. While Will struggles within the inferno of his dreams, adapting to the associations and impulses that tear at his mind, Daniel is struggling to adapt, too. Daniel has adapted enough to be able to think like Will. He already feels everything Will does and has been gradually connecting emotions to thoughts.

Will knows his association with Daniel is changing him.

Who you were yesterday is laid waste to give rise to who you are today.

How many lies have had to be sanctified? How many consciences devastated?

Daniel's conscience remains intact, though he has made many concessions for Will. Daniel seems to have accepted his concessions as collateral damage, weighing his needs against Will's and finding the scales tipped in Will's favor. Daniel's feelings for him run deep and Will is aware that Daniel's empathy is another of those two edged swords Will has a habit of picking up. It is a sword Daniel will find very sharp if its blade finds him.

Will knew he would not be able to protect Daniel from the dark clouds, but the knowing does not make it any easier to accept. Daniel's gentle mist hovers still, but Will doesn't know for how long.

He has kept Daniel out of his hunt for Hannibal as much as possible, exposing him to fragments of information in the hopes of keeping him safe and far from the fallout that will surely come now that Will is certain the lures he threw out have at last attracted their mark. Will has caught no mere fish; he has attracted a shark with an offering flesh and blood. The shark will want more.

Daniel is unaware of the game Will plays with the Sardinian twins, Mason, and Hannibal. He is somewhat aware of Will's status with the FBI, but Will has not explained that situation in any detail either. Jack will not leave messages much longer and he should probably talk to Jack before the imminent shit storm breaks once Hannibal makes a meal out of the twins.

Jack will do what Jack wants. He will consider what Will tells him, but the trust between them will never be what it was. Jack still needs Will's imagination. Jack prefers to keep his tarnished and broken pony close to the stables these days. Will is in Florence conditionally. If he does not call Jack, he forfeits those conditions. And Will will become the hunted as well.

Will rubs at his face as he stares at the ceiling. He has to tell Daniel about all the little games before something happens. Will knows very well now how actions can be misinterpreted and intentions rendered meaningless.

"You know" Daniel says suddenly, lifting his head a little. "I had the weirdest dream last night. It's the only dream I remember."

"A drunken dream? Are you sure you want to share?" Will says into the curls on his shoulder.

"I think a little role reversal could be therapeutic."

Daniel yawns. Thinking about his dream has him thinking of his bed upstairs and how good it would feel to sink into it right now. How good it would feel if Will were to sink into it with him. Will can indulge his predator instincts there as much as he likes…

"For me? Or, for you?" Will says.

"Maybe cathartic is a better word. Confession is good for the soul, huh Will?"

"Depends on the soul. What did you dream?"

"I was fishing of all things. I have never dreamed about fishing in my life, but there I was in this stream like we fished in the Tevere and I'm throwing in my lure, a little feathered thing with a hook. I'm not really paying attention to it after I throw it in the water. I'm looking around, seeing rocks, trees, the banks of the river… And then the feathers on the lure start getting really big, like coming out of the water big, like Jaws. I'm thinking I'm not going to catch any fish with a big huge lure like that and then I start getting angry and frustrated because the lure is not only big it's heavy and hard to manage. Finally, the lure is so large it flies right off the fishing line. And it flies in slow motion so I can see it is an eagle."

"Sounds like something I would dream." Will says, not looking at Daniel, eyes focused on the ceiling.

"I think so, too. Any idea why I might dream about fishing and eagles?"

“Sounds like you have an idea.”

“I’d still like to know what you think. Apply yourself to my perspective and indulge me.”

Will can almost feel him grinning wickedly beside him. Daniel had likely been reflecting on recent conversations while falling asleep. He had absorbed all the imagery from Will’s dreams and his own subconscious had created a dreamscape fueled by his emotions and Will’s.

“See what happens when you sleep with your crazy patient?” Will says.

“It is a hazard of the job, one I have been well compensated for.”

Daniel nudges Will’s ear with his nose and Will feels the smile spreading across his lips despite himself. How typical of Daniel to draw him with honey rather than vinegar.

Will sighs as Daniel’s lips brush across his throat. “I think you spend way too much time in my head. That was me in the stream, not you. You think I am already fishing for him, already thrown out the bait. Our conversation this afternoon has confirmed that for you.”

Will pauses and thinks that Daniel might be more attuned to Will than he is aware. If he dreamed this dream last night, even before hearing Will’s latest revelations today, even while being someplace else and fairly occupied, Daniel has absorbed quite a lot. Will wonders what else he has collected unconsciously.

“Your mind is too quick for your own good. What else are you thinking?”

Daniel rolls his head along Will’s shoulder, inhaling the scent of his shirt and his hair. He stares through the window over the sink into the yard as ideas about Will’s motivations form on his lips.

“There are other reasons for not making your own…tableau. Law enforcement would be a deterrent, but I am sure you are as capable as Lecter of leaving no evidence. You were not prepared to sacrifice some random Italian to attract Lecter. It would have to be somebody who, at least to your thinking, deserved to be the bacon so to speak. So, you figured another way to lure him out.”

Will grins into the curls at his cheek. “So far, so good.”

“You sent the twins on a wild goose chase a couple weeks ago hoping that their digging would turn up something to grab his attention and provoke him. Lecter would connect the dots to Verger, then to you. You’re…manipulating Lecter ”

“I’m trying and it wasn’t a wild goose chase. If someone goes poking around in your old neighborhood, chances are somebody still lives there who knew you. Might even get word to you that people were nosing around. There was nothing going on here and Alia had phoned to tell me that the twins were under scrutiny and if I didn’t want to be traced to them that I should get them to lay low for a while. They had been spending too much time around the precinct, I guess, and somebody noticed.”

Will knows now it was only Alia who had noticed, but it doesn’t matter at this point. What does matter is that she has kept her conversations with Will to herself.

“If Lecter connects them to you, he will kill them. He’ll want you to know he found them. You want him to make the tableau; to reveal himself.”

"He will kill them just for snooping. He will find them insufferably rude. The connection to Mason is icing on the cake. The connection to me…well, I don't know how that will be received. I hoped they would poke around in a sensitive spot and it looks like they have. Hannibal will be curious that I am working with Mason."

Will has no doubt that Luciano will give him up. Hannibal will pull Luciano's strings like a puppeteer and Luciano will dance until the strings are cut. Luciano will repeat every word Will ever said to him and Hannibal's mind will turn. Hannibal will see through the deception in the lies and feel right at home. He will play killer to Will's profiler once again and lace his tableau with misdirection, knowing only Will will see it.

"I think he will feel other things besides curiosity." Daniel says.

Will picks up on the concern in Daniel's voice. His concern is well-placed. Hannibal's emotions are nothing to be trifled with.

"Whatever he learns from the twins will bring all his emotions into focus. He is methodical. He will seek more information.

"You are sacrificing the twins to catch him, Will. But you know that. You want them dead?"

"They plan on killing me and Hannibal."

"They want to kill you? I thought they work for you."

"They work for Mason. Mason wants to kill me almost as much as he wants to kill Hannibal. We are, each of us, a means to an end."

"So instead of you killing the twins…"

"I let Hannibal do it for me. He kills the twins and my hands are clean. Of course, when he does, it will bring Mason, the police, Interpol, and Jack a-running. If I send Hannibal a love letter using the twins, I am compromised. I will be asked to consult on any criminal investigation that ensues and I will be suspect regardless given my history."

"He is much more likely to make the connection to Mason, and you, if he finds them alive rather than hearing about it on the news, if you had killed them."

"Exactly. A news report would sensationalize the gore, but I think the Italian press would protect one its business leaders. Interpol would control the flow of information. And I would be lucky to remain in country."

"Why? How would they tell the difference between your work and Lecter's?"

"They wouldn't. But they when bodies show up like that, they will investigate me. I would have no alibi if I killed them. I wouldn't be able to account for my time. And doing that takes…a lot of time. Unless I asked you to lie for me and I'm not going to put you in that position. This way, like I said, I am clean and once they clear me of whatever Hannibal has served up, I will be asked to consult and catch…again."

"But Will, wouldn't Lecter be thrilled at the thought of you creating a tableau just for him? He would jump on that…"

"Which is why I considered the twins as…art. But once I did, that is the extent of their usefulness. I would have Mason, their family, and the authorities after me, including Jack. And…Hannibal might not have responded. While he would have been moved by the sentiment, he wouldn't trust it."

"But, if he stumbles upon the hired help…"

"Then he will want to draw me out, to see where I stand…this time. Either way, Hannibal will likely conclude I am again colluding with the FBI. He may, or he may not, reach out to me. I think he will."

"He hasn't reached out to you in a year, Will. No matter where he is on the planet, all he had to do was start leaving bodies. You were wondering why he hasn't. You are forcing his hand."

Will knows Hannibal will consider every possible angle with painstaking thoroughness. Will is confident Hannibal will take into account his limitations and resources. Knowing Will is in Florence searching for him with Verger money and apparent FBI backing will bring Hannibal out of his retirement. His curiosity is his whimsy and Will is his muse.

"As he has forced mine on many occasions. I continue to posit his intentions in that regard. We sort of left things…unresolved."

Daniel smiles at Will's unfailing gift for understatement. If Lecter has the twins he will learn Will is working with them. How long before Hannibal figures out where Will is?

"When you sent the twins to Lithuania, you were still living at the palazzo. You're here, now."

"I know. We have time. Hannibal doesn't know where I am. That complicates things for Hannibal. The twins can't tell him where I am because they don't know about the palazzo and I never told them. They were in France. They are either still in France which would mean so is Hannibal, or they made it back to Italy."

"Which would mean he is here, has been all along. Laying low and waiting for you?"

"Waiting for something. Like you said, he's had a year to drop bodies. If he has the twins, and I believe he does, then it won't be long before I am investigating a crime scene. It is his nature. Even though he will know I am expecting it, he will oblige. He won't be able to resist."

To the truth then, and all its consequences…

"He will do it knowing Florence will be crawling with law enforcement. A manhunt of epic proportion."

"He likes epic. He thrives on it. He exists there."

"Achilles battles Troy again."

"And he will want his Patroclus at his side."

"Yeah, and he'll come looking for him…"

"Daniel, except for you and Alia, no one knows I am here."

“Chilton does.”

“Hannibal will not be talking to Chilton, although…Jack might. Damn. Well, Hannibal will only know as much about me as I know about him. We are both in Florence. That’s it.”

“You might have said something to me sooner. No wonder your dreams have kicked into high gear with all that anxiety. Jesus Fucking Christ, Will.”

“Christ has nothing to do with it. The less you know the better. I told you I don’t want you involved in this anymore than you already are.”

“You are living with me, in my house. I am already involved.”

“You are as involved as you need to be. I need you as my anchor, so you can hang up your cape before you even put it on.”

Daniel sighs. Arguing with Will now will get him nowhere. Daniel decides to focus on what Will needs at the moment, and perhaps the rest will take care of itself. He hopes so before it becomes open season.

“It is even more important that you face your fears, Will. You are running out of time.”

“I know.”

“And Will…”

“Yes?”

“You’ve just unleashed another inferno”

Will is quiet as he coils thick curls around his fingers. Will has unleashed not the Inferno, but the prospect of a resurrected Iliad. He is counting on Hannibal wanting to rewrite this one, too.

The Tuscan sun sinks in the west outside; the hazy coral sky grows dark as Hannibal descends into the basement, but the Paolini twins wouldn’t know that. They see only what Hannibal wants them to see within the confines of the sound proofed room. Hannibal thinks it remotely sad that neither of them will ever see another sunset. He thinks it more tragic that watching the sun make its glorious ascent or watching it plunge into the horizon is a pleasure they likely never appreciate except accidentally should they glance up as they stumble from a bar...or a barn.

He has learned a lot about the twins during their sojourn here. They were bred to violence much like the pigs their family raises. Reared in an atmosphere of brutality and expected to carry out the family business with cold efficiency. They are dismissive of their cultural heritage and oblivious to their ignorance. Desensitized to the suffering of anyone outside of their family, but curiously ill equipped to endure any offense to their own. Luciano could break bones or slice off limbs all day, but touch a hair on his sister’s head and he loses all sense of detachment. Hannibal imagines Lucia quite the accomplished seductress, in her own way of course, and just as capable as her brother of slitting a man’s throat while she straddles him, cock between her legs and knife between her teeth.

But there is no art to their killing. No poetry. Their misguided vendetta has placed them on the wrong side of vengeance. For what they would do to him, to Will, they will experience the poetry of life and death first hand. But until then, Hannibal must keep them motivated and alive.

He opens the heavy solid oak door that leads to what constitutes a workshop here beneath his villa and greets the surly twins with a tray containing their dinner. The meal is for Luciano. Lucia will have to forego her dinner this evening. No food before surgery. But Luciano needs his vitamins and his medication.

“What is this?” Luciano asks, wrinkling his nose.

“The usual. Protein and carbohydrates to last you a while.”

Hannibal snaps a napkin in the air, arranges it next to the plate. He checks the bindings at Luciano’s wrists and satisfied they are secure and not too uncomfortable, moves to inspect the sister.

Luciano groans as he sits up from the mattress on the floor and jerks at the heavy chain that wraps around his ankle and binds him to the sturdy metal anchor point protruding from the cement and tile floor. For all his talk of manners, this Lecter treats Luciano and his sister like livestock. He makes references to the pigs his family raises for Mister Verger. He thinks Luciano does not notice his little pig puns, but he does not give the pompous Lecter any satisfaction.

Luciano will have his satisfaction when his family finds him and his sister. They are searching for them now. This Lecter has no idea how resourceful his family is; how many palms are kept greased throughout Italy. It is only a matter of time before Mister Verger throws his own money into the search. Verger wants the information they have dug up on this Hannibal Lecter and it must be worth a lot for Lecter to hold them hostage over it.

Mister Graham may also be looking for them. He seems to want the information as badly as Verger. If anyone can find them, it would be Graham. He is an odd person with odd solitary habits, but he is very clever. Luciano thinks that if Graham sees the footage from the airport parking lot, he will figure out it was Lecter who forced them into his car. He will track Lecter down. That is what Verger hired him to do. Graham seems very much to want to catch Lecter.

Luciano knows what vengeance looks like on a man. Will Graham is a man with an ax to grind; a pretty big one if he has chased Lecter all the way from Baltimore. Too bad that Luciano can’t let him bury his ax in Lecter’s head. Mister Verger has plans for Lecter. And, apparently Graham as well.

Once Graham finds Lecter, he and Lucia have to do what they were hired to do. It is none of his business, but Luciano has wondered what the mild Graham did for Verger to want to kill him as well as Lecter. He had asked Verger only once to explain the reason for his elaborate charade on Graham. Verger had replied that he was not paying Luciano and his sister to think. He said only that Graham was as crazy as Lecter, but Luciano does not see it.

Luciano can believe Lecter is crazy. He already thinks Mason Verger is crazy. Graham seems to be the least crazy and Luciano thinks the only thing that qualifies Graham as crazy is his apparent association with Lecter and Verger. Luciano cannot wrap his mind around the relationship between the three men. He does not have to. It is business.

Luciano thinks this Lecter quite capable of injuring Verger, but no so much Graham. From what he understands, Verger is confined to a wheel chair and his face was ripped off. Yes, he can see Lecter doing that. Luciano supposes he will never know what part Graham played. It is not his concern.

Ensuring that both Graham and Lecter are securely incapacitated is what he has been hired to do. Graham has to die for whatever his offense to Verger, but Luciano has no quarrel with him. Luciano won't enjoy what he has to do to Graham, but it is nothing personal. He will enjoy seeing Lecter get his due. Luciano will enjoy that a lot. But until then, he must behave to give Graham or his family time to find him and Lucia. As the time has passed, Luciano does not care who finds them first.

He takes a whiff of the plate Hannibal slides beneath his nose and salivates. The aroma of aged provolone and crisp seasoned sausage fills his nostrils. Luciano has to admit this figlio di puttana does know how to cook, though Luciano is getting tired of breakfast food.

This Lecter fellow is a bit more complicated than Mister Verger made him out to be. He is educated, that much is clear. And he is strong, uncannily strong. The clothes he wears hide a muscular body more toned and fit than his own. Luciano knows Lecter could easily snap his neck, but he is unfailingly polite, apologizing for each and every discomfort he delivers.

And unlike the annoying and long winded Verger, Lecter explains himself rather well despite referring to books and such that Luciano knows nothing about. He had actually found himself paying attention to one of Lecter's stories about Luciano's ancestors, a captain of the guard for one of the Medici. Luciano thinks that all things considered, being Lecter's hostage isn't so bad.

Luciano would like to know what Lecter is keeping him and his sister around for.

It has something to do with Graham, but Luciano is completely stumped. The relationship between the three men is convoluted enough, but there is clearly something going on that has nothing to do with Verger. Graham seems to despise Lecter. Lecter sends mixed signals where Graham is concerned. Luciano isn't sure if he wants to kill him, eat him, or fuck him. Luciano shrugs. Maybe all three.

Lecter is one crazy figlio di puttana. The papers say he is a cannibal. He is wanted by the FBI for killing a lot of people. Graham had told him that Lecter was civilized evil. Luciano cannot imagine what that even means. He thinks perhaps Lecter ate Verger's face off. Luciano cannot understand what would make a person want to eat people. He reminds himself he is not paid enough to fathom the game being played between the cannibal, the paraplegic, and the profiler.

He shakes his head as he watches the unassuming muscular man dressed in blue twill trousers and Polo shirt fussing with his surgical instruments across the room. He looks like a doctor, a teacher perhaps. He does not look like a murderer. Or a cannibal.

Luciano has cultivated his intimidating appearance. He looks dangerous. This man does not. Yet, Luciano feels terror so cold when Lecter looks at him sometimes he has almost pissed himself. Lucia is terrified of him. And Luciano has seen Lucia kill a man. She is no delicate flower yet she trembles before this man.

He looks back to the plate of scrambled eggs, sausage, and buttered chunks of toast. Lecter won't let them use utensils. He won't even untie their hands. They have to eat from the plate bent over on their knees, licking the plates with their mouths. At first, Luciano had refused, but his stomach had quickly disagreed with that decision. As Luciano sucks up the delicious breakfast, he notices his sister is watching him eat. She has no plate of eggs and sausage setting on her mattress.

Luciano looks into Lucia's face. She looks like she is about to cry. Her eyes are watery and her little chin quivers beneath tight lips. They haven't eaten since afternoon yesterday and Lucia usually eats more often than her brother. She is a snacker. But, there are no snacks from Lecter. Luciano thinks she has lost some weight since they have been here.

He tries to think how many days have passed. Luciano does not know if it is day or night right now.

“Signor Lecter…you did not bring a plate for Lucia?”

“No, not this time. I’m sorry Lucia.” Hannibal purses his lips and frowns in apology.

“Did I…did I do something wrong?” Lucia asks rather timidly.

Hannibal notes the attitudes of the twins have changed remarkably since he brought them down here. Defiance had quickly disintegrated into docility. Hannibal could put them on leashes and walk them down the street if he wanted to. Of course the drugs help.

And a tray of surgical instruments can be a very strong incentive to behave.

“Of course you have.” Hannibal coos. “You are a very bad person. But, you did nothing to deprive you of breakfast, I assure you.”

“That makes no sense.” Lucia pouts as she flops back onto the mattress.

“It will.” Hannibal says simply.

Luciano looks from his sister to Hannibal and his temper begins that short trip from his brain to his mouth.

“Mannaggia. Why not make sense now? Did you run out of eggs?”

Hannibal raises his brows at the outburst. Both of the twins have been kept mildly sedated since arriving, and their fear has departed as a consequence. Of course Luciano is upset that Lucia has no breakfast. He feels guilty gulping down his own while she has nothing. Hannibal can remedy that disparity quickly enough.

He walks over to Luciano and whisks the half eaten plate of breakfast out from beneath his face. Luciano will have to do without the sedatives Hannibal mixes with their food this evening. Luciano should be more concerned about why his sister did not get her ration. Lucia is concerned. Hannibal sees her staring at the ceiling when she is not staring at her brother. The wheels turn slowly, but they are turning.

“Most thoughtless of me to serve you and not your sister. It will not happen again.” Hannibal says, holding the plate and thinking how he hates to waste his creations. Then again, feeding the twins is a bit like casting pearls before swine.

“Hey! We haven’t eaten for hours.”

“You will both be served next time, Luciano.”

Although your sister may not have the appetite for it.

Hannibal dumps the remains of the plate in the plastic lined trash can. All evidence of the twins’ stay here finds its way to his furnace or to the stone fireplace in the garden, for yard trimmings and leaves, of course.

"Maybe we could eat something besides what you make, eh? Nothing fussy…get some take out, some pizza maybe."

Hannibal's eyes narrow to slits. This grimy little Sardinian has a way of plucking Hannibal's nerves. Leave it to Mason to select hired help with mental handicaps. Will must have been tempted to take out Luciano himself.

Hannibal smiles indulgently at Luciano. "I never order take-out. But, if you and your sister would like pizza, I think good behavior could persuade me to indulge you. Perhaps slice a little of my homemade pepperoni on it? Meats are my specialty."

Luciano blinks and Hannibal waits for the neurons to fire in his dulled sedated brain. Luciano's eyes widen and Hannibal can almost hear his thoughts collide like the faded ding of an arcade game.

"Or perhaps we'll just stick to the sausage."

Hannibal watches Luciano's tongue wag helplessly from his open mouth. He turns to leave and walks up the steps to the sounds of Luciano retching up his breakfast. Hannibal wonders what Luciano thought he had been eating all this time. Ignorance is bliss; until it is not.

* * *

Hannibal prepares for Lucia's surgery upstairs where the twins cannot see. He will perform the surgery downstairs where there is a drain in the floor. There is no operating theater here in his villa and Hannibal will have to improvise. It will be a simple procedure, one he has performed many times, though not recently and not on a living person. The last time was…Miriam Lass.

He will have to sedate Luciano when he puts Lucia under. Luciano will be an intolerable distraction if he has to witness the amputation of his sister's arm. But, there is no other area at the villa where Hannibal can perform the surgery without inviting suspicion. This sort of activity requires discretion and seclusion.

Hannibal sees no reason to hunt fresh game when the domesticated variety downstairs will do just fine. The drugs should have passed from Lucia's system by now. Only Luciano has received his usual dose for the last two days. Lucia seems sedate enough without them. There will be traces of the powerful narcotic that puts her under, but the arm will not be attached that long.

Hannibal sighs as he lugs the cd player down to the guest room in the back of the basement where the twins recline on their mattresses. He misses his workshop in Baltimore. Everything perfectly in its place, tools, tables, and hoses at the ready. And the sound system was to die for.

He unlocks and opens the door, walks to the other side of the room ignoring the curious stares of the twins as they sit up to watch him. The villa is not equipped to handle the subterranean sound system he had before and Hannibal will have to make do with this portable stereo that plays three cd's at a time. He finds himself making do more often than he cares to.

He makes do with his position at the Uffizi that falls short of providing him with the intense social interaction and challenge of his former profession.

He makes do with Du Maurier's company and he makes do with the arrangement they have.

He makes do with this beautiful villa that approximates his beloved home in Baltimore.

He makes do with Doctor Clayton…

Perhaps soon that will change. When he finds Will, everything will change.

Lucia rests comfortably on the stainless steel table at the other side of the guest room. She looks peaceful despite the oxygen tubes taped to her nose and mouth and the I.V. in her arm. The arm that Lecter is not going to take.

An assortment of Beethoven's piano sonatas is queued up and Hannibal hums along to the melody as he positions Lucia where he needs her to be before turning his attentions to her brother. Unfortunately, Luciano is not soothed by the strains of Beethoven.

Hannibal picks up the syringe filled with a narcotic and crosses to Luciano whose face crumples in anguish at Hannibal's approach. With every step Hannibal takes, Luciano's breath becomes more ragged. Hannibal thinks he might hyperventilate. He'll be calm momentarily.

"What are you going to do to her?"

Luciano screams at Hannibal from his mattress as his head flops from side to side, eyelids fighting the sedative Hannibal injects into the vein that spurts blood from beneath Hannibal's gloved fingers. Hannibal has to struggle to get him still.

"I'm afraid you and your sister have eaten me out of house and home. I think it only appropriate that you replenish my stores."

"You…you're crazy! Cristo Santo! Brutto figlio di puttana!"

Luciano's words begin to slide off his tongue into incomprehensible dribble. He looks into Hannibal's face as Hannibal rubs gauze damp with rubbing alcohol over his skin before bandaging the wound where the needle sliced him. Hannibal had meant the injection to be practically painless, but Luciano had decided otherwise.

Hannibal strokes his fingers against his scalp, as Luciano's eyelids flutter and close.

"Luciano…I am not crazy. I am a psychopath. There is a difference."

Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata fills the room while Hannibal works upon Lucia, body spread out on a stainless steel prep table, her brother unconscious and quiet on his mattress. She is numb and out like the proverbial light thanks to the narcotic cocktail of propofol and phentanyl Hannibal has administered. The I.V. drip will keep her sedated for hours.

Her shoulder and arm have already been prepped, skin bathed in alcohol and tourniquet firmly in place. It is a routine procedure and Hannibal can perform it almost from memory. He wields the scalpel with a practiced flair; he has missed the feel of slender sharp steel in his hand like this, of using it for its intended purpose instead of shaving wood and charcoal from his pencils. A scalpel is both instrument of creation and tool of destruction.

It is the embodiment of elegance and beauty Hannibal thinks as the blade slices into the flesh separating skin from muscle leaving enough for the flap of flesh he will wrap around the stump. He has decided to take the fleshy arm close to the shoulder. Lucia is pleasingly plump as the saying goes and the meat from elbow to shoulder should prove tender.

Hannibal hums to the melody of the sweeping sonata until he gets to the passage Will always had trouble playing. The tempo shift from first to second movement never failed to trip him up. Hannibal had suggested he was manifesting a resistance to transitions. Will had countered that perhaps Hannibal shouldn't keep time with his hands between Will's legs.

Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata had also been one of the selections playing during a divinely delectable dinner with Alana and Will. Hannibal had been unable to decide which had been more sublime, his entrée or the cloaked exchanges of insinuation around the table. The three of them had dined on Mason's gift of a fresh hog together. Alana could not have conceived the consequences of relating her conversation with one Freddie Lounds that evening.

Freddie Lounds thinks the two of you are a paradox. She sees something no one else sees.

What's that?

That neither of you is the killer she's writing about, but together, you might be.

Hannibal had been enjoying the friction between Will and Alana even before Alana had disclosed her detailed discourse with Lounds with pointed perceptiveness. Alana had handled the awkward position Hannibal had placed her in with grace, the balancing act between current lover and rejected suitor had required tact. Alana's discomfiture had no doubt distracted her from noticing the silent signals that passed between Will and himself. Well, most of them.

Will's behavior had left Hannibal almost giddy with amusement. His expressions had vacillated between indignation and embarrassment; petulance and utter boredom. His comments had been delivered with his usual dry wit and complete lack of appropriateness. Hannibal had been delighted.

Hannibal isn't sure if it was the wine soaked conversation or the sexual innuendo that had sent Will nearly out of his seat more than once during the evening…

The sound of high-pitched whirring summons Hannibal from his memory palace. Lucia's eyelids do not even flicker as he guides the hand saw through her left arm. Amputations take a remarkably short amount of time to complete. Surgery is an art, and largely reliant upon intuition.

The saw glides smoothly through the bone and Lucia's arm is at last free. Hannibal checks her vitals and the various dials of the equipment hooked up to the sedated Sardinian. Blood pressure and oxygen remain at acceptable levels. I.V. drip perfect. What Hannibal takes from her will provide nourishment for another. Sometimes the Fates and the will of the gods align.

As he waits for the bleeding to stop so he can administer the sutures, Hannibal returns to his dining room in Baltimore where the wine had flowed from tapered bottles bearing French labels into tall stemmed glasses, staining lips and loosening tongues. Alana had sat to his left beneath the erotic Japanese prints Hannibal had hung just that afternoon especially for his guests, and Will had sat to his right beneath Boucher's Leda and the Swan. As if he could have sat anywhere more appropriate.

Will had noticed the new prints immediately and had graced Hannibal with his doleful eye roll once Hannibal had seated himself after seating the oblivious Alana. Hannibal thinks Alana must have been distracted that evening. For a psychiatrist, she had displayed a remarkable lack of curiosity in her surroundings. Then again, Hannibal had to consider who she was dining with. The prints on the wall could hardly compare to the beauty already seated at the table.

It's just hard to know where you are with each other.

We know where we are with each other. Shouldn't that be enough?

Better the devil you know.

Hannibal had sniffed the bouquet from his generous glass of wine, his eyes alighting on Will.

The barest wrinkle had tugged at his lips and he had quickly shifted his gaze from Hannibal to Alana.

"Better the devil you know than the one you don't?" Alana had said, sapphire eyes glistening playfully, determined to keep the topic lighthearted. "You imply another relationship could be worse?"

"I imply only that there is comfort in the familiar." Hannibal had said.

"Like the comfort of knowing you chose the lesser of two evils." Will had said, lifting his glass and staring into it as though there was something to contemplate at the bottom of the glass.

Hannibal had raised a brow at the subtle but pointed taunt. A double entendre that Alana had mistakenly assumed was directed solely at her. Alana had turned her head from Hannibal, lips parted as she had stared at Will from across the table.

"I'm not sure, Will, but I think you were making a joke just now." Alana had said, her words crisply spoken but blanketed with a quick smile.

"Was I?" Will had returned a smile just as quickly.

"Humor is often the first casualty after the third bottle of wine." Hannibal had said. "I'll clear our plates and if I could intrude upon you Alana, to assist with dessert?"

"Of course."

Alana had pressed an embroidered napkin to her lips and had shaken a finger at Will.

"No more wine for you." Alana had said, dropping her napkin to the table.

They had left Will stroking at stubble to either stare at or finish his wine. Alana's cheeks had flushed hot as they had entered the kitchen. She had imbibed a lot considering she preferred beer. Hannibal had supposed that Alana had been as eager as Will to self-medicate, to ease the tension between them. As it had happened, both of them had drunk themselves beyond the point of relaxation. Will had drank enough to become surly, an attitude requiring very little alcohol to make an appearance in Will, and Alana had drank enough to become emotionally impaired.

"You know I am trying to be the adult in there…" Alana had said, sipping on her wine as she had stood by the fridge watching Hannibal take out the tray containing their dessert her hand curling around his wrist.

“You have known him longer than I. You already know our dear Will is not the most socialized of people.”

“Hannibal, this dinner…was a lovely idea, and I know you mean well, but I think…”

Alana had looked aside, unsure of how to phrase the rest of her thought. Hannibal had relieved her of the burden of both thinking too much and of saying something she might regret.

“He needs to work through his feelings.”

“I feel the accusations. I see them in his eyes every time I look at him.” Alana had said. Her hand had recoiled as though bitten.

“They feel like accusations to you because that is how you interpret them. I think for Will, he struggles with accepting who he is after all that has happened to him. I invited him here tonight to help.”

“This is therapy?”

“When is Will not in therapy? He dines with two psychiatrists.”

“I thought he was dining with friends.”

“I prefer to think of my role as encompassing more than either therapist or friend. I think of our time together as an opportunity for Will. He is learning about himself.”

Alana had parted her ruby red lips to speak but had thought better of it, perhaps deferring to Hannibal’s professional expertise. She had watched Hannibal through half lidded eyes, taking sips of wine from the glass she stubbornly refused to part with. Hannibal had moved to the center island to add the finishing touches on their dessert enjoying the anticipation on Alana’s face as she had licked her lips.

“What is that?”

“Shhh. You’ll ruin the surprise.”

Hannibal had known she still had feelings for Will, kept them close to her heart, and told herself she had done them both a favor by not acting on their attraction to each other. Hannibal had known she told herself it was better for Will; but Alana had made the decision for Alana. Alana had wanted a relationship with an adult, with someone she admired, not pitied. Which was why she shared Hannibal’s bed, not Will’s.

They had rejoined Will in the dining room and had found him, not surprisingly, staring into his glass of wine, fingers absently playing along the stem. He had glanced up as they entered and had mustered a welcoming smile. Alana had nodded at him; likely hoping Will had no more darts to throw. One can always hope.

Alana had slid back into her seat, tucking a napkin over her snug skirt and folding her legs beneath her chair.

“This looks wonderful.” Alana had said, “So…what is this? And what is the red?” Alana had pointed to dark and earthy red layer at the top of her parfait glass.

“A triple chocolate mousse. Most indulgent. A layer of red velvet, dark chocolate, and milk chocolate. I trust neither of you are lactose intolerant? The red velvet was an experiment I hope pleases your palate.”

Will’s lips had tweaked with interest, tinged with suspicion. Alana’s lips had widened in a pleased smile.

“Red velvet is my favorite. How did you know?” Alana had gushed.

“I didn’t, but knowing that will make it taste all the sweeter.”

Hannibal had not missed the cold stare from Will. Hannibal had merely raised his brows.

“Please…dig in.” Hannibal had said, lifting his spoon.

Will had stared at the curled shavings of dark bittersweet chocolate and the dollop of fresh whipped cream setting atop the slender parfait glass Hannibal had placed it in front of him. His jaw had worked from side to side; almost mechanically as he had observed the three tiered dessert glasses Hannibal had served each of them.

Each parfait glass had contained three tiers of chocolate mousse, but the layers had been arranged differently for each of them, each layer representing one of them. The placement of the layers in each parfait had been an expression of their relationships with each other. Hannibal’s interpretation.

Alana’s parfait had been layered with milk chocolate on the bottom, dark in the middle and red on top. Hannibal’s had the dark chocolate in the middle, red on top and milk chocolate on the bottom. And Will’s parfait had been layered with the red at the bottom, then dark, and finishing with the milk chocolate on top.

It had not taken long for Will to assimilate the presentation before him and infer the intended correlations. His eyebrows had shot up and he had looked to Alana. He had relaxed back into his seat when it became apparent she had no interest in anyone’s parfait but her own. Will's droll expression had suggested he had not shared in Hannibal’s humor.

He had rolled his eyes at Hannibal before glancing at the Japanese prints above Alana’s head and finding the implied eroticism there no less provocative, had consigned himself to feigning something like polite interest. Hannibal had almost heard the silent sigh from him.

Will had set his wine glass aside along with whatever thoughts had been swirling in his head. He had fixated on his triple layered dessert, tongue testing lips as he had stared at temptation.

Alana had wasted no time picking up her spoon and taking up a scoop of the whipped dessert. A quiet moan had erupted, a decadent gasp as the taste had settled on her tongue to slide down her throat. Hannibal watched the rush of blood tinge that white throat and spread over cheeks, already hot from the wine. Alana had been glowing with warmth.

Will had sat enrapt as he had watched Alana take spoonful after spoonful into her mouth unaware of the two men watching her practically shudder with pleasure. Hannibal had been unable to hide his contentment. The swell of satisfaction bloomed beneath his waistcoat as he had watched her eat his carnal creation, the ingredients far more dark and earthy than the cocoa.

“Hannibal…this is exquisite. My god.”

Hannibal had slid a spoonful into his mouth and had silently agreed with her. Will had sat with spoon poised over his parfait, still watching Alana devour hers with marked enthusiasm. Catching Hannibal’s eyes, he had dipped his spoon and placed the cushion of cream and chocolate in his mouth drawing the spoon slowly from his lips. He had closed his eyes allowing the taste to tantalize his tongue.

Hannibal had watched with eyes riveted to the movement of his Adam’s apple as the mousse had slid sensuously down his throat. When Will eyes had opened, his pale blue gaze had found Hannibal’s satisfied smile waiting for him. Will had favored him with one of his wicked smiles and had slipped another, fuller spoonful into his mouth.

Another torturously slow swallow had followed, then the deliberate licking of red full lips as Will had stared at him full on, and Hannibal had wanted to drown in those pale blue pools. Will had once again nearly shattered Hannibal’s reserve with the mere act of watching him eat.

Both Alana and Will were beautiful people. Ever moved by beauty in all its forms, Hannibal could imagine their bodies entwined, naked and perspiring in verdant dew soaked grass. But it was not to be. In Hannibal’s Eden, the serpent had conspired to keep Adam and Eve apart. No tasting of forbidden fruit. Eve’s eyes had been opened enough already. She would have to be content with the serpent. God desired Adam for himself.

Hannibal had forced himself to tear his gaze from Will to grace Alana with his attentions. She had seemed unperturbed but her eyes had darted from Hannibal to Will and back again. It had seemed to Hannibal that Alana had better known the devil after that evening. Both of them.

“I’m tempted to ask if there was some significance to the dessert?” Alana had said.

Will had sat with elbows on table, chin resting on folded hands and brows arched above eyes widened in amusement.

“What significance do you see?” Hannibal had asked.

“Well, there’s three of us and three layers. Deliberate?”

“Unconsciously, perhaps. I had the time to make three layers.”

“And you layered them differently. On purpose?"

“A random arrangement, except that the one with red velvet on top was meant for you.”

“I wouldn’t read too much into it.” Will had said frowning at his half full parfait glass.

“Well, I found the presentation intriguing. And the chocolate is very intense, almost smoky. What am I tasting?”

Alana leaned into her nearly empty glass, had wrinkled her nose, as though she might be able to ferret out the elusive ingredients by smell.

“You know how reluctant I am to give up my kitchen secrets, Alana. I will tell you this. The smoky flavor you detected is from poblano pepper, just a touch.”

“And the color?” Will had asked all innocence. So infuriating…his Will.

“Food coloring, of course.”

Alana had dropped her spoon into her glass and leaned back in her chair, wiped her lips with her napkin and had watched Hannibal and Will finish off their parfaits a thoughtful look on her face. It had been coincidence that he and Will had both set down their spoons at the same time.

Moonlight Sonata had come around again and Will had taken that as his cue to dismiss himself from the table. He had pushed back his chair and stood without ceremony, shaken his head of dark curls and had offered his dinner partners a tired smile.

“Doctor Lecter…” He had nodded at Hannibal and then had nodded to Alana. “Goodnight, Alana.”

Straightforward, simple, and almost polite. Hannibal had noted that Alana had not tried to convince Will to remain longer, nor had she questioned why he had to leave suddenly.

“Goodnight, Will.” Alana had said. “Drive safely.”

Will had held up two fingers as he had made his exit from the dining room, not in farewell, but indicating Hannibal had the time it would take him to finish that much whiskey in the salon to dismiss Alana. If Alana remained when he had finished his drink, Will would have left by way of the kitchen door and driven back to Wolf Trap.

The habit of measuring time with fingers had started in Hannibal’s office shortly after Will had become his patient. Will had not used his words as much back then. They had quickly developed a short-hand of silent signals to communicate simple ideas. Their silent signals had been all the intimacy Will had been able to abide at the time.

Hannibal had understood the reason for the fingers this evening. While Will had been mildly piqued at the innuendo, his desire to remain had been rooted in something far more sinister and immediate. Hannibal had known the topic of Freddie Lounds had weighed heavily on his mind as it had Hannibal’s.

The decision had been an easy one. Alana had spent the last two nights rolling about his sheets and with Will waiting in the salon, there had been no contest.

“Alana?”

“Yes, Hannibal?”

“Did you drive or take a cab?”

“A cab. Why?”

“Why don’t you call for another. I’ve had a wonderful time. But it’s time to call it a night.”

Five minutes later, a horn had honked outside. As Hannibal had walked her to the front door she had turned to him and lifted her chin as dark silky tresses tumbled from narrow shoulders. Hannibal had leaned down to kiss her goodnight, the taste of wine and chocolate still warm on her lips. She had smiled up at him before finally crossing the threshold, purse swinging from her arm as her fur lined coat trailed behind her.

He had closed the door and had joined Will in the darkened salon. Will had been gazing out the window and Hannibal had reached for him, hands covering soft curls at the back of his neck to draw him close, to look into the eyes that had tantalized, teased, and tortured him all evening. To inhale the scent of his clothes, his skin, his hair. To brush his lips across his forehead. To hold what was his.

And as Will had folded into his embrace, Hannibal had seen Alana Bloom staring out the window of her cab, her eyes glued to the very window where he stood with Will and Hannibal had watched her mouth fall open as the cab had pulled away into the cold and cloudy night.

Hannibal glances down at Lucia and admires his sutures. Every doctor's sutures are unique, his own signature to his work. The seal around the opened flesh and severed bone is uniform and neat. Even though Lucia will not live long enough to appreciate the expert job Hannibal has performed, Hannibal has not been any less circumspect than if she had been an actual patient under his care.

Hannibal checks her vitals again and removes the tape and plastic from her nose and mouth. He adjusts the I.V. drip. He will have to monitor her closely, this table has no restraints and Hannibal can't have her waking up with a freshly bandaged wound like this only to have her thrash around and rip out every stitch he just put in.

He applies the bandages after selecting three more cd's to listen to while waiting for the twins to regain consciousness. Neither Luciano nor Lucia will be waking for a while. The anesthesia he gave Lucia will take nearly half an hour and Luciano will likely sleep longer than that. Hannibal is in no hurry for either of them to awaken.

The severed arm sticks out of the sink to drain, hand and fingers already pale from the loss of blood. Hannibal will get to sectioning it off later. The tender flesh will be fed into the meat grinder concealed beneath the brown plastic on the counter at the back of the room, far from the twins. The casings for sausage are already attached and the seasonings sit mixed beside the grinder.

In no time at all, Hannibal will have fresh sausage. He has another session with Doctor Clayton Wednesday morning and Hannibal would like to surprise him. He hopes Clayton will be punctual for this session so they have more time to enjoy breakfast. Hannibal is looking forward to a pleasant therapy session over hot Italian roast coffee, fresh squeezed orange juice, and Hannibal's own special protein scramble.

Clayton should have recovered from his encounter with Du Maurier by then. Like Will, Clayton is an intriguing mix of masculinity and beauty, an embodiment of the classical ideal. But more intriguing is his mind. Hannibal intends to investigate the beauty of Clayton's inner landscape over their intimate breakfast.

Unfortunately, Wednesday is three days away, and although thoughts of seeing Clayton again are gratifying, Hannibal reminds himself he has more immediate concerns.

As Hannibal thinks of his evening with Will after Alana's departure, he finds himself pulling out his phone and ascending the stairs for better reception. He has not thought about his conversation with Will that evening for a long time. He thinks revisiting that memory with a fresh perspective might reveal insight into Will's intentions now. Will's relationship with the FBI and with Jack had been strained since Will's incarceration. Their relationship had not improved afterward. The FBI had not welcomed him back and Will had not been especially effective at repairing his fractured connections.

Hannibal may not know where Will is at the moment physically, but he may be able to better ascertain where he is mentally with the right information. While the twins sleep and the music plays, Hannibal dials his cousin's number and hits send.

"Hello, Hannibal." The sound of Roberta's voice warms Hannibal immediately.

"Am I interrupting anything?" he asks.

"Nothing that holds a candle to a call from you. But I am not alone. Have your guests departed?"

"Not yet."

"Ah. Will they be departing soon?"

"That depends. I could let them go quietly or give them a big send off."

"Which do you prefer?"

"That also depends."

"A big send off will attract unwanted guests."

"And yet it may be the only way to send an invitation to a dear friend."

"Your friend is there?"

"He is. And working for Mason. My guests were assisting my friend."

"Sounds like he wants to find you after all. How does that make you feel?"

"Cautious. Before I send an invitation that will as you say attract uninvited guests to our reunion, I would like to know his situation with the FBI. I would like to know what the FBI is up to. I would like to know where he has been before arriving here."

"You may not like what I find out, Hannibal."

"I like not knowing even less."

"I will contact my friend on the Hill and we'll see what shakes out*, n'est ce pas?"*

"Merci, ma cherie. Jusqu'à la prochaine fois."

Hannibal clicks off the phone and returns to the basement. He begins the necessary task of cleaning up after the surgery. As Hannibal glances around his subterranean guest room he estimates he will have things tidy once again long before the twins wake up.

His chat with Roberta has lifted his spirits. Hannibal feels closer to finding Will. Will feels closer somehow. He thinks of that evening with Will after Alana had left in her cab. As his mind retreats into his memory palace where Will is as yet untouched by Hannibal's blade, unblemished by the tarnish of betrayal, Hannibal reminds himself the Will he is destined to meet again is not the Will in his memory.

Chapter 53

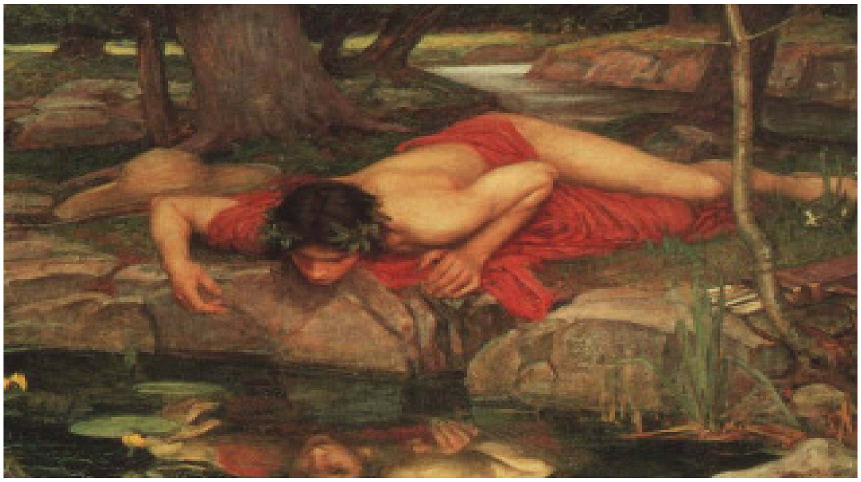
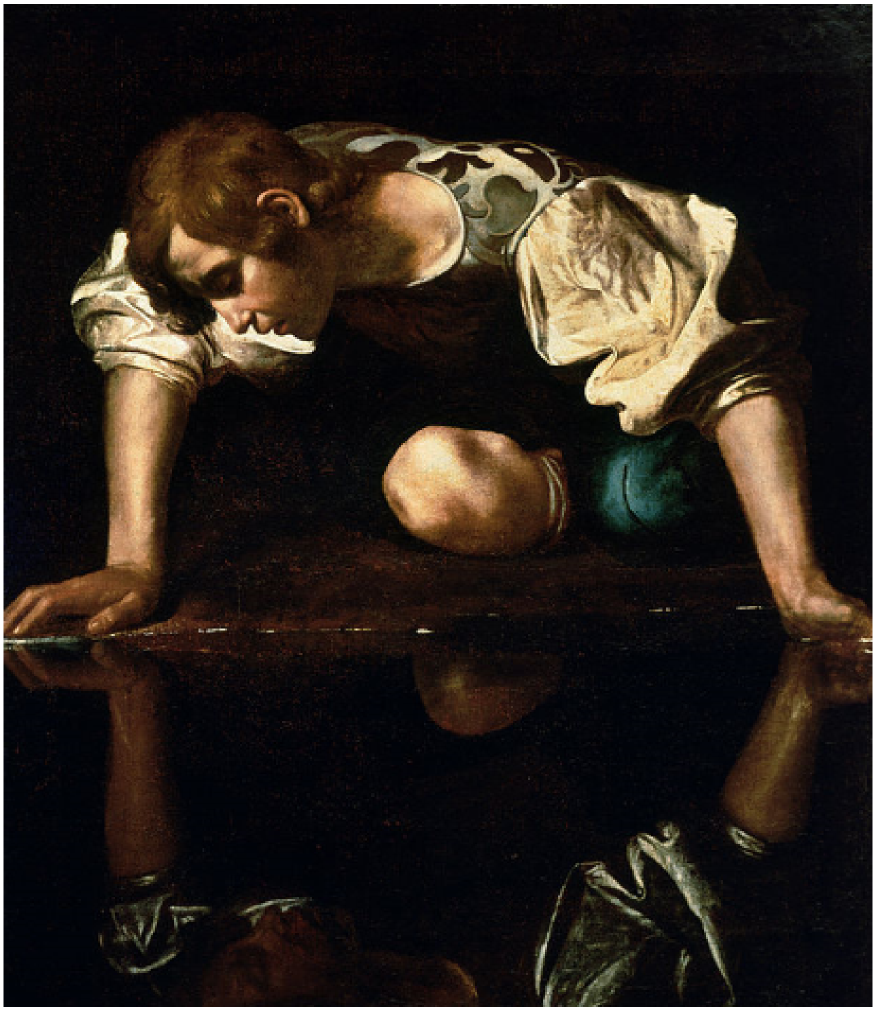
Hannibal returns to his memory palace to finish his evening with Will, has his session with Daniel, and at last…finds Will.



Cropped Echo and Narcissus John William Waterhouse 1903



Narcissus Caravaggio 1597

Hannibal leans over slightly to gaze at his reflection in polished steel, buffed to perfection, so it shines spotless and pristine concealing the sins of the hands that caress its surface now. Hannibal turns the handle of the meat grinder to the plaintive strains of Chopin. The haunting piano of his Ballade No. 1 in G minor, plucks at the sonorous chords deep within his splintered soul, plying him away from the scent of freshly ground meat at his fingertips, from the confines of the chamber of the condemned. And, like the notes of fine liqueur released from a fragile crystal snifter cradled in his smooth palms, the memories flow exquisite and warm.

Hannibal had removed the empty tumbler of whiskey from Will's hand his fingers brushing Hannibal's lightly, wisps of shadows barely there and then gone. Will's entire body had been flush as he had stood with his forehead pressed against Hannibal's chin in silent invitation. Head bowed and lashes pressed tightly together, unaware of the departure of Alana and her taxi.

Hannibal had swept his lips across Will's forehead, his nose detecting the various scents mingled in his hair, a road map of where he had been that day. He had smelled of fresh cut lumber, of metal scrapings and sandpaper, of snow soaked canines. And beneath the lingering smells of his day, had been Will's own scent faint but distinct. Will's scent was unique and Hannibal had smelled him often enough without embellishment to discern between the peculiar blend of musk and sweetness that fairly bled from his pores and the odors clinging to him.

Will’s hand had dropped from the glass and Hannibal had felt the tentative tug of his fingers on the edge of his suit jacket, at first wandering restlessly beneath it until, finding refuge at his waist, had splayed his fingers wide across the fabric of his waistcoat, to curl a finger through a belt loop closing the space between them. Hannibal had stood with one hand still ruffling curls, the other holding the tumbler aloft as gusts of bracing Baltimore wind had shaken the panes of glass.

“She’s gone.” Hannibal had spoken into unruly waves of brown, his eyes trailing the faded crimson lights of the receding taxi, and the confounded visage of Alana Bloom. “As you wanted.”

A soft chuckle had rumbled from deep in Will’s throat, “As I wanted, of course.”

Hannibal had felt him disentangle from the embrace. He had walked back a few steps, drawn his shoulders up and nodded toward the lighted kitchen. Together they had left the salon, the sacred inner sanctum neither had spoiled with sinister speculations and acrid accusations.

Will had blinked furiously upon entering the kitchen, Hannibal thinks not so much from the bright light as from shifting from one state of consciousness to another. Hannibal had watched black pupils shrink and irises fill with pale blue once more to gaze at him beneath fluttering lashes.

“You pricked Alana this evening.” Hannibal had said while assigning the dirty dishes to their proper places in the dishwasher.

Leaving the remains of Mason’s hog to Hannibal, Will had pulled open the drawer where Hannibal kept dishtowels and pulled one out before walking to the sink where shiny pots and pans still dripped onto the drain board. Picking up one of the larger sauce pans to dry, he had turned aside from the counter to stand in profile. To observe, reflect and deflect all at the same time, of course.

“She has a way of tugging at the short hairs while grinding her heel at the same time.” Will had said, lips sliding sideways, perhaps surprised at the slip, more likely at the candor.

“That’s a long walk she’s taken with you. I remember when you burst through my door to tell me you kissed her.”

Will’s mouth had crinkled, bitter creases lining his face. “And what a short walk it was to your bedroom.”

“We are still talking about Alana?”

The creases had deepened, tongue had teased teeth, but the retort had not spilled out. Will had set the saucepan down and grabbed another, a little aggressively Hannibal had thought, and had wiped the towel across the stainless steel until it had gleamed, his body and face still in profile as he had leaned against the counter.

Hannibal could wait for Will to walk around the vexing topic of Lounds as long as he needed. Hannibal had known he would assimilate and synthesize Hannibal’s words in an effort to extrapolate his designs on her before disclosing his own thoughts. Patience was an attribute they shared, like so many others.

Hannibal had continued to scrape bowls and dishes and load the dishwasher, and Will had continued to dry the pans until either his thoughts had quieted or he had suddenly found the sounds of domesticity too disturbing.

“And um…what was up with dessert this evening?”

“Too rich?” A sidelong glance from Will, “The greater the intellect; the greater the need for amusement.”

“Very amusing to you, apparently. As if that print on the wall weren’t enough. Strange, she didn’t seem to notice it.”

“As many times as she has been here, she has rarely commented on any of the art pieces. Her awareness of her immediate physical environment is cursory at best. Unless the work of art is thrust upon her awareness, she does not see it.”

The works of art thrust upon Alana had not been on the wall. Strange that Will had not noticed how she had been unable to tear her gaze from either of them all evening. That he had not noticed her eyes flicker each time his tongue had licked drops of wine from his moistened lips, or had lifted his chin to drink deeply from his glass. That he had not noticed she had noticed Hannibal noticing her and all her noticing. Alana had certainly noticed Hannibal’s attention to Will.

Hannibal wonders if she had felt the shifting of Will’s focus from her to Hannibal as the evening had progressed. Hannibal thinks not. It had not been until the taxi had pulled away that she had understood her place at the table. There had been no contest been between Hannibal and Will for her favor. The favor had been Hannibal’s to bestow all evening, not hers.

“No, I don’t really see her spending time at the Walter’s galleries down the waterfront.” Will had said, referring to the art museum in Inner Harbor known for its ancient and classical collections.

Hannibal had attended many functions at Baltimore’s fine art museum. He had enjoyed one of the special exhibits immensely the last time he had been there. The curator had prepared a presentation of forgeries. Guests had been challenged to detect the originals from their respective imitations. A stimulating exercise; even Hannibal had failed to identify all the originals.

Hannibal had made a mental note to ask Will if he had ever been later. It had turned out he had. He had attended the same exhibit, though on a different day. He had gone alone, of course. Just like Hannibal.

“Tell me, as you sat watching her eat, did you imagine what she was feeling?”

“Full, I’d imagine…”

Hannibal had frowned and raised a brow. So infuriating.

“You watched her same as I. You could imagine her thoughts as she sat rubbing her legs like a cricket beneath the table.” Hannibal had thought of breasts full beneath her blouse, nipples practically poking holes through her bra. Impossible to miss.

“Then, you don’t need me to tell you what she was feeling.”

“I don’t experience my imagination the way you do. You imagined her emotions, felt them yourself, her desire compounded your own.”

Will had set the stainless steel lid on the countertop to turn to Hannibal, the towel hanging limp and damp from his fingers, head angled to one side.

“And what were my desires, doctor?”

“The ones at the table or in the salon just now?”

A long pause and then, “The difference between you and Alana is that she was uncomfortable with the idea of analyzing me while fucking me.”

He had retrieved the dish towel and had resumed attacking the remainder of pots and lids on the drain board with focused diligence.

“You’re rude when you’re upset, Will.”

“I’m not upset. I’m pointing out that she had reservations about intimacy. She with her issues and me with mine.”

“Perhaps she was equally uncomfortable with the idea of you getting in her head? I’m not uncomfortable with that, either.”

Will had grabbed another piece of cookware from the drain board. He had held the pot a few seconds, catching his reflection in the shiny metal and Hannibal had seen the tightening of muscles in his neck followed by the lifting of his head to stare down the other end of the kitchen.

Hannibal had rarely caught Will looking at his reflection he rather avoided it as far as Hannibal had been able to tell. On those rare occasions when Hannibal had caught Will staring at his likeness, the pale face framed by the ever present mass of tousled curls and pale blue eyes looking back at him had always been somber, wrought with puzzlement, as though looking for something. Hannibal had thought Will afraid to look too long because the image might actually show him.

Hannibal thinks now that Will had not looked long at his reflection because he no longer recognized the face staring back at him. A similar expression had graced his features when Hannibal had first presented him with the anatomically perfect charcoal sketches preserved on thick buff colored pages of textured drawing paper. Unnerved certainly at the intimacy Hannibal’s sumptuously rendered nudes had suggested, but unaccepting that the images had represented him.

This isn’t me. This…is your ideal of me. This person does not exist…except in your imagination.

But he did exist. Hannibal had drawn who he had become. Will insisted on seeing himself as he had been. Hannibal had pointed a finger still flecked with charcoal at the drawing and had looked up at Will standing over him, the perpetual frown in place, until his pale blue eyes had softened and his hand had found Hannibal’s shoulder giving it a gentle squeeze.

Hannibal cannot imagine a time when Will had not been at odds with himself, never realizing that the more he fought against his true nature, the more miserable he would become.

Hannibal had realized what his tortured patient had needed.

And, Will, the mirrors in your mind can reflect the best of yourself, not the worst of someone else.

Alana had stung Will. What Will had imagined Alana had thought of him had hurt. She had avoided him before his arrest and incarceration citing his instability as the reason. When Will had sent his adoring acolyte to kill Hannibal, Alana had been profoundly shaken. Her faith in Will had also been shaken to its foundations. By the time Will had been proven innocent, at least of what he had been accused of, it had been too late. The damage had been done. She had chosen Hannibal.

Do you know why Will tried to kill me? It wasn't to avenge Beverly Katz's death. It was to prevent yours. He was protecting you in the only way he felt he had left to him.

I'm afraid Will opened a door inside himself and no one knows if it closed again. Especially not Will.

Then it's healthy he's back in therapy. With a good psychiatrist.

Hannibal had painted Will as primal predator and potentially possessive mate and had used Alana's guilt over burying him in Hannibal's bed to ensure such offensive inclinations fed the seeds of doubt and rejection already germinating in her head. Hannibal had worked very hard at making her see what he had wanted her to see. About him, and Will. Alana's own insecurity had done the rest.

Alana had been a willing and beautiful tool of manipulation, a distraction for which Hannibal had felt fondly; but a distraction nonetheless.

"Will, Alana was never going to pursue an intimate relationship with you."

"Too unstable, I know."

"Too disparate, socially."

"Well now, I suppose, after being accused of murder…no five murders…"

"That…was an unfortunate but necessary…"

The stone cold glare from Will had caused Hannibal to pause both his response and the loading of the dishwasher. A look like that from anyone else might have garnered satisfaction, invited provocation, but not Will. Hannibal had not meant to wound or incite.

Will had quickly looked aside and cleared his throat, choking back whatever comment he had decided to swallow. Hannibal had reminded himself that Will was working through several issues at once. He was always processing many things at once.

Will was as one of the beautiful delicate roses in his garden, about to bloom but riddled with thorns. Hannibal knows the thorniest rose is often the sturdiest, but one must handle it with care.

"Will, think about it. Has she ever invited you over for dinner? Has Jack ever invited you over to dine with him and Bella? Have you even met Bella?"

"No." Will had said, looking aside, "Hardly an indication of snobbery or a demonstration of social class. I'm not destitute, far from it."

"If we were only talking about comparing incomes, I would agree. You are not from the same rung on the social ladder and you know it. You don't socialize. You have no friends, Will."

Hannibal had started the dishwasher and begun to wrap up the hog in Saran wrap to stuff into the fridge. Will would take some home with him the next day for sandwiches, or perhaps to feed to the dogs. Hannibal had no use for reheated meat.

“They know I avoid people, and they know why. So do you.”

Hannibal could well imagine a lunch between Jack and Will. Jack, all business wolfing down a sandwich just released from its cellophane wrapping hurling questions at Will, who would be half listening while trying to block out not only the crime scene, but the other customers bustling about so he too could swallow down enough nourishment to soothe the acid churning in his stomach from a morning filled with too much caffeine and adrenaline and Jack.

“I know what your tell yourself. But in truth, you are overwhelmed by the meaningless and mundane, upset and appalled by the mendacity of daily life that pulses from everyone around you, knowing that you don’t connect or relate. A constant reminder you’ll never…

“Stop. Just…stop. Are you talking about me, or you?”

Hannibal had merely raised a brow at Will and turned back around to the hog, his tongue clicking against the roof of his mouth, a gentle reprimand. It is an insufferable breach of manners to interpose on one’s thoughts like that; a regular habit for Will. And only Will had ever interrupted him and lived to commit the offense, again and again.

Hannibal would suffer it in perpetuity to have Will at his side in this moment. His hands smooth the links of sausages as he places them in their zip lock bags. He glances at the twins, still groggy but subdued. Hannibal had found some bungee cords with hooks, an impulse purchase he had all but forgotten as a kindness to brighten the day of the wearied store clerk who had patiently and politely assisted Hannibal in acquiring the hardware for this current enterprise.

He commences cleaning the meat grinder, its task completed as his thoughts return again to Baltimore, and Will.

Will had stood leaning upon the counter, pots and pans already put back in their proper places. Hannibal had watched him fold the dishtowel and set it next to the sink. His gaze had wandered around the kitchen until finally directing smoldering blue eyes back at Hannibal.

“You don’t like most people, Will.”

“Doesn’t mean I want to kill them for their meaningless mendacity. Who am I; or you for that matter, to judge?”

“I exist outside their social order, and so do you. That’s who we are.”

Hannibal had closed the door to the fridge and begun washing his hands over the sink, the residue of the hog a greasy film on his skin and beneath his fingernails. Hannibal had been able to smell the roasted flesh despite the dish soap. Mason’s pig had permeated his skin much like Mason had pervasively affronted his sensibilities. Hannibal had dried his hands and replaced the towel precisely where Will had placed it, always consciously reinforcing how alike they were.

“What social ladder are you talking about?” Will’s eyes had trailed from the sink to Hannibal’s face, mouth drawn up, brows arched and furrowed.

“Did you ever read my paper on social exclusion?”

“I did. That’s part of the reason I wanted to know if you planned on writing any papers about me. Besides being the catnip of psychiatric circles, I seem to fit your social exclusion theory.”

"Stigmatization is by consensus. Necessary to the survival of a hierarchical society."

"Well, I'm definitely stigmatized. You saw to that."

"You had already essentially stigmatized yourself. You realized you were different at an early age. So did I. We reacted differently to that realization."

"Yes. I don't even try to meet society's normative expectations. You on the other hand mimic those expectations expertly. And yet…"

"We are both alone. A community of the rarefied."

"Two is not a community."

"No. It is perhaps enough."

Hannibal had moved to stand beside him, teasing himself with the heat from Will's body, but not touching him. Desire is fire, igniting it an act of creation and allowing it to consume an act of delicious destruction. Mere proximity had fanned flames hot enough to roast entrails and boil blood.

"You had already isolated yourself with your anti-social behavior, compounded with manufactured neuroses. Built barriers and forts to…"

"To contain associations I didn't want, but they came crashing around me anyway. I was keeping afloat…until you."

Will's words had been delivered softly, not accusingly. A matter of fact he had internalized but had yet to fully embrace.

"Until I saw you were drowning. Social exclusion is not always consensual; it is sometimes a choice. Or a revelation."

"It's not an excuse to cross the boundaries of accepted social mores of behavior."

"Boundaries are negotiable as you well know."

"Oh, the irony." Will had said adopting another bitter smile accompanied by upturned palms closing into frustrated fists as he had turned to look out the window. He had traced a finger around his reflection in the dark glass before turning to face Hannibal once again.

"You write a dissertation exposing society's systematic stigmatization of certain groups, figuratively cannibalizing its own while you do so literally, holding yourself completely exempt from its social norms and hunting in plain sight."

"An interesting observation. Though, I do not exempt myself from social norms; I have simply made my own."

"You have managed to out-Nietzsche Nietzsche."

"And God wept. Shall we retire upstairs?"

Hannibal had looked into long suffering pale blue eyes and had noted the mouth twisted in an effort to contain the grin Will had been trying to suppress. Will had gestured for Hannibal to go ahead first, shaking the tousled mane of curls as he switched off the kitchen light to follow Hannibal upstairs. Hannibal had wondered at which of them Will had been shaking his head as he had walked up the stairs, Will in tow, already unbuttoning his shirt.

After asking Will how long he had spent outside with the dogs that afternoon, Will had sniffed at his shirt and pulled it off, the rest of his clothes coming off in quick succession to fall gracelessly into the arm chair to be gathered up and laundered. Will had left his shoes at the bottom of the bed until the sight of Hannibal's chin resting on his neck, eyes peeled and head angled at the offending placement had caused him to sigh in resignation and move his shoes to the closet before crossing to the bathroom to shower. Hannibal had watched his naked form move across the room admiring Will's own brand of predatory elegance in every step.

Jack Crawford should have seen his awkward profiler swagger like that into the FBI's lab.

Hannibal had smiled inwardly at the favorable response to conditioning, the impulse to please Hannibal firmly in place. The rewards Hannibal always bestowed upon Will for his demonstrations of acquiescence had reinforced the positive associations Hannibal wanted Will to experience whenever he indulged his impulses. Obedience had been an impulse Hannibal had desired to cultivate in Will.

They were so much alike. Hannibal had recognized in Will an inner-strength and intelligence to match his own. As Will would evolve and come into his own, Hannibal had also recognized the need to instill psychological safeguards to ensure dominance. To preserve that particular dynamic as long as possible. That perceived dominance had been an illusion. He had not realized it until Will had looked up at him from the blood stained floor of his kitchen. Will had undermined nearly all of Hannibal's careful manipulations. By using Hannibal's own conditioning against him Will had instilled within Hannibal his own conditioning that had played a melody upon heartstrings Hannibal had not known he had. Had done it masterfully. Infuriatingly so.

Will had found Hannibal's Achilles' heel, aimed his bow and let fly the arrow that had pierced him so deeply the wound bleeds still.

And yet, even with all the manipulation and deception, Hannibal believes there was a part of Will that genuinely loved him, loves him still.

The washing machine had hummed while Will had taken his shower; the tweed jacket had been hung in the steamer to emerge fresh and fragrant the next morning. Hannibal had not minded tending to Will's clothes. Tossing a few more articles of clothing into the machine had been simple enough. The shy and grateful smile from Will at seeing his shirts and pants pressed had more than compensated for the few minutes it had taken to iron his off the rack attire.

Will had joined him in bed refreshed and fragrant, slipping between the sheets groaning softly as the cool satin had slid over his skin. His delight at the sensation had quickly given way to irritation as soon as he had turned on his side to face Hannibal, nose dipping into the soft cream colored pillow case. He had taken several sniffs before sitting up, mouth opened in disbelief and an accusing gleam had sparked behind wide blue eyes.

"Alana was here."

“Last night. And the night before.”

Hannibal had been perplexed by the astounded expression he had found looking back at him. He thinks now that Will had been with Margot one of those evenings. She had brought tidings of her pregnancy not long after.

“Honesty is situational with you, isn’t it?’ Will had snapped, “And you couldn’t change the sheets.”

“I was…curious what you might imagine. Perhaps you have already been here with Alana.”

Will had abruptly turned away to stare into the fireplace. Hannibal had watched his chest rise and fall with calming breaths, noting the shift in the musculature along his shoulders as he had twisted his torso and braced his weight on his arm. Hannibal had thought of his drawing pad on the table, but had dismissed the thought just as quickly. He had committed the pose to memory, instead.

“What are your intentions with Alana? Besides the obvious?”

Will had gestured to the bed and had lifted his eyes to look squarely at Hannibal still reclining upon his pillow.

“You think I am using her to manipulate you.”

“Aren’t you? You made very pointed references to her well-being while I was locked up. After Beverly…”

Katz’s last name had hung unspoken in the air as had the rest of his thought. Will had winced, the painful emotions associated with Beverly’s demise returned fresh to moisten his eyes. But, rather than turn away, he had held Hannibal’s gaze.

Hannibal had swallowed and closed his eyes, a rare moment of indecision on his part and an honest moment of reflection. Though Will likely interpreted it as more manipulation. Hannibal had never admitted to killing her, but Will’s relationship with him was ever evolving and to insult him at this point with continued denial would be unwise and would strangle the fragile honesty that had taken root between them.

Precious little, but honesty had bloomed if one knew where to look for it and Hannibal had wanted desperately to keep it, to build on it. Someday, he would be able to be completely honest with Will. And he would demand the same degree of honesty from Will. Trust is so important between therapist and patient…and friends.

“The survival impulse is strongest of all, Will. Beverly invaded my home. I know you did not send her here, would not have sent her here. An evening of coincidence and opportunity. Most regrettable.”

Will had sat motionless, absorbing Hannibal’s words his eyes glistening in the light of the flames from the fire crackling across the room. Those pale blue eyes had also flickered with flames of regret that seemed for a moment to envelop his entire being. He had nodded drawing a deep breath, acknowledging his acceptance of the closest he was going to get to an admission or an apology. They had not spoken of Katz again.

“And Alana?” Will had asked after a moment, gazing into the fireplace.

“Alana has nothing to fear from me. Unless, of course, something changes.”

Will had rolled his eyes back to Hannibal and his fingers had paused in their idle stroking of whiskers. Nostrils had flared and the tic of a latent snarl had sent a quiver along his upper lip. The predator had emerged and Hannibal had been happy to see him.

“Lounds.” Will had said imbuing the singular syllable with contempt.

“Lounds is a problem.”

“Lounds is a tabloid writer who enjoys rattling people. Alana was rattled, that’s all.”

“I am not certain of that.”

“Alana could not possibly believe her. She doesn’t want to believe her.”

“And yet she felt compelled to cross examine us at the dinner table. If Lounds can get to Alana…”

“She can get to Jack.”

“He reads Tattle Crime, too. She is a problem requiring a solution.”

“I agree.”

“She is a problem we could solve together.”

“If we agreed on the solution. We don’t. Impulses follow instinct. My instinct tells me to wait.”

“You would wait for opportunity to knock. I prefer to create opportunity in this instance.”

“Restraint has its virtues.”

“If we learn our limitations too soon, we never learn our power, Will. You are limiting yourself.”

“I’m not saying I couldn’t kill her, but it would have to be the right circumstances. You keep saying that urges can be controlled with discipline, and conquered with obedience.”

“That was the night after you killed Tier. We were talking about your urges. Urges can be your undoing unless you control them. You almost came undone with Ingram in the barn. If I hadn’t been there…”

“I would have blown his head off and enjoyed it. A missed opportunity.”

It won't feel the same, Will. It won't feel like killing me.

It doesn't have to.

“A missed opportunity you still regret?”

“No. I got over it.” Will had lifted his head, eyes searching Hannibal’s as teeth had kneaded lips in anticipation of Hannibal’s response.

The implications had been clear enough. Hannibal would get over not killing Lounds. Hannibal had thought Will had not appreciated the nature of the threat Lounds posed. Hannibal would not get over slick soliloquies plastered all over her website about him. He pressed a finger into Will's knee.

"She told Alana that neither of us is the killer she's writing about, but together, we might be."

"Might be. Speculation. Her incendiary brand of journalism is designed to increase the number of hits on her blog. She probably counts them every night." Will had waved a hand in air, curt and dismissive.

"Will, tabloid or not, her remarks to Alana are slanderous."

"It's not slander if it's true." Will had said quietly, his toes finding Hannibal's leg beneath the layers of sheets and blankets and poking him for emphasis.

"There are appearances to maintain."

"Then sue her. Everyone else does."

"She hasn't printed anything…yet. I am not inclined to wait. And neither should you be. You are an especially favorite target."

"All the more reason to let her run with it. The more she writes about me, the more she appears on a witch hunt."

"Guilty or not, witches are condemned and hung. I've had my share of being at the mercy of a rope."

Will had raised a brow at Hannibal's oblique reference to Brown's attack on him at the pool. He had turned his head but not before allowing Hannibal to see his eyes flicker wickedly and lips pucker then spread into a satisfied smile. So infuriating…so incredibly wantonly unrepentant. And so beautiful, Hannibal had ached to take all that beauty inside himself, to utterly devour him right then.

"Let us allow opportunity to decide the solution. I'll apply mine and you apply yours."

Will had nodded his silent assent before crawling under the sheets and blankets to curl his body around Hannibal's, his leg over Hannibal's thigh tightly like a vice drawing their bodies close so he could nuzzle into Hannibal's' neck. Hannibal had sighed and opened his throat to the graze of teeth and the tantalizing trace of Will's tongue along his skin.

And when Hannibal had endured all the pleasure he could stand from Will's predatory predilections, the lion had turned his raw savage desires upon his fledgling cub without mercy. He had nearly taken Will apart, limb from delicious limb, until Will had sobbed against him, body racked with tremors as Hannibal's cock had slackened inside, release sweet and hot as the blood that coursed through their veins.

Will had tumbled back onto the mattress, body limp and mind dazed as it always was afterward. A vision of sheer decadence on his pillow, hair a disheveled mane lying damp against his head and that face…a most pleasing combination of the mortal and the divine. Hannibal had taken up his drawing pad and charcoal pencils and had sketched Will lying in repose as the sweat had dried and the fire had died.

Hannibal had watched him retreat into slumber, safe in the arms of Hypnos awaiting the dreams of Morpheus. As Will had drifted off Hannibal had noted the peaceful expression on his face, no furrowed brow to indicate troubling thoughts, no tossing or turning upon the sea of satin beneath him. No nightmares for Will in Hannibal's bed.

As Hannibal had smoothed the damp stubborn curls from his face, thoughts of Alana Bloom and Freddie Lounds had stirred in his mind to mingle with Will's words spoken earlier. As his mind had turned with the consequences of each action he had considered, he had settled on a solution. He had sat in an empty hotel room for hours and had returned home to find Will had beaten him to it. Will's solution would engender unintended consequences of the most lethal kind. But that afternoon, he had found himself sitting in Jack Crawford's office listening to what he knows now was a rehearsed performance.

Hannibal considers that Will was clueing him to alternatives that evening after dinner. He had Jack to appease. Actually killing Lounds on the heels of Tier would have set an entirely different scenario into play. He had been saving Hannibal, and himself. As Hannibal had saved him from the consequences of killing Ingram that day in the barn. Will had been so incensed at the insensitivity and cruelty leveled at Peter Bernardone that his urges had threatened to overrule his own survival instinct.

Killing Tier in self-defense had been much more aligned with his survival instinct. Killing for pleasure should be performed with a certain detachment. Hunting is a passion to be sure, but one's conduct needs be circumspect and careful.

Hannibal mourns another instance of missed communication between them. Hannibal considers it possible that Will had believed he had no choice but to spare Lounds. Perhaps the ice he had been skating on with Jack had been thinner than Hannibal had suspected. But, smelling Lounds on Will that day in his office while they had been bonding, discussing plans about leaving together, had wounded Hannibal more deeply than he had been willing to admit at the time.

Time. The timing of his discovery had figured prominently in Hannibal's subsequent actions. Detecting the odor of Lounds on Will's clothes and in his hair in that singular moment of oneness with Will had torn at Hannibal as surely as if Will had stabbed him in his heart. And Hannibal had stabbed him back with the very passion he had cautioned Will to avoid. Hannibal had been unable to think of the deception outside of the narrow scope of emotion when he had first become of aware of it. He has been trapped in that narrow scope until now.

Hannibal had quite simply lost his perspective. Only Will could hurt him like that. But, Will had told him exactly what he was going to do and Hannibal had not heard him.

Impulses follow instinct. My instinct tells me to wait.

The deception, the betrayal had gnawed at him, worms eating the marrow from his bones, vultures ripping at his flesh. Will had been in an impossible situation.

Opportunity had come knocking on Will's door. Will had sat in Jack's office next to Hannibal; both of them called in for questioning because of Lounds' desperate phone call, and had played his role so convincingly. Will had made up the part about the appointment for Hannibal. Will knew that Hannibal wanted to either kill her himself or share it with him. So, he had made up the lie about an appointment, knowing that Hannibal would believe he had willfully withheld so it would appear he had kept the pleasure of killing Lounds for himself. All with Uncle Jack's knowledge and consent. The fabrication floated in Jack's office had been scripted by Jack and Will, but Hannibal thinks mostly Will. Jack and Will had also been putting on a performance for Alana, who had been present at that meeting.

Both of them had been protecting Alana by creating clouds of doubt to hang over her head about both of them. Will had deliberately alienated himself from her. He had not been able to push her far away enough.

With that phone call Lounds had given herself a reprieve. With that phone call, Will could not have killed her. Were it not for that phone call, Hannibal thinks Will would have killed her. Will would not have invited her to his home to reveal an FBI undercover operation. He could have met her anywhere for that.

Knowing her screams would be received, recorded, and relentlessly researched by the FBI, Will had chosen to hand her over to Jack. With one stroke, Will had solved, at least temporarily, his immediate problem and had given Jack, Lounds, and Hannibal what they wanted.

Jack had been placated in the wake of Tier; Lounds was off the radar and effectively silenced, and Hannibal had been left to believe Will was the killer he wanted him to be.

Will had been forced to deal with an untenable situation, knowing she had an open phone line to the FBI. If she had actually had an appointment Will still would not have told him. He would not have wanted to risk Hannibal driving out to his home to meet Lounds. She had shown up at his house to snoop. She would have never made an appointment to talk to the man she had repeatedly called a serial killer alone, at his house, in the middle of nowhere. She must have been terrified when he found her.

Neither would Lounds have subjected herself to Hannibal alone. Lounds had avoided Hannibal’s office since their initial meeting under her transparently obvious false pretenses. Lounds would have never approached Hannibal at his home in Chandal Square and neither would she have driven out to Wolf Trap, unless she had been hoping Will was not at home. Will’s car must have been in the garage, the house locked up, at least the dogs barking wildly and Will in the barn perhaps. Out of sight at any rate, or Lounds would not have gotten out of her car.

Will could not have known Hannibal had waited in Lounds’ hotel room for her although he likely imagined that was exactly what Hannibal would do. Neither could Will have explained to Hannibal his intentions. He couldn’t tell Hannibal because he wasn’t sure what Hannibal would do with the information. He could not anticipate how Hannibal would respond. Hannibal was too unpredictable, like himself. There had been too many variables to control and adjust for.

Will could have explained his actions at dinner, but had chosen not to. Hannibal thinks Will had already left Jack and Hannibal to Fate. Will had been caving under the weight of constant relentless pressure. He had shown up to Hannibal’s house having second thoughts?…and Hannibal had not given him a chance to explain. He had thrown his surprise of Abigail at him and then taken it away to show Will what he had thrown away for Jack and the FBI.

Will had been conflicted until the last minute, had not known himself what he had truly wanted until he had lain at Hannibal’s feet.

Not for the first time, Hannibal wonders for whom Will had drawn his gun. Will had shown up expecting what? A living Freddie Lounds meant FBI back up, but there had been none. Had Will feared the FBI for some reason? Will had called to warn him in hopes he would leave. Leave before

Jack arrived. But Jack had arrived early. And Hannibal had had no intentions of leaving without saying goodbye.

Jack had not been privy to their bedroom conversations, but between Will's questionable behavior and Du Maurier's interference, Jack had had his doubts. Will had kept Jack in the dark about many things. He had kept things from Hannibal, too. He had tried to maintain control of the situation. And he had done so masterfully, until it had all blown up in Will's face. Something had gone wrong and Hannibal cannot figure out what that was.

The twins have begun to stir and Hannibal pauses in the polishing of the grinder. The groans come from Luciano. Hannibal can see him twisting upon his soiled mattress, eyes still closed but not for long. Lucia will be waking soon, too.

He gathers up the bags of fresh sausage to carry upstairs. Once upstairs, he will prepare yet another syringe for Lucia, who will require pain killers for the next few days. Luciano will resume his daily sedatives until Hannibal locates Will. Finding Will is a priority. The longer he keeps the twins alive in his home, the greater the risk someone will notice them, or come looking for them.

Will let loose the hired help in hopes of luring Hannibal out into the open. He expects Hannibal to rid them both of Mason's executioners. He is probably wondering why he has not been summoned to a crime scene. Will should know that Hannibal has always wanted what was best for him.

Our conversations, Will, were only ever about you opening your eyes to the truth of who you are.

Will will not find the truth looking at crime scenes. Hannibal must open his eyes another way.

Perhaps he will hear from Roberta in the morning. Between his memories and whatever new information Roberta can offer, Hannibal is confident that he can extrapolate enough to create a more accurate picture of Will. Forgiveness apparently does simply happen, but prudence demands proof that it has also simply happened to the other predator circling the city.

On gliding wings he takes up his mask…

Will hears the words in his head as Hannibal's voice licks at his ears sending a prickle along his neck to gather in a knot between shoulders smothered in soft down.

Will sits beneath the canopy of black wings, slick oily feathers at his back and rough warm stone beneath to scape against his naked skin. He folds his wings in close to more easily rest against the sturdy frame of the serpent tailed creature that hovers over him. Will and the eagle sit gazing across the smoldering landscape at the grouping of stones, rubble, and wood that had been Daniel's home.

The winged Daniel also sits on a large rock close by, occasionally glancing in Will's direction, but his attentions are focused on the terrace below. Like Will and the eagle, he is waiting for the viper to appear along the crest of the grassless hillside.

Feathers white and lustrous as pearls flutter and Daniel raises a pale arm to point a finger down the slope of the terrace beyond the rubble and debris at their feet.

See? Look sharp and see, Will.

Hannibal's voice breathes and Will feels the scrape of its beak along his scalp, a familiar sensation that summons memories of Hannibal's nose in his hair…

Will snaps awake to the irritating hum of Daniel's alarm clock. He hears Daniel groan and twist in the bed, imagines him reaching up to pound his fist onto the clock and then feels the flop of his body land back onto the mattress. Cara stirs at their feet, her wet nose nuzzles Will's toes causing him to curl them back and slide them back under the thin cotton that covers them.

Will thinks it must be Wednesday morning already and Daniel has hit the snooze button as usual. Will kicks him in the shin and Daniel kicks him back, turns away to bury his face into the pillow that he holds to him like a lover. Will grins and rubs the sleep out of his eyes.

Daniel loves his bed. He enjoys being in his bed more than anyone Will has ever met. Not that Will knows how all that many people feel about their beds, but still. Will has yet to see Daniel spring out of his in the morning. He is a sloth, procrastinating until the last possible minute. Will thinks if there was a way for Daniel to drag mattress and sheet into the bathroom with him he would.

Will pokes him in the shoulder.

"You said you didn't want to be late again. Something about your new patient having to wait last time?"

Daniel's eyes flutter open to stare into Will's face as Will leans over him. Daniel groans again into his fingers before sliding them over his face and he rubs at eyes still unfocused and lidded. After a moment he clicks off the alarm before it can go off again.

"Thanks. I really should get up." He mutters through his fingers.

Daniel does not move.

"Out." Will says. "Want to go out?"

"Will, don't…"

"Out, Cara. You want to go outside, Cara? Good girl…"

The black dog no longer rests submissively at their feet. Cara is up and bounding all over the bed. Both Daniel's dogs have managed to assimilate a small but useful vocabulary. Very useful, Will thinks. Especially when one is so intimate with the morning routine.

"Let's go outside!" Will croons into Cara's ears, ruffling the fur at her throat.

Daniel tosses the sheet aside and gets up, throws his pillow at Will. "You win, I'm up."

Will watches him stagger as he navigates his way to the bathroom. Cara paces, her nose to the rug. When Daniel returns to the bedroom, he looks sufficiently awake. He pulls on a pair of sweat shorts over his boxers, a tee and his sneakers. Cara dances around his feet the entire time, eyes bright and tail wagging like a banner. Daniel stoops to run fingers down her back and she rears up on her hind legs to lick his face.

Images of Winston and the others bubble up and Will closes his eyes remembering better days.

Daniel looks over at Will as he ties the laces on his Nikes. Will appears relatively rested this morning all things considered. He had tossed restlessly himself, but like so many other things associated with Will, he was becoming used to the disrupted sleep patterns that sharing the bed caused. Will still awoke startled in the mornings, alarm or not, disoriented and unsure of where he was, but at least he was no longer waking up in cold sweat. The sweating had dissipated quite a lot, at least the sweating caused by dreaming.

Daniel smiles to himself, glances at Will lying on his back his eyes half closed, drifting, barely in the room and almost someplace else.

“I’ll be outside walking them. Maybe you could make some coffee?” Daniel says loudly enough to cause Will to shake himself fully awake once more.

“Sure.”

“How did you sleep?”

“I slept. Go. I’ll get the coffee.”

Will had listened to Daniel come back inside, the unmistakable slam of the back door resonating throughout the old house. He had listened to the sounds of rustling about the kitchen, the clinking of the spoon against the coffee cup, the microwave beeping to signal the hot water was ready to pour into the bowls of dog kibble.

With every passing day the sounds become more familiar and welcome and part of Will finds the comfort he draws from the increasing familiarity settling warmly in his chest. Another part of Will resists as he reminds himself this is all fleeting, that he will be robbed of all of it. One way or another, Hannibal will take it all from him, piece by piece, or all at once.

Will hears the shower shut off and sits up in bed to wait for Daniel to emerge from the bathroom to get dressed, images of the nude and winged Daniel perched on his rock fresh in his mind.

On gliding wings he takes up his mask…

Hannibal’s voice had intoned the words; Daniel had not spoken them. Hannibal was referring to Daniel while all of them had been looking for the viper, waiting for it to make an appearance again. Will makes a mental note to look up the passage he knows must be a quote from…something. What does Hannibal want him to see? Or, rather what does the part of him that identifies with Hannibal want him to see.

Will looks up to see Daniel walking past the foot of the bed, towel around waist and arms and shoulders speckled with droplets of water that roll off wet hair combed back flat against his head. Will wants to lick the moisture from every inch, every crevice of Daniel’s body. His patient will have to wait…again.

Will lurches from the bed and tugs on the towel insistently but Daniel holds it fast.

“Oh, no. I’ll be late.”

“You say that every time.” Will continues to tug, stretching the terrycloth more tautly with each wrench of his wrist.

“You wake up like this all the time, Will. Maybe abandoning psychoanalysis was premature…”

“You’re not sure if we’re having therapy or having sex?” Will grins.

The hopeful look on Will’s face is endearing. Will is almost always endearing, especially first thing in the morning, like this. Daniel feels the heat rising, the tightening of his balls and the twitch of his cock knowing full well Will’s body is just as tight and twitchy as his own under the thin sheet. He can’t differentiate his own feelings from Will’s. He supposes it doesn’t matter if they are feeling the same thing. It’s when they aren’t feeling the same that the intrusion of Will’s emotions frightens him.

“Therapy, apparently. Isn’t it always?” Daniel says, his tone light but irritation rubs at him regardless.

This dreaming about Hannibal and then wanting to fuck in the mornings is unspeakably strange to say the least. Daniel isn’t sure how he feels about it at this point. He’s feeling kind of…used.

‘‘No…” Will lets go of the towel and wraps his fingers around Daniel’s wrist instead. “Not always. Not now.”

Daniel looks into the pale blues eyes fairly pleading in the morning light, and rolls his eyes knowing he is going to relent. Damn him.

He sees the satisfied smile from Will as he allows Will to pull him into the bed and snatch the towel away. The thought that he just sold his soul, again, clings to his consciousness, like dust collecting in the corner. And as the devil in his bed sucks payment from willing lips, he opens his soul to receive him.

“Shit!”

Daniel slams the door to the Mercedes and practically runs to the back door of his office. His new watch reads eight fifty-two. Daniel waves to Maria and bounds up the steps taking two at a time. He pushes impatiently at the door, stuck again with humidity, and nearly trips on the carpet when it bursts open.

He drops the attaché case on the floor and straightens the turquoise and cream paisley tie and then runs his hands over pale pink pressed cotton shirt and wilted lapels of the jacket he realized on the drive in, was missing a button. He glances about the room, absently fingering the curls that dried sticking out the wrong way. He notices the water pitcher on the coffee table and makes a mental note to refill it.

His foot taps on the rug as he waits for his laptop to boot up and he begins rifling through the stack of file folders sitting there since Monday where he had left them rather than pack them in his attaché case like he should have. He pulls out Victor Boucher’s file and reads quickly, very quickly as he glances at the clock on his computer. He looks down and grimaces at the black dog hair clinging to cream colored trousers.

Damn him…

Hannibal sits at the same café across the street from Clayton's office as he had before, sipping his expresso, a curl of lemon rind floats on top imparting a note of citrus to the thick hot coffee at his lips. The morning paper rests in his lap though he has barely glanced at the headlines. He has been looking forward to his session with Clayton this morning with more than just a twinge of delightful anticipation.

He has watched the harried Clayton rush from his car to his office, a flurry of dark curls and pale linen. He wonders how someone as classy and successful as Clayton clearly is cannot be more punctual. He takes another sip of expresso and thinks intelligence comes in all forms. A creative mind is often a cluttered mind, as Hannibal well knows.

At precisely nine Hannibal is standing at the door to Clayton's office, smiling at the warm, albeit confused smile on Clayton's handsome face as he looks down at the two black tote bags that dangle from Hannibal's shoulder. Hannibal thinks it very nice to see him…alive.

"Hello Victor. Right on time…"

Hannibal smiles and steps inside. He is again struck by the décor and the sea of blue that greets him in Clayton's spacious office. He walks directly to the coffee table and begins to unpack the totes, taking out a dark red linen tablecloth first to slide over the polished surface of the table.

"May I?" Hannibal says as he continues to remove items from the totes.

Daniel stands at the other side of the table, lips pressed tight in amusement at the older man fussing over the containers and thermoses he lifts gingerly and sets on the coffee table. He realizes the one tote is thermal and his stomach grumbles as Hannibal lifts the lid from a container releasing the smell of toasted onion and fresh basil.

The older man is casually dressed this morning, tailored tan slacks, pale blue designer tee, and a slightly darker blue suit jacket, finely cut accentuating broad shoulders and long torso. Daniel finds his style simple, sparse, and utilitarian. The man obviously comes from money, but he is not flashy about it. He wears only a watch, an expensive one, but no other jewelry adorns his person.

Daniel does not see any grey in his hair, and given the lines and creases there should be. Daniel wonders how close the shiny brunette locks come to Victor's natural color. There is plenty of grey in the stubble on his cheeks and chin. Daniel thinks some of that grey is dark blonde. Curious that.

"I noticed you have a habit of running late."

Hannibal looks up to find a familiar lop-sided grin that sends a pang to his chest. Green eyes glitter mischievously beneath Clayton's brow but he remains quiet, content to watch Hannibal arrange his containers around the table.

"I have the impression that you skip breakfast often and you shouldn't. It's the most important meal of the day."

"Well, I uh…didn't eat this morning, but I usually try."

Hannibal raises a brow at him and purses his lips slightly, chiding Clayton with his eyes. Clayton sucks in his lower lip and rolls his eyes. Hannibal's eyes cannot help but linger on the pink lips and the chiseled line of his jaw.

“Ok. I hardly ever eat a proper breakfast. Nothing like this.”

Hannibal watches Clayton’s eyes sweep over the small banquet he brought. Clayton stands up straight and tilts his head to the side, hands resting on hips below the leather belt that Hannibal notes fits snugly around his lean and slender waist. He notes the wrinkled jacket and the missing button. Clayton was in a big hurry this morning, but the ensemble works and he wears it well. Of course Hannibal knows what lies beneath the tailored suit and pressed shirt.

Although Hannibal had gazed upon Clayton’s nude body with the eyes of a doctor that night at Du Maurier’s, he had found much to admire about the young man. Clayton’s body is tight and muscular, very much like Will’s. And, Hannibal remembers, not without its share of tell-tale welts and faded bruises in the most intimate of places.

Thoughts of Du Maurier’s ruined evening almost bring a smile. Du Maurier must have been kicking herself silly after Hannibal had left. With bruises like those, Hannibal doubts Clayton shy in the bedroom or on the couch as it were. The fashionably clothed doctor gazing upon Hannibal’s gourmet feast is intriguing indeed.

“Wow. I don’t know what to say. This is really quite the spread you’ve laid out here.”

And it is. Daniel notes that Victor brought ceramic plates and coffee mugs and glasses…crystal glasses. Daniel blinks. The silverware is actually silver, polished silver.

“Say, thank you, and sit down to eat.”

Hannibal eases into the couch, perched on the edge and begins to pour hot steaming coffee from the tallest of the thermoses.

“Thank you.” Daniel says, slowly sinking into the cushions of the adjacent couch. “What are we having?”

“Scrambled eggs and sausage, fresh pineapple and peaches, and biscotti with either anisette or lemon. We have coffee, an exquisite house blend I was told, and fresh squeezed orange juice.”

“You brought all of this from home?”

“Of course. I am very particular about what goes into my body. And so, apparently are you.”

“Oh, I indulge in plenty of temptation.” Clayton says taking a bite of the eggs and sausage. “Oh god, this is delicious. What else is in this?”

“My own recipe. A protein scramble with the obvious and some herbs and spices, a little cheese. It varies with the season.”

“It’s uh…really tasty. The sausage is imported?”

"The meat is local. All the ingredients are."

Daniel licks his lips and Hannibal smiles just watching him eat. He hasn’t watched anyone but Du Maurier eat his cooking in a long time. The contentment he feels watching Clayton wolf down his breakfast is most gratifying. Clayton uses his fork for the scramble, but his fingers pluck at everything else and he seems completely at ease doing so.

Hannibal glances at Clayton between mouthfuls, slipping chunks of peach and pineapple between lips glistening with juice, alternating with bites of egg and sausage, licking fingers and lips without a second thought. Finally, he leans back and wipes a napkin across his face. He picks up a biscuit of biscotti and dips the anisette soaked confection into his cup of coffee before lifting it to his mouth. Hannibal imagines the sweet biscuit mingled with the smokiness of the dark roast coffee dissolving on his tongue and dunks one in his own coffee.

The house blend of coffee is exquisite. Hannibal savors the aroma beneath his nostrils as he sits in Clayton's peaceful and fragrant office.

"I smell flowers, orchids I think." Hannibal says.

"Behind you." Clayton points towards the door. "Every couple days, Maria brings in flowers from her garden. I usually bring in my own, but I slacked off this summer."

Clayton looks aside, to his right, clearly remembering something Hannibal thinks. Hannibal can't decide if the memory is a pleasant one or not. Clayton's expression is both wistful and serious.

Hannibal turns around to see fresh cut flowers setting in a tasteful crystal vase on the low console table near the door. The bouquet consists of only purple orchids and sunny yellow daisies, but the arrangement is lovely and the orchids are majestic.

"I have a garden as well. Living here, who could not?" Hannibal says, slipping a chunk of pineapple into his mouth.

"Anyone who actually lives in the city of Florence. You don't live far though if I remember."

"Impruneta. I grow the herbs you tasted in your breakfast."

"And what else? You don't grow just herbs, do you?'

"Some vegetables, and roses."

"Huh. So do I. Well usually. I've got to get out there and weed this weekend."

"Too hot?"

"Too busy. Anyway, I won't be enjoying any tomatoes or peppers if I don't pick them soon."

Hannibal turns his attention to the bookcases and nods at the rows of finely crafted wood shelves brimming with books and artifacts. His eyes are drawn to the collection of red figure Greek vases and plates and he stands to walk over to them, coffee in hand.

"These are reproductions, yes?"

"Of course, though they were made by local artists in Athens. I took a tour of the studio where they make them, all hand done and baked in a kiln. I didn't buy them all at once. A couple every time I went back."

"Impressive work. Wonderful that the craft is kept alive. These are all scenes from the Iliad?"

“Mostly. All of the pieces recall the Trojan War in some fashion. Like this one,” Daniel takes the plate bearing the sacrifice of Iphigenia down from the shelf. “This scene isn’t in the Iliad. It happens at the beginning.”

“Well, the true beginning of the war is debatable is it not?” Hannibal says taking the plate from Daniel’s hands to admire it more closely.

“Well, Iphigenia’s death sends the fleet to Troy. Appeases the gods so the Greeks have wind to sail. You’re referring to Helen?”

“Helen had a beginning, too. Every act of creation has its destructive consequence.”

“I suppose you can look at life that way. A rather polarizing perception.”

Daniel takes the plate gently from Hannibal’s hands to put back in its place. Words and phrases from conversations with Will tumble around his head as he thinks about Helen of Troy.

“Polarizing suggests division. Opposites are not always exclusive. Causal relationships need not be either. They can be…complimentary.”

“Restoring balance.” Daniel says still gazing at the plates.

Hannibal walks back to the couch and takes his seat. He is enjoying himself immensely. Clayton is positively delightful company. He thinks he should send Du Maurier some flowers to thank her.

Daniel trails back to his couch deep in thought. He reminds himself Victor is here for therapy not a philosophy seminar. Still, he thinks whatever a patient chooses to talk about can be revealing, especially this one. Daniel sees his coffee cup is empty and reaches for the thermos of the delicious Italian roast.

Hannibal leans to take a sip from his glass of orange juice at the same time and Clayton’s hand collides with Hannibal’s outstretched arm effectively emptying his juice and spilling it everywhere. The sudden crash of crystal and splashing of juice causes both men to freeze momentarily if only to let gravity take its course.

“Oh my god,” Daniel says, dropping to his knees at once directly in front of Victor, practically between his knees. He begins grabbing napkins from the table to stifle the flow of juice dripping off the table onto the formerly pristine Berber carpet. He notices Victor’s pants and shirt are now stained, too.

Hannibal remains frozen and…stunned. Numb. His eyes flutter in frustration and his heart stills.

No. It can’t be. Can it?

Will’s scent is all over Clayton. The musky sweetness Hannibal knows so well, so intimately , wafts upward from Clayton’s curly locks, from the exposed skin on the back of his neck, from his collar as he kneels dabbing at Hannibal’s shoes with napkins.

Hannibal’s nostrils flare with the memory of opening the door to his office to find Will standing there, promptly at seven, wearing new clothes, hair freshly cut. Only hours before he had been standing in Hannibal’s kitchen holding a gun to his face. A wisp of a smile had played about his lips and his eyes had been wide and clear as he had turned to face Hannibal.

Hello, Will.

May I come in?

Do you intend to point a gun at me?

Not tonight. Are you expecting someone?

Only you.

Will had breezed past him to take center stage in his office. The air had crackled between them and in Will's wake had trailed a new scent. He had changed his cologne. They had acknowledged a lot of changes that evening. Hannibal leans ever so slightly to catch another whiff.

He's wearing Will's cologne, too.

Hannibal's mind swims with the possibilities until he is drowning in them. He watches Clayton rise slowly from the carpet, his eyes wide as he looks into Hannibal's face.

Daniel is baffled by the rush of emotions he feels from Victor. There is such a muddled mixture of sensations throughout his body and skull he can't process them all. One thing is clear. This little spill just now precipitated something. Daniel thinks immediately that this simple accident must have triggered a memory in Victor. A memory he is reacting very strongly to. Daniel hopes he hasn't offended Victor.

He stands up quickly, thinking that perhaps he touched Victor inappropriately or something. Daniel is both embarrassed and confused. He can't seem to get a break with this patient. He wonders what else he can screw up this morning.

"I am so sorry, Victor. That was really clumsy. Your clothes…"

"Please. Accidents happen. I'll just drop these off at the dry cleaners."

Hannibal stands up, adjusts his shirt and glances over his jacket and trousers. There is minimal damage. Hardly noticeable from a distance. Hannibal is acutely aware the incident has unraveled Clayton's composure. Hannibal can take advantage of that.

"I'd insist on paying for it, but I get the feeling you would refuse." Daniel says.

"The gesture is appreciated. You'll forgive me for saying I find it amusing. It's not every day you see your psychiatrist on his knees between your legs."

Daniel's jaw drops in surprise at the comment. His neck feels warm as his mouth spreads into a grin and he can't help but chuckle. He is further surprised when Victor steps closer and reaches out a hand to adjust his tie and straighten his jacket. Daniel stands a little more erect, Victor's attentions are paternal yet oddly arousing at the same time.

"You changed your cologne."

"What?"

"You wore another fragrance before. You're wearing something different."

“Am I?”

Daniel sniffs at his collar and closes his eyes remembering his crazy rushed morning thanks to Will. He had rolled out of bed and had scrambled to get ready, pulling on the articles of clothing that matched before running down the steps. He had not even finished his coffee.

“Oh, I must have grabbed the wrong bottle this morning.”

“Wrong bottle?”

“Yeah. I have a roommate. I must have splashed on his cologne by mistake.”

“An easy enough mistake to make if you share a bedroom.” Hannibal says, dropping his hands from Daniel’s perfectly symmetrical tie.

Daniel feels hot all over. He thinks his morning cannot possibly get any worse.

The slight flush about Daniel’s cheeks and the tremulous biting on his lower lip tells Hannibal all he needs to know. Well, not all. Hannibal glances at his watch. His session with Clayton is not yet over. A half an hour remains and Hannibal intends to make the most of it. Clayton may, or may not, understand or know what he has involved himself in, but it does not matter. He is in the thick of it.

For now, Clayton has no idea who he is and Hannibal will take advantage of that, too. Hannibal can finally send his invitation. Amended to include a guest, of course.

Will is in Fiesole. And Fiesole is where Hannibal will be this afternoon.

Daniel gestures towards the couches realizing they have some time left. Victor feels more relaxed to Daniel now, more like a breeze and less like a typhoon. Daniel finds it odd that such visceral emotions have practically evaporated from Victor. The shift was quick as though Victor had shut a door in his mind.

Thinking it best if he allows his patient to guide their discussion today, Daniel opens his notebook and writes a brief entry about their breakfast. As he writes, he notices Victor cleaning up the coffee table, carefully cleaning plates and putting everything back in the totes. Literally everything. Scraps and all.

“Victor, I can do that. You don’t have to clean up.”

Daniel watches his patient compulsively fold the tablecloth in thirds and then thirds again before placing it in the tote.

“I insist. Compost for the garden.”

Daniel makes another note in his patient log. He waits until Victor has cleaned and arranged everything to his satisfaction and is once again reclining on the couch.

“I had an agenda for today, but I thought I’d ask if there’s anything you’d like to talk about first.”

Hannibal’s eyes roam over Clayton, appreciating the beauty of him, the intelligence and the kindness, and appreciating his intentions most of all. Sadly, Clayton cannot have what belongs to him. Hannibal sighs, but manages a weak smile.

“I think I would like to talk about regret.”

Chapter 54

Chapter Summary

Hannibal takes a drive to Fiesole. Will has a conference call with Jack…and Mason.

“Jack…who else knows you pulled me out of protective custody, besides Zee who has clearly been sworn to secrecy, and Mason and...well, Margot?”

“No one. As we agreed.”

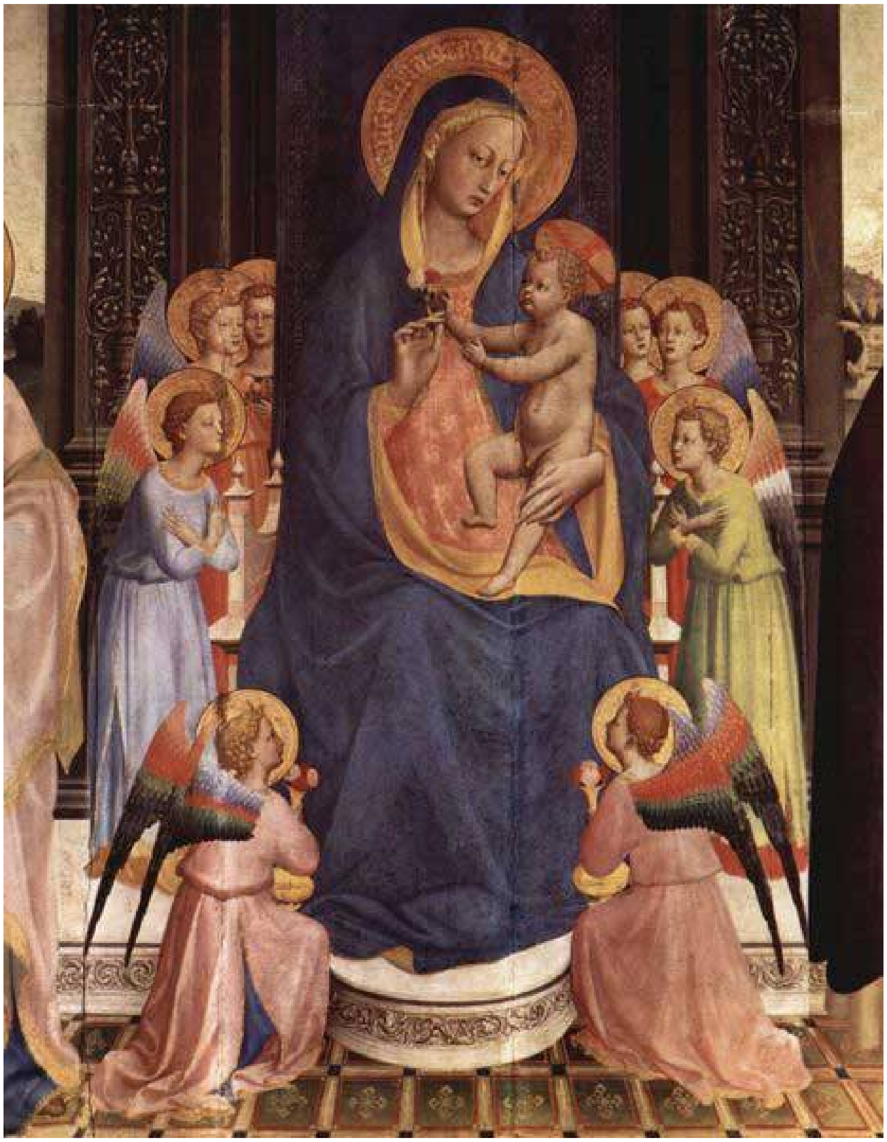
“And what happens if something happens to me?”

Jack sits back in his chair, folds his hands together in a pyramid. The angry glint in his eyes melts away, his expression gentled by Will’s question, and he looks at Will in a way he has not in very long time. He purses his lips and lowers his eyes, an approximation of an apology. But not quite.

“What happened between you, Hannibal, and Verger?”

Chapter 54

Hannibal takes a drive to Fiesole. Will has a conference call with Jack…and Mason.



Virgin and Child with Saints.   Fra Angelico,Fiesole, Italy.

Hannibal guides his Jaguar around the next turn, and continues to climb the hills of Fiesole, taking a leisurely route around the terraces and walls that line its streets. Some of the brick walls are as old as Fiesole itself, remnants of the labors of their Etruscan ancestors. Hannibal has made a point of reading up on the little town's history. He feels an almost intimate familiarity with it now; as he does Florence.

One never knows when the occasion may arise that requires intimate knowledge of a place particularly its design. Hannibal trusts his instincts and his memory far more than any device. The GPS sits unplugged in the console, its constant babble a distraction and its tendency to misidentify streets insufferable.

Hannibal had disconnected it upon arriving at Fiesole's town limits marked by the crumbling ruins of fortifications razed centuries ago by the Byzantine army, a battle the Romans lost in 529, surrendering Fiesole to the invaders. Later, Roman Catholics would take it back and the little town is the birthplace of Fra Angelico, a devout and gifted monk, whose precious and beautiful devotional paintings hang in the Uffizi and in many churches all over Italy. Hannibal finds it yet another travesty that many of his frescoes at the convent in Fiesole did not survive Italy's violent history.

As Hannibal heads toward the pinnacle of Fiesole he turns up the stereo and hums to Mozart's Andante, Piano concerto No. 21. Hannibal needs no device to tell him where the top of a hill is. Tatiana had assured Hannibal there was nothing wrong with his GPS, but the device has managed to exceed Hannibal's patience on too many occasions. Now that it rests silent in his console, Hannibal doubts he will connect it again.

Hannibal is reminded of another circumstance involving his distrust of similar devices.

Hannibal remembers every blissful morning he awakened to Will in his bed. Hannibal nearly always awakened first, and on the morning following their dinner with Alana, and their conversation regarding Lounds, Hannibal had opened his eyes to dark curls framing a familiar face in profile, soft pink lips parted in resplendent repose.

Will had not made mention of Alana Bloom again that night, but Hannibal knows the satin sheets twisting around him while Hannibal had pummeled him into the mattress had seared his relentless imagination with images of the nights before, when Alana had been the one twisting in the same sheets. Those were likely associations Will could not fling into a fort quickly enough.

The sex had been akin to madness between them and satisfying their urges had sent Will straight to sleep, a soundless slumber unspoiled by thoughts of Lounds or the FBI. As distant as those thoughts might have been that night, they had returned with a vengeance the next morning.

Will's phone had gone off on the night stand and Will's eyes had fluttered open as his hand had grasped it tightly, eyes squinting in the dim morning light to read the caller id. After staring at his phone for a couple seconds he had set it back down and had turned on his side toward Hannibal, eyes closed and grumbling into the pillow.

"Wrong number?" Hannibal had said plucking at curls.

Will had opened one eye long enough to check Hannibal's expression before closing it again.

"Jack." The one word reply had been mumbled into the pillow.

"It's half past six. What do you think he wanted?" Hannibal had asked, wondering if Alana had phoned Jack after leaving.

"No idea. He'll call back."

"Will, does Jack have a habit of calling this early?"

"Not habitually, but if he's on his way into Quantico…"

"And do you always take his calls?"

Will had sighed and rolled his eyes. "Um…yeah. Maybe I should have picked up."

"Do you think he suspects you are here?"

"Huh? No…I don't think so. Why would he?"

“We had an interesting conversation with Alana last night. Would Jack be concerned about your whereabouts?”

“Concerned enough to take a drive out to my house? No.”

“Then my house? I live closer to Jack than you do.”

Will had sat up, stretching stiff arms over his head. He had cracked his neck and then cocked his head to one side, his expression grim or annoyed. It was hard to tell with Will.

“I didn’t see Alana leave, but I got the impression she would have been quite happy to stay. Being alone with you didn’t seem to bother her.”

“Nor should it. But she might have feared for Lounds.”

Or thought Jack should know Will accepts tender embraces from Hannibal in front of huge windows.

“Sounds like transference to me, doctor.” Will had bit the inside of his cheek, but had smiled in spite of himself. “Isn’t paranoia a textbook trait of a psychopath?”

“Among other things…”

Hannibal’s eyes had roamed over Will’s exposed limbs and torso alighting on the bruise at his collarbone. Will had raised a brow, eyes down to see what Hannibal had focused on. Will had lifted his eyes back up slowly, teeth pinching his lower lip, a parody of chastisement.

The unspoken intimacy between them had seemed so natural, that Hannibal cannot bring himself to believe Will’s demonstrations contrived or calculated. Yes, Will’s gift could allow him to fabricate a version of himself that Hannibal would find irresistible, but the unsolicited slips of affection had been spontaneous. Hadn’t they?

Hannibal had found Will’s teasing endearing that morning. He was rarely playful, and certainly not upon waking up. In hindsight, at that point, Will had felt reasonably secure about his status with Jack, believed he had Jack’s trust. Believed Jack had his back after Tier, perhaps reluctantly, but Jack had backed off. And, he had wanted Alana out of the equation regardless. To Will’s thinking, if Alana had doubts she might avoid the both of them.

Will’s confidence had folded with the provocative observation Hannibal had presented next.

“If not drive out to your home, it is possible he had someone place tracking devices on your car. I seem to remember something about remote GPS tracking from the Silvestri case.”

Will eyes had opened wide at the mention of the Silvestri case. Dear departed Beverly had cleverly tracked the medical student’s ambulance where he had been performing his organ harvesting. Will had sat up rubbed at his face and glanced again at his phone.

“No…the ambulance had GPS installed in it. My car has nothing like that. I don’t even have a GPS app for my phone let alone my car.”

“It would be easy to attach one though. Without your knowledge.”

Will had looked at Hannibal, mouth open and jaw slack as he had considered the suggestion.

“You think Jack’s tailing me? That he’s tracked me here and called for what? To see if I would lie about it? That makes no sense. He would expect me to lie assuming you could hear me. If I had picked up…” Will had paused, “But why would I be here at…six twenty in the morning.”

“Precisely.”

Will had sighed, deeply and Hannibal had watched him retreat into his head. Hannibal’s fingers along his collarbone had brought him back quickly enough.

“You’re right. That makes no sense. We are assuming Jack called to ask where you were and it is unlikely that is why he called. But if he should inquire later about your whereabouts this morning or why you didn’t pick up, what will you think?”

“I think I’ll check my car after coffee. And yours, too.”

Hannibal had successfully implanted brand new seeds of doubt into Will’s consciousness. Weaning Will away from Jack and the FBI had been necessary for Will’s becoming. Hannibal had known that with every kill, a piece of Will would die. And from death he would be reborn. Eventually, Jack would have no choice but to pursue both of them and they would have to flee Baltimore… together.

Hannibal remembers the conversation with Jack over the Ukranian Kholodets dinner. Hannibal had prepared the dish to provoke. He had not been disappointed.

If you can't rely on others, you have to rely on God.

I'm relying on myself. And yet in this moment, I have to confess that I don't know who's pursuing whom any more than these fish do.

Hannibal thinks Jack had been revealing more than he had meant to. Jack had been implying that he agreed with Alana’s belief that Will had killed Freddie Lounds. A perfectly reasonable thing for Jack to say that evening. Jack was saying he wasn’t sure if Will had killed her, or not. A confession that he wasn’t certain he wasn’t being lied to. A statement designed to make Hannibal feel secure.

Looking back, Hannibal thinks Jack had subconsciously been confessing his doubts. He had been alluding to Will and Hannibal. On some level, Jack had perceived an affinity between them that consciously, he was not prepared to entertain, let alone accept. Hannibal’s dish of fish captured in gelatin like a moment frozen in time had offered Jack more food for thought than Hannibal had imagined.

At the time, he had had no idea that Jack and Will were working together to catch him, but he does now. Hannibal had understood that Jack would have had his concerns about Will, had thought that Jack was applauding Will’s efforts to move beyond his accusations and had approved of his return to therapy.

That their efforts had been coordinated had not occurred to Hannibal. Will had convincingly painted Jack as a sort of paternal figure, indulging his prized but damaged profiler, but only to a point. To his credit, Jack had played his role well.

But, Will had apparently resumed his therapy with dual purpose.

To get closer to Hannibal not only for Jack, but for himself. Though Will would not have admitted that to himself at the time. Will lied to himself all the time.

The thought that Jack might have bugged his car would have been rejected, vehemently so, if Will had been securely singular in his own intentions. He had not been secure. Hannibal's suggestion had unsettled him. While Will was capable of analyzing and assimilating Hannibal's thoughts, and might have been playing into Hannibal's concerns most of the time, Hannibal doubts Will had anticipated this particular conversation, not this early in the morning. Hannibal believes Will's response had been genuine.

Will had not been merely concerned, but alarmed, for a few seconds, that Jack might not believe he was pretending with Hannibal. After Tier, Will had raised serious doubts in Jack about his state of mind, if not his mind then his perspective. Will had wrestled with doubt about himself. Will had been conflicted even then and the idea that Jack might know he was conflicted and had bugged his car to keep tabs on his broken pony had seemed plausible to him. And it shouldn't have.

If things had been going smoothly between Will and Jack, Will would not have spent the next hour and a half going over both of their vehicles in twenty degree weather.

He had watched Will examine both of their vehicles, holding a hot cup of coffee to warm his hands. The coffee had cooled almost immediately as the morning frost had penetrated his cup. After rubbing his hands together, flexing fingers numb with cold despite the thick gloves, Will had shrugged as pale blue eyes had swept over the Bentley one more time.

"Satisfied?" Hannibal had asked.

"As much as I can be."

Will had stood at the bottom of the steps leading up to the kitchen door. There had been only two steps, but the distance and the angle had apparently placed Will in what he had perceived as a subordinate position. He had stood with one foot on the concrete and the other on the step, impatiently glowering at Hannibal to move.

Hannibal had gazed down at him, allowing his lips to curve slightly at the challenge. The tiny tic of his mouth had drawn the hoped for response.

"It's cold." Will had said, lifting his head a little more.

"Yes, I need to tidy up. Change the sheets…"

Will's eyes had narrowed to slits. "For the record, I am not…jealous."

"Of course you aren't."

"I've accepted that Alana…that we are never going to be intimately involved."

"No, but in a way, you already have."

Will had looked aside, pressing lips together in a thin line, muscles twitching along his jaw. Hannibal had watched his Adam's apple bob slowly as he had swallowed down the ball of bile in his throat. When he had turned his pale blue eyes back to Hannibal, the frost on the railing had seemed less frigid.

“It’s cold.” Will had repeated.

Hannibal had turned to open the kitchen door and had held it open for Will to pass through first. Will had brazenly stalked past him, thrown his gloves on the kitchen table and unbuttoned his long tweed coat. And there he had stood, back to the door, motionless head to the side to watch Hannibal’s approach.

Hannibal had followed him in, removed his gloves and coat, and had stood by the door waiting to see if Will would also remove his jacket, or button it back up and storm out.

Will had turned around from the table, slipping his coat ever so slowly from off his shoulders as his eyes had moved from Hannibal’s shoes to his face. Graceful. Predatory. Almost feline.

“Any coffee left?” he had asked, favoring Hannibal with duck of his head and a teasing smile. So infuriating, his Will.

When Will had inquired about the missed call, Jack had dismissively told him to forget about it.

Hannibal thinks this episode had weighed upon Will’s mind as he had watched Freddie Lounds snoop around his property. Images of sitting again on a dirty mattress at BSHCI while Hannibal sat in his office must have figured prominently in his decision to silence Lounds temporarily rather than permanently. Will’s empathy allowed him to think like Hannibal, absorb Hannibal into his very being. Will might have forgotten that his mind had absorbed Uncle Jack, too. Will unconsciously absorbs everything.

The problem Will has is too many mirror neurons. Our heads are filled with them when we are children, supposed to help us socialize and then melt away. But Will held on to his, which makes knowing who he is a challenge. When you take him to a crime scene, Jack, the very air has screams smeared on it. In those places, he doesn't just reflect; He absorbs.

Will has evidently been absorbing a lot lately. Absorbing a lot from Clayton, his psychiatrist. Their psychiatrist. The irony. Pity, thinks Hannibal. What a wondrous experiment it would be to see how long each of them could keep Clayton dancing on a tightrope between them. A pity that Hannibal cannot risk the exposure.

Hannibal glances again at Clayton’s address before eyeing the GPS with disdain. He has never required technology to find anything before. Hannibal will see Will today because he wishes it so.

He drives up and around the rolling hills exploring the terrace lined streets entirely to the music of Mozart, pieces selected especially for this singular experience. Hannibal has the time to explore. He has no plans on paying Will a visit just yet. It is far more advantageous to observe. Will may be alone at the house right now, but not for much longer. He knows Clayton will return home soon. Hannibal would.

For as small as it is, Fiesole is a thriving town, its prosperity tied to its strategic location and proximity to Florence. It’s enviable affluence the result of traders, travelers, and tourists over the centuries. A prized piece of real estate indeed. Hannibal can imagine Rome’s forces amassing along its hills to gaze down upon the city that had so often proved a thorn in many a pope’s side. From these hilltops one can see vineyards and orchards for miles.

Hannibal reaches the crest of the city’s uppermost hill where the Museo Bandini is located. He pulls into a parking spot in one of the lots in the park that surrounds the archaeological site. He takes a moment to envy what must be Clayton's view every time he walks his dogs up here. The ruins of the amphitheater below vie with one's attention for the lush gardens that surround the museum above. Clayton spends as much time with his dogs as someone else he knows. How utterly perfect.

Clayton had been happy to converse about his canines with Hannibal. Prompted by Hannibal's questions, he had talked as much about the trained dogs he uses in his therapy as his own. In his haste to get to his office before his patient, he had not cleaned his cream colored trousers of his pets' assault as he had left his house, and enough dog hair and dander had adhered to the fabric to arouse one's allergies if one were so disposed.

Of course, there had been other less innocuous evidence clinging to Clayton this morning, which is why Hannibal finds himself staring down into the ruins of the Teatro Romano in Fiesole this afternoon.

He had driven back to Impruneta after his appointment this morning, leaving the flustered Clayton to deal with his other patients. Clayton will not be at his office all day. He is probably on his way back already.

Clayton had already explained to Hannibal that he had cut his office hours back, and at the time Hannibal had thought Du Maurier's patient, Lydia the reason for Clayton's scaled back scheduling. Hannibal cannot fault Clayton for allowing Will to monopolize his practice. Neither can he fault him for being late on account of Will. Hannibal cannot fault him for any of it. And yet he finds his jaws tight as his hands clench the steering wheel.

Hannibal knows the scent of sex. It is organic and earthy; a mixture of sweat, fluids both acidic and alkaline, and the residue emanates an odor as recognizable as decomposition. Hannibal supposes in a way it is. Semen is alive. And as it dries sticky and sweet upon the skin it dies, imparting a specific smell, unique to each individual.

Will's sexual scent is very specific and Hannibal's familiarity with it extends to every one of his senses. Will may as well have signed his name along Clayton's throat. That signature scent had held Hannibal captive, so that had he closed his eyes and run his tongue across Clayton's exposed neck, he would have tasted Will in all his salty sweetness as surely as if he had been kneeling before him.

Hannibal's fingers twitch at the steering wheel, his hands grasp the smooth leather and he thinks of his hands grasping the smooth handle of that linoleum knife seconds before sinking its blade into smooth perfect flesh. Tea cup shattered and the shards are so very sharp. Hannibal has cut them both.

It is not Clayton's fault he is now the salt in Hannibal's wound. Hannibal had found him worthy of a second chance at life. Hannibal takes a deep cleansing breath and feels the bitter scraping across his wound subside. Had he let Clayton die, he would not have found Will. Du Maurier's scheming would have taken another form, and she would know about Will and Hannibal would not. All things considered, Hannibal cannot begrudge Clayton his association with Will. As a psychiatrist, Clayton would have found Will fascinating. Fascination led to desire. Hannibal can identify with that.

Hannibal remembers many chilly evenings looking into his appointment book, his eyes riveted to one name among all the others. The name written into the last line in Hannibal's own elegant hand had summoned the familiar anticipation he feels now.

Will…

The longing has wound its way through his chest and limbs, threading through sinew and bone, the need to hold, to touch tortures him, unleashed and unabated since his senses had been overcome with Will's scent clinging to Clayton this morning as it had once cleaved to his own skin and clothing. The throb of the open wound as inseparable from his existence as the beating of his heart.

Hannibal would have liked to have driven to Fiesole directly from Florence this morning, but the status of his current guests demanded his return to Impruneta before indulging his curiosity in Fiesole. Returning home immediately after his appointment had been his original intention this morning and assurance of his guests' continued circumstances must be maintained.

Leaving the Paolini twins unattended all day would be unwise. All of his preparations are about to coalesce culminating in a composition of epic design. Orchestrations of carbon, melodies synchronized once again, point and counterpoint.

Before leaving Florence he had taken the time to stop at a florist shop to arrange a special delivery for Du Maurier.

Hannibal had hand selected only the darkest of red roses in the shop, the petals crimson velvet upon his fingertips, bringing to mind the very essence of the blood and lust that will surely flow. Every creative act has its destructive consequence, and Du Maurier cannot escape the consequences of her own actions.

It is clear to Hannibal that she has known about Will for some time. Hannibal thinks it impossible that she does not. She has been courting Clayton for weeks. Hannibal thinks it likely Du Maurier set Will's palazzo on fire to force him to move elsewhere, someplace far from the Palazzo Pitti and the Vasari Corridor where Hannibal spends his days in Florence.

Her frequent visits to Fiesole must have precipitated a chance meeting with Clayton, whose resemblance to Will must have been jarring enough. Her curiosity piqued, she had investigated him further, leading to the discovery of his association with Will. Believing it only a matter of time until Will and Hannibal crossed paths she had orchestrated her own symphony of subterfuge, creating a situation of convenience.

The sympathetic and smitten Clayton had insisted his displaced patient stay with him. Du Maurier could keep them both under surveillance while attending to her patient, the likelihood of Will crossing paths with Hannibal greatly reduced. Du Maurier had effectively rendered even Clayton's office useless.

Du Maurier does not spend so much time at the winery and estate for her patient's sake. Discovering Will in Florence, knowing a reunion between them imminent and unavoidable, she decided to cut and run. Her greatest fear is that Hannibal will find Will, or that Will will locate Hannibal before the transfer of assets. Hannibal must allay those fears for her.

Hannibal considers her words and actions, stitches them together in his mind until a tapestry of intentions begins to emerge. Clayton is a weapon pointed at both ends. One end draws memories like blood from Hannibal and the other is poised to reopen the wound Will carries.

Whatever her plan is, it requires Will's presence to remain secret until all her pieces are in place upon the board. What a devious queen Du Maurier has become. She thinks to rid herself of all three of them, capture the code like a flag, and fly off to Switzerland to claim the spoils of conquest.

Hannibal thinks upon the satisfied smile that will spread across her lips as she opens his gift of blood red roses. His token card of gratitude for her thoughtful introduction of the charming Clayton into Hannibal's otherwise routine existence should dispel a few of the fretful clouds hovering over her horizon.

Hannibal will allow her to set her pieces unobstructed. At least until the twins make an appearance on the news. Then, their game of chess will truly begin. Hannibal will advance across the board removing each of her pieces one by one, until the queen stands alone.

Hannibal turns off the ignition and steps out, popping the trunk as he does. He exchanges his button down shirt for a pale loose tee in the parking lot, nodding at the appreciative smiles of the two women standing at their car admiring him. He dons a faded blue baseball cap and adjusts the jeans that fit snugly if not uncomfortably. Walking around Fiesole as an anonymous tourist necessitates a change of wardrobe.

He slips his phone into the right front pocket of his jeans and tucks the slim wallet into a back pocket.

The walk to Via Fra Giovanni where Clayton resides should take about half an hour. Hannibal will find a secluded place nearby from which to observe, just like Du Maurier must have done. Ironies abound, but it is upon Hannibal's shoulders that Fate descends as surely as the sun sets behind him.

Will sits in front of Daniel's laptop his finger poised over the mouse as he contemplates hitting send. The e-mail is to Jack and Will knows that hitting send will trigger a series of events that once set in motion, will again spiral beyond and out of his control. He is also acutely aware of what will happen if he does not.

He glances at the old mantel clock over the fireplace. The scratched glass and embossed Roman numerals remind him of another clock with the same dark wood framing the same round face in the center but a coating of dust from disuse had stuck to Will's old mantle clock. His clock had been lodged in his bookcase, its electric cord tucked behind it because it had finally stopped working after travelling with Will since he had left home.

When he looks at Daniel's clock he is invariably taken back to the day he had reluctantly unplugged it, thinking he would take the old heirloom with him next time he went into Baltimore; or to Quantico, drop it off and get it repaired. He had never gotten around to it. He thinks it portentous that the mantel clock he had dragged around with him since college had stopped working the day before Jack Crawford had stepped into his classroom to borrow his imagination.

Will rereads his message, finger still hovering over the mouse and decides the wording is precise, conveying facts without the clutter of adjectives or adverbs that might suggest how Will feels about the message. He adds Mason, always ensuring both Mason and Jack have the same traceable information so that neither Jack nor Mason has an advantage over the other, at least not from Will. However Mason intends to exact his revenge, keeping Jack informed provides Will with some insurance that Mason will have to step carefully around Jack to pull it off.

Just because Mason is bankrolling their clandestine enterprise does not mean that Jack will allow Mason to call the shots. Will can depend on Jack to keep Mason on edge. Jack is very good at that.

Will imagines that his lack of contact has prompted quite a bit of speculation between the two of them, each of them tip toeing around the other trying to determine how much the other knows, without arousing suspicions as to intentions. Jack is suspicious of Mason and Mason is contemptuous of Jack and of the FBI in general. Mason has never deviated from his account of his accident and Jack had known better than to ask Will about it. Jack understands the practicality of plausible deniability, particularly where Hannibal and Will are concerned.

Will would have loved to have seen Jack's deniability in action when he'd finally been subjected to the debriefing after his release from the hospital. Will can imagine the look on Kade Purnell's face as Jack had tried to navigate through the voluminous evidence and forensic reports on Hannibal's home and office. Entrapment could not hold a candle to the implications and correlations between the human remains in the fridge, Hannibal's recipe box and rolodex of business cards, and the staggering number of dinner invitations. Will has to wonder how Jack explained dining with Hannibal knowing full well what was likely on the menu. And how does someone like Purnell, Inspector General of FBI Oversight, even phrase the question?

So Jack, did you know you were eating people to entrap Doctor Lecter?

Purnell would not put it past Will, but Jack?

Jack had apparently not sat comatose through his psych evaluations. He still has a job.

Purnell now knows the breadth and scope of Hannibal's pathology. She knows that it was Hannibal who had murdered the judge presiding over Will's case, not Matthew Brown. When Hannibal's testimony had failed to sway the judge toward an acquittal, Hannibal had left him swinging from the rafters, delivering his own suspended sentence and settling for a mistrial instead. Will has imagined many times the sight that must have cost Purnell her breakfast that morning.

Thanks to the abundance of forensic evidence at his home and office, she also has no doubt as to source of Hannibal's tantrum. Purnell had found Will contemptible before the events at 5 Chandal Square. She had been unable to cloak her contempt afterward. Will had cringed inside the entire time he had endured her brief visit at the hospital. If Purnell had her druthers, Will would never see the light of day again, except from between bars.

Do you believe in miracles, Mr. Graham? Because when we catch him, and we will catch him; it will be a miracle if you avoid a padded room.

Will is well aware that Jack cannot guarantee the promised immunity from future prosecution. This is partly because of Purnell and partly because there is no guarantee that Will's actions won't place the FBI under scrutiny once again. There is already a chalked figure of him drawn beneath the proverbial bus the FBI will surely throw him under should he fail to exercise the requisite restraint and decorum this time.

Kade Purnell may have to shift her rigid perspective once Hannibal displays the twins in another morbid tableau. She will be desperate for Jack to bring Hannibal in, or kill him, if only to salvage relations between Interpol and the FBI. The FBI's inability to capture one well-heeled serial killing cannibal has raised eyebrows and smiles among European law enforcement. They will continue to smile until Hannibal goes a-hunting in their backyard.

Then, they will want Jack's crazy damaged bloodhound on the case. They will wink while the mongoose goes after the snake. And Will will no longer be on his own as he is now. He will be under relentless surveillance because no one really wants Lecter's love interest to actually catch him. Jack certainly does not want Will alone with Hannibal. They only want Will to lead them to him. Neither the FBI nor Interpol knows what Hannibal might do to him; or what Will might do with Hannibal.

Will hits send, and his fingers recoil immediately as though the mere touch of skin to smooth plastic sent an electric current through him. He cradles his head in his hands, massaging his temples and scalp until the thoughts begin to recede from his consciousness. He can feel his mind detaching from a reality that leaves him cold and numb inside, casting off from the shore to float away, and too wearied to contemplate the consequences another minute.

To the truth then. And all its consequences.

The hour and minute hands of the clock form a single arrow, pointing to twelve and Will wonders where the morning went. The last couple hours have passed quickly since Daniel flew out of bed, swearing as he had run down the stairs. Will had lain in bed and had laughed out loud listening to him fumble around the kitchen, dogs at his heels, still swearing loudly, this time about somebody moving his car keys from the top of the fridge.

Daniel had suggested Will engage in some yard work today, perhaps mow the lawn if he were so inclined since the forecast was calling for rain this weekend. A little manual labor would dislodge the disquieting dread that constricts like a noose around his throat every time he thinks about the twins, for a little while. Will clicks on the browser to check the weather. If the forecast does not call for rain this weekend, Will can occupy his mind with something other than cutting grass. He should have taken out the lawn mower earlier, before noontime. Now, the yard is baking under the hot Tuscan sun, humidity so thick, Will thinks steamed clams would be less sticky.

As the local forecast comes up on the screen, Will notices the toolbar flicker as the webcam is activated. As he wonders what he touched on the laptop to cause the damn thing to turn on, the image of Jack Crawford sitting at his desk pops up in a window. Will groans inwardly but clicks to make the image larger and he sees Zeller standing next to Jack's chair, hands still flitting over the keyboard as Jack grimaces behind him.

"He's there, I got him, Jack." Zeller says.

"I can see that." Jack says, "So what are you doing now?"

"Adjusting the audio. I don't hear anything…"

"Because he's not saying anything. Will?"

"Yes, Jack."

Will's teeth find his lower lip, drawing the flesh slowly into his mouth. He had not expected the consequences to catch up to him so soon.

"Oh…right." Zeller says, "Hey Will."

Zeller waves, a pleasant smile on his face. Will rubs at temples already pulsing and Jack hasn't even said anything to him yet. He smiles wanly at Zeller who at least looks happy to see him.

"Hello, Zee."

“You finished catching up?” Jack says from his chair.

“Uh, yeah…you’re good to go Jack.” Zeller shrugs at Will.

“Wonderful. Then why the fuck are you still here?”

Will waits for Zeller to clear the room. He hears the door to Jack’s office slam shut as Jack leans forward in his chair, hands folded on the top of his cluttered desk. The raised scar along his neck where Hannibal had stabbed his jugular with broken glass is visible above the collar of his wrinkled shirt. Will’s eyes are drawn to it, and he imagines again the struggle that preceded it. He closes his eyes until the images recede. We all carry scars from him, don’t we, Jack.

Jack’s suit jacket is as wrinkled as his shirt and it hangs from shoulders, bowed with fatigue. Will thinks he has lost some weight. Will decides he is a man in mourning still, thoughts of Bella never far from his mind. Will notes the picture frame turned around behind Jack, but he knows whose face graces the photograph.

Will observes the lines of age carved around Jack’s mouth, the creases around and between his eyes, made more prominent from the artificial light that seems to suck the lustrous brown from his complexion, causing his skin to appear more sallow than Will knows it to be.

Jack stares at him wide eyed and unblinking. Will thinks of dead fish and looks aside. Gesturing to the files and papers on Jack’s desk, Will clears his throat.

“Keeping you busy?” Will says, trying to be sociable.

“The criminals or my superiors?” Jack snaps.

Will fights the urge to sink his teeth into his lip. He straightens up in his chair, forcing himself to behave how Jack would prefer him to behave. He considers a moment what exactly that might look like. He decides instead to give Jack what he expects.

“Just say what’s on your mind, Jack. No need to put on gloves with me.”

The smallest of tweaks tug at the corner of Jack’s mouth. He glances down at a paper on his desk.

“So, I received your email. I don’t hear from you for weeks and now this?”

“I can’t help what turns up. But the Paolini have been incommunicado for too long. Something’s up.”

“I concur. And so does Mason Verger. I spoke to him earlier. I’m going to include him in our conference call, right now.”

Will opens his mouth to protest but shuts it again. He steels himself to the inevitable and waits for Mason to appear on the split screen. He averts his eyes as Mason’s face, or what remains of it appears next to Jack’s. The lighting isn’t any better where Mason is, Will decides.

“Mr. Graham.” The sound grates, memories threaten and Will presses his fingernails into the palms of his hands, “You’re looking healthy and handsome these days. Is that a suntan?” Mason’s voice crackles over the speakers, irritating as always.

You must be the baby daddy…I'm going to feed you to my pigs…I'm full of myself…My face is cold…

"Mr. Verger." Will nods vaguely at the camera.

Verger's patched and scarred face does not move, but his cold blue eyes do. They search Will's face for several seconds as Jack sits rubbing at his. Will thinks again of dead fish, of pale translucent flesh exposed between slit scales peeled back in layers. Of Saran wrap on raw blood drenched tissue…

"You know, you are so attractive Mr. Graham. You should think about making babies with somebody. Imagine what lovely children you would spawn."

"Sire." Will says, "You meant, sire."

Jack sits quietly, eyes blinking and a confused expression on his face. He glances up at Will who catches his eyes and shrugs slightly.

"Oh, of course I did. Ha! Now…about my employees. You lost them in France, I believe."

"I didn't lose them. But they do appear to be lost. And I am certain they made it back to Italy, maybe back to Florence."

"To Florence."

"If Lecter has them, then he knows who sent them. He knows you are here in the states with the money, and he knows I am in Florence waiting for the twins. Did they send you any information?"

"No. They said the files would have to be scanned. All…old stuff. No electronic files."

"They told me the same thing. I only received tax documents and property deeds from Lithuania."

Will watches Mason roll his tongue over the rolled skin that passes for lips. The image of what Mason looked like before he cut off his face in strips with Papa's knife appears ghostlike beneath the scarred flesh. Will cannot make the image go away no matter how hard he tries.

Will thinks Daniel may be on to something. His mind invariably remains in the past, unable to grapple with the present, so it retreats to a time when it could. Perhaps.

"I find it…oddly convenient how they are lost and you are not. Explain to me why…you weren't with them."

Will imagines a different Mason, walking along scaffolding, arms gesturing wildly, in love with the sound of his own voice…

"Should I have been?" Will says.

"Well, Luciano said you would be going with them."

"Did Luciano actually say that, or did he imply it?"

"The exact wording of our conversation escapes me… Why?"

“Well, it makes a difference if Luciano outright lied or if you just heard it wrong.”

“I suppose…”

“You could have contacted me anytime. You didn’t.” Will says.

“You didn’t contact me either.”

“But that is nothing out of the ordinary. Luciano usually talks to you, sometimes Lucia.”

“Will, tell us what you said to the twins before they left.” Jack rubs along his eyebrows. Listening to Mason was like listening to fingernails on a chalkboard.

“I suggested the trip to Lithuania. Luciano said he and Lucia were up for it. He said he would clear it with you. You’re the money. Next I hear from him, they have already landed in Lithuania.”

“I pay you to work together.” Mason says.

Drool pools in the corner of his mouth. A thick hairy hand, attached to a nurse Will hopes, appears on the screen with a towel to dab at Mason’s mouth and the folds of skin that approximate lips, but the grafting it seems, is not working out so well. Will can’t find it within himself to feel anything as he stares at the pale patchwork of sutures and scarring that covers the bottom half of Mason’s face like a road map.

Check that. Will does feel something. His lips part slightly as he silently thinks he loathes Mason.

“And we do, or did. I could have gone with them…”

“Mr. Verger, I think it just as well that Will didn’t go, don’t you?” Jack says.

Mason pauses to suck on a straw his hairy handed nurse has stuck between teeth. Will and Jack wait while Mason wets his throat which must be constantly dry given his mouth never really closes. Ever. Will watches his tongue wriggle around and finally click against the roof of his mouth as the nurse withdraws the straw, a disgusting sticky sound. Will’s stomach turns.

“What was I saying? Oh yes…working together. Agent Crawford, what…is the recommended protocol in this situation?”

“There is no protocol for this. Not where Lecter is concerned. I would like to talk to Will about his recommendations and after considering all the angles, I will get back to you and let you know what I decide. If you have nothing more to add, of course.”

Mason rolls his eyes up in his head, apparently searching for something else to add. Will wonders if Mason realizes his attic has already been cleaned and cleared out. Nobody home… Vacant but for the maliciousness that remains, corrosive and eating him alive from the inside out.

Mason clicks his tongue a couple times, “No…I guess not. Seems you are very lucky, Mr. Graham.”

“Oh, I am far from lucky.” Will says.

“What do you think Lecter will do?” Mason asks, eyes wide with the gory possibilities.

“Kill them horribly, but with distinction.” Will says.

“Unfortunately, a rescue operation is out of the realm of possibility.” Jack says. “Thank you for your time, Mr. Verger. Signing off.”

Mason’s face vanishes and the split screen disappears leaving Jack in wide screen. Will thinks that a marginally better visual.

“There’s more than a little friction between you two. Still.”

“That’s not going to change, Jack.”

“You know…” Jack begins, and Will braces himself. “I have to wonder about this arrangement you have with Verger. What was all that about you going with them to Lithuania?”

“Mason doesn’t trust me. He expects his employees to keep an eye on me.”

“So, why would this Luciano and his sister leave you behind when they know what their boss wants?”

“Maybe they found me a bit of a drag, a tag along.” Will shrugs. “I’m not much fun.”

“Or maybe you put that idea in Luciano’s head. Why would you do that?”

“Because if Mason wants them to shadow me, then I don’t want them shadowing me.”

“Fair enough. Let’s talk about the laptop. Why aren’t you using it?”

“Because it is burned beyond recognition, like the rest of my apartment.”

“Say again? Where are you?”

“I’m still in Florence, Jack, just the address has changed. Don’t tell me you haven’t already identified this IP address. I have my reasons for not telling Mason. I was hoping you wouldn’t ask in front of him.”

“When did this happen? Your place burning down…”

“A couple weeks ago, while the twins were out of country. Mason doesn’t know and I would like to keep it that way.”

“Does that include me?”

“You have the IP address. We don’t exchange postcards…”

“Will, this is not the arrangement we agreed to. And with the disappearance of Mason’s people, this looks really bad. For you.”

“I know.”

“You know. What were you thinking?” Jack’s voice bellows through the speakers.

Will stares at him coldly, unaffected by the tactic. It’s just Jack blowing off steam. He will be blowing a gasket before too long.

“You send Mason’s people on a hunt to Lithuania, they move around Europe digging up dirt on Lecter, and end up in France. The last you hear from them is before they board their flight at De Gaulle. But you think they are in Florence?”

“Correct.”

“Lecter will kill them as you said. This is the best you could come up with? You handed those people to Lecter, Will.”

“Yes, I did. Want to know why?”

“I’m all ears, Will.”

“They work for Mason. Mason wants Hannibal at any cost. If I find Hannibal using his people, the FBI will never see Hannibal. You understand that, right?”

“Not exactly. You report to me, not Mason’s people. I think Mason would have no problem disposing of Hannibal on his own, but that’s not going to happen. That’s why you are there.”

“I copy Mason everything I send you.”

“As far as I know. So?”

“So that he knows that you know what he knows.”

I’m not following you, Will. This is a joint venture, why wouldn’t he be kept in the loop?”

Will shakes his head and laughs, bitterly, he doesn’t even recognize his own voice.

“Jack…who else knows you pulled me out of protective custody, besides Zee who has clearly been sworn to secrecy, and Mason and...well, Margot?”

“No one. As we agreed.”

“And what happens if something happens to me?”

Jack sits back in his chair, folds his hands together in a pyramid. The angry glint in his eyes melts away, his expression gentled by Will’s question, and he looks at Will in a way he has not in very long time. He purses his lips and lowers his eyes, an approximation of an apology. But not quite.

“What happened between you, Hannibal, and Verger?”

“You don’t really want me to tell you, Jack.”

“And why is that, Will?”

“Because then you’d be obligated to act and I don’t think you really want to do that. Not now.”

“Something happened.” Jack says softly. “Something to cause you to fear for your life.”

“Something sure did. Mason’s people are hired assassins. They would have killed me once I found Hannibal.”

Will watches Jack's eyebrows shoot up. "That's the truth, Jack. Mason wants us both dead. Mason is using you, so that he can use me to catch Hannibal. Then he'll thank me…"

"By killing you. For whatever however you helped…mutilate him."

Will does not nod; he does not acknowledge Jack's statement in any way. He can't. Jack knows he can't. Will thinks how adversarial their relationship has become. He can remember sitting on the bathtub with Jack as they had talked about the Ripper, the body of a freshly murdered victim of organ harvesting gone wrong sprawled in the tub between them. Jack had confided in Will back then.

You'll catch the Ripper eventually.

Yeah, well, I want to catch him now. And when I do, you're not gonna get a chance to shoot him, 'cause I'm gonna do that.

You can't just jack up the law and get underneath it.

Can't I?

Will had found Jack's dim view of the law rather startling for an FBI agent. He had come to respect Jack, had considered him close enough to be a friend, at least an ally. They had a shared desire for catching the Ripper. In the beginning, Jack had more reasons to catch him than had Will. By the time Will had found the Ripper, Jack had not believed him. Hannibal's design.

And yet, Jack had not abandoned him. Jack had not played the card Purnell had all but ordered him to play. Jack had put his career on the line to testify on Will's behalf. Later, he had covered Will's ass, or at least tried to, while they had laid their trap for Hannibal. Will had known all that and had still set Jack up, had sent him to dine with the Ripper. Alone.

Will thinks he might have shattered some tea cups himself. Jack is pretty shattered. He is at least chipped and perhaps as broken as Will. Will sighs and decides to give Jack the honesty he wants, as much as Will can afford to offer.

"Jack, there's something else about the twins you should know. They are part of a crime family here in Italy. Sardinia and Tuscany mostly. Hannibal killed two of their family who worked on the Verger estate for Mason, in the states. The Paolini family also wants Hannibal. And maybe…me. At any rate, Mason has hired them to kill us both, and not quickly."

"This is news. Why did Hannibal kill them?"

"They tried to kill him first."

Jack leans back in his swivel chair, fingers to lips, as he stares at Will's image on his computer. Will knows he won't ask how Will knows.

"Verger doesn't know you know. You've kept this to yourself. Knew Verger's intentions and agreed to his terms anyway."

"It's the only way to catch him, Jack. I was the lure before. I still am. Hannibal will make contact using the twins, I'm sure of it."

“So you hope to kill two birds with one stone. Lure him out and he kills the assassins. He’ll wring every bit of information he can from them before he kills them.”

“I know.”

“He’ll find you.”

“I know that, too.”

The back door flings open and the sound of the door slamming back against the jamb startles Will out of his seat. The dogs start to bark wildly, and Daniel drops his attaché case on the table with a loud thump.

“Hey girls.” Daniel is already on the floor, face in fur, as Cara and Bella fuss and lick at his clothes. “Did you miss me, huh? Did you miss me?”

Daniel perches on his knees, pushes himself off the floor and finally notices Will at his computer. He realizes Will is on camera with someone. He pats down his ruffled suit and walks over to the table and the laptop to peer over Will’s shoulder.

“Hey.” Will says, looking up.

“Hey. What’s going on?”

“Who the… Who is that?” Jack says, squinting into the camera.

“Jack, this is my psychiatrist, Doctor Clayton.” Will turns slightly toward Daniel, “This is Jack Crawford.”

Daniel’s face remains remarkably still although he blinks several times. Daniel can feel the tension in Will spread from his own jaw down his neck to settle in his shoulders. He has obviously interrupted a very heated discussion and he knows who they would be discussing.

“Hi.” Daniel says, “Good to finally put a face on the name.” He smiles at Crawford. He doesn’t really know what else to do.

“He’s…your psychiatrist. When did you start seeing another… Are you in his office right now?”

Jack sits gazing at both of them, eyes shifting from one to the other.

“I just left my office. This is my home. Will told you his place burned down? Well, I invited him to stay here.”

“And this is your laptop?”

“It is. Is there uh, anything you wanted to ask me before I take the dogs out?” Daniel offers, knowing Agent Crawford will have no questions for him until he talks to Will.

“No, not at the moment. But, if you won’t be too long, I might have some later.”

“Okay. Again, good to meet you.” Daniel looks down at Will. “I’ll get changed and take them out.”

Daniel walks around the other side of the table, out of Jack's line of sight, but clearly within Will's. Will sits so rigidly in his chair Daniel thinks he might split in two if he touched him. Crawford has him wound up tight. He wonders what prompted today's video conference.

You okay? He mouths silently. Will nods slightly and waves him off. He hears Daniel thump up the stairs, the dogs in tow, claws clicking against the hardwood trying to keep from slipping.

"Will, what the...What is going on with you?"

"Your concern is heartwarming."

"Why are you seeing a psychiatrist?"

"I'm alone, Jack. I needed some…objectivity."

"Living with him is hardly objective." When Will doesn't respond, Jack continues, "What…have you told him?"

"Everything."

"Will. You can't tell him classified information."

"Why not? Doctor patient confidentiality. I trust him, Jack."

"Well, that's saying something. You've done a one eighty on the psychiatric community. Why him?"

"He likes dogs."

"A singular endorsement for you. What else? What are his credentials?"

"Look him up. I'm sure you will."

"This is not a good time to fall apart Will, tell me that you are not falling apart."

"I'm not falling apart."

"Then why are you seeing him? I'm going to ask him when he gets back. Now, he'll claim doctor patient privilege; but I'm telling you that if I am not satisfied with the answers, I'm bringing you home. Is that what you want?"

"Bring me home for what? To finally stand trial for the charges hanging over my head? Because if I don't deliver on Lecter, you and I both know what will happen to me. You know what I want? I want a clear head. To get that, I need to hear how I sound to somebody…normal."

"These are not normal circumstances. I think you're right about Lecter taking the twins. I don't agree with your methods, but after four months of nothing, I'll take it without missing any sleep. But, I can't have you…losing yourself, or your mind over this."

"Conscience bothering you, Jack? I've already lost my mind. Doctor Clayton here is helping me adjust to what is left."

"What's left is you and I. We are the only ones to get close to him and live."

"There's Mason."

"Mason is a ruined hunk of flesh with a huge bank account. He was never close to Hannibal." Jack sighs and opens his mouth to speak, words still forming in his head. "I am alive only because Hannibal was interrupted. He would have eventually burst through that pantry door and finished the job. And he had called me friend."

"In Hannibal's mind, you were, Jack. Friendship is not something he would throw away easily. To his mind, you forced him to do something he regretted."

I forced you to do something I regret…

"Hmmm. Well, he would have killed me if Alana…and you had not arrived. He could have killed you, too, Will. But he didn't. There was no pantry door between you and him."

"No, just a blade."

"There was much more between you than that knife, Will."

"We've…been over this already. At the inquiry."

"This is just us talking. You and I. He loved you, Will. I don't know what else to call it. You let him…"

Jack stops, the words sit in his mind curdling like the expression on his face. Will waits, focuses on the sound of Daniel at the front door putting the leashes on the dogs. For the briefest of seconds, Will can imagine walking out the door with Daniel, running with the dogs around the park, this laptop and the image of Jack and all he represents gone, like none of it ever happened.

"Your DNA was all over his house, Will. In places it shouldn't have been. From the basement to the bathroom. You kept a toothbrush there for Christ's sake. And those drawings…pretty incriminating stuff.

"I know what you found, Jack. I already said…"

"I know what you said. You were baiting him. Is that what you told yourself? Your empathy, Will. You got too close. Too close to tell the difference between what you wanted and what he wanted. I need to know if you know what you want, now. In this moment."

"Jack…"

"I can't let you near him if I can't…"

"Can't trust me?"

"Can't be sure you won't become confused…again."

"You don't have anything Hannibal wants, except me. You can pull the plug if you want. There is nothing, absolutely nothing I can say that will convince you I am emotionally or mentally stable enough to handle it."

"There's your integrity. You still have that. Hearing from you that you at least you think you can handle it would go a long ways."

"Honestly, Jack? I don't know if I am up for it. But, I'm trying. He has to be stopped. We both want that.

"You remember the case with the dead woman in the horse?"

"How could I forget?"

"Well, there were indications of your state of mind when you were together even back then. I watched you and Hannibal exchanging looks while we took statements from each of you, while Ingram sat shaking in handcuffs. The man had pissed all over himself. Christ, Will, he had shit himself."

"I know. I was there."

"Do you know what he said once he was sitting on plastic in the back of the police car?"

"I guess you're gonna tell me."

"He said you held your gun to his head, tried to force him to pick up a hammer. He said you and the other guy with the accent had a strange conversation, but it was the other guy who stopped you from pulling the trigger. You, Will."

"It was…therapy."

"Goddamn it, Will. This is me you're talking to. Me!"

"And because it is you, I can't, Jack. Why didn't you act on it? Say something then?"

"Because Hannibal apparently opened the door on the other side, slipped inside for a few minutes for a conversation and slipped back out. Ingram never said another word about it. Like the entire episode had slipped his mind. Poof. Gone."

"Hannibal is quite the magician. He can make a lot of things disappear."

The front door opens and the noise of panting dogs fill the living room. Will turns his head to see Daniel hanging up the leashes. Daniel's walk was much shorter than usual. Will knows he wants to help and he didn't want to keep Jack waiting, or leave Will engaged in a conversation he clearly doesn't want any longer than necessary. Will can't help but feel relieved at the sight of Daniel massaging Cara's back as she stands stubbornly between his legs so Bella has to walk around him in circles for his attention.

"Well, let's just say I don't want him to make you disappear with him. If you don't think you can convince me you are stable enough, perhaps your psychiatrist can."

Jack's eyes move to the side of his screen and Will feels Daniel standing next to him.

"You should probably pull up a chair." Will says.

"Sure."

Daniel slides a straight back chair over, takes his seat. Will's emotional tide fairly wails beside him. Crawford has released a tumultuous storm pitching Will's emotions to and fro in its wake. Daniel shifts in his seat, settling in and opens his legs so his knee rests against Will's as he sits hunched over, tailbone on the edge of his chair. He watches Will's shoulders give a little and he feels Will nudge him beneath the table.

Daniel figures that's about as much support and affection he can offer with Crawford's face looming at him. He takes a moment to consider the head of Behavioral Sciences, the FBI agent who thinks of Will as his broken pony, his fragile tea cup, his only lead to Hannibal Lecter.

Agent Crawford is pining. He pines not for Lecter, although Daniel senses a similar determination to catch him, but for his wife. Daniel can sense the sadness in his movements, sees it in the hollow look in his eyes where there had once been tenderness. Daniel thinks finding Lecter is the only reason to live left to Jack. And that makes him dangerous. To Will.

"Will and I are just about finished." Crawford says, glancing at Will as if to concur, "I have a couple questions for you about his mental health. As his psychiatrist you are inclined to represent his best interests. I wouldn't expect anything less. I need to know if I can still put him out there."

"Is that one of the questions?" Daniel says.

Crawford smiles. "All right. I'll put things in context for you. Will says he has told you everything. I'm not sure what that means. Can you clarify what you know for me?"

"I think Will has explained all the events leading up to your last meeting with Lecter with clarity. Remembering those events is upsetting for him, but he has talked through them with me. He has likely discussed feelings with me he has not discussed with you, given the nature of our respective relationships."

"And from those discussions can you determine if he can emotionally handle confronting Lecter, again?"

"Agent Crawford, there is nothing in my experience that prepared me for what he told me. I think it a testament to your character, and his, that you continue to pursue Lecter. You have all been traumatized. Will's trauma is unique because of his gift. Does his gift enable him to still empathize with Lecter? Sure it does. I think what you really mean when you ask if he can handle confronting Lecter again is if Will is emotionally stable to know the difference between what he wants and what Lecter wants."

"Yes. That would be exactly what I need to know."

"Then my answer is yes."

"You are aware of the physical relationship between them?"

"Jack…" Will starts from his chair.

"Will, it's ok." Daniel says. "As aware as you, although my information was given to me freely, not culled from a forensic report. I suspect my understanding of the relationship is more…complex than yours."

"And knowing that, your answer would still be yes?"

"Yes, it would. Agent Crawford…"

"Jack…please." Crawford actually smiles, and the smile is warm. Tired, but genuinely warm.

“Jack. Will is hurting but functional. I can’t guarantee his good behavior. Neither can he. But I think his need for closure on this is as important to him, as it is for you. He needs a win here, Jack. Making him sit on the sidelines won’t do it.”

“And what did you think of his recent actions involving the twins?”

“I found his solution brutal, but brilliant. And evidence that he can still use Lecter’s thinking against him.”

“I think that you and I see Will the same way. Thank you for your insight, and…your honesty, Doctor Clayton.”

Daniel nods, “You’re welcome.”

Daniel squeezes Will’s shoulder and excuses himself from the conference by getting up and shoving his chair back under the table. Will watches him walk into the kitchen, open the fridge and take out a beer guzzling down nearly half the bottle before Will looks back at Jack.

“You two look a lot alike. You are aware of that, right?”

“Couldn’t miss it. He dresses better.”

“You need a haircut.” Jack says.

“That…is nothing new.” Will brushes curls out his eyes, almost smiles.

They are interrupted by banging on Jack’s door.

“Who is it? I’m in a conference here!” Jack’s voice booms through the speakers.

Will can’t make out the muffled words from behind the door, but it sounds like Zeller.

“Oh, all right. Come in, then.” Jack pauses as Zeller slips inside, closes the door behind him. “Just a second, Will.” Jack says.

“I was hoping you still had him online. Hey, Will.” Zeller sticks a flash drive into Jack’s computer. “You have got to check this out.”

“What are we looking at?”

“Footage from da Vinci airport, a week ago. Those are the twins, right there.”

“I see them. Can you hook it up for Will to see?”

“Yeah, give me a minute.”

“Looks like you were right. They made it back to Italy.”

Zeller has the video up and running in no time. Will watches the video queue up as Jack and Zeller once again are minimized into a smaller screen. The twins are walking, clearly drunk, across a parking lot carrying their baggage to their car. It’s a rental, the license plate clearly visible, but blurry. Zee can fix that later, probably already has and ran the plates, too.

Will watches the twins shift position in front of their rental. A stranger dressed all in black has accosted them, his back to the camera the entire time. Will's heart hammers almost skipping beats.

It's Hannibal.

Will knows it clear to his bones. The stranger never gives the camera a frontal or side view of his face. But the physique Will would recognize under any conditions. The composure, the self-aware mannerisms, the elegance of movement as the figure holds Lucia to his chest is all too familiar. Hannibal is practically posing for the camera. Or, for Will.

The video is brief. The altercation lasts only a minute at most before the twins and the stranger walk off camera.

"There's no more footage? From another lot, maybe?" Jack asks the back of Zeller's head.

"Nothing so far. This guy was aware of the cameras. He didn't park near any that's for sure." Zeller looks into the webcam. "It's him, isn't it? That's Lecter."

Jack is looking into the webcam, too. His face is pinched and gaunt as he looks into Will's eyes.

"Oh, that's him all right." Will says, feeling the smile spread over his lips and not caring. "Caught himself a double entrée."

Daniel walks over to the table and leans into the laptop. "You have Lecter on camera?"

"Yeah, but you can't see anything. You can't see his face."

"So how do you know?"

"I know." Will says looking up into Daniel's confused face.

Daniel swallows and nods. Of course, Will knows. The connection, the intimacy between them defies definition.

"Well, that cinches it." Jack says, "I'm coming out there. Should be there in a couple days."

"Jack, he hasn't done anything yet."

"And I want to be there before he does. Before the shit really hits the fan."

"It's going to get really, really messy. You'll be awash in it."

"Just like old times, then. I'll send you the details of my flight. You let me know if anything pops up on your end, and I'll do the same. Zee?"

"Yeah, Jack?"

"Send Will anything else you find on the airport footage or follow up. Make sure he has every scrap of information we have."

"You got it. This email address, Will?"

"Yeah, send it here."

Will looks at Daniel who nods, one hand on his hip the other holding a fresh bottle of beer.

“Jack?”

“What, Will.”

“Are you going to send this info to Mason?”

Jack taps his fingers on his desk, considering the question, and not favorably by the look on his face.

“Jack, I have appearances to maintain.”

“We don’t need him. Fuck him. Fuck, Mason.” Jack grins into the webcam.

Will feels himself grinning back. “Fuck Mason it is.”

“See you in a few days, Will.”

“Bye, Jack.”

Will turns to Daniel. “Got another one of those?”

Will nods at the bottle of beer Daniel holds in his hands. Daniel feels the tension from him still, Will’s back and shoulders must ache like hell because Daniel’s back feels stiff as a rod of rebar just standing next to him. Daniel also feels relief flowing from his limbs as well. It is the aching he feels along the invisible tear threading across his stomach that concerns him. The ache has intensified, the wound like a Geiger counter becoming more enflamed as Lecter draws closer.

“Plenty in the fridge. Ice cold.”

Will doesn’t hesitate. He cracks open a bottle and drinks deeply, enjoying the taste of malt and hops on his tongue, revels in the cool tingle as he swallows. In the space of time it took for the video conference with Jack, Will’s world has turned on its side once again. Jack is back.

“The silence before the storm, huh?” Daniel says filling the space beside Will on the counter.

“You uh, handled Jack pretty well. Gave him just what he wanted without lying.”

“I gave him an edited version of the truth.”

“A fine line.”

“Very. You do know the difference between what Lecter wants and what you want.”

“Uh huh. But Jack didn’t ask if there was difference.”

“And I’m not going to ask either.”

“Because you don’t want to know?”

“Because when you decide, I won’t have to ask.”

Daniel tips his bottle and taps it against Will's nearly empty bottle. Will lifts his head from the bottles to look into Daniel's face; pale blue eyes stare into deep green, each assessing the other. Daniel looks away first, brushes Will's hair out of his eyes, his fingers lingering in the soft curls.

"I'm in the mood for a little music. You up to practice?"

"Sing us a song you're the piano man…"

"Ugh. I hate Billy Joel." Daniel says as he walks over to the piano and picks up his violin case.

Hannibal sits at a corner table in a café situated in the back of a quaint market located the street below Via Fra Giovanni, the street bearing Fra Angelico's given name and the street along which Clayton lives. Hannibal can see the back of his rustic house from where he sits, sipping at ice water and waiting to order an iced cappuccino as the sun dips toward the horizon.

Hannibal notes the brick patio, the gas grill, and the vegetable garden. His fingers itch to prune the rose bushes that grow untended throughout the yard. The grass has grown too high, and the entire yard screams neglect to Hannibal. Will can have that effect on one. If one doesn't exert some control, one's passions will be one's undoing.

Hannibal knows this all too well.

The lovely little server has come around again, checking on her tables with a gracious smile. As she leans over Hannibal's table, he can see the drops of perspiration between her breasts, rolling like dew from freshly opened blush roses. He lets his gaze linger appreciatively on her slender form as she slides a menu in front of him.

"What do you recommend?" Hannibal asks her in Italian, laying out his wallet so that several Euros peek out from the black leather.

Her smile beams brighter still at the suave tourist speaking the language of commerce so perfectly. Hannibal has just ensured her unfailing attentions for as long he sits here.

"The coffee is our own blend, created especially for our store. For the meal…I would suggest the veal piccata."

"Then, the piccata it is. And an iced cappuccino."

"You are dining alone?"

"This evening, yes. So please come by as often you like."

"Okay. Are you in a hurry?"

"Not particularly. Why?"

"Well, you asked me what I recommended. If you like music, the classical kind, I recommend you stay a while. See that house up there, the one just above our terrace?"

"Yes, I do."

"The two guys who live there play all the time. It's like a concert."

"Really? A concert."

"Well, I think it's more a rehearsal, but they are pretty good. They'll open those big French doors so you can see the piano and they play duets. And it's free!"

"They play every night?"

"Almost. If they are home and they usually are. Everyone enjoys it. You'll see the neighbors come out and listen. We all clap so they come outside and take a bow."

"Well," says Hannibal, "I wouldn't miss it."

Hannibal senses movement in the house above, figures move by the French doors and the muffled sounds of the instruments tuning up filter through the open windows. Hannibal listens to a series of scales on piano and violin as the would be musicians warm up. Hannibal feels the anticipation rising, a luscious blooming from deep within. He is startled when he realizes he is feeling… happiness.

Clayton appears behind the frames of glass in the doors and he opens them onto the patio, his violin and bow tucked under one arm. Hannibal watches him disappear into the dark recesses of the house, the only light from the windows at the front of the house, casting everything in the room in stark silhouette.

The bass notes of Pachelbel's Canon in D register in Hannibal's ears and he sets down his fork.

Will...

Hannibal cannot believe that the fingers striking the keys are Will's. He stares unabashedly at the slender form at the piano. The wound erupts, a fissure in his chest and Hannibal bears it, though the moisture in the corners of his eyes causes him to blink. Once.

The French doors are flung wide open, Clayton's patio looms above like a stage and Hannibal can see Will's silhouette in profile hunched over the key board, mane of dark curls, distinctive nose, and the swell of lips slightly open in concentration as his hands move over the keys. Clayton stands beside him, violin poised upon his left shoulder, foot tapping in 4/4 time, as he waits for his measure to join Will.

Hannibal counts along silently in his mind and Clayton's bow slides across the strings perfectly in time. The notes soar, and the melody sinks into Hannibal's chest, bittersweet both blade and balm. Clayton wears a beatific smile as he plays, his eyes bright and alive as he watches Will play. Hannibal does not miss the unadulterated affection in those eyes. Clayton is not just playing with Will, he is playing to Will. Will sits upon the bench, eyes never wandering from the score, still lacking the confidence to look up from the keyboard.

Hannibal sits enrapt his meal forgotten as the sequential melodies wash over him, the notes resonate deep and rich, as the other people seated around him fade from his consciousness. Nothing else exists in this moment.

Will plays the ostinato, the ground bass and the first violin parts on the piano while Clayton plays third violin as it was intended. The arrangement they have chosen to play fuses the part of the second violin with the third. It is a simple arrangement, but they are playing it beautifully and Hannibal notes, they are playing it as one, each attuned to the other's presence. It is obvious they have played this piece many times.

Clayton is gifted and Hannibal thinks he might have missed his true calling. His fingers move along the frets with ease and precision, reason enough for the rough and calloused fingertips Hannibal had noticed. He stands close to Will, so his knees can prod him as he plays.

And Will needs the prodding. As they progress to last movement, Will's fingers falter. Hannibal watches Clayton lean into Will and speak into his ear. Will nods, apparently encouraged, but his fingers trail over the keys perhaps off by half a beat. Clayton covers for him a couple measures and Will manages to correct his timing.

Still having trouble with transitions Hannibal thinks as Will dutifully plays his part to the end, his bass notes synchronous with the closing strains from Clayton's violin. Hannibal is startled by the sudden bursts of applause that erupt from around him.

He had been so caught up in the performance that he had not noticed the neighbors scattered along the terraces, perched on walls or porches to listen.

"I told you." Hannibal's server says, appearing suddenly at his table. "Aren't they good?"

"Quite." Hannibal agrees. "Will they play something else?"

"Sometimes…oh, here he comes. The other one never comes outside."

Clayton has emerged from the house to stand on the patio, bow in right hand and violin held aloft in his left. He bows deeply amidst the ripples of applause from the appreciative neighbors and customers that are littered around his property.

"And, a little round for the piano player…"

Hannibal watches Will take one step outside the threshold of the French doors to wave and to glare at Clayton before ducking back inside. He is gone too soon. Hannibal had barely a glance at him. The server is waving wildly and Hannibal averts his head as Clayton notices her and waves back.

"Oh, they are going back inside. I guess that's all for this evening." She begins to gather up the plates from Hannibal's table. "Oh, you didn't finish. Was there something wrong?"

"Not at all. Just the heat."

"Would you like me to wrap it up? Put it in a doggie bag?"

Hannibal smiles at the ridiculous thought of having a dog. It occurs to him that such a thing is entirely possible…someday.

"No," Hannibal says, "But the veal was perfect. I'll be sure to come back. Just the check for now."

When Hannibal looks back up to the patio, Clayton has stepped back inside; drawing the doors behind him and the house is quiet once more. He takes the check from the dark haired young server and presses Euros into her hands. He glances up at Clayton’s house, his eyes recording every detail of the property, tucking it away for later.

He leaves the café knowing his generous tip will make the little server’s night. The walk back to his car will give him time to think in solitude. Seeing Will like this is tortuous. Leaving him here, in Fiesole while Hannibal drives back to Impruneta, even more so. Hannibal acknowledges that while the wait is tortuous, it is necessary.

He has preparations to make and invitations to send. The separating from Will tears at him, and Hannibal reminds himself it is temporary. He can allow Will to twist in his inferno a little longer. Hannibal will be delivering him from it soon enough. And Will can finally emerge from his dark pit tempered as the finest steel, a killer forged in the depths of his own hell. The question remains whether or not he is ready to join him at the table once again.

Chapter 55

Chapter Summary

Hannibal prepares the Paolini twins for their date with Destiny. Daniel introduces Will to hallucinogens and hypnotherapy. Wolf Trap and The Inferno are among the stops Will makes on his trip...until Chapter 56. See Notes at the end.

“What is in the box that will uh…redeem us?”

“The box is for you, Luciano. Go ahead, open it.”

Luciano approaches the box with obvious trepidation mingled with curiosity and perhaps, his large brown eyes gleam with hope as he takes the scissors from Hannibal’s hands. There is no hesitation as he slices the tape that seals the cardboard. Luciano holds the scissors with a fondness of a hunter fondling his knife. Hannibal thinks that a good sign. Luciano will need his hunter’s instincts.

The Jaguar sits cold in the circular drive in front of Hannibal's villa. It is warm in Impruneta as the stars begin to come out in the Tuscan sky. It is warm but not sticky. A faint breeze from the over the hills bring relief. The windows are open in the kitchen so Hannibal can smell the fragrant aromas of his garden as much as to hear the sounds of life stirring in the dark outside.

Hannibal knows if he closes the windows all he will hear is the hum of the air conditioner. He could play some music, but he thinks he has listened to enough for the evening. He would prefer to listen to the gurgle of the fountain in the backyard, the chirping of insects, or the sound of bat wings beating as they search for their supper.

Hannibal is alone. And Will is not.

As his mind has done relentlessly upon learning Will's whereabouts, his thoughts rewind and replay events from the past, their past. His mind watches an endless movie that runs continuously through his memory palace. Tonight, as he reaches into the stainless steel fridge for the ingredients that will comprise a meal for the Paolini twins downstairs, he thinks on Will's intentions then and now.

How much of Will had been performance and much had been…Will? Hannibal does not retreat from fear. It is an emotion he has not felt since childhood and he might have trouble identifying it should he ever experience it. He thinks alarm would perhaps be more accurate. But fear is what he thinks he feels when doubts about Will enter his mind. Fear that he might be wrong, might have been wrong about Will all along.

To be wrong about Will would cause Hannibal to question his entire existence. Hannibal is never wrong. He miscalculates…from time to time.

We're just alike. This gives you the capacity to deceive me and be deceived by me…You're applying yourself to my perspective. As I've been applying myself to yours.

You're right. We are just alike. You're as alone as I am. And we're both alone without each other.

Will had leaned forward in his chair a little, his eyes intently focused upon Hannibal's as they often were when they sat facing each other in Hannibal's office, a room that, for them, had become an arena where the weapons had been words but each had drawn blood from the other nonetheless. Hannibal had looked into those pale blue eyes and that sincere face and had believed Will his.

Hannibal can remember every conversation they ever had and imagines so can Will. He thinks of the conversation they had standing over Clark Ingram while the police, the FBI, and Jack had arrived. Will had called in the apparent homicide while talking to Peter Bernardone and Hannibal had waited with the sheep. Poor Mister Ingram's life had gone from bad to worse in a matter of seconds. Bad enough Will had drawn his gun on him, but he had witnessed far too much for Hannibal to suffer his interference.

But all that had come after other revelations.

With all my knowledge and intrusion, I could never entirely predict you. I can feed the caterpillar, and I can whisper through the chrysalis, but what hatches, follows its own nature and is beyond me.

Will's hand had slowly let go of the Berretta Hannibal had just decocked, his sorrowful eyes looking squarely into Hannibal's, glistening with the questions and emotions surging through his mind. His fingers had trailed along Hannibal's fingers as he had allowed Hannibal to take the weapon from him.

Guns are efficient and are possessed of a certain utility certainly the military and law enforcement could not do without them, but Hannibal has never used one. He had been somewhat familiar with the pistols and shot guns favored by the FBI before becoming involved with Will and Jack, but it had not been until Will had attempted to kill him in Hobbs' kitchen that he had taken it upon himself to become more intimate with Will's weapons of choice. Of course, Will had not needed to know that.

Hannibal slices Roma tomatoes from his garden as he thinks of the encounter in the barn with Ingram. When Will had almost killed a man. Or had he?

Many troublesome behaviors strike when you are uncertain of yourself.

Peter Bernardone lies in the same darkness that holds you.

No, I'm alone in that darkness.

You're not alone, Will. I'm standing right beside you.

"Is that supposed to be comforting?"

Will had continued to gaze out the windshield his hand slipping inside his coat where Hannibal knew his side arm was strapped to his body like a snug safety blanket.

“More comforting than the gun you cradle to your chest. Which weapon of choice do we have this evening?”

“And why would you need to know that?” Will had almost laughed and glanced out the dark side window, his reflection causing him to turn right back around.

“I’ve taken an interest in the guns you use.”

“The FBI issues all kind of weapons. It’s a long list.”

“I mean your weapons.”

Will had at last turned away from the windshield to look at Hannibal, eyes glittering with an almost cruel amusement.

“That’s a very specific interest, doctor. And when exactly did my weapon become worthy of your interest?”

“I would think that obvious. You are very fond of your…weapons. I have been curious since you aimed one at my face in Hobbs’ kitchen. And you aimed another one at me, in my own kitchen. I think you can appreciate my curiosity.”

Hannibal had given Will a sidelong glance. Will had simply stared back at him until Hannibal had been forced to return his attention back to the road. They had ridden in silence for a minute or so, until Will had cleared his throat, more a grunt than anything else.

“You really don’t know much about guns, do you?”

“I avoid them…or try to.”

Will had actually chuckled softly, and Hannibal had enjoyed the rich throaty sound like a stolen gift. He had presented Hannibal with another unwitting gift with the trail of his tongue over moistened lips as he had continued to reflect on Hannibal’s comment.

“I must be crazy…talk about inviting troublesome behaviors…” he had muttered under his breath but he had reached inside his coat and had unsnapped the holster. The Berretta had gleamed shiny and black as Will had held it up to the dashboard within Hannibal’s line of sight.

“It’s a Berretta 84FS. Sometimes called a Cheetah, I don’t know why. You unlock it like this…” Will had given him a demonstration, holding the gun close to the steering wheel. “And you unlock it…there…like that. The magazine comes out like this…and you put it back in like that.”

“And the rest is just aim and shoot?’

“Pull the trigger and the bullets come out.”

“How sensitive is the trigger?”

“Very.”

"How sensitive is your trigger?"

A pause and then, "Equally very."

Will had holstered his sensitive weapon as they had pulled up to drive leading to the barn. As they had rolled up closer to the entrance it was evident that Peter Bernardone had had company. A sleek cherry red Mustang had sat parked next to Peter's hay filled truck. Will had unsnapped his holster, again.

Even Hannibal had been unprepared for the sight they had found upon walking inside and finding Peter Bernardone kneeling before his very bloated and very dead horse. Will had quickly surmised what had happened and had approached cautiously with gun drawn. Will's gift for the macabre was unsurpassed.

Peter, is your social worker in that horse?

Yes

Peter's voice had broken like the abused child he was. Hannibal had been all too aware of the parallels Will had drawn between the social worker and Peter and Hannibal and himself. It had been apparent to Hannibal on the drive over that Will was still grieving over what had been lost and what had changed.

You look like a man who has suffered an irrevocable loss.

I'm trying to prevent one.

Will had lost his innocence and had desperately desired for the damaged Peter to retain his. Will's pain upon hearing Peter's reply had radiated from every part of him. He had walked past Hannibal to kneel down alongside Peter. He had guided Peter away from his dead and desecrated horse and Hannibal had watched the two of them disappear around the corner, his presence reduced to an afterthought in Will's mind.

Hannibal's surprise had barely time to register as he had stared unbelieving at the sudden eruption of fingers poking out from slimy sutures, followed by the tide of equine fluids and entrails as the ignominious Ingram had climbed out of the carcass and stumbled across the floorboards toward Hannibal to fall on his knees gasping for air. Hannibal's first thought had been of Will around the corner even as he had cautioned the bewildered social worker.

Mr.Ingram. Might want to crawl back in there if you know what's good for you.

Is if on cue, Hannibal had heard Will's footsteps and had moved aside. Whatever misplaced relief Ingram had felt upon seeing Hannibal had vanished at the sight of Will coming around the corner with arm raised and finger already cocking the pistol in his hand. Ingram had quickly abandoned his victim act when Will informed him he wasn't a police officer but a friend of Peter's.

Hannibal had watched the exchange between Will and the social worker with elation and a growing apprehension. To see the killer in Will had been exhilarating. To know he had been entertaining the idea of shooting Ingram in cold blood with the presence of mind to tell him to pick up the hammer had pleased Hannibal to no end. But he could not allow Will to go through with it. That Will had thought about it had been enough. The willingness to bestow judgment upon a lesser being had been a necessary step in his becoming.

Hannibal wonders now if Will would have actually pulled that trigger. Their conversation at the time had been convincing enough. Will's tightly coiled fingers depressing the trigger had certainly been convincing. Their conversation the following evening during Will's session had been convincing.

I regret what I did in the stable.

Then, you were lucky I was there.

Oh, no, no, no. Being lucky isn't the same as making a mistake. The mistake was allowing you to stop me.

So, it's not pulling the trigger that you regret, it's not pulling it effectively.

That would be more accurate.

You must adapt your behavior to avoid feeling the same way again, Will.

Will had been referring to his regret about being too conflicted, too aware of how the regret that taking another life would fill him afterward, to pull the trigger effectively. Anticipating regret impairs decision making. Will had correctly identified a limitation.

Hannibal had recognized that Will would require a situation in which regret would not play a part in his decision making. He had to learn to accept the regret and set it aside. He had needed a situation where he would complete his kill and experience the purity of that kill without hiding behind a weapon. That would come with Randall Tier.

Ingram would not have provided the requisite learning environment for Will's particular sensitivity. Hannibal had known that regret would always be present in Will. It is one of the ingredients that defines him. Will can kill with precision and detachment and yet feel regret afterward and this is what Hannibal finds so beautiful in Will. To expunge that particular quality completely would be undesirable if not impossible.

Everything about the encounter and the subsequent session had seemed genuine. Will's responses had felt genuine from the barely contained contempt for Hannibal to the transparent curiosity about himself. And yet, if Hannibal had not stopped him, Will could have just as easily have sighed and dropped his arm claiming regret; or better yet flung his Berretta across the barn in a fit of tears, also claiming regret and that would have been equally convincing.

So infuriating, his Will.

At the time, however, Hannibal had been pleased at the transformation. Once Will had come back to himself, had broken the eye contact and their near embrace, he had stood gazing at the speechless Ingram with the familiar frown. He had lifted his eyes to meet Hannibal's and had held out his right hand for his gun.

"Jack shouldn't see you with that." Will had said, palm up.

Hannibal had placed the heavy weapon and all its responsibility back into Will's waiting hand. Will had checked it once before slipping it back inside his coat.

Hannibal had glanced at Ingram, who had begun to emanate an unmistakable fecal aroma in addition to the pungent fragrance of horse entrails and viscera. The man had been swaying from side to side, his complexion taking on a greenish tint. Perhaps it had been the light.

"Do you think it wise to put away your gun so soon?"

"Oh, he's not going anywhere. Are you, Mr. Ingram?"

Ingram had not been unable to utter a single word as he had stared at Will from the floor. He had been shaking, his arms wrapped uselessly around his soaking wet shirt. He had been shivering from the cold, from the fear, but mostly from shock. Hannibal had glanced at the horse blanket hanging on the far wall but had thought draping it over Ingram too disrespectful…to the horse. He had looked back to Will who had been eyeing Ingram with cold curiosity, and the ever present disdainful frown.

"How long before the FBI…" Hannibal had started to say.

"Anytime now."

The sound of shuffling feet across boards had registered in Hannibal's consciousness. Both he and Will had turned to see Peter slink around the corner, eyes fixed on Ingram. His mouth had opened in anguish and his sobs had wracked his entire body.

"Go." Hannibal had said, "I'll stand with Mister Ingram…and the sheep."

Will had thrown an arm over Peter's shoulder and had guided the emaciated and forlorn figure back around the corner while Hannibal had waited with Ingram. Hannibal had watched him stare into space his lips moving as he had uttered what Hannibal thinks were empty prayers.

The sounds of police sirens had sounded in the distance and before long the barn and its environs had been swarming with law enforcement. Hannibal marvels still at the speed with which the police can arrive at a crime scene but cannot be found when one's car has broken down. Hannibal had stood next to Will as Jack had pulled up in his usual FBI issue black SUV.

Jack had stepped out of the car, slammed the door with flourish, and had sauntered up to the barn, hands in pockets and dragging along with him an air of irritation to rival the stench inside.

"Doctor Lecter…Will. So, you want to fill me in? Let's start with why you are even here in the first place."

Jack had taken statements from each of them, Will first. Jack had separated them physically, about twelve feet apart, but they had been able to communicate well enough even under Uncle Jack's watchful eyes. From what Hannibal had been able to discern from where he stood, Will had stammered out an abbreviated version of what had actually happened interspersed with frequent appeals to accompany Peter to the mental ward awaiting his arrival.

While waiting his turn to be interrogated by Jack, Hannibal had had the opportunity to observe Ingram. As soon as Ingram had seen the actual police approach him, his shaking and silent praying had ceased. He had then become a veritable font of verbosity; his words had spilled so quickly he had to be reminded to breathe. Hannibal had watched Ingram stumble alongside the officers to the police car. How miraculous that he had managed to pull himself out of his daze to relate what had occurred in the barn. Hannibal had known what had to done about that.

He had glanced at Will who had also noticed that a lack of loquaciousness was no longer a problem for Ingram. Hannibal had nodded at the police car. Will had caught the gesture and had lowered his eyes and inclined his head. Hannibal had walked swiftly to the car and the chagrined Ingram, who had frantically tried to reach across the length of the back seat to lock the other door with his nose Hannibal supposed. The officer guarding the vehicle had turned to the sound of Hannibal opening the door.

“Hey, you can’t be talking to him.”

“I’m his psychiatrist. May I? I won’t be long. Is he handcuffed?” Hannibal had asked with mock trepidation.

After a second of consideration, the young officer had nodded. “He’s cuffed, but be careful And just a minute…that’s all. I shouldn’t be letting you do this.”

Hannibal had nodded in gratitude. Law enforcement was always letting people like him do things they shouldn’t. Being a doctor has its advantages.

“You’re rather ripe.” Hannibal had said slipping into the back seat, barely touching the seat and holding his coat close. He had left the car door open for both safety and fresh air.

“Get out! I don’t have to talk to you.”

“No, you don’t. Listen then. We spoke before about what was good for you.”

Ingram had stared dully at Hannibal, full of smug condescension.

“Your brand of brutality has struck an ugly chord in Mister Graham. He would be the one with the gun. I think we can agree you have found yourself in a very undesirable situation.”

Hannibal had paused but Ingram remained sullen and silent.

“Before it becomes more undesirable, I think it prudent you recall the conversation you witnessed and think carefully about what kind of men would engage in such a conversation. You should then think carefully about what those kind of men might do in the event they find themselves in an undesirable situation such as yours.”

Ingram’s eyes had flickered and Hannibal had continued, “I think I might forget about what happened in the barn since it had nothing at all to do with me, nothing at all. In fact, I would think my own situation demanded all of my attention and energy.”

Ingram had sat quietly in his handcuffs and his fetid fluid soaked clothes and had nodded slowly.

“Good evening then, Mister Ingram. I doubt we shall see each other again.”

Hannibal had climbed out of the car to find the police officer standing by the door.

“I thought you said you were his psychiatrist.”

“I was. He just fired me.”

Hannibal had walked back to Jack and Will. Jack had still been talking and Will had still been half listening, his attentions divided between Hannibal and Peter. Peter had been taken to an ambulance, not twenty feet away, and was being treated for trauma. Had Mister Ingram kept his mouth shut, he would have been sitting in an ambulance and not a police car.

Hannibal had nodded once at Will who had lifted his head and Hannibal had heard the audible sigh from his lips where he had stood. Hannibal's conversation with Jack had been much shorter, especially since Hannibal's responses had been presumably nearly identical to Will's. Jack had stood with feet apart rubbing his hands together as he had faced the two of them.

"I'm going to wrap this up. You can go home. I take it you rode together?"

"My car is over there." Hannibal had gestured toward his Bentley.

"I'd like to ride with Peter." Will had said, "I'll catch a cab from there."

Will had not even looked at Hannibal, his attention focused solely on Jack's face. Hannibal had expected Will to indulge his emotional attachments. Jack had sighed and waved toward the ambulance and Will had abruptly turned and walked off without so much as a thank you. Jack had stood beside Hannibal and together they had watched him approach the back of the ambulance only to be stopped by the armed officers on either side of the vehicle.

"Let him through." Jack had waved and nodded to the officers.

After Will had climbed inside the back and had disappeared from view, Jack had turned to Hannibal.

"Still reflecting and absorbing, isn't he?"

"He can't help it, Jack."

"He can't help picking up strays, either. Goodnight, Doctor Lecter."

Jack had stalked off to mind the store as he referred to his duties; and Hannibal had had nothing left to do but drive home. The car with Ingram sloshing around the back seat had already departed and the ambulance doors had been closed, its engine running and lights on. Hannibal had been very pleased with how the evening had turned out. Hannibal wonders now if Will had been pleased; for the same reasons or his own.

Hannibal allows the memory to retreat, his attentions focused on the task of arranging the food on the plates for the twins. In every great lie there is a kernel of truth. Will had learned his lessons well. Lies and deception had been delivered in equal measure and truth had been as fine between them as the smudges of olive oil Hannibal spreads across the toasted pane for Lucia.

If Will had been lying, Hannibal has to conclude that Will is an exceptional liar. He has not yet heard from his cousin and Hannibal hopes that when he does, he will find the news illuminating.

Hannibal unlocks the door to the guest room where the twins wait for their evening meal. They do not know it is evening, but they require nourishment regardless. Lucia is recovering splendidly from her surgery, the sutures are sealing without any trace of necrotic encroachment. Emotionally, she could be faring better. Hannibal could tell her that her missing arm will barely impact on the quality of life left to her though he doubts she would draw comfort from his words.

Comfort is of paramount importance at this juncture in their captivity. Comfort encourages cooperation. Hannibal requires cooperation. Cooperation requires hope. Hope for the Paolini requires deception of the highest magnitude. Hannibal must therefore imply and insinuate and leave them to choose hope instead of despair.

Hannibal does not like to lie. One should avoid the deliberate misappropriation of the truth whenever possible. Unfortunately, society as a whole does not appreciate truth, especially when served unadulterated, no sugar, no cream…just black.

The door opens slowly its weight requiring more than a gentle shove from Hannibal's shoulders to swing upon its sturdy hinges. He sets the tray containing the meal for the twins down at the folding table he has supplied for them. They no longer sleep upon mattresses on the floor but proper beds and they believe their obsequious behavior has been rewarded by the removal of their restraints.

Luciano looks up from the music magazine he rifles through and Lucia rises up from her pillow, the sleeves of the pale pink nightgown sliding off her shoulder as she shifts cautiously twisting her body to better see Hannibal. She starts to pull the flannel back up, but realizing it will slip off the stump of flesh regardless, merely groans and looks to the ceiling instead.

Hannibal sets the tray on the table and watches Luciano devour the sumptuous spread with his large brown eyes. He licks his lips and looks up at Hannibal waiting for permission to eat like a well-trained dog, or mutt as the case may be. Hannibal points to the place settings.

"Napkin, Luciano."

"Right…right." Luciano waves his hands over the table until his fingers alight on the fresh linen and he tucks the napkin under the table, spreads it over his freshly laundered sweat pants. He looks back up at Hannibal. "Better?"

"That…will do. Please, enjoy."

Hannibal turns to Lucia, "Would you like to try and eat at the table with your brother?"

"I don't know. I don't feel so good, still." Comes the stifled reply.

"Well, you've lost an arm, not a leg. You should be up and about. It's not good to lie in bed for so long. Here, I'll help you to the table."

He walks over to stand beside the bed, Lucia's eyes growing wider as Hannibal approaches her. Hannibal gazes down at the unfortunate young woman. Unfortunate, because she represents such a waste of life not because what remains of her life can be counted in hours. Hannibal flicks stray blonde hairs from her face and pauses as she flinches, recoiling from the hands that have mutilated her.

"Come now, Lucia. Why the sad face? You need your nourishment. Up, up."

"You took my arm!" Lucia whines at him from her pillow.

"Yes, but you didn't feel it, did you? You have felt no pain at all, nor will you so long as you behave."

Hannibal takes a step back from the bed and waits for the neurons to fire from the depths of her limbic cortex. He watches Luciano pluck sections of freshly peeled oranges from the tray while stealing glances at his sister. She turns her head from Hannibal to look at her brother.

“Luciano, è buono?

“Sì, molto buono , si dovrebbe avere un po '”

“See? Even your brother thinks you should have some. Give me your arm, ah…this one of course, and I’ll help you out of bed. Buona?”

Hannibal offers an easy smile and his hand which Lucia takes and allows Hannibal to help her slide out of the bed that rests so high off the floor that her piggish little toes have to stretch to find the cool cement. By the time she has reached the table, her grip on Hannibal’s hand is no longer tentative, but quite vigorous. Her hand slips from his grasp as Hannibal pushes in her chair so she sits facing her brother.

Hannibal feels vindicated as her eyes alight on the food. Lucia observes her brother has already started and picks up her fork as she scans the selections before her. Luciano ‘s eyes move over his sister, and his eyes twitch in sympathy but rather than direct the anger that soon follows at Hannibal, he turns his head to stare at the wall instead.

“Ah, ah, ah. Lucia. Your napkin?”

Lucia quickly stuffs the napkin under the table and across her knees like her brother, an indication that at some point, someone had exposed them to some form of table etiquette. She looks up at Hannibal, the nostrils of her turned up nose quivering with the aromas beneath it.

“What is all this?” She asks, eyes as wide and brown as her brother’s, though her pupils are dilated with pain killers.

“We have grilled pane Siliciano topped with mozzarella and plum tomatoes from my garden, some fresh fruit, mostly oranges, and caffee latte with plenty of sugar and a sprinkle of cinnamon. For Luciano who needs his protein a stuffed pork chop with dressing and gravy like mama would make.”

“You mean a…real pork chop?” Luciano says ever so quietly.

“I did say like mama would make. Your mama, Luciano.”

Hannibal stands over the table and waits. The aroma of garlic and other seasonings on the pork quickly convince Luciano to give the chop a try. He slices off a chunk and closes his eyes as the tender meat touches his tongue.

“Mama never made pork chops like this.” Luciano says, stabbing at another morsel to fill his greedy mouth.

Hannibal supposes that is as much a compliment as Luciano is prepared to offer him. Of course, when one’s meals are spaced nearly eight hours apart, one’s palate is hardly discerning. Hannibal watches Luciano carefully. His meals have been free of sedatives and Hannibal has relied upon behaviorism and intimidation to ensure Luciano’s good behavior.

Hannibal’s positive reinforcement has been supported by the implied threat of further dismemberment of his sister. Hannibal’s surgical instruments can rest in plain view beneath the plastic cover because Luciano dares not attempt anything that would endanger his sister. She is in no condition to leave and Luciano would never go without her. Hope of a rescue still blooms for the Paolini.

Luciano is no longer drugged because Hannibal’s invitation to Will and - Hannibal quickly amends his thought - and guest requires Luciano’s mind and body are fully functioning; otherwise, Luciano will not find Hannibal’s proposition credible. Hannibal must allow him a fighting chance or he will believe his situation hopeless. And that simply will not do.

Hannibal watches them eat. They exchange looks with one another as they do, communicating in a private language. What they have is a wordless exclusive bond that, for them, had originated in utero. Hannibal thinks it likely they almost read each the other’s thoughts. He imagines them growing up together and finding each other so much alike, that despite sharing a womb, rather because of it; they could not resist physical intimacy. Intimacy with anyone else does not approach the oneness they share.

Neither can one of them can imagine life without the other, to wound one is to wound the other.

The beauty of their symbiosis resonates, striking at the chords of loneliness and discharging an eviscerating echo within the cavernous hole Will left in his chest. The longing Hannibal had felt at the sight of him had been enough to evoke the singular strains that for Hannibal have not stilled for a single second since their separation.

Hannibal has believed that he shares something similar with Will, an exclusive bond. But after seeing him with Clayton, Hannibal wonders if Will’s empathy has allowed him to sublimate his feelings for Hannibal and redirect them onto Clayton. The mirrors in Will’s mind compulsively do that. He absorbs. He cannot help but absorb Clayton, who looks so much like Will, who is possessed of so many qualities Will once attributed to himself, that Will must feel like he stares into his own past every time he looks at him. Absorbing Clayton into his consciousness would seem to Will like finding a forgotten old coat and slipping it on to find it still fit.

There is an alternate possibility that causes Hannibal’s hands to flex with impatience. The alternative, already introduced by Du Maurier, would be unthinkable and yet Hannibal must consider it.

I miss him.

You are obsessed with Will Graham.

I'm intrigued.

Obsessively. And he will take advantage of that.

Will is my friend.

Why? Why is he your friend?... What can't you repress, Hannibal?

What, indeed.

Knowing first-hand the extent of Hannibal's determination and the tenacity he displayed while following his urges, she had feared her patient would cultivate his newfound inspiration to her detriment. She had believed Hannibal's pursuit of friendship with his own patient misguided and perhaps to her thinking, infatuation at best. She believed him pursing fantasy.

I'm trying to help him understand.

You may not be able to…Even the very best psychiatrists have an inherent limitation to their professional abilities. You may find that difficult to accept.

You're right. It is.

You have to maintain boundaries, Hannibal.

Du Maurier had been referring to the boundaries between reality and fantasy as well as the physical and emotional boundaries between doctor and patient, even within the narrowly defined parameters Du Maurier and Hannibal assumed as therapists. Hannibal had had fantasies about Will. And Will had made those fantasies flesh and blood for Hannibal. He had left Hannibal dizzy and craving more. He had left Hannibal vulnerable to the flaw in his own design.

Hannibal sits in the basement of an Italian villa far from Baltimore watching two Sardinian assassins gulp down sustenance because of Will. Will twists in his inferno because his own design had backfired on him, spectacularly. They have wounded each other rather spectacularly. Truth had indeed imparted consequences.

Hannibal watches Lucia lift her cup of latte from its saucer and imagines a sun soaked breakfast nook where Abigail still languid with sleep sips daintily from the porcelain as she smiles at Will, who sits across from her squinting through the morning light in wrinkled pajamas, chiding her about picking the tomatoes off the pane as he slips a morsel of meat into his mouth. Hannibal watches the cup crumble in Abigail's hands and Lucia and Luciano sit before him once again. This was not the life he had wanted.

Hannibal must learn if Will's innate nature still dominates; or if Clayton's influence has soothed the savageness and tamed the urges. Hannibal must know if Will still craves that awesome sense of power that had caused his eyes to shine with wonder and his body shudder with pleasure.

I forgive you, Will. Will you forgive me?

Don't…don't…no…

With one glaring exception, Will has never disappointed Hannibal. That glaring exception had been miscalculation, on Will's part and Hannibal's. Hannibal has forgiven Will but he has not forgiven himself for his own blind rage. The rage had been commensurate with the passion that had preceded, precipitated it. The magnitude of miscalculation is always proportional to the stakes. The punishment equal to the offense. Hannibal thinks now his punishment too severe and the offense understandable, even pardonable.

Forgiveness is such a profound, conscious and unconscious state of affairs. You can't actually choose to do it. It simply happens to you.

Has Will forgiven him? Or has Hannibal wounded him too deeply for forgiveness to happen?

As Hannibal watches Luciano eat his chop through eyes that insist on seeing Will instead, the ache in his chest gives him pause. At the time, Hannibal's entreaty had been spoken in anger, in anticipation of delivering the cruel and final blow he knew would tear Will apart. A taunt lacking the gentleness with which he would speak it now.

Hannibal had not expected forgiveness from Will at the time. His own declaration had lacked the requisite sincerity given the act that had followed. But he has forgiven Will. He wants forgiveness from Will. He wants to hear the words from his lips as much as he wants to breathe.

You are obsessed with Will Graham.

Will had needed more time.

Always aware of his vulnerability to the emotions of others, Will had isolated himself in the course of his daily life cloaked in a persona designed to keep others away. As Hannibal had pointed out, Will had stigmatized himself. Working for Jack had forced him to socialize, throwing him into constant contact with an array of personalities whose emotions had washed over him like rain leaving him soaked in sensations clinging to him like a drenched jacket. The jacket of residue clings to him still. A residue Clayton believes he can rinse from Will as though Hannibal had been a mere stain. Hannibal's immeasurable influence is not the only raiment with which Will cloaks himself. Surely Clayton must realize by now that the taint of Will's darkness bleeds into every fiber of his being.

What a trying and novel experience for Will to try and separate his emotions from everyone else's in order to adopt only Hannibal's under the intense pressure that laying his trap with Jack had brought down upon him. He had been unable to do it.

He had been drowning. Jack had seen it, and had cut Will loose deciding to take on Hannibal by himself with disastrous consequences.

Will is an innocent.

Yes. He is.

I mean, Will is genuine. He'll survive anything I could put him through. He will always fight his way back to himself.

Not always. So far.

Uncle Jack's belief in Will had been sorely tested after uttering those words. Jack had had plenty of time to observe and reevaluate his prized profiler, since that conversation. Jack had stood by and watched Will succumb first to his nature, and then to Hannibal. Jack had not required GPS tracking to know where Will was spending his time. Jack had known, but he hadn't wanted to see it. The seeds of doubt Hannibal had sewn had stubbornly cropped up despite Jack's efforts to stomp them back into the distressed soil of his mind where he was also stomping on the insidious vines of his wife's cancer. By the time Jack had received Hannibal's invitation to dinner, he no longer cared whether Will had absorbed Hannibal or not, no longer cared with whom Will had been empathizing. Jack had come calling to collect payment. And collect he had. The beautiful Bella lies in the ground and Uncle Jack runs after Hannibal because the running is all he has left.

As his reunion with Will draws ever closer, Hannibal thinks of Will running circles in his inferno. Hannibal's invitation will send him running straight to Hannibal. And when they collide, as they are destined to do, Will will discover he has not run into Hannibal, but himself. Hannibal is not sure what Will will do when he stops running. Clayton is the unknown variable in Hannibal's equation.

As the twins finish off their breakfast and Hannibal contemplates the tray of nearly empty bowls, cups, and dishes he thinks of the encounter between Du Maurier and Clayton at the guest house. Clayton's behavior intrigues Hannibal.

Clayton's reactions to Du Maurier suggest it is possible that Clayton possesses some form of evolved empathy. Nothing like Will's gift certainly, but the sex with Du Maurier had suggested something of the kind of empathic transfer Will had demonstrated on many occasions. Had Hannibal not experienced something similar with Will, Clayton's behavior might be written off as drug induced.

Watching Clayton slam Du Maurier against the wall had been a vicarious thrill. Hannibal thinks he exercised considerable restraint. Hannibal would have liked to have seen him scrape her skin against the wall until she had wailed, blood streaming from abrasions along her bare back like cracks in marble. Hannibal thinks Clayton too much a gentleman to actually hurt her. He had been exercising restraint, but not out of courtesy. He had been prepared to indulge himself, at least before succumbing to Du Maurier's unnecessary pharmaceutical cocktail, robbing him of whatever control he had thought he had over her.

Hannibal thinks he might have actually been feeling Du Maurier's sexual responses, and unable to control his own responses, had collapsed in what Hannibal can only describe as sensory overload. A man can hold his release, especially in the absence of any direct tactile stimulation as had been the case with Clayton that evening. It had seemed to Hannibal that on some level, Clayton had experienced what Du Maurier was experiencing and he had been experiencing it involuntarily. Clayton had clearly wanted Du Maurier beneath his hips, not his mouth.

The only instances Hannibal had ever witnessed of one's oral fixation culminating in untouched orgasm had been with Will. And Will's empathy had figured prominently in those encounters.

Clayton's fingers find his lips in conversation constantly, and Hannibal had watched him eat his breakfast with undeniable relish, practically sucking fruit juice from his fingers in almost infantile pleasure. Clayton is similarly as fixated as Will. And yet, the stimulation of one's erogenous zones alone could not have precipitated the simultaneous release Hannibal had seen. Clayton had lost his emotional control and he had not wanted to.

Hannibal is sure Clayton does not even like Du Maurier. His intentions that evening had been to dominate pure and simple. Du Maurier's focused attentions had aroused irritation; he had found her transparent objectification of him intolerable and had been prepared to engage in a little objectifying of his own. Du Maurier had anticipated his reaction and had drugged him to retain control. A creature addicted to dominance herself, she could not have behaved otherwise.

She had no doubt hoped to elicit information about Will that evening. Hannibal thinks reconnaissance the primary reason for serving him the cocktail. With Clayton's inhibitions departed, his body putty in her hands, she could have asked him anything and he would have answered, remembering nothing. Du Maurier would know that extracting information from a patient under those conditions is not reliable. The same drugs that lower one's inhibitions also cloud the mind, and while the responses are genuine, the actual facts are jumbled up with the emotions elicited by the drugs. Du Maurier chose to ignore the detractors. She wanted as much information as Clayton was able to provide before the transfer of assets.

But Clayton’s near death experience had precluded that. She had spent the remainder of her evening cleaning up vomit and playing nurse. So much for short cuts sniffs Hannibal. Hannibal had learned much more in the half hour left in his session with Clayton than he supposes Du Maurier had learned. And Clayton had been completely sober. Desperate circumstances require desperate measures, and Du Maurier reeks of desperation.

The display of desperation is uncharacteristic of Du Maurier and the reason for it rattles like chains in the back of Hannibal’s mind. Chains he has no intentions of wearing. She is showing her hand deliberately to misdirect, or she is genuinely desperate which suggests complications of the most serious kind. Du Maurier as always, keeps Hannibal sharp. He has not heard from her since he sent the roses. She will likely call today to thank him.

Hannibal is not seeing something. Hannibal is confident that Du Maurier will reveal herself in time. The light of Apollo shines upon Achilles not his enemies. Du Maurier will be revealed in the light.

Hannibal returns his thoughts to Clayton and Will.

If Clayton could empathize with Du Maurier, even under duress, Hannibal can imagine how much more enjoyable he finds empathizing with Will. Du Maurier had not required emotional attachment from Clayton to pursue intimacy. Will would require an entire battery of emotions to be present to even consider intimacy of that sort. Clayton’s bruises attest to the fact that Will has done much more than consider the possibilities.

Will’s memories must assail his mind constantly, the scar stretching along his stomach an inescapable souvenir with scintillating and sensual associations. Will would be aware of the associations, and as his therapist, so would Clayton.

Hannibal thinks on how they might reconcile that. He can only conclude that Clayton would be attempting to overwrite those associations. Clayton must understand that he cannot put the genie back in the bottle, but he can present the genie with his wishes and hope the genie will see the wisdom in granting them. And the rewards.

When you take him to a crime scene, Jack, the very air has screams smeared on it. In those places, he doesn't just reflect; He absorbs.

Will would reflect the best of Clayton, the evidence before Hannibal’s eyes and ears just hours ago. That had not been Will playing piano on the patio. He had not been accompanying Clayton; he had been Clayton, at least a version of Clayton, for Clayton. Will had been moved to bestow a token of his affection by becoming, for a little while, what Clayton had desired.

Will is not an empty vessel awaiting the emotions of others to fill him up. Will knows who he is despite Hannibal’s best efforts to convince him otherwise. But, he learns by the compulsive absorbing. He learned to adapt. He observes, silently, unobtrusively, associations winding around his mind like tentacles, like branches, the process of assimilation natural and beautiful. Organic and divine.

Will would have invariably absorbed everything about Clayton, too. He has found in Clayton an ally, a balm for the loneliness. And Will finds him every bit as appetizing as Hannibal had found him. As Du Maurier had known Hannibal would find him. Hannibal thinks Du Maurier has outdone herself. She has managed to find a being not only capable of understanding both Will and Hannibal, but a being with the potential to rend them apart.

Will will naturally want to protect what is his. As does Hannibal.

Hannibal cannot bring himself to believe Du Maurier is correct about Will. That Will had seduced him and manipulated him with cold and calculated maliciousness. Manufactured every glance, every touch? That would mean that Will had been able to immerse himself so completely in Hannibal's mind that he could behave exactly like Hannibal, a mirror image so compelling that Hannibal had lost his practice, his home, his anonymity and nearly his life just to touch that image.

We're just alike…

He's still influencing you. Will Graham asking to see you betrays his clear intent to manipulate you.

And if I agree to see Will?

It betrays your clear intent to manipulate him.

I miss him…

Then maybe you deserve each other.

We're just alike…

He realized early on that he saw things differently than other people, felt things differently.

So did you.

I see myself in Will.

Do you see yourself in his madness?

We're just alike…

Had Hannibal seen only his reflection in those pale blue eyes? Had he been so desperate to believe that he had allowed himself to be tricked by Will? He had told Will they were alone without each other. Had reinforced it systematically by removing everyone he cared about. He had spoken the words like a mantra, so Will had repeated it, time and again and Hannibal had been content he had internalized it. Hannibal wonders now which of them had actually internalized it.

I have to confess that I don't know who's pursuing whom any more than these fish do.

Whomever is pursuing whom in this very moment, I intend to eat them.

Uncle Jack's words begin to carry the tone of a taunt. Jack could not have been inferring that Hannibal was the prey in their merry chase; that Hannibal was the one being pursued and was about to be devoured by Will. Jack had not sat there in his own dining room mocking him, laughing beneath the veneer of friendship at Hannibal's conceit.

The thought is insufferable. Hannibal can almost feel the chilled flesh of fish slathered in gelatin upon his palm and he clenches his fist imagining blood slipping like pulp between his fingers as snippets of conversations continue to slip around his skull.

He's still influencing you. Will Graham asking to see you betrays his clear intent to manipulate you.

And if I agree to see Will?

It betrays your clear intent to manipulate him.

I miss him.

You are obsessed with Will Graham.

I'm intrigued.

Obsessively.

And he will take advantage of that.

You are obsessed with Will Graham.

You are obsessed with Will Graham.

You are obsessed with Will Graham.

Hannibal slams his fist upon the table unnerving the twins in the process. Hannibal becomes aware he has been staring at the ripe flesh of strawberries in his hand and in his haze had seen drops of blood. He stands up quickly and grabs a napkin. He will let the twins infer what they want from his momentary lapse from the present. Luciano could probably do with a little reminder of the nature of the man who holds him and his sister captive.

Hannibal retrieves a pair of rubber gloves from atop the table where his surgical instruments sit sheathed in a sheet of plastic. He commences removing dirty plates from under stunned faces.

Will's true emotions had made appearances. There had been truth beneath the lies and deceptions. There had been the salon. Will had been his in the salon. And Hannibal had been Will's. Will had allowed Hannibal to see him. As much as he had dared let Hannibal see before walking again into the light of the kitchen and the harsh reality of the universe each of them despised but had been forced to acknowledge and endure. If only Will had allowed himself to truly abandon his world, forsake it for the one Hannibal had made…with Abigail.

With all my knowledge and intrusion, I could never entirely predict you.

Will always was…is unpredictable. As alike as they are, Hannibal has never been able to know with any degree of certainty Will's mind. Will is fascinatingly unfathomable. Will is unique.

Will was his once…his.

And he will be again.

Hannibal dismisses his doubt; removes it like the clutter he now clears from the folded table where the twins sit quietly waiting for Hannibal's storm to pass. He ignores them. Reflection is good for the soul, even debauched souls such as the Paolini.

Hannibal wonders at the reflection mirrored in Will's mind as he settles in with Clayton this evening. When Will lies prone upon his pillow, his fingers wandering across his wound what tempts his gaze as Morpheus steals him away? Does he favor the starry heavens with his penetrating pale blue eyes or does he favor the new star lying beside him, freshly fallen to bask in the warm glow of a gaze once again fixed upon earth forsaking heaven.

Du Maurier could but suffer Hannibal's inspirations only to a point and she had reached that point with Will. Two was company, three…a crowd. The similarities do not escape Hannibal. Hannibal does not desire a…crowd, either.

Clayton is not Will. As intuitive as he is, there are no violent urges simmering in the depths of his mind waiting to be brought forth. Unless, in the course of his therapy with Will, he identifies too closely with his patient and Will's inspirations become his. A provocative question soon to be addressed with Hannibal's invitation. Psychopaths are particularly exceptional at applying the methods of their madness.

"Lucia," Hannibal turns from the large plastic bin he uses to take the dirty dishes up and down the stairs and removes the gloves from his hands. "Let your brother guide you back to bed. I will be back in a moment."

Lucia nods as she looks sideways at her brother. Hannibal knows Luciano has some questions to raise right about now, but he doesn't dare. He rises from his chair and holds out a hand to his sister. Hannibal hefts the heavy bin out the door and up the stairs, closing the door behind him. It locks every time and Hannibal will have to unlock it again when he comes down. A necessary inconvenience and one he will soon be relieved of.

After setting the bin upon the kitchen counter, Hannibal turns his attentions to the large box in foyer, surrounded by smaller boxes delivered yesterday and still unopened. Hannibal takes a deep breath and begins to lug the heavy but sturdy cardboard box down the stairs to the basement. The package is for Luciano.

Luciano and Lucia look up from their beds, having retreated to their respective sources of comfort in the wake of Hannibal's outburst. Lucia scowls to conceal the dread creeping into her addled mind while Luciano scowls to mask whatever fear swarms under the surface. But curiosity rears, no matter how morbid, and Luciano slides from the mattress to stand beside the bed, toes tapping against the cement as he watches Hannibal set the container upright from beneath bushy brows.

"What is that? What do you torture us with now?"

"Not torture, Luciano. Redemption."

"What do you mean, redemption?"

"A means to redeem yourselves for offenses against me. You think perhaps I have not punished you enough?"

"No, no. You punish more than enough. You would let us go?"

"Well, to let you go would be inaccurate. But the tools of your deliverance have arrived."

Luciano's face winces, likely from thinking too much. Hannibal knows he should cease with the vagaries but he can't help himself. The looks on their faces are wrought with a confusion bordering on the Dickensian. Hannibal feels like Ebenezer on Christmas morning.

"What is in the box that will uh…redeem us?"

“The box is for you, Luciano. Go ahead, open it.”

Luciano approaches the box with obvious trepidation mingled with curiosity and perhaps, his large brown eyes gleam with hope as he takes the scissors from Hannibal’s hands. There is no hesitation as he slices the tape that seals the cardboard. Luciano holds the scissors with a fondness of a hunter fondling his knife. Hannibal thinks that a good sign. Luciano will need his hunter’s instincts.

As Luciano opens the box and peers inside, he steps back and lifts his head a quizzical look on his face.

“This is a…treadmill. What does a treadmill have to do with…redemption?”

“You have a job to do for your employer, Mr. Verger?”

“Yes, but…”

“I intend for you to complete it. Well, part of it.”

“I don’t understand…what job?”

“Mr. Verger expects you to capture and kill me and Mr. Graham. I will grant you the opportunity to fulfill one of those directives.”

“You want me to kill Graham?”

“That would be the most reasonable assumption, would it not?”

Luciano looks aside, his brain saturated with too much information to process. Hannibal decides to spell it out for him. Talking to him is rapidly becoming too tedious to endure.

“Mr. Verger wants you and Graham to die…in a very specific way. I won’t be doing the job he wants.”

“Well, he’ll have to learn to live with disappointment. I’m sure he is already well acquainted with that particular emotion. What you should be concerned with, Luciano, is what I want.”

Hannibal looks to Lucia still seated on her bed, but bursting with agitation. She twitches with it from the top of her head to the toes that dig into the blankets.

“Even if I kill Graham, Mr. Verger and my family still want you.”

“Leave Mr. Verger to me. As for your family, I believe your vendetta as you call it can be renegotiated…with the release of you and your sister. What do you think?”

“I think maybe something like that is possible. But I have to kill Graham, first.”

“Yes. But you need your strength. So you will put this treadmill together and you will lift the weights I will bring down. I think a couple of days will be sufficient to revitalize your vigor.”

Luciano’s eyes roam over the box a thoughtful look on his face. Hannibal waits for Luciano to collect the strands of information coalescing in his frontal lobe as dopamine floods his neurons with the task of weighing his options.

“Mr. Graham carries a gun. A Glock 17.”

Hannibal raises a brow. Will had pointed the same type of gun at him in Hobbs’ kitchen.

Hannibal had been curious about what kind of gun had been pointed at him as he and Jack had looked down upon the unconscious Will slumped on the floor, Jack’s bullet lodged in his shoulder. Separating Will from his guns would become a necessary part of his becoming. Hannibal had decided to familiarize himself with Will’s weapons because of this illuminating encounter.

Hannibal had stood next to Jack, the pistol still smoking hot from firing in his right hand while his left hand had cradled a jaw slack with remorse. Hannibal had moved to stand over Will, kicking his gun toward Jack before he had crouched beside him on the blood streaked floor.

“What type of gun is that?”

Hannibal had received a most confounded look at his inquiry. Perhaps his timing could have been better.

“What kind of question is that?” Jack had snapped.

“Will just tried to kill me. I’d like to know what he aimed at my face.”

Jack had turned his head slowly, “Will had a Glock 17 on you.“ Jack had set his gun on the counter, his eyes fixed upon Will’s gun at his feet.

“Mine’s a Walther PKK. Either one will drop you with a head shot.”

Hannibal had nodded and after a moment had asked, “Are there any bullets in Will’s gun?”

Jack had stood motionless for several seconds. He had looked at his gloved hands and back to Will’s Glock on the floor. Within seconds, Jack was holding the Glock in his hands, slipping out the magazine.

“It’s uh…fully loaded, Doctor Lecter.” Jack had said, his face grim.

Hannibal had merely nodded while silently applauding the killer splayed beautifully on the floor beside him. He had turned his head back to Will, had gazed upon his blood soaked shirt and looked into his blood splattered face. A foreshadowing of things to come. Hannibal had not imagined he would again find himself gazing into Will’s blood drenched face on his own kitchen floor. They had come full circle.

Hannibal will see who ends up on the kitchen floor this time.

“Luciano, he may have a gun but I can guarantee that he will not be using it. Not if you follow my instructions. Do we understand one another?”

“You will let me and my sister go if I kill Graham? What about my family?”

“If you do not kill him, there is no reason for me to contact your family is there?”

Luciano shakes his head. This is all very sudden and very confusing for him. Hannibal understands.

“Luciano, if you succeed, you will be permitted to contact your family and broker the deal with them yourself. I will keep Lucia here as insurance. I have no reason to lie to you. If I do not keep my word, your family will continue to hunt me down.”

“That is true. But why not kill Graham yourself?”

“Because he does not know I am here. No one does. Why put myself at risk when you will do it for me? When you approach him, he will not know why. Not at first.”

Hannibal watches Luciano consider the proposition. Will should be expecting Luciano, but perhaps not. He twists in his inferno, trapped by his past. He may exist in the past and if that is the case, his thinking remains in the past. Luciano’s visit should provide him with a jolt that will shake that tousled head of curls into the present.

“Luciano! What choice do we have? I have already lost an arm. What more does he have to take from me? Luciano!”

“I will do it. Benedetto Dio, I will do it.” Luciano says, making the sign of the cross across his chest.

“Good. Then take your equipment out of the box and put it together. I want you up and running as soon as possible.”

Luciano swallows and turns the box long ways on the floor. He begins emptying the box of its contents. As he looks at the brochure and directions, he waves a hand at Hannibal.

“Hey, I’m a gonna need a tool box, si che ok?”

“Whatever you need, Luciano.” Hannibal says.

As Hannibal starts up the stairs to retrieve his toolbox for Luciano, a passage from Nietzsche’s All Too Human, comes to mind. In reality, hope is the worst of all evils, because it prolongs man's torments. Luciano is about to prove Nietzsche correct.

Daniel sits across from Will at the kitchen table sipping at his second cup of coffee watching Will with amusement as he attempts to balance the precariously piled scrambled eggs on his toast and guide the toppling mess into his mouth before spilling it. Will observes Daniel watching him and successfully manages to take a bite, and grins between munches, vindicated.

Watching Will eat is a sensual experience. Daniel has to force himself not to stare. Between the soft damp curls and the hint of muscle beneath the tee and of course, the mouth in between, there is no escaping the feast for the eyes he is. As if he weren't desirable enough sitting there fresh from the shower and licking his fingers, he is emotionally calm this morning. No storm behind the ocean of blue, no anger or frustration bubbling beneath the surface. Just watching him breathe is sending Daniel's imagination into hyper-drive.

Daniel sighs softly and looks out the window. Damn him.

Will refrains from pouring more ketchup on his plate. Daniel makes a truly fine breakfast and Will thinks dumping condiments all over it might come off as insulting. He decides the Italian bread and Daniel's omelet, a scramble by default, tastes pretty good without anything else. He glances at Daniel as he gazes out the window and thinks he should have stepped into the shower with him this morning. Those soft green eyes get him all the time. And the mouth… Will stabs at the eggs. He rolls the eggs around his tongue imagining what might have been.

They had turned in early and had spent another restless night, tossing and turning, some of the tossing and turning actually pleasurable. Between the humidity and the dreams, Daniel is not sure which had affected them the most. Daniel had dreamed of an open air summer concert amid the ruins of an amphitheater, haunting melodies floating above the crumbling walls until creatures descended from the skies, plucking off people left and right, vultures and winged jackals hunting at will. Daniel can only imagine what Will had been dreaming about to cause his own dreams to turn vicious and violent all night long.

Daniel shifts his thoughts to their duet last evening. They will be discussing dreams again soon enough. Will doesn't know it, but he had not only piled eggs onto his seeded rye this morning, he had been topping his morning toast with Daniel's blend of hallucinogens. Daniel expects the drugs to kick in soon; in perhaps twenty minutes Will will begin to feel the effects.

For the next several hours, Daniel is prepared to enter Will's dreamscape come what may. Daniel shifts in his seat feeling a familiar teasing tickle begin to work its way from his brain downward to settle between his legs. He leans over the table on his elbows and looks directly at Will.

"What?" Will says looking up at him.

The startled look on Will's face melts into grin and Daniel rolls his eyes. Will's timing is really off this morning. Daniel considers a little sex might provide a nice segue into the hypnotherapy, but chances are that it will set the stage so well that the entire play would remain in the first act and there are other parts of Will's imagination that require exploring. There is a procedure to be followed and Daniel suspects that sex might find its way into the therapy anyway.

Daniel figures he may as well begin setting the stage.

"You uh, screwed up on your timing again last night." Daniel chides from his side of the table.

"You are talking about the duet and not…" Will kicks at his bare feet under the table. Raises his brows.

"The duet, yes."

Daniel shakes his head trying to clear it of images of twisted limbs and very naughty pale blue eyes. Of course, Will would be playful this morning. He just has to be perfectly…perfect on a morning when Daniel can't take advantage of... It occurs to Daniel that the drugs might be kicking in. Losing one's inhibitions would be on the menu.

"I can't help it." Will says reaching for his coffee to wash down the eggs and toast. "Seems I learned it that way and can't seem to correct it. Like mispronouncing the name of a town or street the first time and never being able to say right after that."

"Habits. Hard to break, aren't they?" He says as he lights a cigarette. His first of the day.

Will sets down his fork, leaving the eggs on his plate. "And what habits would we be referring to, doctor?"

Daniel smiles, "Which ones come to mind?"

"Stop doing that." Will says. "Always this…answering questions with another question."

"How does that make you feel?"

Will raises his brows and contemplates how it would feel to chuck a hunk of toast across the table. Instead, he gives Daniel's question the serious consideration it deserves.

"We're talking about actual habits, not compulsions or disorders?" Will says watching the smoke drift out the windows.

"A fine line. How do habits form?"

"Repetition. Positive reinforcement."

"Okay. And where do habits come from?" Daniel glances at Will's unfinished breakfast.

Will picks up his fork and takes another mouthful of very spicy scrambled eggs. Daniel had gone wild on the fresh peppers he had picked this morning. He thinks maybe Daniel had not rinsed all the dirt from them.

"Come from? From the things we do every day. Routines. And we apply the routines to new situations, because the routine makes us feel comfortable with the new routine or experience."

"And habits are coping mechanisms. I will automatically light a cigarette when I'm stuck in traffic. I will have one or crave one before meeting people I don't know, like at a party or a conference. And I am conscious that I do it. So what that does that suggest about me?"

"That you need a buffer between transitions. A break to give yourself time to adapt while creating a bridge. You use the positive associations you get from smoking to emotionally bridge the gap between comfort and discomfort, from familiar to new. And the nicotine helps."

“Yeah, it does. But that’s uh, pretty accurate. Your mind works very differently from mine, but the parts are all the same, the chemistry is the same. What habits do you engage when making transitions?”

“Like when I transition from one state of consciousness to another?” Will yawns and takes another sip of coffee.

“That would be the one. You don’t have to tell me your habits. I just want you to think about them. Habits come in many forms and when you dream, or hallucinate, or do your profiling thing, you involuntarily adopt your habits. Habits of mind, not just physical manifestations.”

“I retreat into my mind as I make associations. I can’t help that.”

“Do you enjoy it? That is, is it a comfortable place to be in?”

“Sometimes. Depends on the associations.”

“But is it a comfortable process for you? It happens, but you can make it happen, too. You can withdraw anytime you like.”

“So you imply retreating into my subconscious has become a habit. A habit I use to avoid rather than as a bridge.”

“Do you?”

“I told you to stop that.”

“Will, you could make that musical transition correctly if you imagined yourself playing it. But sitting there in real time trying to do it is more difficult. When you have to deal with new situations, or change, or something you don’t want to deal with, you retreat. Forcing ourselves to break habits is also difficult. We almost always need another habit to help break the old habit by transitioning into the new one.”

“What’s it like being too smart for your own good?”

“Awesome. What’s it like having me tell you things you already know?”

“Comforting…like…” Will says suddenly distracted.

Daniel watches Will zone out as he takes another drag off his cigarette.

Will could swear he was moving backward a moment ago. He stares at the glint of sunlight sparkle on the utensils. He thinks the room a little brighter than it was a moment ago. His eyes are drawn to the smoke curling up from Daniel’s cigarette and he leans back in his chair to watch the smoke curls rise to the ceiling before dissolving into fine white dust that seems to roll slowly out the window.

“There’s a lot of dust floating up there,” Will points at the ceiling, head back against the chair. “Can you see it catching the light all around the fan?”

Daniel nods, “Uh huh.”

As he leans in closer he can see Will's pupils have begun to dilate. He figures he should start explaining while Will is still relatively clearheaded. If he can draw Will's attention away from the ceiling.

"Will? We were talking about transitions and I'd like to…"

Will shakes his head from side to side wondering at how it feels heavy and empty at the same time. Like marbles rolling around in air except it is in his head and he feels... He looks back down at the table. He thinks Daniel just said something. As the utensils begin to shimmer on the table he recognizes the points of glittering light all over the table for what they are. He lifts his head slowly to look at Daniel. He closes his eyes for a moment. Daniel is shimmering, too.

"Therapy today?" he says slowly.

"Um…wow. That hit you quicker than I thought. How do you feel?"

"I'd say…angry, but I'm too buzzed to…Shit, Daniel. A little warning? You put it in the food?"

"Some palate you have. I was sure you'd taste it."

Will rubs at his face and it feels like moving putty around. He feels the panic rising and pushes it down, or tries to. He reminds himself Daniel is right there across the table. They have talked about this. He gave Daniel his permission. He sits up straight and takes a deep breath, lets it out really slowly. He takes another.

"That's good, Will. Keep doing that while I talk. I'm going to check your blood pressure, ok?"

"Good idea." Will says watching him get up and cross the kitchen.

Daniel pulls his medical bag out of the kitchen closet, checks it for the third time to make sure everything is where it should be. He doesn't want to have to rummage around for something in an emergency. As he wraps the rubber around Will's bicep to check his blood pressure, he nudges Will's head with his own.

"You'll be ok. I know I caught you off guard, but this has to be as spontaneous as I can make it."

"I know. You told me."

"The dizziness will pass once your body gets acclimated. In a little while, your brain will compensate and movement will feel normal to you. The entire experience will feel real. It's supposed to."

"Except in my head, I'll be someplace else." Will frowns and leaves the rest of the bundle of worry unspoken.

Daniel notes the frown and the furrowed brow. It's the drugs he thinks. He knows Will has a negative view of drugs and given his past experience Daniel understands. Drugs have been given to him to limit or control his mind, not free it.

"You do trust me, right?"

"A little late to ask, don't you think?"

"Just checking your sense of humor. Still intact."

"Daniel, I'm…" Will swallows, closes his eyes. "You are familiar with my dreams from talking about them. This is…really intimate."

"Boundaries, Will. Barriers and boundaries."

"Are we crossing them or negotiating them?"

"Navigating."

Will looks up at Daniel from his chair. He searches Daniel's face and imagines their situations reversed. He would be looking down at Daniel with similar concern and…affection. There is a quiet determination about him that shines in his eyes, a calm sea of gentle waves breaking upon the shore, unfailing and constant.

Will has shared a lot with Daniel. He knew this was coming, but he feels so exposed, so vulnerable. He thinks maybe his unease is less about showing Daniel his innermost universe, and more about him actually seeing it. About seeing him.

See. See?

Daniel takes advantage of the lull in conversation to look at his watch to finish taking Will's blood pressure. Will is very healthy physically. His blood pressure is naturally low to begin with. Even when he awakens panicked in a cold sweat, the heart that beats beneath Daniel's hand thumps hard, but strong and steady.

"You're afraid. How could you not be? The best way for you to look at this is to think the about the drugs as enhancing your experience. Or, don't think about them at all. Like the pot we smoked. We got high and just enjoyed it. You had really vivid dreams, too."

"Yeah, I did. I'll um…try and enjoy it." Will offers a weak smile and looks down at his arm as Daniel lifts the cool metal of the stethoscope from his skin.

Daniel unties the band. "Your blood pressure is good. A little high for you but I expected that. I'm going to have you do some counting and breathing to keep it where it is. I'm glad you had the MRI done otherwise I'd have had to ask to take your blood pressure for a baseline. What a hint that would have been."

"How high is it?"

"Not much, a little elevated is all. You don't need to know the numbers. You'll obsess on them. I'm the doctor so let me do my job."

Will leans into Daniel so his head rests against his ribcage and feels Daniel's arm across his shoulders immediately. He thinks of sand and salty air and breathes a sigh of relief when he feels the sensation of soft mist around him. His body begins to relax though his head floats and objects continue to shimmer.

Daniel massages Will's shoulder and feels the tension recede beneath his fingers as the anxiety abates.

LSD and other hallucinogens can be cut with strychnine and other substances, and can cause the same muscle contractions as rat poison, but Daniel isn't using anything like those. These psilocybin mushrooms are about as untouched and organic as one can get. Will is tense because he is stressed.

Daniel can't regress Will until he's in a calm emotional state. Daniel will know when he is. He has not ever done this particular therapy with a patient. Well, not all the components at the same time. He does know he will be relying on his empathy to guide him and Will through the therapy.

Will's presence is powerful enough without drugs. Will poses unique challenges because he is unique. Daniel reminds himself that he has been over this in his head many times; he has thought this through and tried to plan for every contingency. There are always unknowns. Daniel needs to present to Will as confident and in control despite feeling a little afraid, too.

"I want you to breathe in slow and count that as one. When you exhale, count that as two. Count to ten and then count backwards to one again. I'll stand right here. You can keep your head where it is. I like that."

Daniel can feel Will's grudging approval as he takes a deep breath and begins to count. Daniel places two fingers over his jugular and counts as he listens to Will.

"Okay. You continue relaxing while I talk. I'm going to regress you into a lucid dream state. Like hypnosis but not exactly. You are tripping so putting you under completely is uh…not what we want here."

"What is it we want exactly?"

"We want insight and answers. After I regress you into a simple relaxed dream state, you'll free associate. I can let you do that for a bit, but I am going to guide you into conversations and you will respond without hesitation or inhibition. If I had not given you hallucinogens you would hesitate and you would block anything you didn't want to talk about. With me so far?"

"Um…yes."

"I will be present and talking to you the entire time. I will be prompting you and listening to your responses, and adjusting to your responses. You will invariably retreat, as is your habit…"

Daniel pauses to squeeze Will's shoulders for emphasis.

"Go on."

"And you'll imagine things. You'll respond to my questions and prompts but you may not be aware of me."

"How do you mean?"

"You may not see me all of the time. I may appear as someone else. You might internalize my suggestions but you may not be aware of actually hearing them. I'm not sure how all this will manifest, Will. I can give you my best guess. You will be in an alternate reality. I may pop in and pop out. I may stand in for other people. I am sharing it with you from the outside, but feeling your emotions."

"You'll become part of my imagination. Sort of." Will cringes inside and thinks of Mason.

No, no, no…don't go there. You will really have a nightmare then… Will tells himself.

"That's the idea. I gave you a really tiny dose. You should start to come down in about four hours and once you start coming down, it will be another hour or so before you feel yourself again. You won't be completely yourself until tomorrow morning."

"Will I be walking around or confined to the chair the whole time?"

"I'll give you the range of the house, but we won't go outside. Can't have you running and screaming down the street."

"Expecting a lot of screaming?" Will says, feeling at ease enough to joke around.

He is feeling more comfortable with the idea of the therapy. Daniel always makes him feel comfortable. It is a gift and Will thinks he never tells Daniel and he should. Will's mind spins with ocean breezes and the scent of brine and salt air. Will thinks the drugs are affecting him a little too much.

"Let's go sit on the couch and get comfortable. These chairs sure won't be after a while."

"I should remember this, right? You didn't give me anything that would impair my short term memory?"

"I hope not. You shouldn't be impaired in any way, except that you are hallucinating. All your mental faculties are intact. The drugs and the regression should allow you to remember even things you don't want to. Which is the point."

Will gets up and finds his legs remarkably steady. He seems to be moving slowly but maybe it just feels that way. He follows Daniel to the couch adjusting to the sensations and altered perception as he walks. He feels more in control now that the initial shock has subsided. He decides he feels like he smoked an entire joint by himself. Will remembers reading a list of slang terms for marijuana from the FBI's data base. He had been amazed there had been hundreds of terms from A to Z…

"Will?"

"I'm here."

"I want you to count backwards from twenty."

"Why twenty?"

"Because they are my instructions and I want you to follow them. Are you going to imagine you're twelve the entire time or just for now?"

Daniel adopts an authoritative tone to dissuade any further argument. He needs to establish some mental boundaries and Will needs to accept those boundaries. The most important boundary is Daniel. Will has to listen to him once he goes under. If he continues to perceive himself autonomous, Daniel might not be able to adequately control the situation. He also has to introduce an exit word, a word to bring him back.

He needs to establish these safeguards quickly. Will is already far enough along as it is.

"Sorry." Will offers a smile. He wasn't trying to be difficult…

"When you have counted back to one, I'm going to have you repeat a word I'll use to bring you back, okay?"

"Okay. Start counting now?"

"Yes. Close your eyes."

Daniel waits for Will to close his eyes and start counting. He rises from the couch to turn on the music. He created a playlist especially for the therapy. Selections he knows will invite all the requisite associations he wants Will to make. When he returns to the couch Will is just about finished counting. The counting had no purpose other than to have Will follow his instructions. Now, Daniel is sure he will do so without question.

The melodic strains of Vivaldi's Summer sweep the room gently, a dusting of sound that settles quietly, invitingly.

"Two…one."

"Keep your eyes closed. I'm going to regress you now. We're going to take a trip to do that, someplace you know and someplace safe. Before we do, I want you to remember our exit word. It's the same word I'll use to bring you back, but you can use it anytime you want to leave. I'll reinforce the word while I regress you. Okay?"

"Where are we going?"

"Wolf Trap."

Will smiles and nods. Of course Daniel would start there.

"What's the uh…exit word?"

"Well, it has to be something you wouldn't say in the course of conversation, but that's sort of hard to anticipate considering the situation. And you'd have to associate it with an exit."

"What did you come up with?"

"Ticket."

"Ticket?"

"Yeah, if you hear me talking about tickets, it's time to go. If you start talking about tickets, I'll bring you back."

"How is that associated with an exit?"

"I've got your ticket, Will, time to leave."

"That's pretty good. You've um…really thought this through."

"As best I could. You're not alone, Will. I'll be right beside you…Ready?"

Will opens his eyes to the sun peeking out from behind drawn beige shades covering familiar paned windows that frame the corner of his bed. He notices his front door has been flung open, the dogs are nowhere in sight and he hears…laughter outside. He throws the sheet and blanket off and pulls on the pair off loose fitting jeans and button down flannel shirt that hang over one of living room chairs. He walks through the open door to stand on his porch, shoes dangling from his hands as he watches a girl dressed in khakis and a light vest throwing sticks for the dogs. He counts. All seven of them.

The dogs hear him and begin to run at the house, Winston first. The girl turns her head with the tide of fur, and Will can clearly see the large blue eyes gazing at him as her mouth falls open in a wide tooth filled smile.

"Abigail?"

"I was wondering when you'd wake up and come outside. Where are we?"

"Wolf Trap. My house…what are you doing here?"

Will sits on the porch steps and pulls the shoes on over his thick socks. Abigail walks over, dogs trailing behind her, and sits next to him on the steps.

"I think they're hungry."

"I'm sure they are…hey guys. Good morning, huh?"

Will finds himself buried in a collage of fur and wet muzzles as Abigail laughs again. He sits up straight and takes in the freckled cheeks and nose, the hair braided and hanging off to one side. His eyes alight on the scar along her throat, quickly covered by tremulous fingers.

"I still cover it up most of the time, but you already know it's…there. Are you going to make breakfast?"

"Um…yeah. What do you want?"

"Well, something quick. We don't want to be late."

"Late for what?"

"The sacrifice. And I probably shouldn't eat too much, because you know how people lose their uh…insides when they die."

Will grabs Abigail's shoulders and turns her to face him. "What sacrifice are you talking about?"

"You know what sacrifice." Abigail frowns and pulls back away from Will, just out of his reach. "He'll come for me, and you know that, too, Will. You already know."

"We could stop him."

"How? What happened had to happen. You can't change it now. You can only learn from why it happened."

"Why the sacrifice? Why did it have to be you?"

I don't need a sacrifice, do you?

"I was always meant for you. A surrogate daughter."

"For both of us. Two fathers."

"But you loved me more. And he…loved you more."

"You don't know that."

"Who did he choose, Will? Who did he choose?"

The dogs whine restlessly and all of them turn toward the trees in the distance. Will looks up with Abigail and they watch a figure emerge from the canopy of red and orange approaching with a familiar measured gait.

"No time for breakfast." Abigail murmurs.

"There's never enough time…" Will says standing up to greet Hannibal.

Hannibal wears thick brown leggings and boots beneath a tan colored tunic. A long cloak lined with fur drapes from his shoulders held in place by a clasp of twin snakes entwined and writhing in gold. He shakes his mane of long blonde braids and holds out his hand to Abigail.

"Hello, Will. Come, Abigail."

Abigail turns to Will, her expression sorrowful. "Goodbye, Will." She touches his arm lightly as she rises from the steps to take Hannibal's hand.

Will stands up and quickly places himself between Hannibal and Abigail.

"Why the sacrifice? You said you didn't need one. Why couldn't you take her with you?" Will looks into the dark eyes that hold him paralyzed, again.

"The life to which she was born was taken from her. I made her another life. Your actions robbed her of that."

"You should have told me about your other life."

"I did, but you would not see it."

"Vagaries. Lies and deceptions."

"Opportunities. Lost with tragic consequences."

"You were supposed to leave."

"You were supposed to choose. You did not. So, I made the choice. Come Abigail, it is time."

Abigail walks from behind Will to take her place beside Hannibal. He draws her close so she stands in front facing Will.

"No… You haven't told me why you couldn't take her with you, just punish me."

"She already has. I had to sacrifice one to make a life with the other. I chose you. I left you to the Fates and your choices. A habit of yours I think you recognize all too well."

The sun shrinks behind clouds as Hannibal draws a sword from the depths of his cloak, pummel dark carnelian in his hands, as though already stained with her blood.

"How many lies have had to be sanctified? How many consciences devastated? How many sacrifices?"

"How many sacrifices has God made? If the war of Troy were a shattered tea cup, its shards strewn across time, where would you begin to pick up the pieces, Will?"

"You mean a time before the tea cup shatters?"

"Yes, Will. How did the war begin? The fleet has already sailed upon the winds of her sacrifice. Will you let her sacrifice go to waste? Another life still beckons for Achilles and he would that his Patroclus join him still."

As the sun emerges from the clouds its light catches bright upon the blade Hannibal raises high in the air. Will lunges at the stilled figures of Hannibal and Abigail and…

…lands upon hard ground as smoke and gravel fill his nostrils. Will looks around at his inferno. He pushes himself off the sooty ground to his knees and feels the aching of his shoulders as black wings rise from his back to steady him. His eyes are drawn to the silky black down that sprouts between his legs obscuring cock and balls and creeps up to his navel. He cranes his neck and reaches a hand up to feel soft curls at his neck and touch whiskers that are but a shadow of stubble across his face.

Will can handle a few feathers between his legs, what concern him is that the feathers seem to cover a little more of him each time he enters his inferno. He knows they sprout from his back and the wings seem fuller this time.

A rustling of feathers he knows are not his own cause him to lift his eyes. Daniel stands over him, as naked as he is, his wings frosty white contrasting sharply with the thick downy thatch of black that meets Will's eyes. The thatch is not so thick that Will can see that he stares at no angel. Except for the wings, he is quite human.

Winged Daniel inclines his head and holds out his hand to Will.

Will accepts the outstretched hand and lets Daniel guide him to his feet. The green eyes staring intently into his are alive and glittering like jewels in this place that reeks of death. Will can see the charred remains of Daniel's house behind him, rubble and splintered beams covered in ash.

"Are you okay? You went down pretty hard." The winged Daniel asks, brushing the curls from Will's eyes.

"I'm uh…yeah." Will says, momentarily confused. Something feels different. Daniel but not Daniel looks back at him, face serene as his fingers pluck at Will's hair.

"What do you see?" Daniel asks.

Daniel stands facing a dazed Will in the living room. Will had collapsed onto the rug from the couch a moment ago, eyes open but far away. Will is still in his hypnotically induced trance though a part of him recognizes Daniel and Daniel needs only the vaguest of cues from Will to guide him back into his dreamscape.

Will stares into the familiar face, as smoke drifts up from the crusty earth to curl around the frosty wings that flutter slightly in the stillness. But this is the Daniel from his inferno. A representation. A fragment of himself. He's tripping…

"I see…you, Daniel."

Will says knowing he's not really seeing the Daniel he knows. But that's what Daniel said would happen. Will lets the tether twisting in his mind snap. He watches winged Daniel's lips move.

"Okay. What else do you see?" The pink lips part, soft breath mingles with his own.

"Your house. What's left of it, right behind you."

Daniel turns around, scans the fireplace and turns back to Will. He knows where they are.

He watches Will flinch as he stands flexing back muscles and craning his neck with elbow bent and fingers massaging his shoulder then chest as his eyes move about the room seeing a devastated landscape only he can see, one that Daniel knows only by description. Daniel realizes Will has his wings, and so then must he. Daniel sits down on the couch hoping Will follows suit. He doesn't need to stand up or walk around; his mind will do that for him.

"Are we alone?" Winged Daniel asks as he gazes about the ruins of his home.

The sky overhead darkens and the ruins around them are cast in shadow, the distant crimson orb the only light in the heavens. With the darkness comes the flapping of great wings and Will knows what stands behind him though no shadow falls upon the charcoal colored dirt.

"Not anymore." Will says, his hands finding the wound that has already begun to pulse along his flesh, the thing inside awake sensing its kind in the darkness behind him.

The creature spreads its enormous wings over Will and beckons for the white winged Daniel to join them. Daniel takes a tentative step but Will blocks his way.

"Will…" He says.

Daniel pleads with his eyes and takes another step that brings him toe to toe with Will. Will instinctively shoves him backward, Daniel's wings move quickly lifting him up and he stumbles but does not fall to the earth. He comes at Will again and Will shoves again. The shoving gives way to grappling, legs lock in place and feet seek purchase against the ground while arms and hands seek advantage over flesh.

Will doesn't want to hurt him, but if injury keeps him from the creature at his back he can live with that. Will brings an elbow up, hard slamming Daniel in the side of the head. The blow sends Daniel reeling backward and Will is right on top of him, pinning him wings and all to the ground, grinding him into the grit, and almost enjoying it. Daniel struggles beneath, legs flail and hips rise to push Will off of him, but to no avail. Daniel holds his forearm against Will's throat seeking leverage to push him off once and for all while twisting his body up off the ground and Will answers with a twist of his own. Will's wings beat furiously as he slams Daniel's shoulder into the ground knowing his wings are anchored between the flesh of shoulder blades already pressed flat into the dirt.

He hears a snap and the sob of pain that escapes Daniel tears at his heart. Will moves off Daniel and watches him roll to his side and scramble a few feet away to finally draw himself up on his knees, wings white no more as they flutter and Daniel grimaces as he looks at Will. Will sees the blood bloom through ravaged feathers to trickle onto the dirt. Daniel heaves as he rests on all fours, his back rising with every breath.

Will crouches where he is, holding his ground between Daniel and the creature that hovers at his back.

The green eyes fill with sadness but Daniel retreats to stand aside a boulder, body twisted around so he can examine his wounds.

"Still the stronger predator."

Hannibal's voice whispers in Will's ear, as feathers soft as breath caress his ears.

"That wasn't hunting. He doesn't belong here. You know that."

"He is but a messenger, Will. You look, but you do not see."

"He has delivered no message."

"You do not want to hear it."

Feathers caress his cheek, but there are fingers beneath the feathers. Will turns around and winces at the sight as the thing inside coils ever more tightly. The sting of tears is sharp as Will gazes at the dark winged figure that smiles at him in the dim light of the blood colored sun.

The serpent tailed eagle is now a serpent tailed man covered in layers of thick black feathers that lay flat against flesh and muscle, powerful and elegant, awesome and grotesque. Great wings hang dark and luminous, a cloak of black satin. A long scaly tail scrapes along the ground flicking ash in its wake. The tiny feathers ripple across his face and the lips spread wider still.

Will knows that smile and seeing it here in this desolated place leaves him cold inside, his chest aches with the burning fear that he looks at what he is becoming.

"What do you see, Will?"

"I see my future." Will says, his throat dry and voice thin.

"A future you fear. A future that surely waits if you remain here. Do you know why you are here?"

"The ninth circle. I've condemned myself. For betraying you."

"A personal betrayal. An act of hubris that invites the punishment of the gods."

"And the gods have punished me haven't they?"

Will smiles bitterly as he caresses the scar that winds along pale flesh beneath his fingers.

There is a rustling of feathers as the creature creeps closer. "The gods didn't send you here. You punish yourself."

"No. Punishment is for evil, not good. An act of evil perpetrated against an evil doer cannot be evil."

"If your actions were good, why are you here? And what of good and evil, Will? Still undecided and indifferent?"

"If you are evil, then so am I. That's why I am here."

"Good and evil have nothing to do with God. Or with you and I. You limit yourself. If we learn our limitations too soon…"

"We never learn our power. What power?"

"The power to leave your inferno, Will. You look but you do not see."

"See!" Daniel's voice rings out from across the desolated yard.

Will and the creature turn to see Daniel climbing up on the boulder, one wing slightly askew, to get a better look into the cratered out terraces that once adorned the hillside. He points toward the bottom of the hill. Will knows the viper has returned. He wonders if that is Daniel's message. But this isn't really Daniel, he represents something for Will and he cannot grasp what that is.

"The viper? What am I supposed to see?"

Daniel throws him an exasperated look and leans to one side of the boulder. He kneels down upon the cracked and crumbling surface to reach down low. The grey wolf emerges from the other side and as Daniel stands upright it glances down the hill before assuming its usual and welcomed place at Will's side. Will notices it doesn't seem wounded in any way and he finds that both pleasing and puzzling.

"Who is he?" Will asks.

The creature moves to stand on the other side of him, ignoring the warning growls of the wolf, its ears lay flat against its skull and a stripe of fur ripples along its back.

"On gliding wings he takes up his mask…" Hannibal's voice whispers as talon like fingers curl around his hair.

Will stands still, peering into the darkness, looking for the viper that plagues his inferno.

"All that we see or seem is but a dream within a dream."

The voice is Daniel's but Will hears the words from inside his head. Daniel has not moved from his rock. He rubs at his face. All the voices are in his head. He takes a deep breath between his fingers, inhaling the dust from the scorched earth beneath his soiled feet. As he stares at his feet he feels vertigo and as he reaches out to both wolf and creature to steady him, his fingers grasp at empty space and he slips into blackness, free falling…into a bed.

Will's eyes widen as he stares at the faded tiny roses on the wallpaper.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 55 ended taking longer than anticipated. The therapy will figure prominently in Hannibal's invitation and Will's response to it. Apologies I couldn't manage the chapter in its entirety.
Here's a preview of Chapter 56 -
The Baltimore State Hospital for the Criminally Insane, and Hannibal’s home in Baltimore are among the final stops on Will's trip. And then, Daniel gets a taste of that crazy psychopath sex he couldn’t wait to hear about.

Chapter 56

Chapter Summary

Will continues his therapy with Daniel.

The Baltimore State Hospital for the Criminally Insane and Hannibal's house in Baltimore are among the final stops they make on Will's trip.

Why would you want to surprise him?

He does not believe I will deliver on our little quid pro quos. I'd like to benefit from your visit.

I wonder why he doesn't believe you, Frederick. What am I being used to bargain for?

An incentive for good behavior. He has to stop biting the staff. It's getting near impossible to hire quality personnel. Punishment doesn't work, so I thought I would try rewards.

Chapter 56

Will continues his therapy with Daniel.

The Baltimore State Hospital for the Criminally Insane and Hannibal's house in Baltimore are among the final stops they make on Will's trip.

The Birth of Evil, Roberto Ferri

Daniel ducks his head out of the bathroom to take a peek at Will who is reclining comfortably and more importantly, calmly on the bed. He stares at the ceiling, hands on stomach his fingers tracing over the scar he compulsively cradles through the cotton tee, but Daniel knows he is lost in his inferno. At least he is no longer crouched on the floor, every muscle taut with adrenaline while his brain swims in psilocybin.

After Will had decked him, Daniel had lain prone on the floor until Will had moved off him. Evidently, Will's imagination had not required Daniel's physical interaction. Will had spoken aloud some of his conversation, adopting all the parts himself, until Will had fallen silent; the rest of the episode had played out in his mind as Will had sat trancelike upon the couch. Daniel had been spellbound as his own body had reflected every flinch, every twitch of emotion from him.

The therapy is not going as planned. Daniel will once again experience Will's emotions without knowing what is happening in his head. Unless he wants to get decked again. And again. Imagine that.

Will is high functioning, able to process and assimilate his associations while responding to all the sensory stimuli at the same time. But, his aggressive tendencies have been enhanced by the drugs, and Will's lowered inhibitions coupled with Will's overactive imagination had resulted in Daniel finding himself staring up at Will from the rug, Will's hands trying to grip the flapping feathered wings Will imagined at his back as Will's calves and thighs had pinned his lower extremities to the floor.

Emotions had been running high, and Will had seemed to want to protect Daniel from something. Will had crouched on the floor in the living room with a very determined expression on his face but Daniel had felt the regret, too. Daniel's prompts have sent Will to Wolf Trap and his inferno so far. As far as Daniel can tell, Will is still there.

Still the stronger predator. That wasn't hunting. He doesn't belong here. You know that.

Will must have been keeping the winged version of him away from the serpent tailed eagle. Will had stopped talking after uttering those few sentences.

Daniel knows Will can assume the mindset of others without moving at all. He does not profile a crime scene by acting it out. Daniel had anticipated that Will would interact with his environment once the drugs had kicked in and he had been regressed, but Daniel had not anticipated that Will's imagination would so completely overtake him.

Will is becoming more intimate with his instincts the further into his head he goes. Daniel is not sure how much more intimacy he should invite. It is clear to Daniel that his presence can influence Will's hallucination. Rather than engage him directly, Daniel thinks it better that he keep his distance, allow Will to go where he wants on his trip with minimal interference from Daniel. Unless Will signals that interaction between them is what he wants, Daniel will guide the therapy from a safe distance.

Daniel would prefer not to engage Will physically. Will's reflexes are quick and Daniel just experienced how strong he is. He's an hour into the therapy and he is peaking. Will's adrenaline is likely spiking and Daniel thinks the pleasure centers in his brain have been activated by the near sexual pleasure he derives from exercising the aggressive tendencies. The release of dopamine will ignite more aggression which will, in turn escalate the violence. Lecter had no doubt relied on the same neural receptors to do the same thing to Will when he sent Randall Tier to his house.

But Daniel's decision had not required a complete neurological assessment. Will had quite simply knocked Daniel on his ass with one punch and it was then that Daniel had decided that perhaps a bed was safer. For him.

Daniel had led him upstairs to lie down. At least there, Daniel could keep an eye on him while he used the bathroom. The downstairs bathroom is not a full bath; the one upstairs is. Daniel had brought the medical bag up along with some snacks and drinks to camp out on the second floor. There is a lot less for Will to get into up here, and it will be a lot more difficult for him to leave the house if his associations should inspire him to embark on an odyssey of his own.

He presses the ice to his cheek as he looks in the mirror. He knew Will might get physical with him, but not quite like this. The abrasion doesn't hurt as badly as it looks and Daniel wants to minimize the swelling as much as possible. The experience is going to leave Will with plenty of emotional fall out without Daniel looking like a punching bag afterward. He may have to cancel appointments Friday should Will insist on taking more swings at him. Daniel is already feeling emotionally spent, and he isn't feeling close to what Will is feeling.

Usually, the patient sits in a chair or couch for the entire hypnotherapy. The therapy is similar to the narcoanalytic interview Chilton administered to Will, except that the patient is guided to explore or remember an event, often from childhood or trauma. Restraints would not be required, unless the patient had displayed aggressive tendencies or was considered violent and hostile, as Will had been viewed under Chilton's care. Such a patient would be considered resistant to therapy. In a clinical setting at a hospital for criminals, sodium amytal would be the drug of choice to elicit the hoped for truthful responses.

But Will's brain has been exposed to these sorts of drugs and Daniel thinks that he may have built a resistance to them, or at least his brain has. Daniel doesn't know how Will's mind works nor how it does what it does, but he is certain Will's neural pathways can find alternate routes around the usual suspects and for that reason he had opted for the hallucinogens instead. The hallucinogens would lower his inhibitions and would add fuel to the fire of his imagination.

Daniel thinks he may have overdone it on the fuel part. Will is much more active and ambulatory than expected, acting out his hallucinations rather than simply answering questions and role playing as Daniel had imagined. Will continues to prove he is consistently unpredictable. He considers Will is resisting in his own way. Habits of mind.

He had hopes of seeing Will through the fractured pieces represented by the people and creatures in his dreams and hallucinations. But Will seems to barely acknowledge him unless provoked. Daniel has had to manage his expectations. Daniel's presence in real time cannot compete with the scenery and sensation in Will's head. The best Daniel has been able to do is capture Will's attention briefly, dust him off, and gently send him back into the ring.

Will is unique in his ability to empathize. His perception of other people's intentions and motivation is dead on, embellished by his apparent eidetic memory. Associations come quickly as his compulsion to make associations, assimilate, and synthesize everything he sees and touches, is relentless and never ending. He can no more stop doing it than he could stop breathing.

Daniel thinks that Will's need for isolation arose in childhood. The mirrors in his mind absorbed too much from the other children, and he would have retreated to protect himself. What he absorbed from adults he would have been unable to comprehend…at first. He would have learned quickly to manage his responses around adults. Daniel thinks he began feigning his antisocial disorders about the same time he figured out it was easier to pretend ignorance than to ask questions. Satisfying one's curiosity had become a covert operation out of necessity. Exclusion by design.

He had learned to insulate himself from the constant barrage of sensation around him, unable to process them because he had been too young to have a frame of reference. And the more isolated he became, the more finely attuned his empathy became. Will has been building forts for a very long time.

When Will began to start putting himself inside other people's heads is anyone's guess. His powers of observation grew over time and since Will spent so much time alone, he perfected his ability.

Daniel imagines the images dancing behind those pale blue eyes would have shut most children down. The adults around him would not have known what was different about Will; they would have known only that he was different from other children. And while most children are protected from the adult world of sex, violence, and death; Will was not. Will's innate intelligence is what saved him. Once he had started making and cataloging associations, his own childhood must have been cut short, sacrificed so that he could make sense out of the world around him.

Probably quiet and withdrawn for most his childhood; his personality had emerged slowly as he gradually became more socialized, better equipped to handle his gift with maturity. Daniel thinks it a marvel of human resilience that Will can function at all. Will has struggled to retain who he is all his life.

Normal children emulate and copy the behaviors of their parents without understanding the behaviors. Children internalize behaviors, keeping the ones that garner positive associations and losing the ones that don't. Rewards and punishment, positive and negative reinforcement. This is how we all become socialized. But, Will internalized all of his influences, his mind unable to distinguish between the right emotions and the wrong emotions. Every scrap of emotion and behavior was noticed and recorded.

And his associations became more complex and nuanced as a result. Will's mind has no limits except the ones he places on himself. And this is what enables him to understand everyone and everything whether he wants to or not. This is why he builds forts and raises shields. Losing his mind is a legitimate fear. Daniel's gentle jokes aside, Will is crazy; a very special kind of crazy.

Will cannot only become other people; he can adapt his behavior to the expectations of the people around him. He can do it consciously as he had last night for the duet. Daniel recognizes Will had not wanted to open the French doors initially, but he had relented out of affection for Daniel. He had indulged Daniel in the outdoor rehearsals by adopting Daniel's persona to help him out of his comfort zone. Just like he had adopted the personas of other people at crime scenes, absorbing the screams and the violence with every breath. Just like he had created a version of himself for Hannibal.

If Will had not learned how to manage his gift, he would have absorbed everyone else's personality, would absorb them now, and would walk through life a montage of everyone he came in contact with. Will knows this and knows he cannot isolate himself completely. His experience with Hobbs and then Lecter proved that. Will was affected by Jack, too. And Alana. Will absorbed them all. Drowning in a tide of emotions that had finally found him gutted on Lecter's kitchen floor.

When Will had learned from Alana that Purnell had pulled the plug on their operation, and that Alana had not heard from Jack, Will had feared the worst. So had Alana. She had arrived before Will and foolishly gone inside Lecter's home by herself. Will had called Lecter to warn him in hopes Lecter would leave before Jack arrived for dinner, had suggested Jack would not be alone. But Lecter had already been aware of Will's deception and had recognized Will's call for what it was – a desperate attempt to save lives. Lecter would have realized Will's plan had blown up on him.

Will's version of events as he had told them to Daniel had left out some details. Daniel does not know if Will ever had a conversation with Jack after the fiasco with Mason Verger. He does not know if the two of them had agreed on using Jack as bait before Will had suggested to Lecter to reveal himself to Jack or if Will had come up with that on his own while discussing the Iliad over a tumbler of whiskey in Hannibal's office in front of the fireplace...

Had Will introduced the idea to send Jack a dinner invitation on his own? Or had Jack already agreed to it? Had Hannibal insinuated enough that Will had thought the suggestion his own? Daniel splashes his face with a few handfuls of cold water. The depths of manipulation and deceit are mind boggling. And Will had been in the thick of it for weeks. Another bundle of questions beckons in the back of Daniel's mind. A bundle that Daniel can reason through with a degree of certainty.

Had Jack and Will agreed on FBI back up? Had Will talked to Hannibal first, or to Jack? Had Will known Jack was going to have the cavalry standing by, or had Jack surprised Will by deciding that having just Will as backup had not be enough? Had Will prepared Hannibal for dinner knowing Jack would have snipers or had he talked to Hannibal before preparing Jack?

Daniel thinks Will had been surprised by Jack's announcement of snipers on the rooftops. Will had already looked deep within himself and found mercy. Will had not wanted Lecter dead, but he had wanted him to pay because Jack had wanted Hannibal to pay and Will had known that, had felt that. To Will's thinking, if he acted on his fantasies of killing Lecter, the act would send Will right over the edge and he would become what he feared, the monster who killed his creator. A modern day tale of Frankenstein in Will's mind, the ultimate act of playing God and inviting the ultimate punishment for the sin of hubris. An act of revenge from which there would have been no turning back.

Will might not have been able to live with himself. He had not wanted to kill Lecter, that much is clear, but his reasons are not. Had he called to spare Hannibal out of fear of what he might become, or out of love? Daniel thinks that Will does not know. He also thinks that Will's thinking is too complex to reduce his decision making to such a limited scope. Will had had far too many emotional entanglements to consider. Will could imagine why Jack had gone ahead alone. How had Will felt about that?

Only Will knows what he had been thinking the days leading up to the final bloodbath at Lecter's stately residence at 5 Chandal Square. What Will knew and when he knew it makes a difference to a point. Will had set both Lecter and Crawford up. Will had decided he didn't want to be Lecter's killer or Jack's killer and Daniel is certain Will had decided to take himself out of the equation. Until Alana's phone call, Will had had no intention of being anywhere near Chandal Square that night.

And when he had ended up going anyway, it must have seemed that Fate had punished him for not making his choice. Lecter had been the instrument of Fate that night, and in his own way, Lecter had granted Will the mercy of a choice. He had not taken Will's life. He had given Will another chance.

And Will struggles in his inferno trying to make his choice. Lecter has the twins. He intends to make sure Will makes a definitive choice this time.

Daniel looks in the mirror and finds the creases that furrow Will's brow have made an appearance on his. Will has to know what is lurking around the corners of tomorrow for him. He has been dancing on the edge of a knife. Perception is a tool pointed at both ends he has entrusted Daniel to help him wield the double pronged tool at Lecter and himself.

Will has to decide between Shelley and Homer. Between surrendering to God's judgement or joining Lecter in flipping him off. As Daniel stares at his reflection he wonders what he would choose.

Daniel thinks Jack Crawford wants Lecter so badly that he is willing to risk Will's mind, or what is left of it, to catch him. Daniel thinks Jack has some idea of how Will's mind works. He had certainly talked to Lecter at length about him. Jack continues to enlist Will because even though Will empathizes with Lecter, he empathizes with Jack, too. Jack knows all this and Will knows that he knows. Lecter knows, too.

He steps outside the bathroom to peer into the bedroom where Will still sits staring out the window from his seat at the edge of the bed. He has not moved and Daniel ducks back into the bathroom. Will's ability to analyze himself is impressive. Even now, as Will dreams he analyzes, compulsively collecting and assimilating associations. Whether drugged, regressed, or thrust into any state of consciousness or unconsciousness, his mind is a garden of images that blooms and grows vines around his head, a vast labyrinth of thoughts and memories, beautiful and terrible in scope and majesty.

His gift allows him to become other people totally cognizant of the shifting of personalities. Deliberate dissociation. Unique. An imagination so powerful that Will is not spared its relentless assault on his mind even in sleep. Also unique.

There is nothing on the planet so rarefied as Will. A connoisseur of the rare and beautiful, Lecter had found him irresistible and addictive. Will's particular madness is unmatched, and having tasted the delicacy; Lecter could not let him go.

To become a police detective and then a profiler for the FBI deliberately exposing himself to the absolute worst humanity had to offer; running the risk of internalizing the behaviors he adopted when he recreated the mindset of the criminals seems counter-intuitive. It only seems counter-intuitive if one assumes that Will did not enjoy it. But he did. Part of him enjoyed it tremendously. And Hannibal, ever curious, ever fascinated, the eternal student of human nature had known that he had enjoyed it, or would enjoy it if he allowed himself that particular pleasure. Hannibal is an intelligent psychopath. He is also a brilliant psychiatrist, because he is an intelligent psychopath. He extrapolated and deduced the truth from watching Will work his magic at crime scenes, from all their conversations, and had come to the conclusion that Will was taking a visceral enjoyment from his virtual crimes. And, he was being torn apart inside over the guilt he felt at enjoying it.

No wonder Will had told Jack it was getting harder and harder for him to look. His thinking was shutting down because of the encephalitis and he had known if his thinking shut down enough, the barriers and forts he kept in place would shut down, too. His mental defenses weakened by his illness, he had been ripe for Hannibal's design.

Exclusion by design. Hannibal had written the book on it, rather a published paper. Meeting Will must have blown his mind. Another Steppenwolf among the sheep. And love had bloomed.

There is a reason Will has never allowed psychiatrists to analyze him. He is afraid they would learn his dirty secret. Most people do not possess the specialized training to understand why people do what they do. Even if they did, most people would not take the time to try and figure out why a person does what they do. But Hannibal had. And once he had diagnosed the problem, Hannibal had taken it upon himself to help Will. He had helped initially out of curiosity and later, he had helped for a far more complicated and human reason. Love in the hands of Hannibal becomes not only a many splendored thing but a selfish thing.

Daniel would like for Will to become Hannibal, at least Will's version of Hannibal just for a little while. There are some questions he would like to ask him, rather questions he thinks Will would like to ask him but never would, even if he could. These would be questions that Will does not want to ask because to know the answers would require him to act. And he would rather simmer in his inferno than climb out of it on the back of the being he hates for sending him there. The barriers Will has put up have to come down.

Daniel knows Will has had plenty of conversations with the real Hannibal, but from adversarial positions, even in the bedroom. Will had been playing a role, and had remained in character most of the time. Remaining in character had meant giving Hannibal what he wanted; presenting Hannibal with what he had wanted to see. Daniel imagines Will tried to hold onto as much of his real self as he could, not wanting to give Hannibal the satisfaction or the edge. And now Daniel thinks he regrets the withholding, too.

Will has constructed a duplicitous and deceitful Hannibal in his mind. Will might not be able to endow his version of Hannibal with the honesty he had experienced with him in the solitude of Hannibal's salon. That would depend on Will's willingness to confront his true feelings. Daniel hopes the drugs are a strong enough substitute for that willingness.

Will has had plenty of imagined conversations with Hannibal. He's had indulgent fantasies where he killed him afterward. He has recovered fragments of conversation from drug soaked memories. He has had strange dreams in strange places and he has been talking to a serpent tailed eagle in his inferno most recently. Will has been the architect of all of his dreamscapes and like any architect; he knows well the blueprints of the structure and can avoid the places he doesn't want to go.

Daniel wants him to visit those places, and clean out the clutter from the basement, the attic, and all the other messy and well insulated places Will avoids in his own memory palace. Daniel can be a surrogate Hannibal for Will during the therapy. Daniel has already filled that role for Will in the bedroom. Getting Will to become Hannibal might not be possible. Will is drugged but his mind is quick and he has his habits. The drugs might have leveled the playing field, but these kinds of mind games are beyond Daniel. He thinks he may be in over his head.

Daniel thinks Will might have experienced similar feelings once he had entered the lion's den. Will must have known he was drowning. He couldn't let Hannibal know. And he chose not to tell Jack. Will had to have known Jack's mind. Will had not wanted to confirm Jack's doubts about him. If he had, the charges for Tier would have been enough to put him away.

He sets down the bag of ice and decides he can hold the ice to his face if he needs to when he joins Will in the bedroom. Daniel has allowed Will to free associate enough. He glances at the scissors and razor on the vanity and sighs. These are the main reason he stands in front of the mirror. He picks up the scissors and reminds himself this is for Will.

Will stares blinking at the shimmering wallpaper, the pink rosebuds entwined within a labyrinth of pale green leaves seem to pulse with a light of their own. He gradually becomes aware of someone…Daniel, sitting beside him on the bed. Daniel's sneakers skim along the floor, the creases and wrinkles in his tee and gym shorts wriggle in the light, shadows that shift and move darts of light over his body. He's fussing with something in his hands. Will glances down at his shorts, feels the boxers riding up his thighs as his bare feet dangle off the bed. He realizes his bicep is tied with a rubber band and he blinks in a panic as Daniel injects a long syringe into his forearm. He jerks his arm back, stops, unsure if he really wants to rip his skin open to escape whatever it is Daniel seems intent on pumping into his arm. Daniel looks up at him and Will grabs his wrist.

Stop…what is that?

Will, hey…what are you doing? Daniel reaches his other arm around to stop Will from tugging at his wrist. Ouch! Will…let go.

What are you shooting me up with?

What? No…oh, no, no…Will, I'm taking your taking your blood pressure, that's all. You were hyperventilating.

I see the needle, Daniel.

It's a stethoscope, here…feel the metal. See?

Will looks but he still sees a syringe sticking into his arm. He touches the syringe and it feels like what it looks like. If it looks like a duck… It takes all his strength of will to drop his hand and sit still. He can feel the point withdraw from his skin; can see the hole and pucker of flesh that will bruise later. Thoughts reel. He closes his eyes to shield them from the flashing strobe.

It's a syringe, Daniel. Will says flatly, opening his eyes to popping lights.

He watches Daniel look up from his watch. No, it isn't. I want you to breathe in and out like you did before and count.

Don't lie to me. Just tell me what you gave me. Is this…a hospital?

This is my home, Will…

This doesn't feel like… Will twists away from the grasp that holds his wrist.

Do you remember the exit word? Do you want to use it? I'll bring you out…

I'll bring you out…

I'll bring it out of you…

Will shakes his head. He doesn't want out. He doesn't want it out… He pulls his hands in, folds his arms across his chest. He needs the barrier so he can think.

He looks into Daniel's eyes and sees the wounded look. That chiding look he used to get from Jack…

I'm not your father, Will…

Will does not care. Every time he turns around someone is sticking a needle in him or fucking with his head. He is a magnet for abuse. He feels his face twitching from lips to forehead and he's not sure if he boils from anger or frustration. Probably both. He shoves himself backward so he huddles against the headboard draws his knees up and wraps his arms around them tightly.

He hears music…it's Bach. Brandenburg concertos…he tries to think which one as Daniel edges closer.

Will, I'm not lying to you. I just took your blood pressure. It's high again. You need to calm down and think… about what we're… doing here…together. You…

Are…

Not…alone.

Daniel's words sound far away though he sits right in front of him. Will does not answer. His head thuds with the music. It's the fifth concerto…

I want you to think about what you would have liked to happen in the kitchen that night…

Will focuses on the notes, hums the melody in his head. The hum of an electric saw fills his mind. Randall's left leg separates from its pelvic joints like butter as the fluttering of the flute mingles with the violins… Then the right leg, Will's movements are controlled and fluid. He stares at the detached leg on the metal table, and the blood splattered on the white apron he wears, the spare apron Hannibal pulled from the pantry on their way downstairs.

Can you hear me, Will? What could have happened instead? …other possibilities, can't you?

Stay with me, Will. The glint from the rails of the approaching train tempts you.

Tempts me like the ocean…

Follow your instincts. Where should you start?

The violins and flute help him focus as he sets down the saw and takes up the surgeon's knife. He looks down into the chest cavity, Randall's ribs have been removed already and all Will has to do is start taking out the organs. He sighs and feels the weight of Hannibal's hand on his shoulder as he begins to slice through the intestines the way Hannibal shows him to avoid getting bowel on the meat…

The wallpaper moves, shifts with the shadows.

You need to become intimate with your instincts, Will….

Will's eyes feel so heavy, so heavy and he wants to close them so badly because his head will not stop spinning but he forces himself to focus on the shifting melting face in front of him. He reaches out his hands to touch the smooth skin he knows so well and he smells sandalwood…and beach. The walls shimmer and the glint of sunlight refracted off the veneer of the old piano is blinding.

I don't know this place…

Will knows he is speaking but his lips aren't moving. He feels hands grasp his wrists, thumbs massaging slow circles on the inside as strong fingers glide along his bones up his arms and Will leans into the touch allowing the fingers to guide him forward. Light flickers relentlessly. Make it stop…

Close your eyes, Will.

I can feel myself fading…

You told me I was ocean mist to you, remember?

Yes…Where is this place?

The smell of ocean fills his nostrils salty fresh and moist and if he listens closely, he can hear it, too. His mind rolls with the distant crash of waves and he feels sand at his feet. Feels the spray of mist on his face. The wallpaper pulses and Will leans into the hand that cradles his head.

The memory is there, but your mind isn't making the connection. It will come. Don't force it.

Will is quiet. He cannot be sure if he saw this place in a dream or for real. Daniel does not live at the beach and yet the association is so strong. That he does not know with any certainty where he is bothers him; it bothers him a great deal. Will thinks knowing the difference between dream and reality is becoming harder and harder. No matter where he is, what mental state he is in, his senses process it all the same. He can't be sure of anything and he has travelled this road before, with Hannibal.

Listen, what do you hear?

Ocean waves, distant on the horizon of my mind. Breaking on a shore… my own feet unsure…

Your feet don't need to feel the sand. I'll be your anchor. Drift on the waves, Will. Are you drifting?

He is. His body feels weightless,buoyant as he listens to the rhythm of the waves wash upon the sand synchronous with the melodies of flute and violin. He looks up from Randall's ravaged chest cavity. His fingers find the smooth skin again and he draws the face close smelling surf and sandalwood. He pulls the face closer still until his lips can graze across nose and cheeks and Will feels nothing but the cool rush of water around him and the warm supple flesh that moves beneath his lips.

The way you looked at me that night in the barn with Ingram…you looked at me the same way after you killed Randall, when I asked you if you had fantasized about killing me.

Hannibal words fall from lips brushing through his hair. Will has missed this, missed it so much… But how can he forgive the monstrous acts of the monster he chases?

You awoke and gazed at me with that same look after our first night together after Tier…

Will remembers and tries to turn aside but strong hands scented with musk and sandalwood hold him still. The fragrance tingles and lingers and Will wants to lick at the fingers that caress his lips.

And you smiled the same way each time… Will says.

Thoughts of killing me fueled your becoming. Most of what we do, most of what we believe, is motivated by death.

I've never felt as alive as I did when I was killing him. As I felt when I thought I was killing you. You knew…

I hoped. Out of destruction comes creation. Your becoming Will. I could not be more pleased knowing that thoughts of killing me inspired your becoming.

I haven't become…not yet.

The monster grows inside you, Will. You would deny yourself the urges you kept down for so long? You would deny…the grunts and poetry of a life we could have shared? You are alone because you are unique.

I'm as alone as you are. But I know who I am.

And you know who I am. You wanted an admission from me. To admit what I am. I did. For you. No one can be fully aware of another unless we love them.

You loved an ideal.

Will struggles against the hands at his face but the hands will not release him. He thinks they remain because he wants them there…

Do you think me the only one of us to allow the potential nestled inside expression? By expressing that love, did you not see my potential? Or did you see only the monster growing inside yourself?

What was growing inside you…except pride in your accomplishments?

Didn't you think you could change me? The way I changed you?

The wallpaper peels away from the beams in the wall, burning and through the flames Will can see the inferno waiting. The figure shifts beside him and he hears the rustling of feathers as the dark creature shifts on the bed of stone.

You remember everything we've ever said. Listen…what do you hear?

Hannibal…

What do you hear, Will?

A melody…

Orchestrations of carbon… All our destinies swimming in blood and emptiness.

I feel empty, drained, used up…faded.

He feels the weight of the wings at his back, he relaxes his shoulders to allow them to settle on the rock, not daring to look at himself for fear of what he might see.

You didn't wade into the stream, Will. You came here.

He feels fingers kneading the back of his neck then skull and he lets the hand guide him close so his nose nuzzles against Hannibal's ear. The creature's ear buried beneath the silky down that slips along his cheek.

No, I don't want to be here. Will whispers softly into smoke and sandalwood scented feathers as the ocean fades away.

With every choice lies the possibility of regret. You welcomed my embrace that night in my kitchen. When you saw Abigail, did you understand then?

You were supposed to leave…

We couldn't leave without you…

You took her from me, again.

Your actions…

My actions did not kill her, you did. And who are you to sit in judgement of me? To judge me guilty and render punishment?

And why not? The offense was against me. Who else is qualified to judge you?

You found me guilty…

Of deceiving me. As you have found yourself guilty.

One deception to halt the parade of lies from you…

There were no lies between us, except yours. You lie to me and to yourself. Do you remember what an imago is?

Yes...

What images of me do you carry?

I carry an ideal of you. A concept of an ideal. Neither of us is ideal.

And neither are concepts immutable. They can be expanded, like boundaries. If you are capable of transformation so then am I. We are just alike.

Boundaries and limits. If we learn our limitations too soon…

We never learn our power… You would have taken my freedom from me Will. If not my life; then surely that.

You were supposed to leave… If you had left, none of this would have happened. When did you know?

Still torturing yourself? And had I not learned of your deception, what consequences then? What do you see, Will?

What would I have liked to happen? What should have happened?

If you prefer. Imagine taking my freedom, Will.

I can't… Don't ask me to do that.

You have to face your fear. You wanted a reckoning…

The strong hands cradle his face, stroke his head and talons trail through his hair, scraping sharply along his scalp. Will's lips slide across seeking the warm skin to rest aside a cheek he knows so well. Instead, feathers rustle and Will opens his eyes to see the black faced creature seated across from him on the cracked boulder, a smoky orange sky at his back. The talons move to scrape across his shoulders as the creature turns him around.

The circular drive in front of the Baltimore Hospital for the Criminally Insane glistens in the rain, the sidewalk drenched in sparkling wetness that shines beneath Will's shoes as he walks up the steps. He stands in the lobby sniffing at the air. The odor is medicinal; a scent of mildew seasoned with a touch of bleach, the aftertaste of a bitter meal, still sitting acrid upon Will's tongue. The sight of Frederick Chilton causes the sour bile to curdle.

Mr. Graham. I can call you Will, can't I? No need to be so formal is there?

None at all, Frederick.

Will tries not to stare at Chilton's damaged face. It's still shocking. He pushes images of Miriam's bullet splintering through cheekbone from his mind.

You can imagine my surprise when I received a phone call from Jack Crawford threatening me. I wasn't aware you had any friends left.

Jack threatened you? That doesn't sound like Jack.

Chilton raises a brow, not sure if Will is being sarcastic. Will wonders if Chilton is really that dense or if he fakes it.

Not in so many words but tone of voice. Seems like I'm still everybody's favorite punching bag.

Will is quiet. He doubts his silence will invite Chilton to do the same. Whining is Chilton's way of keeping the conversation focused on his favorite topic. Himself. Will just wants to get this over with.

Where is he?

I gave him your old cell. Seemed appropriate. He's not as cooperative as you were.

I don't remember being all that cooperative.

You were the ideal patient by comparison.

Therapy not going well?

Charming as always. Shall we?

Will follows Chilton through the halls to the elevator he knows will take them down below to the secured levels where the mezzanine and reinforced cells are located. The series of locked doors and stairwells is new. Probably to accommodate Chilton's newest addition. They walk down the steps to the mezzanine filled with cages. The cages are empty.

Wait here. I don't dare put him in a cage for your visit. You understand.

No, I don't.

Transporting him to and from his cell is too risky. He manages to induce enough chaos right where he is.

The knot in Will's stomach hardens as he thinks of the array of possible treatments and tests Hannibal must have endured over the past year. A part of him hopes each one was every bit as tasty as the therapy Hannibal had served up to him. He tells himself Hannibal is far too proud, too strong minded, too conceited to give Chilton the satisfaction of breaking him. Will thinks there is nothing in Chilton's arsenal that Hannibal could not chew up and spit out. Hannibal must be entertaining himself at Chilton's expense.

Will watches Chilton leave to secure the hallway that leads to the row of dank and musty cells. Will can almost feel the stone walls damp with moisture beneath his fingers and can picture the rat turds on the cold cement floor under the bed and clinging to the bottom of the toilet and the cracked and rusted sink.

He has condemned Hannibal to this place. A place he himself had despised. Will had gone fishing in his mind to escape the confines of his cell. Hannibal escapes to a mindscape more vast and exotic than a stream. Or would, if Chilton would leave him be. Apparently, Chilton cannot resist playing with the new toy the FBI brought him. The added security suggests Hannibal continues to resist his accommodations.

Will paces; unable to stand still as he gazes at the reinforced steel cages. If he stands still too long, he may find himself back inside one of them. He halts in his pacing and looks up at the sound of footsteps.

Did you tell him I was coming?

No.

Why wouldn't you tell him I was coming?

Chilton raises his eyebrows as a pucker of amusement lifts one side of his partially paralyzed mouth. Will thinks he shouldn't stare but then decides to dispense with the pretext of politeness. It's just Frederick.

I didn't tell him because I didn't want to give him time to prepare. I so rarely can surprise him.

Why would you want to surprise him?

He does not believe I will deliver on our little quid pro quos. I'd like to benefit from your visit.

I wonder why he doesn't believe you, Frederick. What am I being used to bargain for?

An incentive for good behavior. He has to stop biting the staff. It's getting near impossible to hire quality personnel. Punishment doesn't work, so I thought I would try rewards.

What rewards? You didn't instantly think of me.

Of course not. A warm shower. Prepared meals. His charcoal pencils and drawing pads. And the like…small comforts, but quite grandiose by normal standards. And all documented.

You offered things he had already given up. Return to him things you had taken away. Not much of an inducement.

Apparently not. But you...

He threw a tantrum, Frederick. And you promise him candy if he'd calm down? That's bad parenting at the very least, and reprehensible in your profession.

Appeasement, quid pro quo…whatever works at this point.

Why not just allow me to visit after the first request?

Timing. Had to see how far he would take it. It is regrettable that there have been casualties along the way, but he's such a prize… magnificent to watch in his natural state.

I've already seen it.

Hmmm. I'll bet you're something to watch in action. Chilton huffs, As for the candy, I'll let him unwrap you slowly and see what happens.

I'm trying to get better. What's in it for you, Frederick? You wouldn't have agreed unless you hoped to gain something for yourself. You want something from him.

His cooperation of course. He lacks motivation. He needs…an audience, applause. He won't talk to me. Highly resistant to treatment. He's as stubborn as you were, more so. At least you didn't punctuate your indifference with violence. Ah, here we are.

Chilton turns to Will before signaling to open the door. He holds up a hand up to the orderly operating the doors and latches. Although he can't see them, Will feels feathers slide along his cheek and shudders at the touch.

Now that you are here I intend to make the most of it. To watch the two of you circle each other will be fascinating I'm sure. You can't resist each other. He's here for study. I can't study him if he won't cooperate. Let's see if you calm the savage beast, or if you excite him more.

I'm here for me, Frederick, not you.

I don't think you really know what you are here for. Let's let Hannibal unwrap his pretty present and then perhaps I can convince the almighty FBI that that you belong in a cell right next to him. Two for the price of one.

If Kade Purnell had her druthers, I'd be in here already.

If your therapy doesn't work out you just might.

Don't start turning down the sheets and leaving chocolates just yet, Frederick. I don't think I'll be back for any therapy with you.

We'll see. For now your therapy is not with me; it's with him. Your psychiatrist didn't refer you to me. He referred you to Hannibal. That says something don't you think?

About you or my therapist?

Chilton rubs at the mustache and goatee that are supposed to hide his disfigurement. They don't.

How is he?

You don't know what he's become?

What would that be?

He's a caged animal, quite primal.

If he is, it's because you've reduced him to that.

It's what he is. Only his habitat has changed. And it took less than a year to manifest.

Will thinks there still isn't a word to describe the happy anticipation of feeling contempt. But he feels the contempt well enough.

The electronic door clicks and Will stands with Chilton in the hallway that stretches in front of them. Chilton does not remain at the door. He begins to walk and the door locks behind him. Will bites his lip. Chilton does not intend to even offer the illusion of privacy.

Will knows Hannibal can hear the scrape of two pair of shoes along the floor. By the time Will has reached the half way mark, he is sure Hannibal has already smelled him. Chilton is about to be very disappointed if he expected to get a rise out of Hannibal. Will turns his head to the sound of rustling feathers. The corridor is empty.

Hello, Will.

Hannibal's familiar voice floats through the bars before Will has even stepped into his line of vision.

Hello…Doctor Lecter.

Will allows his eyes to soften as he steps in front of Hannibal's cell to gaze through the bars at the rigid figure dressed in gray jumpsuit on the other side. Will doesn't want to give Chilton the satisfaction of glimpsing any expressions of intimacy between them. They both know Frederick would be salivating for it. More ammunition to hurl at Hannibal later. Will feels his chest lurch at the sight of Hannibal standing tall, chin up but the predatory gleam Hannibal reserves for Chilton dissolves as his eyes alight on Will.

Will stands quiet and unmoving as Hannibal's eyes wander over him fully aware of the smirk on Chilton's face. Will notices the subtle changes incarceration has wrought. There was always an air of superiority about Hannibal, an aristocratic sort of aloofness that Will had found alternately amusing and annoying. The air of aristocracy remains but there is dangerousness to him. The danger was always there, but Hannibal had not advertised it as he was doing now. He has lost weight. He seems smaller somehow, wiry and edgy. Will acknowledges that standing in a cell does tend to diminish one's stature and increase one's pallor. Hannibal's face is like stone, the chiseled cheekbones are hollow and his skin is so pale as to be almost blanched. The contrast of his face against the dark wall at his back is stark. He is a ghost of who he was.

His hair is longer, it falls over one eye briefly until Hannibal flicks it away and Will can think of plenty of reasons he has not had a shave in a while. The number of fingers would be ten; there are two hundred and six bones in the human body for starters. The floor is wet and water pools in dips along the floor. Will observes the condition of the cell and deduces that Hannibal had received hosing down earlier. The walls are bare as is the mattress on the floor. The bed frame has been removed in case Hannibal would take it apart. With his bare hands.

Hannibal stands in profile only his head is turned toward Will. The eyes that gaze into Will's are dulled with the monotony, but emotions stir ominously behind the black glass.

I've missed you, Will. You never write.

Will smiles at this. It seems the perfect thing for Hannibal to say.

Considering where I'd be sending my letters, I thought better of it.

I suppose my memories will have to do. We do share many memories, don't we?

Hannibal's eyes linger a little too long below Will''s hips and Will figures he knows why Chilton didn't set out any chairs. Besides giving Hannibal notice that he was going to have visitors Chilton can easily observe Will's every movement and Hannibal's from where he stands. Will shifts his weight but his trousers tighten anyway. Hannibal lifts his eyes to Will's face once again and the slight tug at his lips and the knowing tics in the corners of his eyes cause Will to feel heat across his cheeks and down his throat.

Will hears Chilton's feet move along the floor. This is just the sort of innuendo he craves and Hannibal is handing it to him right out of the gate. Will sighs. Hannibal must have his entertainments.

You look well. The jacket is very stylish, looks good on you. And your hair, freshly cut?

Yesterday.

The dogs are well? Still seven?

Still seven.

You look…very much the same. How long has it been?

Not so long that I would appear any different.

No one in this room is the same, Will.

We've all changed haven't we? But that is the nature of life. Nothing stays the same.

Some of us change more radically than others. Some of us do not change much at all. Despite exposure to a number of potentially edifying experiences.

Hannibal turns his head slightly in Chilton's direction and is rewarded with a click of the tongue and an exasperated sigh.

Change is not always a good thing. Tell him what you've done, Hannibal.

I've no interest in meeting your expectations, Frederick. Tell him yourself.

You see the condition of his cell? It didn't start out this way. I honestly don't know what Doctor Clayton expects you to gain from this experience. Except perhaps…closure.

Frederick says you've been biting the staff?

Hannibal's eyes shift to Chilton and narrow slightly. I was provoked.

Nothing of the kind happened. You ripped her face off with your teeth. It would have been merciful if you had killed her.

Hannibal's expression does not change. Mercy has no place at the table. Mercy would have been served had you allowed me to finish.

What happened to impulses can be controlled with restraint and conquered with obedience?

Will knows the sound of his voice will bring Hannibal's attentions back to him and away from Chilton's scowl. Hannibal is obeying the call of his impulses; not his reason. He's ignoring his own advice, advice he had drilled into Will. Will chews on his lip as he remembers the literal restraints Hannibal had used to illustrate the abstract and make the instruction more tactile for Will.

One must be sufficiently motivated. My present circumstance is not conducive to motivation. In those instances, one can easily slip into a state of nature.

This isn't you. This is giving in. Why give in to such self-destructive urges?

Disappointed I'm not living up to your ideal of me? How does that feel?

You tell me. I'm learning to manage my expectations.

As am I. Absent valid or attainable rewards for delaying the satisfaction from indulging one's nature or resisting it altogether; one can devolve into a state that at the very least appeases one's natural inclinations. I have no reason to deny my urges here. I seek to fulfill the ones I can. And I mourn the loss of those I cannot.

Hannibal again looks Will up and down and Will flushes warm under his penetrating gaze. He may as well be standing here naked. Chilton remains a goading insufferable presence at his side. Will takes a step forward. Just one step.

The exclusion is no longer voluntary, then. It is imposed. And because the imposition is eating at you, you bite back? The exclusion of the society that excludes you?

Something like that. Frederick here is the most sought after item on my menu.

Chilton tries to frown, but manages to curl his upper lip in something like disgust. Will winces, not so much that Hannibal means what he says, but that he said it aloud.

You can appreciate my boredom, can't you Will?

You said if you were ever caught, you had your memory palace.

And all its rooms are filled with you.

Hannibal curls his fingers around the bars to stand as close as he can to Will. Will stares at the fingernails, still remarkably free of grime even here. Hannibal's face looms between the bars at Will. Invisible feathers flutter at Will's back and he tosses his head backward just to make sure there are no wings sticking out of his jacket.

You've given him reason enough to give you a lobotomy. Is that what you want? Will says.

Frederick would never do that. There'd be nothing left to poke, would there, Frederick? I'm not valuable if you take me apart. Besides, I have to be ready to stand trial.

You have to stop dining on the staff. Chilton says. You at least used to cook the meat before eating it.

Are you offering the use of the kitchen? I would think it hardly suitable.

Maybe he should think about using his own paper as part of his defense strategy. That would be a novel approach. Chilton says.

I don't see how that would help. Will says, knowing that is not what Chilton meant. Still no trial date?

Will says looking at his feet as the floor shifts, tiny cracks splintering along the stained cement.

I have been unable to find adequate representation. Will you be testifying against me?

My testimony would hardly benefit the prosecution.

And the defense?

I doubt the defense would know what to do with me either. I'm thinking of pleading the fifth. I'm bleeding with contempt.

A thin smile from Hannibal and an impatient eye roll from Chilton. Will sighs as he looks at Hannibal through the bars.

No one will take the case? Or you don't want a public defender? Will asks.

Too many applicants for the job. Reading through all their resumes can be tiresome. The desire to share in the celebrity is painfully transparent. And then Frederick doesn't help. He tells them all sorts of gruesome stories when they come to interview me. Don't you, Frederick?

Maybe you should stop…dining on the staff, then. Will says, biting his tongue.

Care to join me at the table?

That's not why I came.

Why did you come?

I still have to deal with you and my feelings about you.

Well, Frederick is most possessive of me. He taunts me with promises but he wouldn't have invited you here. Someone must have twisted his arm. Jack?

Yes.

What does he want?

I don't know what Jack wants. It's more about what I want. Rather what I need. I can't remember shooting you. My therapist believes that talking to you will help me remember.

Your therapist sent you here. And Frederick refused. You contacted Jack. Jack strong armed Frederick. What is your therapist like?

He's young. About my age. New to the area.

Interesting that he would send you to me. Trauma often results in memory loss. You may never recall those memories. He should have told you that.

I told him that. Chilton says.

Will turns to stare at Chilton as does Hannibal. Chilton makes a helpless gesture with his hands. He takes a step backward and looks aside for moment before resuming his vigil.

He did. You were there with me. You remember.

With noise and clarity.

Well, I don't.

Remembering or not doesn't change what happened. Why does he think you need to remember?

I think I need to remember. I've been told what happened, but that's not the same thing. As you well know.

You can't recreate it in your imagination?

Recreating the scene hasn't given me my own motive for…

It's not real to you. But, here I stand. Is it that you didn't pull the trigger effectively this time?

It's that I pulled the trigger at all. I remember something different that night. Why would I pick up the gun? What were my intentions?

You have tried to kill me, Will. More than once.

Yes. But, I evolved beyond that.

Hannibal smiles and the feathers flutter at his back, the scrape of a talon along his throat sends another shudder along Will's spine.

What do you see as you look at me now, in this place?

I see regret.

Mine or yours?

I think there's enough for both of us.

You wanted a reckoning. Here it stands. I have lost everything. I have lost you. What do you think?

What happened to you, to us, had to happen. It wasn't…sustainable.

That you are standing here now would seem to refute that assertion.

Hannibal…I remember everything else about that night. Why can't I remember that? Please…help me remember.

Appealing to my better nature? I thought I didn't have one.

I was hoping…

You think remembering will help you do what? Move on? Accept what has changed and what…has been lost? Do you still grieve, Will?

Do you?

The friendship we had is over.

You keep saying that and yet, here we are.

Yes, here we are.

You were supposed to leave

I couldn't leave without you.

You let me shoot you?

I let you follow your instincts. Perhaps you couldn't leave without me?

Will! Chilton's voice cries out in warning from behind Will.

Don't allow your empathy to confuse what you want with what he wants. You're too close to the bars…Will! Damn it. Open the Door! They'll blame me for this, too. Will….

Will realizes he has edged right up to the bars. Hannibal need only slip his hands through to grab his shirt or his hair. Hannibal grabs at his hair. Of course.

We are alone without each other. I would have you with me, to share in what we created together.

Will hears the gasp from Chilton as Hannibal pulls him close so that his lips graze Will's cheek. Will freezes, unsure of what Hannibal might do to him. Despite the fear he feels envelop him like a tight fitting glove he does not move away.

Like a moth to the flame. I am mad.

You need not fear me, Will. I have no desire to hurt you. But, you shouldn't have come…

Hannibal whispers as his fingers hold curls so tightly that Will knows if he tries to wretch away he will lose hair and scalp in a painful ripping of flesh. He doesn't have long to ponder his situation. He feels the shocks of electricity vibrate through Hannibal's body as the Taser presses against his side. Hannibal's fingers tremble and spring open releasing him. The Taser finds Will next.

What? Why?

Will looks up at Chilton as he sinks to the floor. Chilton hands the Taser back to the guard.

I'm afraid your contact with Doctor Lecter has caused you to attack me. Welcome home, Mister Graham.

Will's ribs still sting with sensation as he sits upon a thin mattress on a familiar bed frame facing another chipped sink every cracked detail apparent in the glaring overhead light. He looks down at the gray colored molded tray containing the food just as gray he is supposed to eat. Conversations with Chilton resurface in his memory to mingle with the one he just had.

Your personality disorders, neuroses-- all forgeries.

Even if that were true, I'd still be a psychopath - of some interest.

Mm. Quite a manipulative one at that.

You will be the first and last word in the mind of Will Graham. God, you could dine out on that for years.

And the first and last word on Hannibal. I'm looking at a very comfortable retirement. Well, bon appetite. To both of you…

Will hears the strains of Handel's Musica sull'acqua. He thinks the sound is coming from speakers at first until he sees the talons curl around the edges of his cell. His inferno follows him still. Will sets his tray aside and gets up from his bed.

What just happened?

Will stands at the bars and watches the creature draw itself up to stand before him on the other side. It cocks its head to one side and the black feathers ripple across its face. Lips begin to move from where its beak should be, but isn't. Will's monster is looking more human all the time.

You were testing the boundaries of your fears. You are still tripping. Do you remember the exit word?

Yes…I'm ok.

The thing in his stomach turns sharply and Will winces. He looks over the shoulder of the creature as the damp and musty wall across the corridor is swallowed in flames. The desolate vista of his inferno begins to manifest in the smoke that filters into his cell.

Do you see, Will?

See what?

See the way out of your inferno. You still see good and evil. You believe you belong in that cell. At least you fear you belong in that cell.

Good and evil exist. Right and wrong. Up and down.

Relative to your location. Situational. Negotiable.

Opposites then. Balance. Nature demands balance.

Creation and destruction are balance? Evolution. One species makes way for another. Dominance is not balance.

What is it?

The state of being that emerges above the chaos. Opposites are but adjectives to describe what is and what is not. Good and evil are not opposites, neither are they mutually exclusive. They are concepts.

Concepts of Ideals. I have a concept of good. I have a concept of evil. Just as I have a concept of you.

An imago you cherish and the reality that never fails to fall short.

Love the ideal but accept the flesh?

Acceptance leads to forgiveness. Have you forgiven me, Will?

Is that what you want from me?

I forgave you.

Did you? Doesn't feel like it.

The creature begins to walk away from Will and Will watches the smoke swirl in its wake, its scaly tail twitching behind it. Will looks at the bars separating them, takes a breath and walks through. He leaves Baltimore State Hospital behind to gaze once more at the debris filled terraces that litter the hillside of the ruined terrain. His mouth is dry with the acrid taste of it almost immediately. The air is thick and metallic, almost corrosive if Will breathes too deeply.

The wolf and winged Daniel are perched upon the large boulder where he last saw them. Daniel's one wing droops and Daniel's eyes follow Will's gaze to it. He wriggles it slightly and turns to face Will, and Will thinks the green eyes that stare into his convey such sadness. Will is struck again at how beautiful he looks upon his rock and how out of place that beauty is in this devastated place that seeks to devour his very soul.

Will, the devil is not as black as he is painted. Daniel says.

The wolf jumps off the rock to greet Will. It stands at his side and nudges his leg. Will looks down to see he is wearing dark blue trousers, a shirt and pullover sweater. He hears music…a harpsichord. Will closes his eyes and the music becomes more audible, the notes resonate and pulse in his memory.

It's after dinner; Will holds a tumbler of whiskey warm and fragrant in his hands as he watches Hannibal play. His fingers strike the keys with confidence as Will turns the page of the score that sits before him.

What is this?

This is Scarlatti, Sonata in D minor. Do you like it?

I think my ear prefers the pieces in major chords, but it's…nice. Will says looking out the window at the late afternoon traffic. He glances back at Hannibal and feels the contentment this room always brings. He slips it on and wraps himself in it and he feels safe.

Hannibal stops playing and straightens the score Will had left hanging to one side.

What's bothering you? Hannibal says, closing the lid. Hannibal pats the bench next to him.

Will rolls his eyes and looks into his glass.

I…had a strange dream. I'm not sure if I want to talk to you about it, though.

Does the dream concern me?

Will nods from the window and takes a gulp of the sublimely smooth whiskey shimmering dark amber in the glass he holds tightly in his hands.

Then what do you think? Come. Sit. Please.

Will takes a breath and slides in beside Hannibal. He hesitates. He is enjoying the moment so much he doesn't want to let it go just yet. He feels the touch of Hannibal's knuckles slide across his jaw, a gentle prompt.

Where was my gun when I turned to face you in the kitchen?

Hannibal blinks and almost frowns but he runs his fingers through Will's hair as he thinks a moment.

In your right hand, at your side. You slowly dropped it as you spoke.

Did I let it slip to the floor before or after you cut me?

Before. I held out my hand and you welcomed my embrace. At least for a second or two. Why?

I don't remember picking it up again.

You didn't. Shock. Pain. A lot of it. For both of us.

Mostly me, I think.

Will turns his head slightly so Hannibal's face is squarely in front of him.He lifts his chin waiting for Hannibal to challenge him on that one. Hannibal raises a brow and shrugs.

There are different kinds of pain, but we shall leave that discussion for another time, perhaps. Why the concern about your gun?

Aren't you going to ask which gun it was?

It was the Berretta. Why the concern?

I didn't use it.

Is that a question?

This dream I had. I did. And the dream seemed like it could have happened. But I'm not sure if what I dream are dreams or memories…or…

If what you see and feel is real at any given moment. You are afraid you can't tell the difference between being asleep and awake?

I'm beginning to…be afraid.

And in this dream you shot me…after I cut you? Well, I can assure you that did not happen. I walked out the front door. How does that make you feel, to shoot me?

Well, in the dream, it's after the fact. I didn't kill you. I come to visit you, at Chez Chilton. And I ask you about it because I don't remember.

Why do you think you missed?

I'm not sure what my intentions were. Maybe I hadn't aimed to kill. Maybe my hand slipped from all the blood. Hell of a thing to ask.

But important. Dreams prepare us for waking life. What are you preparing for?

Will is quiet. He doesn't want to tell this Hannibal about hunting for him in Florence.

Yes you do. Yes you do. That's exactly what you should be talking about but never do…

You dropped your gun, Will. Were you anticipating regret? You welcomed my embrace and you did not struggle against the blade. Do you regret your actions in the kitchen?

I regret not anticipating your actions.

So you wouldn't have taken my life. No more fantasies of killing me?

The ache in Will's chest pricks sharp and he winces at Hannibal's words. He lets his head rest on Hannibal's shoulder. Feels arms encircle him. He shakes his head into Hannibal's shoulder.

Are you anticipating regret now, Will? Are you preparing for something with the potential for regret?

The ache grows sharper still and Will lets his head drop to rest against Hannibal's chest. Will feels his chest tighten and he knows tears are about spill. He holds his breath willing that the sting of moisture in his eyes recedes, but it does not. He thinks of the Hannibal in the cell, miserable and filled with spite. So spiteful he colluded with Chilton to keep him there with him.

That is the Hannibal he knows and hates. The one capable of fostering the co-dependency Will allowed in order to keep his seat at their grand chess board of deceit and manipulation. The one who killed Abigail to punish him. The one who had committed unspeakable atrocities as the Ripper.

And there is this Hannibal. The one Will knows from the salon. The one who cradles his head in his arms at this moment.

Do you still intend to take my freedom from me, Will? Put me in a cage?

Will pushes his face deeper into Hannibal's shirt, smells the cologne, the musk, the sandalwood rushing heady and strong and filling him up. He feels fingers in his hair, rifling through the curls to settle warm upon his head. He wants this. He wants. He wants what he cannot have.

Ah, you are faced with the decision once again. You are trying to choose.

I hated you; hate you still for so many things. Will says into Hannibal's sweater.

I know.

The Hannibal I visited was a ghost of you.

Do you still believe you changed me as I changed you?

Will sits up, shakes his head and lets the tears run off. He wipes a hand across his face, catches the moisture impatiently flicking it away. He looks into Hannibal's face.

I know I did.

And you thought a cage would not? Prick us do we not bleed?

Thoughts of Hannibal behind Chilton's bars fill his mind. Chilton would prick Hannibal until he bled so Chilton could reap the recognition and the rewards. Will figures Chilton would pass off Hannibal's observations and work as his own, further pricking his prize patient. But Hannibal has pricked Will, too.

You have taken things from me and I have…hated you for it. You gutted me with a knife so sharp it felt like ice going through me. And I hate you for that, too.

You think your betrayal did not wound?

I know it did.

What have I taken from you that you were not willing to give, Will?

Like Achilles gave his armor to Patroclus, let him go into battle alone? He lost Patroclus to Hector over his pride.

Hubris, Will. At the heart of every Greek tragedy.

And your heart as well?

The painting of Leda and the Swan in dining room. Why do you think I hang it there?

The association of sex with food. An expression of carnality to accompany the eating of human flesh, literally and figuratively at your table. A massive joke on your dinner guests. The ones being served and the ones…being served.

A joke you shared many times. But knowing me as well as you do, you know there is another more subtle and perhaps significant association I make . Do you know the myth of Leda and the swan?

I do. The Swan is Zeus and Leda was a mortal he pursued and raped.

And if I told you that there is an analogy to be drawn between Zeus and Leda and you and I, what would you think?

I would think that I am not the swan.

Will reaches for his tumbler and takes a gulp, licks his lips as he gazes at Hannibal. He feels the warmth of the whiskey slide down his throat and he observes Hannibal's eyes drift there as he swallows. He smiles slowly. Hannibal lifts his eyes and his lips peel back slightly so Will can see his teeth.

No, you're not. But, not because of the sexual associations. Well, not entirely. Think on that while I show you something else.

Hannibal walks across the room to the far wall where there hangs a cluster of pictures Will has seen many times. They all contain scenes of anguish or death, a theme that runs strong in Hannibal's art selections.

What do you see?

I see…Judas betraying Christ.

Will gives Hannibal a hard look to which Hannibal cracks an almost imperceptible smile. Will looks back to the prints.

I see um…is this Cain and Abel?

It is. The others are less recognizable. This would be Antenor, the betrayer of Troy. And this one is the death of the sons of Simon Maccabaeus. What does the arrangement suggest to you?

Will looks intently at the prints housed in the handsome antique wood frames. The one of Christ and Judas is a Caravaggio, one of Hannibal's favorite artists, but the rest are from other centuries. He thinks of the stories and what they have in common. Hannibal has arranged them in a circle.

You left out the painting in the middle. What is that? Allegorical I suppose? The men in armor and the classical nude woman in the middle is an allusion to…something epic I'm sure.

The one in the middle is by William Hogarth. It is entitled, Satan, Death, and Sin. Do you recognize what it is from?

Not at the moment, but I will.

I have great confidence in you Will. I always have. Have you finished your drink?

Uh, yes.

Another?

Any more pictures you'd like to show me?

I always have more, but none I need to show you at the moment.

Then I don't want another drink. Will grins at Hannibal from beneath his brows, eyes looking upward at him in the way Will knows he adores, but won't admit.

Will feels so hot at the moment he can hardly stand it. Hannibal stands beside him emanating the same heat from beneath the sweater that hangs off one shoulder a little because Will had stretched it out one evening helping Hannibal out of it, too quickly for Hannibal, but not quickly enough for Will. Will lowers his eyes as he nuzzles his head against Hannibal's shoulder. Waits for the hitch of breath he knows will come.

It does. Hannibal nudges him back. Will stands leaning against Hannibal, inhaling the smell of him, imagining every contour of the body he knows languishes beneath the soft cashmere and twill. He imagines Hannibal's mouth around his cock and his teeth, pricking him sharply, painfully, and exquisitely along his thighs and between his legs.

Will licks his lips imagining wrapping them around Hannibal's swollen cock, wet and warm, that luscious ripple that comes from the sucking and he feels a warm hand slide along his stomach, lift his shirt and ease its way down his boxers.

Will's turn to catch his breath. Hannibal.

Upstairs? Hannibal nods at the Greek amphora that sits atop the bookcase.

Another match?

Why not?

Will follows Hannibal out of the salon, through the kitchen, and up the back stairs turning off the lights as they go. Will can feel his heart beating in his chest as he climbs the stairs and imagines he feels Hannibal's thumping in time with his.

You are alone because you are unique.

I'm as alone as you are.

You're not alone, Will. I'm standing right beside you.

Will knows his association - his relationship with Hannibal has brought forth an indescribable evil within him. Will accepts that he invited it. He invited it the moment he started working for the FBI. Hannibal has followed his nature. He forced Will to acknowledge his. Evil begets evil. Good begets good. Will thinks that if he continues to see his universe like that, he will never get out of his inferno.

He glances at Hannibal on the other side of the bed, their bed, as he pulls off his sweater, folds the sleeves and folds the sweater in half and half again to set beside him as his fingers pluck next at the buttons of his shirt. He wonders how he can hate him and love him at the same time. As he watches Hannibal continue to undress, he decides he does not care…at this particular moment.

Chapter End Notes

My sincere apologies that the crazy psychopath sex must be postponed. I could post it sloppy and quick but I prefer to post sloppy and slow. The co-axel went on my front end (of my car) Friday at work. And...I left my cell phone at home. I was HOURS waiting for a tow Friday night and spent Saturday getting it repaired. So, I think I absorbed enough Friday the 13th bad luck for everybody! Will post asap or next weekend. I know I what I said...but stuff happens.

Chapter 57

Chapter Summary

Will’s hallucinogen filled trip takes him back to the Baltimore State Hospital for the Criminally Insane after Daniel gets his crazy psychopath sex. Hannibal has received some intel on Will from Roberta just in time to send invitations. Bedelia gives Hannibal a call about the roses.

Will turns to the paralyzed Chilton. Chilton’s mouth moves but no words will come out. Movement registers in Will’s periphery. He swings and smashes the Taser into the side of the guard’s head shattering bone. Blood seeps from the man’s skull, dampening cropped hair in a sea of red to drip profusely onto his light blue collar.

Will watches him sink to the floor. He drops the ruined Taser thinking that he used the Taser rather effectively.

Handcuffs. He repeats to Chilton.

Daniel lies pinned beneath Will who looms over him, open mouthed and panting. He dips his head to look into Daniel's face, arms pressing Daniel's shoulders into the mattress with crushing ferocity.

Daniel holds up two fingers the way Will had showed him. Will grins, practically snarling and kisses him full on the mouth.

"That's three." Will says triumphantly, thumbs digging into sore shoulders sharply in case there was any doubt.

"I can count*."* Daniel returns between gasps of air.

Daniel does not wrestle. He has never wrestled until now. And his crash course in the sport has left him with a profound appreciation for the athleticism it requires. He reminds himself that winning one round with Will was lucky. He's not sure Will has heard any of his actual comments or if Will is responding to his own inner dialogue. Will seems to be reacting to him physically in real time, but Daniel is certain he is hearing only half a conversation he is not party to. There has not been much conversation between the gasps and grunts. Will's imagination continues to astound.

Daniel knows what three pins means. So does Will. The anticipation twists in every limb, every sinuous movement in the tip of his tongue as it curls over teeth and lips into Daniel's open mouth. Will is breathless with desire and need. Daniel can feel the longing in the way his mouth clings to Daniel's afraid to let his lips wander too far. Will's hands have moved from Daniel's shoulders to cradle Daniel's face so that every breath between them is shared and seamless.

The longing is not limited to the aching in Daniel's chest. Already bathed in sweat from the match, Daniel slides easily beneath Will's taut body, to and fro, the friction becoming unbearable and yet Daniel wants more, to be madly unbearably thick and hard with the torture of it. He can't press his body against Will enough and remembers he is feeling Will's feelings mingling with his own.

Will can't get close enough either. He's not even coming up for air as he grabs handfuls of hair and sucking on Daniel's tongue with such abandon Daniel thinks he might pull it loose. He manages to wrest away only to feel teeth drag along his throat from ear to front, lips trembling over his jugular savoring the pulse before sinking teeth into flesh, not to break but to bruise.

Daniel squirms. The bite is much harder than Will's usual nibbling, and the urgency is much more, well, urgent. He grabs at the damp curls in the back of Will's head and draws him back a little. He finds himself at the mercy of strong biceps as fingers fervently contract around his throat to press against his windpipe as Will shakes his head at him. Daniel quickly relaxes his grip of Will's hair and Will's grip on his throat loosens, a little. Will's delicious mouth curls up in a friendly warning. Or invitation. Daniel can't decide which.

"Will?"

The mouth cups his jaw and teeth pluck at the tender skin beneath clear down to collarbone, a favorite spot frequently targeted and the angry bruise flares with each pinch of Will's teeth. The tortuous torment of the teeth tugging at his flesh rivals the throbbing between his legs as Will grinds him into the mattress, skin soaked to bone with sweat it is so hot in the room.

Teeth scrape along his skin, and Daniel moans softly as Will drags his tongue to a nipple. He bites. Hard. The clamping of teeth on the tender nub sends Daniel off the pillow, but Will's hand remains clenched at his throat, and he doesn't even look up.

"Will!"

Daniel wriggles and grabs at Will's sweaty fingers trying to pry them off, and he immediately feels the tightening of Will's grip around his larynx. He removes his hand to cradle Will's head instead as his fingers ruffle damp locks. Another bite, and another and Daniel begins to acclimate to the pain and lifts from the bed to press his chest against Will's mouth, the twisting of flesh sending pulses of pleasure straight to his cock.

Daniel understands Will thinks he is with Hannibal and he expected that any sex they might have would reflect that but the pang of jealousy he feels won't go away. It gnaws at him like the scraping of Will's teeth along his throat and collarbone. Knowing that Will isn't really seeing him hurts. He has been feeling Will's emotions throughout his experience and there is no doubt in Daniel's mind that his therapy has indeed helped Will knock down some forts and examine his associations and inspirations for what they truly are.

This is not the Will he knows in this bed with him. Will's inner demon has been released in another bed and he is not holding back for Daniel, because Daniel isn't here with him right now. Daniel is seeing what only one other person has ever seen in Will. The demon laughs in his ear and laps at the lobes before delivering another body shuddering bite. Will's hips grind against him, his cock rubbing rigid along his.

"Ow!" Daniel cries out. "You damned near ripped my ear off. Stop it."

Will pays him no attention whatsoever.

“Will?” Daniel tugs at his hair. “Hey! Christ…how deep did you go?” Daniel mutters.

Will pushes off and places his hands on either side of Daniel’s shoulders to rest flat upon the bed. He looks down into Daniel’s face and his eyes are dark and appraising as he angles his head to one side.

“Petulance is unbecoming, Will. Especially when you enjoy losing so much.”

Daniel blinks as he realizes that at some point during the wrestling match, Will shifted his perspective…to Hannibal. Daniel is Will. Though he is Will physically, Will is still playing both parts in his head. Daniel is merely the warm body bridging their conversation and this intimate encounter. Daniel tells himself Will survived his intimate encounters with Hannibal. At least the ones in bed.

Daniel marvels he feels excited and fearful at the same time. Perhaps Will always did…does, too. Daniel can’t be sure of his emotions. There are far too many emotions in the mix.

As he stares into Will’s face, he can see the subtle change. There is an arrogance there that is not Will. And mingling with the longing and need lurks a prideful possessiveness apparent in the way Will gazes at him. Daniel has never felt so exposed or vulnerable as he does in this moment. And that too is deliciously exciting.

“Fuck…I hope I don’t regret this.” Daniel mutters as he twists up off the mattress.

He doesn’t twist far before he is pressed back down into the mattress.

Daniel stares into pale blue eyes that aren’t seeing him at all. Daniel cannot imagine what it is like to stare at yourself because that must be who Will is seeing in his hallucination. Will drags his lips up Daniel’s throat, open mouthed kisses along his jaw until he feels hot breath in his hair. Will’s thick curls hang in his face and Will’s fingers wind around Daniel’s own limp curls holding them taut against his scalp.

“I never take from you more than you are willing to give, Will.”

Will releases Daniel and begins to nip along his chest, chewing nipples and skin on the graze down sending tingles like volts of electricity. Daniel’s entire body is alight with sensation in the close and humid bedroom, the air saturated with the smell of sweat and the thick musk of desire.

The mass of curls brushes softly over his stomach as Will’s hands move along his thighs pushing them apart, thumbs grinding wickedly into the muscle of his inner thighs clear up to his balls.

“Mine…” Will mumbles between nibbles of flesh.

Daniel throws his head back into the recesses of the pillow and arches up from the mattress, fingers searching along the sheet for enough fabric to steady him. He whines into the pillow unable to help himself as tongue and teeth tease the length of his cock with excruciatingly slow precision. He sucks in air with the touch of moistened tongue on the tip and his fingers clench at warm and wrinkled sheets as Will begins to suck, drawing him in little by little.

Daniel thinks he might lose his mind, the emotions are so raw between them he feels like his skin has been peeled back exposing sensitive tissue and enflamed nerves. He knows his own feelings are compounded by Will’s and Will’s emotions are in turmoil jacked up with drugs and memories.

Daniel groans with pleasure as his cock hits the back of Will's throat and he thinks this is Will's brain on steroids. He could use their exit word and bring Will out of the trance. He could have Will here with him for the rest of his trip. But Daniel knows he won't. Daniel doesn't dare miss this. He is about to be eaten alive by Hannibal Lecter.

The taste of salt and metal prickles on his tongue as Will licks the blood from the corner of his mouth. The blood continues to trickle from his swollen lips stretched too tightly, lips he has let slip from around Hannibal's cock in order to soothe the tiny split and he is roused from his momentary lapse of attention with a jerk to his scalp, jarring his fraught senses. Hannibal's fingers twist around his hair to guide his head back down. Will shudders at the nudge to the back of this throat.

Hannibal moans softly between clenched teeth as he rocks his hips against Will's bobbing head. At the moment, there is nothing as soft or pliable as Will's mouth when it hangs slack like this. Hannibal had pleasured Will earlier, teasing himself with the taste of musk and sweat and the sensation of Will's hardened flesh twitching along his tongue and throat, delicious and alive. He left Will unsatisfied and the simple tap of his thumb upon Will's chin had sent Will to his knees, fingers carefully peeling back foreskin to caress the flaming bulb of flesh with moist lips as gently as he would his own.

Hannibal had fairly swooned in pleasure as Will had swallowed the length of him, eyes closed in concentration, damp curls plastered about his head. Will's hands remain on Hannibal's thighs and Hannibal relishes every flex of Will's fingers as they contract, a veritable vice that holds him in place while Hannibal assaults his mouth. Will's cock arches rigid from between his legs, and Hannibal knows Will is painfully aware of the throbbing, is taking pleasure from the tension that builds in the absence of touch.

Hannibal takes a few more indulgent stabs before pulling away allowing the tender exposed tip of his cock to graze deliciously along the edges of Will's teeth. He holds Will's head up as pale blue eyes widen into focus and his tongue flicks along blood stained lips. He watches Will swallow, a sensuous ripple of movement along his throat that Hannibal never tires of watching.

Will smacks his lips, enjoying the searing soreness that pressing them together brings. He parts his lips to meet Hannibal's as the fingers still entwined in his hair tug his head back. Hannibal's tongue finds the tiny cut. Will flinches as it opens further to the roll of tongue and teeth as Hannibal sucks at the wound until Will feels nothing but the throbbing of his cock.

Satisfied, Hannibal pushes a couple fingers into Will's mouth, slowly until both fingers are glazed with saliva. As he pulls his fingers free from Will's bruised and swollen mouth Will lifts his eyes. The gleam of the predator flickers behind the blue as Will wipes a hand across his mouth and grins savagely. Hannibal licks his fingers.

Bed. Bottom up.

It's about time…

Will rises from the rug, and climbs onto the plush bed of soft satin that smells of the spiced leather and sandalwood he remembers. He reclines in the center, resting on his knees body coiled and then slowly stretches his arms taut and luxuriates in the sensation of the silky fabric gliding over his skin as he settles upon the mattress. He has missed this. He hates that he misses it…Hannibal. Will concentrates on the way the satin sends his nerves on edge and the tip of his cock on fire.

Hannibal is an unapologetic sensualist, ever seeking to indulge all his senses simultaneously and as provocative as smell and touch and…taste can be, with Will it is the visual Hannibal finds most stimulating. Hannibal strokes his cock already a rock in his hands as he watches Will draw his knees under his body. He watches the naked predator beneath him surrender to his urges stretching his arms out toward the headboard so that every muscle along his body is accentuated in the firelight. Will turns his head to the side baring teeth as he waits, drawing deep even breaths.

This is the Will Hannibal desires and dreams of. This is the Will that Will keeps locked up but he handed the key to Hannibal and he can no longer pretend the door is closed. The doors to Will's mind have been flung wide and the sensations wracking his body confuse and titillate, leaving him open to associations that flood his consciousness as he assumes the alternating perspectives of himself and Hannibal.

He knows it's the hallucinogens wreaking havoc and he is helpless to control the effects. Scarlatti echoes maddeningly in his ears as he inhales the fragrance of the linens, aware of light and shadow dancing across the walls from the fire that crackles and pops. The weight on top shifts and he feels warm breath in his hair as the manicured fingers he knows so well slip between his open lips.

Hannibal pushes his fingers deep into Will's waiting mouth past the teeth to press down upon his wagging tongue. Sufficiently moistened, he withdraws and teases the pucker of flesh between the glorious twin cheeks of flesh and muscle at his fingertips. He slicks his cock with lube and applies a generous helping to Will reveling in the soft groans he hears muffled in the pillow.

I hate you for this.

I know.

Hannibal's fingers curl and twist inside as muscle clenches hot and tremulous around them.

And yet you do not give voice to the other emotions that burn.

It is…the dominant emotion.

Will grunts and moves with Hannibal's twisting. The thing in his stomach coils as feathers ruffle, and Will turns his head around to see the creature seated in one of the chairs by the fireplace behind Hannibal's head. He sighs, buries his head in the pillow and squirms further into the mattress as fingers widen and wriggle within.

Is it? Or is it the one you find most useful? All your associations of me are awash in it.

Hannibal opens his fingers wide eliciting the desired gasp from the pillow.

And does that wound?

Will hisses, the words lost in another gasp.

It motivates. I hoped you would embrace your nature.

I hate you for making me want…this. Wanting it… with you.

Hannibal withdraws his hand, caressing smooth skin as Will's body shifts, lifts higher to follow the movement, like metal to magnet. Hannibal bends over Will who stretches his arms to press hands against the headboard as Hannibal lowers his body to rest again along his back, stiff cock prodding the crack of his ass. He runs his hands over Will's flesh, licks at the beads of perspiration along tense shoulders.

Hate is proportional to the action that prompted it. Hate motivates us to action or reaction. Your hate combined with anger compelled you to try and kill me.

His tongue laps at Will's neck drawing another audible hiss.

Have you determined which emotion stopped you?

I suppose the same emotion that draws me to this bed, again and again.

Is this bed your inferno, Will?

This is your design…for me.

A design for us. A design you helped create. You are the architect and yet you will not see the beauty of your own design.

The penetration is sweet as always. Will never disappoints. Hannibal pummels soft giving flesh, heady with the aromas of sex and sweat, flush with the spoils of surrender writhing beneath him. The strokes are long, the thrusts powerful and the moans from Will excite Hannibal to thrust more deeply so they rock as one upon the mattress.

So slick. So tight. The pressure builds, unbearable this addiction to him, to Will, his precious infuriating Will. Insufferable that Hannibal could give up so much…for a lie. Hannibal slams Will hard into the mattress and it feels like he is ripping him apart. He pays no attention to the cries muffled in the pillow, takes no notice of teeth tearing at sheets as he relentlessly assaults the flesh he both loves and hates for the weakness it exploits within.

I believed you…

Will's sob erupts with Hannibal's release that gushes hot from tortured flesh and Hannibal collapses nearly numb with pleasure, as his cock slips out the very air sends him to shuddering as sticky sweet trails follow to score along cheeks still quivering from the tumultuous pounding of a moment ago.

And you punish me still. Will whines from the pillow.

You…wanted this. Hannibal pants, breath still coming in gasps.

Will draw his legs up, hands wrapped around his own cock, threads of white drip through trembling fingers as his body trembles and shudders against Hannibal's. Hannibal looks down upon the bruised lips and tightly shut eyes, lashes as wet as the curls framing the face Hannibal loves so much. Whether twisted in agony or pleasure, Will's face is beautiful, a work of art Hannibal is compelled to recreate over and over again in the countless charcoals he draws. His way of keeping the thing he loves close.

Hannibal slides along the rumpled sheets to rest at Will's side. He grasps shoulders that resist his efforts to turn toward him. Will flops onto his back, unwilling to lie on his side to face Hannibal, unable to look into his eyes just yet. He looks up at the ceiling instead, wetting his lips as his mind absorbs and assimilates a fretful frown cutting deep creases into his otherwise perfect features.

I hate what I've become. I hate what you did to me. And I hate that I let you do it.

Will ignores the rustling of feathers in front of the fireplace. He listens to the crackling of the fire and the sounds of Chopin…some prelude he can't recall…relying on the familiar to soothe his frayed nerves.

Did Adam hate God?

Your conceit knows no bounds, Hannibal. Will's lips curl in contempt.

Will's curiosity overrules the disdain, however. His body at rest, his nerves calm and his urges sated, he feels more like himself and he is fully aware of how relative his feelings are at any given moment. Relatively speaking, he feels more like himself than he feels like Hannibal. His imagination has returned him to himself and he is no longer looking at himself upon the bed through Hannibal's eyes, an experience he does not want to repeat anytime soon. He turns his thoughts back to Hannibal's question. His question. He laughs at himself for waiting for Hannibal's answer. His answer. Will thinks there is no litmus test for how crazy he is.

He turns in the bed, kicking at satin to stare into Hannibal's' face, to run his fingers through silky strands of ash blonde hair that fall over one brow. Hannibal's eyes narrow slightly at the touch and something like a purr rumbles in his throat.

Why would Adam hate God? Will asks. For punishing him?

For creating him.

For creating him? You infer that I blame you for creating me?

Don't you?

I take my share of the blame.

Blame. A curious choice of a word to assign to Fate. Did Adam blame God for creating the circumstances that precipitated his fall?

The tree of life and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. Back to this old chestnut of ours.

The discussion is a salient one. Considering that you've condemned yourself to your inferno. Did Adam hate God?

Well, he didn't thank him.

Didn't he? The bible would have us believe that man has worshipped God ever since. Imagine, thanking God for sentencing all of mankind to mortality.

As if Adam had a choice. That was God's design, Hannibal.

Adam had choices because God left him choices in that garden. Imagine he had made a different choice. The bible relates a narrative to promulgate an entire belief system, but there is an entirely different belief when one considers the alternative.

Adam could have resisted the temptation to taste the apple.

Yes. Suppose he had taken an apple from the other tree?

Hannibal's knuckles caress his cheek and Will knows his fingers will be twisting in his hair soon enough. Will wants him to. He hates that he wants…

Both trees and their fruit were forbidden. Eating from either would have resulted in God's punishment. Will says, wiping the sweat from his forehead.

But only one of them would have resulted in achieving a state of being immune to God's punishment. An act of hubris God could neither condone nor punish.

Eating of the tree of life would have made Adam immortal, Will pauses, Like God.

Perhaps God was testing his Adam. Adam chose Eve and mortality rather than become more like God. The Judeo-Christian adoption of pagan myth.

To avoid the sin of hubris. And I suppose God was saddened by Adam's choice? Will says.

Will can't help the smile that twists on his lips. Hannibal is so transparent. Hannibal presses a finger into Will's collarbone, waits for the grimace and slides the finger down along his sternum until it rests above his heart.

You think God did not weep for Adam? To be parted from him, no longer able to walk in the garden with him, their contact reduced to a pale imitation of what it once was – lips moving in prayer in a vain attempt to feel…intimacy.

You continue to equate yourself with God. Will says.

Hannibal smiles patiently as he twirls damp curls between his fingers.

God is an ideal. A concept. I have a concept of God as I have a concept of good and evil, and of you.

So, Adam ate from the wrong tree. God had hoped… Will pauses for emphasis, …that Adam would disobey and partake from the tree of life to join God in divine bliss?

If God created Adam in his own image, then God could not help but love that image, that ideal, and placed those choices before his creation to see what he would do.

Have I partaken of the wrong tree? The FBI becomes the serpent in your analogy?

Does it? Perhaps the FBI is Eve in the garden. Why are you in Florence, Will?

To correct a mistake. Your ideal of me is…inaccurate. You can't reduce me to set of influences, even your own. I'm not the product of anything.

I you cannot be reduced, then neither can I. But, your ideals can be reduced to a set of influences rooted in religion. Roots that hold you fast in the soil of limitation.

Right and wrong, good and evil are necessary in the world outside the garden. Will says.

They are concepts. Religion is a means to control the environment, control society. It enhances survival in the face of natural selection.

That's a reductionist view, don't you think? To reduce religion to a means of survival? To something as simple as survival in numbers.

Conformity breeds contempt for the non-conformist.

I selected myself for exclusion, I know. And I knowingly ate the forbidden fruit. It has destroyed me.

It destroyed a part of you so you could be reborn.

Now you play the role of Shiva, my destroyer and my creator?

Didn't you destroy yourself, piece by piece? Jack offered you a way out, more than once, and you refused each time.

I was saving lives.

Then you can't whine about losing your own. Or blame me for what you replaced those missing pieces with.

Will looks away from Hannibal and lets his gaze wander up and long the walls. Hannibal's Japanese prints surround the headboard but Will's gaze is drawn to the print of the samurai embattled with the Tengu. He sits up on his elbow to have a better look.

Ah, the Tengu. Hannibal says, glancing behind him, I suppose the FBI have the little statue now. I would have kept us safe, Will. You should have trusted me.

You took my trust and abused it, as you abused me.

Will feels the familiar movement beneath the scar along his stomach. Hannibal uncurls his fingers from his hair and drops his hand to rest on the wound. Will watches blood ooze and drip from Hannibal's fingers.

I took nothing from you that you weren't prepared to give, Will.

As Will stares at Hannibal's blood soaked fingers he feels a trickling along his lips. He wipes a finger across his wet lips to find them smeared with fresh blood, dark and red along his finger. He licks at the corners, the taint of iron rust strong upon his tongue and he swallows it down, pressing a hand against his mouth.

Beware of limitations, Will.

Hannibal raises a blood stained hand to caress his face and Will feels the scraping of talons across his skin. Will smells the acrid pungent odor and it permeates the room as the fire blazes and the music swells. Blood. It seems Will has been swimming in it interminably. Blood. The elixir of life. No wonder it tastes so bitter.

Will lifts a trembling hand to cover Hannibal's. Hannibal looks into Will's upturned face, a rueful smile upon his lips where a dark pool of red gathers at one corner to spill down his chin. His teeth and tongue are stained with blood as well. The entire bed is now drenched, their bodies entwined in blood, breath and heat beneath the soiled sheets.

Anticipating regret impacts decisions and clouds perspective. You would still put me in a cage?

The anticipation of being filled with regret for locking up the monster?

You are riddled with regret. Your experience at Baltimore State Hospital with me is an extension of your inferno. You are anticipating regret as you prepare to meet me again.

I regret that I want…what I cannot have. That I can only have it…have you like this.

Like Adam? Your fantasies approximate a prayer, Will. You can have whichever tree you want; you have only to reach up and grab the fruit.

Will closes his eyes to the taste of blood as Hannibal's lips press against his, and the blood lingers upon his tongue deliciously tart like an apple and almost as sweet.

Will starts from his bed and the metal frame quakes and squeaks as he rolls to his side to sit up. He stares at the dank stone of his cell. He is in Baltimore State Hospital. He glances at his clothes and sighs at the sight of the familiar gray jumpsuit. He rolls his tongue over teeth glazed from sleep and attempts to moisten dry lips. He decides he needs a drink of water and hangs his head over the sink, turns on the faucet.

Bad dreams, Will?

Hannibal's voice comes muffled from beyond the wall of the adjacent cell. Will finishes his drink, shuts off the water. He knows Chilton records every conversation. Hannibal knows it, too. The question is deliberate, designed to introduce a specific train of thought. Will will have to play along to find out what it is exactly that Hannibal wants to communicate.

I was dreaming of you. Is that a good dream or a bad dream? Will says to the wall that separates them.

Still a tease. Does your inner voice haunt you today?

I hear you less and less. Will says to the Hannibal in the cell and closes his eyes. He is only lying to himself.

That breach of individual separateness remains.

I'm working on that.

I imagine it's easier for you to believe that I'm responsible for you being here than it is to accept that you are.

Plenty of responsibility to go around.

And regret.

And regret.

The door buzzes and clicks and the sound of shoes upon cement and the squeak of wheels in need of oil announce the arrival of breakfast. An orderly rolls the cart up to Will's cell. Will smells sausage and eggs and his stomach turns somersaults. He takes the tray anyway and decides he can manage the eggs and biscuit. The orange juice is actually cold. Will is surprised Hannibal takes his tray as well. At least Will assumes he did. The orderly isn't ducking.

The orderly leaves them to eat in silence. He'll come for the trays later. Will thinks of his inferno and puzzles why his trip brought him back here. His dreams are preparing him for waking life. Will wonders if he can still tell the difference.

You meet with your therapist today? Hannibal says.

Hopefully. Will says.

Will hears another familiar buzz and click of the door. He listens to the footsteps and decides it must be Chilton. He stands in the middle of the cell and waits.

Good morning, Will.

Frederick. What brings you down here this morning?

I bring tidings of great joy. Your psychiatrist, your…other psychiatrist will be here at nine. You'll have twenty minutes in the cage with him.

A whole twenty minutes?

Hmmmm. Yes. I can make if fifteen.

Twenty will be plenty. Anything else on the agenda?

For you, no.

You can't keep me here, Frederick.

We'll see. Unfortunately, the fact that your own therapist sent you to Lecter in hopes of jogging your memory suggests a certain desperation.

Did he tell you I was desperate?

His actions make him look desperate. At least it will be construed that way at the preliminary hearing. I'm confident that there is enough evidence for the Grand Jury to indict.

Indict me on your word? And Hannibal's? Will almost laughs aloud.

And the guards who used the Taser on you.

You used the Taser on me.

I don't remember it that way.

That's a lot of palm greasing, Frederick. Taking quite an advance on your retirement fund, aren't you?

Trying to figure out the divergence in your pathologies poses quite the challenge.

Nice to know you are assuming there is a divergence.

Two intelligent psychopaths. One with heightened empathy and the other…completely bereft of the ability. In fact, I'm writing a paper right now…

Don't bore our poor Will so early in the morning, Frederick.

Good morning, Hannibal.

Chilton walks out a ways from Will and over so he can stand in front of Hannibal's cell. He stands several feet away from the bars and Will can't help but bite at his lower lip. Not even Hannibal can reach that far.

Be grateful boredom is all you are subjected to. If you could behave you could have some of your things returned and I wouldn't have to medicate you so much.

Perhaps if I pay enough attention to you Frederick, you might become interesting. But I doubt it. A census taker once tried to test me. I ate his liver with some fava beans…and an exquisite chianti.

Hannibal sucks in his breath and Will can see Chilton's horrified expression as he hears Hannibal smack his lips as though slurping up sauce from his plate.

Your sense of humor has not improved, Hannibal. Chilton says, straightening his tie. In fact, it leaves a lot to be desired.

Your tongue is still very feisty, Frederick.

Hannibal's words have the desired effect. Chilton's eyes widen and his mouth, half of it, falls open.

Frederick, Will says in hopes of drawing Frederick back to his cell.

Hannibal has never eaten or killed any census takers as far as Will knows. The census taker is an imaginary composite Hannibal uses when making a joke…or sending a message. Will needs time to think.

I hope you're not going to regale me with stories of cannibalism…

You think we're so alike. Is that why you colluded with Hannibal to trap me here? He gets a neighbor and you get your psychopath duet?

Not just any neighbor. The object of his obsession. And I get to pick both your brains. Hannibal is an opportunist, you know that.

And you're not.

I am the keeper of the keys and I'll be keeping them for the foreseeable future. You are in my kingdom now.

Beware the Ides of March. Hannibal says as Will watches fingers curl around the bars.

The fingers become smothered in black feathers and talons now grip the steel. Will looks back to Chilton.

Chilton tosses his head and sighs. Doctor Clayton will be arriving soon. I'll be there for the visit. Chilton turns to leave.

Don't you record conversations anymore? Will says to Chilton's back. Will listens to the buzzer.

He'll run back to his office to listen. One would think us his only patients. Hannibal says. So predictable, our Frederick.

Will considers the concept of predictability. Hannibal is also predictable, at least his habits and routines are. Or would be if he weren't medicated. Hannibal's census taker nags at the back of Will's mind.

Not much time before your visitor, Will. What do you see?

I see the ninth circle of hell does not include Caesar. Et tu, Brute?

Et tu, Cassius?

Will can imagine the smile on Hannibal's face on the other side of the wall.

Misery loves company. Will says.

The greater part of misery - or happiness - depends not so much on disposition but circumstances.

Will blinks and finds himself in the mezzanine staring out at Chilton and the winged Daniel from his seat within the claustrophobic cage. Daniel's right wing still droops and Will feels badly about that. Daniel flaps his pearly white wings slightly and the green eyes crease as he smiles a gentle smile. Of course, Daniel feels Will's regret. Will hears the sound of scraping echo within the cavernous mezzanine.

Will glances down either end of the mezzanine He sees the serpent's tail of the creature twitching along the steps at the far end and Will's eyes follow the scaly tail to find the black feathered creature perched upon the stairs watching them from the shadows.

The devil is not as dark as he appears, Will. Winged Daniel says.

All that we see or seem is but a dream within a dream. Will says.

Dreams prepare us for waking life.

Time's up. Chilton says, looking at the winged Daniel. Your imagination continues to astound. He looks like you.

Will ignores Chilton's remarks in favor of asking a question. What kind of medication is Hannibal on?

Trying to anticipate what's on the menu for you? A monoamine oxidase inhibitor. I'm using it to treat…

I know what it's for. You've diagnosed him with generalized depression from being locked up. You're trying to treat his anxiety and depression with it because other anti-depressants aren't working. It's the closest thing to a sedative you can give him without it actually being a sedative.

Your understanding of psychiatry is impressive. The MAOI he's getting is the only thing that appears to have an effect on him.

Will nods lost in thought as he allows the orderly to cuff him for the walk back to his cell. Chilton follows close behind. Associations come quickly and Will realizes Hannibal is not taking his medication. Will thinks it likely he never has. He pretends to take it, or can detect which food Chilton puts it in. Hannibal's pretend meal of the census taker contains the three foods that block the effects of MAOIs. Hannibal has, in fact, been performing for Frederick since he arrived.

The way any animal thinks depends on limitations of mind and body. If we learn our limitations too soon, we never learn our power…

Hannibal has enjoyed indulging his more primal instincts, but Brutus has been conning Caesar in order to bring Cassius to the forum. Will glances at the guard next to him and figures they have about half a minute before they arrive at the doors to the hall leading to his cell, and Hannibal's.

You're applying yourself to my perspective. As I've been applying myself to yours.

The control booth is located right next to the door. Will thinks the architect of that design might find himself out of a job after this.

Anticipating regret commonly results in dubious decisions. You must adapt your behavior to avoid feeling the same way again, Will.

Will takes a deep controlled breath and exhales slowly, closing his eyes as he pictures the layout of the control room and cells. As they approach the control room and doors, Will turns, bends low and quickly pops his left thumb dislocating it successfully from behind. It hurts like hell but he manages to slip off the one cuff. He sees Chilton and the orderly turn but not quickly enough.

Will pushes the orderly through the open doorway leading to the control room. The guard springs from his chair and reaches for his Taser.

Will uses the stunned orderly as shield and weapon. He shoves the orderly into the guard, effectively immobilizing him momentarily. The guard fumbles against the control panel, losing his grip on the Taser as his hands reach out to grab anything to break his fall. Will slams the confused orderly to the floor. He spies the Taser near the doorway.

Will twists and stoops to pick up the Taser from the floor. The guard moves to rush him. Will shakes his head at him. He points the Taser at the guard and the guard freezes. Will watches his eyes shift between him, the orderly, and Chilton who stands behind Will, useless as ever.

He already has the orderly on the floor, his shoes grind against his throat prepared to crush the fragile trachea that lies beneath. Muscles quiver to the pressure of Will's foot. The guard hesitates, unsure of himself as he tries to calculate which actions will result in the least injury. Or continued employment.

Will turns his head toward Chilton not taking his eyes off the guard.

Keys for the handcuffs. Will says.

The guard takes a step closer reaching for the keys that dangle from his belt.

Not you. Him.

Will turns to the paralyzed Chilton. Chilton's mouth moves but no words will come out. Movement registers in Will's periphery. He swings and smashes the Taser into the side of the guard's head shattering bone. Blood seeps from the man's skull, dampening cropped hair in a sea of red to drip profusely onto his light blue collar.

Will watches him sink to the floor. He drops the ruined Taser thinking that he used the Taser rather effectively.

Handcuffs. He repeats to Chilton.

Chilton scrambles to the floor to wrest the keys from the belt of the terrified orderly still pinned beneath Will's foot.

Take the keys from the guard, Frederick.

Oh my God. Oh my God. Chilton says, fingers shaking so badly he can barely remove the keys. He stands up finally with keys in hand. Will turns slightly so Chilton can unlock the cuffs foot still poised on top of the orderly's neck.

What…are you going to do? Chilton asks as Will lets the cuffs fall to land beside the orderly.

Before he can kick them away, Will feels movement beneath his foot unbalance him and the orderly wriggles out, grabbing the handcuffs as he springs from the floor. Chilton moves to run and Will grabs him by the coattails eyes still following the orderly. Chilton tries to scramble out of his designer jacket but Will uses the momentum to carry Chilton to the floor as the orderly swings the cuffs at Will's head.

Will ducks and lunges. To keep Chilton from leaving, Will knocks the stumbling orderly on top of Chilton. Chilton drops back to floor, the orderly piled on top. All Chilton can do is watch from beneath the body of the orderly who struggles to rise. Will tugs the handcuffs from his hands. The orderly is too young, too inexperienced to keep his wits about him. But not so young and inexperienced that he would not try to bash Will's skull again if given the chance.

Will gathers the chain of the cuffs in his hands, loops it around the dazed orderly's neck and pulls tight. He twists the chain until he hears the snapping of vertebrae and the orderly's head slumps against his shoulder.

Chilton looks up in horror from the floor. Will imagines Frederick is having a little trouble focusing about now. Will cracks his knuckles, ignoring the pain from his dislocated thumb, and looks around for something to use as weapon to induce cooperation from Chilton. He looks at Chilton and decides he doesn't need one.

You wanted to see me in action, Frederick?

Will scans the control panel and locates the key pad that controls the entrance door and the doors to the cells.

Is there a code? Or can I just press the button?

What button? Oh my god…Will! You can't… You can't be seriously considering letting him loose? You're the one who put him in here…

Show me how to open the doors Frederick, or I'll do it myself. Without your help.

Will figures there must be silent alarms going off somewhere alerting the local police of a potential security breach. He cracks another knuckle and Chilton bites his lip. Will grabs an arm and pulls Chilton to his feet.

How do I open the doors, Frederick?

Chilton stares at him sullenly and Will thinks he must be counting the seconds before some security override kicks in. Will chooses a button and hits it. The door to the control booth closes. Chilton jumps.

Will does not have time for this. He grabs Chilton by the collar and slams his face into the door jamb. Chilton screams in pain.

He'll kill me…

But, he probably won't have time to eat you, Frederick. Stop stalling.

If I help…?

Maybe I'll have some influence. Open…the…doors.

Chilton sobs all the way over to the control panel. He holds his nose as blood pours from nostrils and he heaves through his mouth, but he finds the correct buttons and punches in a code that Will memorizes. The buzzer sounds and Will hears the door click open, all the cell doors open. The door to the control booth slides open, too.

Will drags Chilton out of the control booth and shoves him through the doorway that leads to the hall of unlocked and open cells. He has to drag him down the corridor. Chilton begins to become dead weight in Will's arms as they get closer to the trim figure standing in a gray jumpsuit at the end of the corridor.

I'm afraid you've misdiagnosed just about everything. Will says as they reach Hannibal. He's not depressed or anxious. You pissed him off, Frederick.

Chilton cringes and takes desperate swipes at his nose to staunch the flow of blood to no avail.

You enjoyed my joke, didn't you, Will. Too bad Frederick didn't get it.

I think he gets it now.

I told you, you shouldn't have come. I'm afraid I've dragged you into my world.

I think I got here on my own. But I appreciate the company.

Will hands off the trembling Chilton to Hannibal. Hannibal holds Chilton close by the collar of his shirt that hangs from slumped shoulders.

WILL! Chilton screams into Will's face. Will raises his brows and looks to Hannibal. His thumb is throbbing and Will massages the dislocated joint before jamming it back into place. Hannibal nods appreciatively.

How's your heart rate? Hannibal asks reaching out a hand to touch Will's chest. He waits a long moment. Ah..steady.

Hannibal throws Chilton to the floor. Chilton stares up at both of them.

You're on camera, you know. Chilton says, his voice thin and hoarse. The voice of a man who knows he is about to die…horribly.

As if there would be any doubt. Hannibal says. About that feisty tongue, Frederick.

Will watches Hannibal take Chilton by the finely coiffed hair on his head and wretch his neck backwards. With the other hand he pries Chilton's mouth open wrapping his fingers around Chilton's tongue. Will winces as Hannibal pulls Chilton's tongue loose and rips it out of his mouth. He lets Chilton fall to the floor gasping and moaning as blood spurts over clothing and cement and Will's shoes.

Hannibal steps back holding his bloody souvenir.

The tongue is almost seventy five percent fat. Hannibal says looking at the tongue dangling from his fingers.

All sizzle and no substance. Will says.

No time for braising or smoking. I had imagined a Borscht Horseradish Terrine. Hungarian recipe if I recall.

There's always tar-tar.

Sirens wail in the distance and Will looks to Hannibal. Hannibal glances at the fleshy pink tongue in his hand and to Chilton heaving on the floor. He stoops down to peer into Chilton's face. Chilton's eyes stare into Hannibal's but Will doubts he really comprehends what is happening to him at this point. Hannibal straddles the limp Chilton and lets the tongue drop from stained fingers to the cement. He takes Chilton's head in his hands and deftly breaks his neck as he had done with Mason, only more effectively this time.

Life is full of regrets. But, you didn't allow the anticipation of regret to interfere with your decision this time.

No…but I feel it regardless.

That you do feel it is what makes you unique. Remember that feeling, too.

Will watches Hannibal rise from the floor. He wipes his hands on his jumpsuit, smearing the front crimson. He steps over Chilton's body and heads for the door at the far end of the corridor where the mezzanine is, and from there the stairs that lead to the main level. Where a SWAT team likely awaits.

Will remembers he is hallucinating. The SWAT team doesn't matter. That is not Chilton on the floor. Hannibal is not here, and neither is he. This is his inferno.

Feels good to do bad things to bad people, doesn't it? Hannibal says as he walks, surely expecting Will to follow.

Hannibal begins to climb the stairs. Will watches the jumpsuit recede as he walks, the naked muscular figure of flesh is soon replaced by black and oily feathers that sprout along limbs and torso until it is no longer Hannibal standing on the stairs, but a vision of shiny blue-black plumage with piercing black eyes that gaze luminously from the shadows at Will.

I won't be coming with you. I can't. Will says.

You deny the monster growing inside you?

I don't deny the monster. I don't deny that we're alone and alone without each other. I deny that we're just alike.

Alike does not mean the same, Will. Your empathy allows you to know me, understand me. But you are not me. Zeus does not want another swan. He wants the goose.

Will stands over Chilton. He can't deny the pleasure he took from the killing and neither can he deny the awesome feeling of power that overtook him as he methodically removed all the human detritus from his path. The shame and regret that he enjoyed it tears at him. He fears there will come a day when he feels nothing at all. He feels the sting of tears and blinks them back.

The creature on the stairs looks down at him from the steps as Will looks up from Chilton. He presses his lips together and turns his head as the room begins to spin. He hears Bach playing, one of his favorites, the prelude to his Suite 2 in D minor as rosebuds shimmer upon the stone walls of the corridor.

Your empathy allows you to see, Will. See into yourself. Are you ready to leave?

I…have a ticket. Will says. I have a ticket.

I have my ticket…right here.

Hannibal watches Luciano run on the treadmill as he thumbs through the current issue of Bon Appetite. Despite his smoking habit, Luciano can run at about six miles per hour steady for twenty minutes. Hannibal finds that impressive and most definitely sufficient. Luciano does not smoke here.

Luciano lifts the weights Hannibal provided for about half an hour before taking a rest of ten minutes and performing the exercises again. And again. Hannibal is pleased with the progress. Luciano will be delivering his invitation to Will and guest tomorrow evening if all goes well.

Lucia listens to her Ipod as she watches her brother run. She bobs her head in time to music Hannibal can thankfully not hear. Watching her bob her head and tap her feet reminds Hannibal of Clayton. Clayton does the same thing when he wears his earbuds. Hannibal had found the image of Clayton lip-synching and nodding his head profoundly disturbing. It had been like watching a Will he did not recognize. Better the devil you know…

His cell phone vibrates on the metal table containing his surgical instruments. Hannibal picks it up and sees the caller is Du Maurier. He will have to talk to her upstairs.

"Luciano!"

Luciano looks up at him from the treadmill. Hannibal holds up the phone. Luciano nods and Hannibal leaves him to finish his run to take his call in the privacy of the kitchen, or the garden

Hannibal thinks as sunlight streams from the veranda when he reaches the top of the steps.

Cajun spices waft from the pot on the stove where stock simmers. Hannibal has developed a craving for Jambalaya in anticipation of Will's RSVP. The twins will lap it up without question. In the short time they have been guests in his home, they have acclimated quite admirably to their surroundings and to Hannibal's expectations.

Hannibal imagines he feels something akin to a peculiar fondness for them. He considers what he feels is nothing comparable to what Will feels for his dogs, but perhaps he has developed a sense of responsibility. Much like the rancher who cares for his sheep, but sends them to slaughter nonetheless. They kill and eat what they love.

He walks out to the veranda so he can smell the aromas from his kitchen and relaxes into a chair that faces the garden. He takes a deep cleansing breath before redialing Du Maurier's number. She becomes ever more tiresome, but she too has a role to play.

"Hannibal." Du Maurier purrs. "How nice of you to return my call so soon."

Hannibal surmises from the slight drag of her syllables that she has had at least two glasses of wine, if not more. He pictures her liver suspended in a bottle of Sauvignon Blanc.

"You left no message. What choice did I have?" Hannibal says, his tone light.

"I received the lovely roses and wanted to thank you. Your note indicated you are rather pleased with my gift."

"I'm quite taken with him yes. What's the expression? He's just what the doctor ordered."

"He's perceptive. Did your session provide you with any insight?"

"In what regard? Into him, or myself?"

Du Maurier laughs softly. "Whichever is most beneficial to your well-being, Hannibal. He is meant to help heal a wound, is he not?"

Hannibal thinks prick his wound would be more accurate, but Du Maurier must be permitted to continue with her scripted farce a while longer. The queen must arrange her pieces if Hannibal is to correctly assess her moves.

"We talked of regret. Of anticipating and of accepting it as part of the healing process. Nothing I haven't heard before, but talking with him is pleasant enough."

"He seemed…well to you?"

"Had I not known about his ordeal, I would have never suspected he suffered such a regrettable miscalculation. Unfortunate that your evening was…spoiled."

"Yes, unfortunate but not without a silver lining. Insight often manifests in the unexpected and the spontaneous."

Hannibal walks to the kitchen to check on the stock. He glances at the clock.

"Did you manage to get the stain out of your rug?"

He hopes to change the topic from Clayton to whatever it is she really called about. Hannibal has obtained far more insight into Clayton than Du Maurier. Hannibal has a rapport with the younger man that is almost intimate in its…associations. To discuss him with her seems rude.

"The rug is being replaced this weekend. I'm afraid it couldn't be salvaged." Du Maurier pauses.

Hannibal wonders if she needs a swallow of wine or time to think. He stirs the stock while he waits and tosses in another handful of fresh cut cilantro. Not a traditional ingredient, but Will had suggested it and Hannibal had enjoyed the spiciness of its inclusion.

"Any word on the transfer?" Du Maurier says. "I've had to sign papers I already signed."

"I apologize for that. Lawyers earn their reputations, don't they? I've had to involve yet a third law firm, one that deals with extra-national interests to manage the assets so that the FBI could not trace anything from Will's end. The original papers you signed are of no use now."

"You're saying the process has to begin all over again." Du Maurier manages without even a hint of the exasperation Hannibal knows she must be feeling.

"Not exactly. It will go more quickly this time. The loopholes have been addressed. At least, that is what I have been told."

"And the time frame, now?"

"A couple weeks, ten days perhaps."

"This new law firm hasn't located Mr. Graham by any chance have they?" Du Maurier smacks her lips and Hannibal imagines Du Maurier swirling her wine while considering posing that inquiry.

"Not yet, but I am hopeful. Since we are partners in this enterprise and we are seeking to resume our previous relationship I feel I should disclose some information to you."

"Oh? Protecting our assets is always my concern. How does this information impact on our assets?"

"There is no direct impact, but the information indirectly affects the transfer. It's about Will."

Hannibal savors the complete silence at the other end. Hannibal knows Du Maurier's mind is racing with the possibilities even as she counts the seconds ticking by that she does not speak.

"What have you learned that could possibly affect the transfer if no one knows where he is?"

"Well, someone must know."

Hannibal looks out over the garden from the veranda. He has poured himself a glass of wine. He tells himself he is enjoying this game far too much for his own good. His cousin phoned earlier with information about Will from her friend in D.C. Hannibal has parsed it especially for Du Maurier and will leak it to her a little at time.

A long sigh from Du Maurier and then, "Shall I open another bottle?"

"I suppose that would depend on whether or not you feel like celebrating. I have engaged a private investigator to find Will."

“That…actually makes sense.”

“The investigator has reason to believe the FBI has placed him in witness protection in the Florida Keys. He is expected to testify against me in exchange for dropped charges. It is the only way that he will not be prosecuted and the only way he can ever be free of the FBI.”

“How reliable is this investigator?”

Hannibal is not surprised she would ask. She likely believes Hannibal will set the investigator on her. If she is colluding with Jack Crawford, she would be concerned that Hannibal’s investigator might stumble onto that information as well.

“Apparently, Either Kade Purnell or Jack Crawford set it up, but my investigator is still trying to verify that. Agent Crawford is not very forthcoming. And…” Hannibal pauses for effect. “I hesitate to mention this given your…feelings about him.”

“I may not approve of your hobbies, Hannibal, but I deserve to know what you know.”

“I don’t know what impact this information could have on the transfer, but I know the effect it has on me.”

“Something concerns you. About Graham? What happened?”

Hannibal silently applauds her performance. She sounds genuinely concerned. For Hannibal. If not him, then at least she seems concerned about the transfer.

“It would appear dear Will has not recovered from his…ordeal, psychologically speaking. He may not be competent to testify. He may be better now. The investigator is still looking into it.”

“I know that is distressing for you Hannibal. It is difficult to stand aside and watch, or learn that a patient cannot be helped. I tried to tell you.”

"You did. Is there anything else you wanted to talk about this evening?”

“No, I suppose not.” Du Maurier clears her throat. “Well, I imagine you’ll be receiving some more news very soon. And I hope it is news you can…accept.”

“As do I. I will apprise you of any other news as I receive it.”

“Good night, Hannibal.”

“Good night. Bedelia.”

Hannibal clicks off the phone and gazes at the setting sun. His garden is beautiful this time of day. And it smells glorious on this late summer afternoon. Hannibal is pleased with the call. He did not even have to lie. Du Maurier does not need to know that Roberta is his investigator or that what he told her was the state of affairs several months ago. Will was apparently in some kind of protective custody, but Roberta learned from her friend that one Jack Crawford pulled him out of it for some off the books operation. Officially, Will is still in custody, but Hannibal knows what Uncle Jack put him up to. Hannibal also knows that means Jack will be joining Will soon after he receives his invitation if he’s not already on a plane to Florence.

Will is once again caught between the FBI and Hannibal. It would seem history is bent on repeating itself. Hannibal hopes Will finds his truth in his inferno. Truth may yet provide a different outcome. For both of them. He lifts his wine glass, swirls it around and watches the dark crimson legs drip back down the glass. He makes a silent toast.

To the truth then, Will…and all its consequences.

Hannibal wonders how long it will take Du Maurier to hire her own investigator. He glances at the clock and decides that Luciano has worked out enough for the day. He will allow the twins to relax and settle down for the night. He has already prepared their meal for this evening, but it is still too early to take it down. He sniffs the air and revels in the aroma of his tomatoes on the vine and the scent of his peppers.

He walks back inside to finish the Jambalaya. He considers which musical accompaniment he should select. Something festive he thinks. Perhaps something he hasn't listened to in a while. Hannibal walks over to the tall antique armoire that he had converted to house his music collection here in Florence. Like so much of the furniture here, the refurbished armoire is reminiscent of the one he left behind in Baltimore. Hannibal has had to reproduce his collection from memory and every once in a while he remembers a missing selection.

But not this evening. He finds what he is looking for and queues it up before returning to the kitchen. As always these days, the associations with Will come almost automatically and Hannibal smiles as he slices the fresh Andouille sausage he purchased this afternoon from his favorite butcher. Circumstances being what they are, Hannibal can make do without his own for a while.

He hums softly to Rodrigo's Concierto de Aranjuez, a selection he had shared with Will over dinner, a paella from Andalusia, during one of those cold winter nights in Baltimore.

Chapter End Notes

My thanks to blktuana and joeymalfoy for inspiration. I hope the flavor is tasty.
I will post another chapter next weekend but I have company coming for Easter and my home is a crime scene or should be declared one. There will be a brief but necessary hiatus. Thanks for reading!

Chapter 58

Will leaves his inferno, debriefs with Daniel, and receives Hannibal’s invitation. Du Maurier makes an appearance and Will gets an email from Zeller.

Roberto Ferri, Angelo Caduto - Icarus

I have my ticket…right here.

Will?

The stone and cement continue to glow and pulse until the ruined terraces of Fiesole appear beyond the smoke that clears from the shimmering panes of pink rosebuds and faded olive vines that creep along the vibrating walls of Baltimore State Hospital. Will rubs at his eyes and watches the cracks in the wall become fissures, splitting stone and cement asunder, the corridor pulses in time with the beating of his heart. Light flashes strobe like, and it seems to Will like seeing his world in quick frames of movement; disjointed images assault his retinas as darkness relentlessly interrupts the light leaving Will vaguely disoriented. The floor seems to move under his feet and he stumbles but does not fall. Something has hold of him.

Hands cradle his face in the darkness and thumbs smooth and warm move to caress his brow in languid strokes so comforting he could almost float away from this awful place but for the tether that binds him here, the umbilical cord drawing life from him like a fiery mangled womb sucking flesh and bone from a fetus conceived in wickedness. To leave it forgotten. Aborted. A mistake of nature.

You were supposed to leave…

The words are his, but it is Hannibal who speaks them and Will feels the curl of a wet tongue around an ear and moist breath in his hair and the tether draws him back into the furnace again. His skin prickles as talons graze across his stomach tearing at the scar that flushes angry red. Will becomes aware of the monstrous creature standing behind him; its great wings rustle softly as slick and feather laden talons grasp his naked shoulders. Its dark eyes gleam and shimmer as Will watches the walls crumble to dry and scorched rubble like the rest of this desolate place that is his inferno.

Its wings hold him fast and Will is once again standing within the inferno of his dreams, the taste of despair sour and thick upon his tongue, the scene of gnarled wretchedness as broken and empty as he is.

He just imagined he killed two people, indulging his instincts and enjoying the quiet sense of power that had filled him like a drug. The fight had been like a dance, nearly every movement of his adversaries anticipated, his own movements quick and lethal, and he had taken a primal delight in the ease with which his body had assumed a state of predatory awareness.

Natural. Superior. Deadly.

He had watched Hannibal reduce Chilton to a heap of breathless blood and bone at his feet as the monster growing inside had coiled deep within his bowels accompanied by a familiar shudder he now associates with…pleasure.

The regret remains. It stings. It reminds him of who he is…

Will peers out from the collar of feathers about his neck. The ruined landscape is as familiar to him as his home in Wolf Trap, as familiar as his adopted residence at Chandal Square and every bit as treacherous yet he is compelled to return to it, again and again and again.

I want to leave. Will says, trying to remember if he actually said the exit word aloud or if he thought it.

I don't want you to be here, Will.

I don't want me to be here either.

Then you have a choice. Still the uncommitted soul, with that ill band of angels mixed, undecided and…indifferent?

Will laughs bitterly as he gazes into the red rimmed eyes looking down at him, its wings frame a frightful and familiar canopy of malevolence over his head.

Still uncommitted, still here. He says twisting away from the suffocating plumes of black.

Will, the mirrors in your mind can reflect the best of yourself, not the worst of someone else.

Your definitions of best and worst are different than mine.

Best and worst. Good and evil. Ideals. Concepts.

Not everything is malleable. Certainly not the truth.

The truth is perhaps the most malleable of all concepts. And highly subjective. Like the truths you showed to me?

Will flinches and looks aside. He remembers another conversation in Hannibal's office, red and white curtains drawn, fire burning brightly in heated contrast to the chill of the words crackling crisply between them, two predators ensconced upon lustrous leather cushions trading secrets and delivering flat announcements of disaster.

I don't expect you to admit anything. You can't. But I prefer sins of omission to outright lies, Dr. Lecter. Don't lie to me.

Will you return the courtesy?

Will wriggles with the memory and the creature at his back clucks its tongue softly, a chiding sound that Will knows well.

Touched a nerve, have I? Hannibal's voice fills his head as talons sink into his stomach.

Will looks around at the ruined landscape of his scorched inferno and sees his steadfast companions remain. The gray wolf reclines at the foot of the boulder where winged Daniel watches from above his pearlescent wings raised in greeting as ash falls from the hazy clouds above. Will clicks his tongue against the sticky roof of his dry gritty mouth. He swallows and it feels like a lump of cold crumbling clay is caught there. He rubs his throat as he looks at Daniel and thinks of tumbling waterfalls, deep pools, and ocean… He can almost feel the cool tumble of waves tossing him about, unfettered upon the open sea, the scent of salt and brine so close…

Will. Can you hear me?

The cello from Bach's Suite No. 2 in D Minor hums close by and the notes echo in his head as goosebumps rise along his naked skin. He feels the weight of wings, his wings, shifting in the embrace of the creature at his back. His body twitches restlessly; every nerve anticipatory, arms and legs tingle not from the rush of the sea but as though stung by nettles streaming past him in a blur. He is running.

He is Hannibal's Adam stumbling blind through a garden of thorny spindles, sharp rocks and splintered bones that pierce his feet as Will runs, the wolf at his side, keeping pace. He halts at the edge of a precipice. He watches the shadow of the serpent tailed eagle descend over him. Its talons sink into shoulders as its body presses flush against his glossy wings pinning them to his back in a tight embrace.

The thing inside twists and Will can feel it uncoiling, its essence slipping through sinew and bone, stretching from belly to bowel and Will feels as though he will burst apart from the inside out. The feathered creature releases him and takes a step back. Will sinks to his knees to crouch upon the soil steeped in ash and cinder. His fingers find the scar as it begins to split open, blood as thick as oil drips through fingers that tremble now as much from the searing pain as the reopening of the memories that sear his mind. The scaly tail twitches along the dirt as the black eagle lowers itself to the ground, great black wings dip to drag along the rust colored dust. It levels its red rimmed eyes at him as its long and blackened tongue darts over its beak.

I wanted you to believe in the best of me, just as I believed in the best of you. You limit yourself to seeing only what you want to see in yourself.

The mirrors in my mind reflect the truth whether I want to see it or not.

When you turn the mirrors on yourself what do you see?

I know who I am.

You know who you were and you still mourn what has been lost. You've been reborn. Wasn't that the goal of my therapy?

You said you think about God when you think about killing. How can you think of God and not think of good and evil?

Because, good and evil has nothing to do with God. When churches collapse on worshipers is that an act of God? Is that evil?

God subcontracts the evil to Satan?

Typhoid and swans, Will, it all comes from the same place. Good and evil. Up…and down. Concepts to contemplate from your enlightened perspective.

The creature stretches a single talon and points to the ground where Will crouches cradling his wound. A fissure in the swollen earth opens belching smoke and Will's eyes burn with the hazy orange cloud that gathers at the precipice. The wound continues to weep and Will thinks it is his own blood that has infused the soil beneath in ruddy crimson. He sees the creature, the wolf and winged Daniel through the charred orange haze that reeks of blood, his mind a pyre of the corpses extinguished in the flames of his becoming.

He blinks the stinging smoke from his eyes and sees the ravenstag lying on the ground, its hooves scraping at the dry dirt, and suddenly he is once again prone upon the floor of Hannibal's kitchen, his shirt and face awash in blood, the stench of it at his nostrils, hands folded beneath his ravaged flesh. The ravenstag lifts its head to look back at Will, its great glassy eyes gaze into his and Will realizes it is this moment that sent him to his inferno.

It's your inferno, Will. You can leave any time you want. Hannibal's voice whispers. I know why you won't leave.

The smoke clears over the precipice and Will hears the thunderous crash of waves below, imagines a sea of red churning beneath as his inferno bleeds. Feathers ruffle against his cheek and he feels the prickle of sharp tines like antlers breaking along his spine. He knows if he reaches around to touch the spines, he will find the shafts of fledgling feathers erupting like razors along his flesh.

You tarry here because in here, I am with you.

Alone without each other. Will manages a smirk as his fingers claw at the soot and ash.

At least you punish both of us. You've condemned yourself and me…bearing a wound invited by deception and inflicted by pride.

Will lifts his eyes and sees a tent draped in banners of red and white, but the javelins, plumed helmets, and shields lean from hand hewn posts forgotten in the scene of tragedy that registers in Will's mind. Though the occupants are naked, there is no mistaking their identities.

Without even seeing his face, Will recognizes the tangle of soft brown curls and knows the figure lying on its side, pale and limp is the body of Patroclus and it is the flaxen haired Achilles who leans over the still form, stoically stitching the fatal wound delivered by Hector, a gash that mars the perfect flesh at his fingers. Armor, burnished and blood spattered sits untouched off to the side as the scent of frankincense filters through Will's nose.

Achilles was no surgeon but Will knows this Achilles would close the wounds of his beloved before sending him to his final resting place on a pyre of flame. Achilles ties off the last suture, blonde locks falling over his face as he rends the silk thread through his teeth. Fingers brush lightly over the pale and puckered flesh, no longer pink and flush with life. He picks up a sponge and dips it slowly drawing it over the wide lip of red and black kylix filled with perfumed water, squeezes once and commences bathing the body, scented sponge settling on face first. He wipes across the blue tinged lips and cannot help but glide his thumb tenderly over them. His eyes are dark and glittering beneath pale blonde lashes and his mouth twists in a grimace of pain even as he recoils from the chilled flesh that no longer responds to his touch.

I let you know me, see me. Achilles speaks, his words strangled in this throat. The sight of you in my armor so convincing even I believed. But the gods saw the lie and took you from me.

You wanted to be seen. Will says, his own chest tightening in sympathy.

By you. Only you. Ever…you.

Will reaches out his hand as though to still the hands that stubbornly caress the waxen cheeks already tinged with rigor. Achilles continues to gaze upon the peaceful figure, his anguish evident in the locking of jaws as fingers follow the arch of Patroclus' brow.

The ache burns slow in his chest and Will hates that it burns but he cannot deny the wrenching regret he feels as he empathizes with the distraught Achilles bending over the bruised and broken Patroclus. Will wipes impatiently at his eyes and tells himself he got too close, too close, too close…

Feathers sneak across his shoulders and Will turns to look into the face of the monster that haunts his inferno, the monster he condemned to keep him company.

Tears, Will? Does Adam miss the walks in the garden as well? I gave you a rare gift but you didn't want it.

Didn't I?

Another lie? I forgave you. Do you forgive me?

Acceptance…

Forgiveness…

An act of redemption.

Adam could walk again in the garden and Achilles could have his Patroclus.

The devil is not as dark as he appears.

Daniel's voice throbs in his head as his winged figure tentatively approaches, keeping his distance from the creature skulking in shadow hovering over Will. He holds out his hand for Will to grasp it from where he crouches in the filth and the dirt.

Do you see, Will? Don't you see the fear that keeps you here? All we see or seem is but a dream within a dream…

Will? Do you see me? I want you to count backwards…

With all my knowledge and intrusion… Hannibal's voice intones in his head as the odor of blood surges through his nostrils.

No…I know who I am.

Give me your ticket, Will. I'm right here…

Will hisses through teeth clenched in anguish, his body contorted, fingers wrapped around the weeping wound. Hannibal's words descend upon his ears tumbling in the same timbre and gentle tone as the words spoken in the salon, syllables slick with the warmth of whiskey, and fingers that slide seductive and soft along Will's bristled cheeks. Will watches the parched ground greedily soak up the blood that seeps from his wound through half lidded eyes.

I could never entirely predict you.

I know who I am.

I can feed the caterpillar, and I can whisper through the chrysalis, but what hatches, follows its own nature, its own nature,

and is beyond me.

I know who I am.

I know who I am.

…backwards from ten. I'll count with you…

The serpent tailed creature looks down upon him through its red rimmed eyes as Will collapses upon the sullied soil, wings splayed uncomfortably beneath and belly up before the beast that bends down through the ash and smoke to smear its crimson stained lips across the wound and Will shivers at the searing heat as the wound is sealed once again. He reaches up a hand expecting the slick feathers to move between his fingers and feels the smooth skin of cheeks and chin instead. A thumb rubs gently at his lips as strong hands cradle his face and ruffle through the damp curls that stick to his head.

Hannibal?

Will?

Icarus didn't fall because he looked up; he fell because he looked down.

…seven…six…count with me, Will…

Is it hubris to refuse a gift from the gods?

Will shudders as the ground moves beneath him and he is falling, falling…counting and falling…

…three…two…one.

Daniel watches the pale blue eyes widen into focus as Will looks up at him through half lidded eyes. There is more blue than black and Daniel turns the heavy head he holds in his hands to the open window. The pupils contract in the sunlight and Will pulls his head away to shield his eyes.

"Where are you? What do you see?" Daniel says to the figure coiled the bed. He wonders which Will lies beside him wrapped in sweaty sheets and glistening with perspiration. Will has assumed the classic fetal position, arms hugging his chest and knees drawn up. Daniel imagines him sleeping like this as a child; he needs only his thumb in his mouth to complete the picture. It's a comfort pose, the mind subconsciously seeks protection in the place it felt most protected.

Or, the mind is subconsciously preparing for a rebirth. Daniel wonders what Will's take will be when he wakes up enough to notice.

Daniel touches the side of Will's neck and feels his pulse. It's steady. Will's fingers curl over his and Daniel braces, waiting to see what name Will calls out this time.

“I see you, Daniel. I see you.” Will says, voice thin, tired, but aware.

“How do you feel?” Daniel asks, letting go of him. He can feel the relief released by Will’s words. His neck and shoulders slowly begin to unwind from the vice that has kept them pinched for what seems like days.

He cannot begin to describe what he feels from Will. Daniel is torn between bolting from the room and from throwing his arms over Will’s shoulders. The need to be alone, separate from Will plucks at nerves already frayed like worn strings about to break upon the bow. He sits on the edge of the bed instead, and tries to ignore the pounding in his head and the soreness between his legs.

Will lets Daniel’s fingers slip away reluctantly. The room still pulses and shimmers and the hardwood glows beneath his feet. The need to feel substance and solidity is persistent, but Will settles for wrapping his fingers around the damp rumpled sheets that conceal his lower half. He realizes he is naked beneath the cotton and slowly stretches his legs as he glances up at Daniel. Will wonders how much of his hallucination he spent curled up like that. He remembers many nights in Wolf Trap waking from tortured dreams in a cold sweat and wrapping himself up in a blanket to lay the same way.

Will clicks his tongue against the roof his mouth. His entire mouth feels pasty. He notices Cara on the bed with him, curled up at his feet. The sight of her causes Will to gasp and then laugh aloud. He laughs to keep from crying, and he sighs willing the tears that well up to stop.

He feels like a complete mess, unraveled, just pull any string and he will come apart. He is not entirely certain he is not still dreaming. This bed and the touch of Daniel’s hand on his shoulder feel no more or less real than his hallucinations.

All we see or seem is but a dream within a dream.

He shakes his head. Daniel asked him a question. At least Daniel isn’t sitting there naked with huge white wings.

“Shredded. I feel…shredded. Didn’t I have clothes on when we started?”

“Oh yeah. You peeled them off hours ago.”

Will takes in the wrinkled tee hanging off Daniel’s shoulder and the gym shorts gathered at his hips. These are not the same clothes Daniel had on earlier. These are clothes chosen in haste, pulled on in a hurry. Damp tufts of curls stick out over his head and, Will realizes what seems different about him.

“When did you shave?”

“About an hour or so into it. A little tactile reinforcement.”

Daniel bites at his lower lip, incredibly self-conscious all of a sudden. It shouldn’t take Will long to notice the other little changes their experience has inflicted over his body. Daniel has covered up as much as he could, but the abrasions on his face are impossible to hide. And there are the wounds Will cannot see. As his therapist, Daniel shouldn’t let him see, but as his friend, his… Daniel wonders what he is to Will, exactly.

The thought hangs in his mind, suspended like a balloon and Daniel decides to leave it there rather than burst it with anything so painful as the truth.

Will blinks as memories of the last several hours fill his head, associations click in his mind in numbing succession as images flood his consciousness. Daniel had played Hannibal for him. It hurts to be so aware of one's inclinations. He buries his head in his hands.

"Fuck. What don't you know about me?"

"I'll bet quite a lot. Look, we don't have to talk about this now. If you're okay, I'd like to take the dogs out. They've been really patient."

Will looks up at him and sees past the ruffled hair and the clean shaven face. Besides looking years younger, Daniel looks like he's been in a fight. And the only person who could have inflicted the cuts and bruises Will sees flaring from tanned skin is him. Daniel had played Will as well. A lump catches in Will's throat as he remembers and he wants to crawl under the sheets.

"Things got physical. I didn't just hallucinate, I was out of control?"

"Controlled violence. Necessary." The green eyes narrow, trying not to appear as wounded as Daniel surely feels. Will cringes inside. He hurt him, and deeply.

Daniel runs shaky fingers through his hair. He does not want to discuss all this right now. He's too raw from it, mentally and physically, and so is Will.

"You expected it?"

"Uh…no." Daniel almost laughs, "I had to um…improvise."

Will looks aside, shame erupts fresh and raw from deep within, he feels his face grow hot and the wound quivers at his touch, the remorse clawing from the inside out. His head feels like it could crack open any second. He flops over on the bed, pulls the sheets up and wonders what wounds Daniel's shorts and tee are hiding. The bruise across his cheekbone and the cut that swells along his lip are indication enough of what else lies beneath the camouflage of faded cotton and Nike sneakers.

Daniel is never going to let him touch him again, Will thinks. He doesn't blame him. He's selected himself for exclusion once again. Murderer. Monster. Stigmatized.

Daniel must have suspected what regressing him like this could mean, but had gone ahead anyway despite Will's warnings. He had wanted to see into Will and a part of Will had wanted him to. Will can understand that wanting. Despite the risk, Hannibal had wanted, needed to show him, too. But Daniel is not Hannibal. A concept Daniel likely appreciates all too well.

Will glances out the window at the setting sun. The sunlight had been drifting lazily through the kitchen windows when they started. Will's stomach grumbles as he remembers eating his psilocybin soaked breakfast. It would seem his body has taken longer to metabolize the drugs than Daniel had anticipated. His eyes fall on the nightstand and he smiles at the two bottles of water and the container of Excedrin he knows Daniel set out for him. Always thoughtful. Painfully so.

"Go ahead. Take the dogs out. I'll be right here…thinking."

Will wonders what Daniel sees when he looks at him now. He thinks he doesn't want to know.

"You remember everything, don't you?" Daniel asks.

"With a clarity that is sharp as a…knife."

Will winces and nods. He remembers all too well. His head feels thick and heavy, but the little darts of lights bouncing off the walls have disappeared and he feels more like himself. Whatever that is.

Daniel has folded his arms over his chest massaging tense elbows with his fingers. It's a defensive posture, involuntary but expressive. Will is not insensitive to Daniel's gift. A gift that has surely left him tied up in knots.

"Was all this worth it?" Will pauses, "The trip was incredible."

"Went pretty deep, I know." Daniel says, biting his lip at the unintended pun.

Will catches Daniel's eyes, ignores the phrasing, "But the cost…Daniel…"

"The cost was acceptable." Daniel words sound flat, even to him. He quickly smiles at Will and rubs his cheek.

As Will stares into his face, pale blue eyes searching Daniel's for any sign of reproach, Daniel feels the gush of affection, of gratitude welling in Will to mingle with the regret and shame that threaten to tumble through the meager shreds of resistance Daniel has left. Daniel cannot handle an emotional tide like that. It would rip him apart. He needs to get out of this room, just for a little while.

"That's not what I meant." Will says, tugging at Daniel's fingers.

The tug resonates. Daniel twists inside, but Will's lure catches in his heart and Daniel lets the line reel him in. He feels Will's hand contract around his fingers and he clasps his hand over Will's. He allows Will's head to lean against his hip for a moment. The dogs stir restlessly in the hallway, patience expended and bladders full. Daniel looks down at the damp curls pressing against his tee.

"You didn't break me, Will. I saw the monster and I am still here."

Du Maurier stares at her phone in disbelief as Clayton's voicemail message sounds in her ear for the third time. He should be home on a late Thursday afternoon kicking back with his dogs and Graham. She sighs and declines to leave a message. He will return her call eventually. He is circumspect about his practice although she acknowledges Graham has a way of creating his own particular brand of chaos.

Du Maurier hums softly to Pavarotti, Nessun Dorma, a favorite performance she never tires of listening to and somehow apropos as she looks over the rolling hills of the vineyard from her patio. She pours another glass of the crisp Bianco Tuscana and lifts it to her lips, savoring the aroma of citrus and delighting in the metallic finish that alights upon her tongue. She thinks she will continue to drink this vintage even after she has left Italy behind her. She will not miss Lydia but she will remember this view fondly and an order placed every now and then for this delicious wine will summon the best moments of her time here.

She has already selected another identity to replace Doctor Dumont. She thinks it time to replace her blonde tresses with a less provocative and less memorable shade of brown. Tinted contacts will hide the bright blue of her Nordic ancestry to blend in with new neighbors among the palette of pastels that await her in the south of France. And the wine. One must not forget one's passions.

She glances at the photos of the quaint cottage she has purchased in Provence, clicking on one image after another. She has missed France, although Florence has not been without its charms, at least until recently.

Her conversation with Hannibal continues to occupy her thoughts but she can find no reason to suspect anything. His candor seems genuine. Of course, the best lies are couched in truths and Hannibal is the master of weaving even the darkest of lies into a tapestry of light. He may not know Graham is here, but if his investigator is any good, he soon will. He will also know that Crawford sent him here. Hannibal will invariably consider Crawford's intentions and more to the point, Crawford's resources. Including her.

Nothing makes us more vulnerable than loneliness, Agent Crawford.

Except perhaps desperation. Agent Crawford is very desperate. He must be if he released the damaged and demented Graham from whatever protective custody in whatever psychiatric facility he was in to hunt Hannibal. And Graham must have been under psychiatric care. Crawford must have pulled him out of therapy and Graham had been struggling in Florence, enough to seek out Clayton.

She doubts Crawford mentioned anything to Graham about his arrangement with her. The seeds of doubt she had planted in Crawford's mind had germinated quietly, and had grown into a forest of uncertainty where Graham was concerned. As Hannibal was fond of doing himself, she had provided Crawford with tantalizing tidbits of misgiving and Graham had fed the beast of suspicion within Crawford with his own misguided actions.

Both Hannibal and Graham were vulnerable in their loneliness. Hannibal had completely lost his perspective with Graham because of it. Graham has apparently lost his mind over it. And Du Maurier can continue to exploit it in both of them to her advantage. Crawford is aware, too. She remembers her conversation with the grim faced Crawford as he had walked her out of FBI headquarters.

Whatever your situation with Doctor Lecter…I believe you want to be free of him, eventually.

I would like to be free of all of you. My entire life has been uprooted.

Understood. I'm letting you go with the understanding…

And the written agreement…

And the agreement, that should Doctor Lecter contact you or resume an association with you in any way, you will contact me, and only me.

In exchange for complete immunity from prosecution.

As complete as I can manage. I need to keep my options…open. I agree that Will might be more compromised than I realized, but I'm not happy about letting you walk out of here free.

You let Will Graham walk free.

I can keep an eye on Will.

For now.

Will is…in a bad place right now, and I put him there. I have to keep an eye on him. Will is my friend.

Will Graham is not your friend…

Distrust had bloomed and chaos had ensued. Chaos is a milieu in which Hannibal excels and thrives. Graham had barely survived the terrible tantrum he had wrought. Jack Crawford had not fared much better. She decides Crawford would keep his indiscretions close to the vest. If he has pulled Graham out of protective custody, he likely did so without proper authorization as he had done when he had released her. Du Maurier imagines Crawford received plenty of flack for that.

Graham must be walking around a marked man. He has to know that if things go badly, Crawford will deny getting him out. Graham will be considered an escaped mental patient. He is the most expendable player on the board, except where Hannibal is concerned. Crawford knows Graham is the bait that will entice Hannibal like nothing else. Crawford is fishing. With two rods this time.

She doubts any agreement they made, in writing or not, would be honored should they catch Hannibal. It does not matter. She will set her trap and Hannibal's code will be hers. Jack Crawford will never see her again.

Du Maurier glances at the counter and thinks she should prepare some lunch. She picks up the phone instead, deciding to try Clayton once more when it vibrates in her hand. It's Clayton.

"Hello." Du Maurier breathes into the phone after allowing a few seconds to pass.

"Doctor…Cesca. You rang?" Clayton's tone is polite but clipped.

"Daniel…I know I called several times, but it is Thursday and I haven't heard from you about Saturday."

"Right. About that…Hey! No, No… over here…good girl. Sorry, I'm out with my dogs right now and uh…Oh c'mon…really? Just a minute…"

Du Maurier rolls her eyes and sighs. She drinks half a glass before Clayton is back on the phone with her.

"I think it's important that Lydia's therapy take place in a more conducive environment."

"Meaning?"

"Meaning not at the estate. With her family present. You concur don't you?"

"Well, Signor Fiore might not be open to that change of venue. Where would you want to conduct the therapy?"

"I could meet you both at the park, near the Teatro Romano here in Fiesole."

“Well, I could talk to Signor Fiore about the change of plans. He might agree for next time, but he expects his daughter to remain on the estate with the dogs you bring at least this weekend.”

Du Maurier examines her nails and wonders why Clayton is being so insistent on another location. She thinks perhaps their last encounter might have affected him more adversely than she had thought. He should be thinking about the obscene amount of money he is receiving to treat the wine czar’s daughter on location.

“Well, if I call today, I can arrange for the dogs. I will call if we are agreed Lydia comes to the park. If Fiore disagrees he can stick his wallet up his ass. So, what do you think?”

“I think you are putting me in a very delicate situation. May I ask what has prompted your…attitude?”

“We want what is best for Lydia, yes?”

“Always.”

“Then, let me be the bad guy. You are simply the messenger. I can’t treat her there. Not effectively. I appreciate you aren’t exactly in a position of influence with her father, but I am. I haven’t deposited the check. I’ll tear it up before I step foot on the estate again. Are we clear?”

Du Maurier hears him loud and clear. Clayton does not want to subject himself to her influence except on neutral ground. He has had time to reflect on his experience at her bungalow and the reflection was not favorable. She must repair their fractured relationship and quickly. He sounds particularly testy and Du Maurier decides to soothe his ruffled feathers.

“I understand your thinking and I agree with you; however your method is rather abrupt. Still, Lydia has been looking forward to her session with you all week. Fiore hates to disappoint her. I think I can persuade him to see the value of social interaction away from one’s comfort zone without offending him in the process, which I’m sure that given your current mood would be impossible for you.”

Du Maurier waits, swirls her wine around the glass. She hears Clayton sigh and imagines him rubbing slender fingers along that luscious mouth of his as he considers his options. He may mean what he says at the moment, but he doesn’t want to make an enemy of Fiore and by extension negatively impact his highly reputable practice. She considers he may be blowing off steam about something else. It would not surprise her if Clayton found Graham exasperating. Everyone else does.

“Thank you for seeing it that way. And thanks for being so gracious. I’m…I’ve had a rough day and I probably shouldn’t have called you until later. I’m sorry for the…abruptness.”

“Apology accepted. Shall I call you later? Or will that be too late to arrange for the dogs?”

“I’ll arrange for the dogs after I hang up. I can always cancel, but I’m hopeful you can work some magic on the Signor.”

“Well, take care then and I’ll phone tomorrow.”

“Okay. Ciao.”

Du Maurier rises from her chair and thinks Saturday at the park is not such a bad idea. The decorators will be coming Saturday to replace the rug. She glances at the large stain on the white carpet and takes another gulp of wine. She smiles as she thinks seeing Clayton under any circumstances will be rewarding. If she is to discern any influence or interference by Hannibal, she must remain cordial with him.

The thought occurs to her that he might bring Graham along to the session. The park he chose is near his home. She cannot think of any reason for him to invite Graham, but stranger things have happened. It would be her bad luck to run into Graham. She has not been impervious to setbacks of late. Du Maurier does not believe in luck. More precisely, she does not believe in leaving her life to Fate. Fate and Hannibal make bad bedfellows. She decides she can alleviate her problem when she talks with Clayton again on Friday.

Daniel ambles back to his house with the dogs. He takes a meandering route; he's in no hurry. He thinks he should get a better grip on himself before he returns home if his phone call with Dumont was any indication. He had simply snapped when he checked his messages. The residual fall out from Will is affecting him still and while he had thought to call and cancel his Friday appointments earlier – the reason he had pulled out his phone in first place – he now thinks he should go in if just to distance himself from Will. He needs to feel normal. He needs some semblance of his old routines.

He needs to feel grounded and he does not feel grounded at the moment. He can't function like this and he certainly cannot provide Will with the anchor he requires. Will needs more than an anchor, but Daniel can only provide so much.

He has narrowed down the lies he can offer to Maria to explain his appearance tomorrow to a handful. None of them really sound convincing, but the lie doesn't have to be convincing. The lie is a polite way of informing Maria he doesn't want to talk about it…ever. She can assume whatever she likes.

Daniel is more concerned about what the drug induced descent into hell has introduced into Will's shattered psyche. Giving anyone hallucinogens even under controlled conditions is risky. Giving them to Will was not only crazy, but the experience has been nerve wracking for him and has completely unhinged Will. The unhinging was necessary.

Will had to unlock the forts he has erected around Lecter and soon. Daniel knows that meeting up with Hannibal again is imminent. This business with the Paolini is about to explode and Will cannot have epiphanies in front of Lecter. Lecter has taken advantage of Will enough already. Will needs a fighting chance to deal with him.

Daniel knows which way the wind blows. Will loves Hannibal. He will not kill him. From what Daniel understands of his hallucinations at BSHCI, he is not going help lock him up either. What Will has to decide, what Will has really been trying to decide all along, and Daniel had not understood himself until now, is whether or not he wants to resume a relationship with Hannibal. And, if Hannibal wants the same thing.

Will may or may not be aware this is what he needs to decide. Will can only admit to himself that he wants to know Lecter's state of mind. Daniel thinks Will does not want to deal with why at the moment. The fact that he does not want to deal with the why should set off some alarms. Perhaps the alarms are going off now. If Will wants to get out of his inferno, Daniel thinks he can be his Virgil. But Will has to allow the devil to help him, too.

When Will is with Jack Crawford he empathizes that he shouldn't want the thing he wants. Even when he is with Daniel, Will empathizes. But when Will is alone, left to his own feelings in isolation, he is torn. Wracked with guilt for wanting, paralyzed with regret over what has been lost, and seething with anger over the lives lost in his pursuit. And yet, it all boils down to whether or not Will can forgive all of that.

The ache in his chest twinges sharply as he walks behind Bella and Cara who tug at their leashes now that the house has appeared below them. Daniel knows that even if Will finds it in himself to walk away from Hannibal, he will not stay. The goal of his therapy with Will was to help him muddle through that amazing mind of his so he could come to grips with his feelings. His feelings, his wants, his needs. Not anyone else's.

Daniel knows what he wants. And he knows he cannot have it. Acceptance hurts.

Daniel also knows that if Hannibal has decided he wants Will back; he will not let Will go. Hannibal will be ruthless in his possessiveness. Daniel is not unaware of the danger his association with Will brings. Allowing Will to stay at his house is an invitation in itself. He must be insane to remain in Fiesole, in Italy for that matter. He doubts Hannibal would thank him for taking over as Will's psychiatrist. Daniel thinks perhaps he might have a future in couples' therapy.

Daniel sighs. Will is a really bad influence on him. His humor is clearly a casualty.

The thought that he is competing with a narcissistic serial killer for Will's affections should be funny, but it isn't. Daniel thinks he would probably have to kill someone for Will to even consider running away with him, anyway. Daniel berates himself. He's tired and this tasteless humor is a coping mechanism. He should just go to bed but he knows he can't. Not yet.

Daniel rubs at his eyes and buries the other ridiculous thoughts running around his head. He needs to mentally prepare for a debriefing with Will. They won't accomplish much except to touch the tip of the iceberg, but they should discuss a few things while the experience is still fresh for both of them. Daniel grunts as he walks, very fresh indeed.

Daniel decides to keep their discussion content related rather than delve into the emotional aspect of the therapy. Daniel doesn't trust himself to keep his emotions in check should they discuss Will's intentions. Daniel's emotions are rubbed raw like the rest of him. If Will wants to talk about his feelings, Daniel will listen, but he doubts Will has the energy for that discussion, either.

As he reaches the driveway up to his house he sees the lights are on. Will is up and about, hopefully eating something and rehydrating after going all day without either sustenance or water. Bella and Cara paw at the front porch and Daniel opens the door wide to let them inside.

He finds Will seated in the kitchen, showered and dressed simply in a tee and drawstring sweatpants as he sits sipping iced tea that smells vaguely of whiskey. Habits. Daniel pulls out his phone to call the kennel. The dogs are for Lydia he tells himself, not Dumont.

Will shoves the last dish in the dishwasher and closes the door, depresses the button and listens to the water pump through the old pipes. He turns to Daniel who lifts his head to greet Will's inquisitive stare.

“You’re about to say something, so say it.” Daniel says.

“You can’t be serious about going in to your office tomorrow. You…look like hell.”

“Funny, feels like I’ve been there, too. I need to go in, Will. I need some space and you need space, to reflect.”

They have been talking for about an hour and the debriefing has been productive, but Daniel knows Will is exhausted and so is he. He knows Will has some trepidation about falling asleep and is not prepared to dream again so soon, but Daniel thinks his mind has reached a saturation point of sorts and might allow him a few hours of uninterrupted sleep.

Daniel is willing to suggest that Will imagine he is falling asleep in Hannibal’s bed in Baltimore, but thinks that might not go over very well. At least not coming from him. For all Daniel knows, that is exactly what Will plans on doing. Will likely wonders if the medicine is worth the cure.

“You’ve given me plenty to reflect on.” Will says as he leans against the counter.

“Well, we’ve tried to focus on the obvious stuff. More will come up. I didn’t expect to decipher your entire mindscape this evening. The drugs allowed you take an inner journey and remember it.”

“I doubt I will ever forget it.”

“Still no idea who the messenger is supposed to represent?”

“No, not yet. But it’s probably important that the messenger is you. And he seems to have only two messages.”

“But knowing what he represents would shed light on the messages.” Daniel says.

Daniel takes up next to Will at the counter, leans the small of his back against the Formica and stretches his legs out in front a ways. Will looks aside at him and smiles. Daniel has kept his distance from Will for most of their discussion and it feels good to have him close.

“Telling you over and over that the devil is not as dark as he appears is easy enough and it’s not surprising that my counterpart says that to you.”

“You’ve been trying to get me to see the good in Hannibal from the beginning.”

“And do you?”

“I’m trying.”

“It’s difficult for you because you empathize so closely with him. To see good in him is to see it in yourself and you are enjoying punishing yourself far too much to see that.”

“Don’t mince your words, Daniel. These concepts of good and evil are at the heart of everything.”

“Because you have made them the issue. For all your empathy Will, you still argue with the Hannibal in your mind with your mindset. He can’t give you the answers you want because you don’t want to hear them.”

“What is it I don’t want to hear, Daniel?”

“Your choice in the inferno is not about choosing good or evil. It’s about choosing how to look at good and evil. Hannibal wants you to look at the concepts as he does, as he believes god would if he believed there was a god.”

“Typhus and swans.”

“It’s about becoming, Will. Transformation. Killing has changed the way you think. Ideals and concepts are no longer absolutes for you. They are subjective, situational, and malleable.”

“Do you believe that?” Will says, incredulous.

“It does not matter what I believe. If you want to get out, you have to decide what you believe. He says dreams prepare us for waking life. Nothing is more true for you.”

“You recognized the prints I mentioned from his house, from the salon.”

“I looked them up while you were…calmly hallucinating. Laptops are a wonderful thing.”

“The pictures have to do with Dante’s Inferno, don’t they?”

“All but one. Hannibal does have a dry sense of humor. But his pathology betrays a deep rejection of Christian values. He mocks them. Probably goes hand in hand with his narcissism. And his predilection to think in classical terms. He sees himself as a force of nature.”

“A god. A god to rival god. Or close to one. He’s not immortal.”

Will wonders what forces nurtured Hannibal’s epic imagination and associations. Will thinks of a lonely child in an orphanage secretly reading from books likely banned under Soviet occupation, but books he had cherished while still wrapped in the cocoon of family.

“Seems to me he is concerned with his legacy. He is complicated, Will. It’s going to take some time to sort all this out. But that painting of Leda and the Swan in his dining room is the place to start.”

Will shifts against the counter. He knows his relationship with Hannibal is mirrored in that painting. How Hannibal has interpreted Boucher’s explicitly sexual rendering of the mythic encounter and applied it to himself and Will is crucial to understanding Hannibal’s epic universe.

“He said as much.”

“You said as much. Will, remember that everyone and everything in your hallucinations and dreams represents a part of you. The parts are fractured because you fractured them. You fractured them on Hannibal’s kitchen floor. You understand that, right?”

Will nods and tries not to grind his teeth. Why does Daniel seem to see more clearly than he does? His mind is fractured he reminds himself, fractured but not broken. He closes his eyes and imagines shattered tea cups strewn along Hannibal’s floor. He returns his attention to Daniel.

“Let’s leave Leda and her swan for the moment, but remember this, Will. In some versions of the myth, Zeus rapes Nemesis, Leda becomes that goddess.”

Will stands up straight. Associations stir, thoughts and images churn as though released anew, like a plow freeing frozen soil trapped too long in winter's slumber.

"As for the other paintings, the ones from the Inferno…" Daniel pauses, "You okay?"

"Just thinking." Will smiles. "Go ahead. It all fits together somehow."

"Dante's ninth circle has four rounds represented by various sinners. Those sinners are depicted in Hannibal's prints. He even arranged them in a circle. Did he arrange them like that after meeting you, or were they always like that?"

"I never saw them arranged any other way, so I can't answer that."

"Interesting. I was wondering if he has always thought this way or if meeting you caused him to think this way."

"Guess I'll have to ask him."

"Among other things, I'm sure. Anyway…Antenor, the Maccabaeus sons, Cain and Abel, and of course Judas are guilty of personal treachery, in essence…hubris. Sins against God, or the gods. That's where you are. In your mind because you can think like Hannibal, you have condemned yourself for committing hubris against Hannibal."

"I'm with you so far. Those four represent the inner circles of the ninth circle, reserved for the most egregious of offenses. The ninth circle is also where the devil lives. Of course I would condemn myself to the part of hell where I could be close to…the object of my afflictions."

"And the object of your afflictions is trying to show you the way out. Did you recognize the print in the center?"

"Hogarth, he said. A mythical scene? I remember seeing creatures in armor and a naked woman…a goddess?"

"Personifications. The figures are Satan, Death, and Sin. The naked woman is Sin, of course."

"Adam's temptress." Will says.

"Not just Adam. Eve's sin is the sin that preceded all others. It would be Eve's sin that gave birth to the concept of sin. Sin and Death are Satan's constant companions."

"What is the painting a scene from? Not the inferno?"

"Milton's Paradise Lost. Do you know it?"

Associations come quickly once again and understanding unfolds like the dawn. Hannibal does have a twisted sense of humor. Too bad the joke is on Will.

"Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven." Will says. "Milton's Satan would appeal to Hannibal. He is beautiful. A fallen angel who led a rebellion in heaven. He is classically tragic, almost Homeric."

"And the perfect literary personification of mockery to Dante's self-important and some would argue narcissistic Divine Comedy."

“Dante’s nemesis.”

“Milton’s intent was to explain God’s thinking. Dante’s intent was to explain his own actions, to mitigate his exile from Florence.”

“You’re right. Hannibal is very complicated.” Will bites along his lower lip and sucks thoughtfully for a moment. “The way out of my inferno is to mock God. To reject tradition and accept the notion I am beholden to no values other than my own.”

“To celebrate and revel in your…exclusion. With him.”

“And the swan?”

“A puzzle for another day. Sleep on it, see what happens. I have got to go to bed. I am a walking dead man.”

Will laughs softly. “I’ll join you. If that’s okay.”

“As long as it’s just the two of us.” Daniel says with a straight face.

Will sits at Daniel’s laptop typing phrases into library searches. He still can’t find the source for the eagle’s reference to the winged Daniel of his dreams, no matter how he phrases his search. He’s not even sure if it is from some literary work or it is simply a clue from deep within his memories delivered in a fragment by a fragment of his imagination.

On gliding wings he takes up his mask.

Will shrugs and decides to check his email. He is surprised to find an email from Zeller. Jack did tell him to expect follow up information on the investigation into the Paolini twins’ disappearance and the footage from the da Vinci airport. He clicks and his fingers tremble slightly with dread and hopeful anticipation.

Will,

Footage revealed license plate number of rental. Verified Paolini rentals from same company for last six months. Nothing remarkable. Baggage in the trunk contained personal items and evidence of lots of shopping in Paris. No information on Lecter. Face recognition on Luciano was positive, but no frames of their assailant facing cameras. Sorry. Kind of a bust. One other thing. There was a number of sex toys and lingerie in the luggage. And some kinky photos of the twins. Were you aware they were involved, with each other?

P is all over J and V is back in play. Thought you should know. Hope all is well.

Zee

Will scratches his chin as he puzzles over Zeller’s message. He had sent it from his own email account, preferring to keep the FBI at bay. His emails could always be found or tracked, but only if Zeller gave them cause. There was nothing incriminating in the message, but Zeller had decided not to contact him through official channels.

Will can imagine Purnell had not been pleased with all the sexual innuendo. He can picture her lips tightening in disgust, curling in the same contemptuous snarl she had bestowed upon him. Will sniffs and thinks she should get out of her office more often. Then again, maybe she doth protest too much.

Mason must have complained about being ignored by Jack. Jack had either received a nasty phone call from Purnell mid-flight, or had been stopped at the airport before leaving for Florence. If Mason had called Purnell, Purnell would know that Jack had pulled him out of protective custody. That could mean Jack is arriving with company. Or rather, escorts for him.

Will thinks he should contact Jack, but he's not sure what the best way is to do that. Mason might have dug up some information on his own and had passed it along to Jack. Maybe Jack had no choice but to read Mason in on what he was doing in exchange for the information. Will grits his teeth. Jack is holding out on him, again. How fleeting their happy bonding of the other day. Will hits reply on the email.

Zee,

All would be better if I knew wtf is going on. Any thoughts? Where's Jack? And…thanks.

W

He hits send and logs out. His coffee is cold and Will looks around the living room as he fidgets in the chair. He needs to occupy his mind and his body. He can't sit here all day. He knows what sitting still and zoning out will invite.

Will drags the lawn mower out of the garage and wheels up to the backyard. He figures he should do some work around the house. The yard has been the victim of neglect all week, and the week before. Will has robbed Daniel of his routines and the least he can do is take up the slack.

Besides, Will thinks sweating off whatever remains of the drugs in his system can't hurt. He glances at the dogs sniffing around the yard. Their sniffing reminds him of the wolf in his dreams, always alert, always searching for the viper lurking among the rubble of ruined terraces. He wonders what part of him the viper represents. It seems to Will that the viper is connected to the serpent tailed eagle.

The eagle's tail had become a viper, embattled with the elusive viper of his inferno. Will thinks of all the creatures in his inferno, the viper is the one creature that does not engage with him. It also seems the other creatures are keeping him from the viper. They sit upon their rocks and wait for the viper. Will thinks maybe he is letting the other creatures act while he observes. Then again, the dreamer is often the observer in the dream.

Will shakes the hair out of his eyes and wipes at his face with his shirt. Only ten thirty and the humidity hangs heavy and thick. He thinks of Daniel preparing for work this morning. Will had caught him staring at himself in the bathroom mirror razor in hand contemplating whether or not to tidy up or let the scruff grow back.

The cut on his lip had scabbed over and the bruise along his cheek had certainly not gotten any smaller during the night. Will had tugged on his boxers after they had gotten into bed wanting to see the damage he had inflicted. Daniel had eventually relented his expression somber as he had stared at the ceiling while Will has satisfied his curiosity. Will had not needed to say anything. Daniel already knew how he felt. He had turned to his side, facing away from Will not in rejection, but in invitation. Will had taken up his usual place in their bed, forehead pressed between Daniel's shoulder blades.

They had awakened in the same position and Will had actually slept. Will isn't sure if that indicates progress of if he was simply too fatigued to dream. Will's demon had also been sated and that too could have contributed to his restful slumber. Regardless, waking had been a pleasant experience this morning.

As Will pours gasoline into the mower he thinks he will concentrate on the identity of his winged messenger while he cuts the grass. The creature had quoted from something and Will is determined to remember what it is. If the creature is a fractured part of him, then the answer is in his head somewhere.

On gliding wings he takes up his mask…

Masks hide identities. Greek tragedies employ masks. Gods and mortals exchange identities. Patroclus exchanged identities with Achilles.

Hiding and revealing identity is a constant theme throughout the Greek epics.

Zeus transformed himself all the time. Leda became Nemesis. Hannibal wears a mask. And Will himself has been transformed. On whose wings does Daniel glide?

Hannibal sits beside the blindfolded Luciano as he drives toward Florence, and Fiesole. Luciano wears the blindfold for security reasons. It would be most unfortunate if Luciano were to disclose his whereabouts for the last several days to Will. He could tell Will approximately how many minutes it took to travel from one place to another, but Hannibal doubts Luciano will do that. Luciano will find himself suddenly deposited in Fiesole, not knowing from which direction he came. He will never leave Fiesole…alive.

Luciano has been raised to be hunter, not prey. He does not have the capacity to entertain the possibility of reversing those roles. He has concepts of family and loyalty. Those are the concepts Hannibal has relied upon to get him here.

Lucia is sedated back in the guest room, restraints about her legs, torso, and remaining arm. Hannibal doubts she will ever be awake again. Even if Luciano somehow manages to successfully complete his task, the porcine beauty will join her brother soon enough.

Luciano's life is forfeit already. Should Luciano kill Will, highly unlikely but possible, Hannibal will see to it that barely a breath escapes before Luciano joins Will in death. Hannibal is certain Luciano will not survive the encounter. Will has likely already considered how he will kill Luciano. Hannibal is forcing him to do it a little sooner.

Clayton and his dogs pose a challenge. Luciano has been instructed to kill only Will. Hannibal needs Clayton to find out what Du Maurier is up to. Hannibal did not save his live to give it to Luciano.

He is to leave the dogs alone. It is not Hannibal's intent to cause distress; the encounter is meant to inspire. Out of Luciano's destruction will come creation. And every creative act has its destructive consequence. Will requires a little reminder on the nature of things as they truly are. After this evening, Will can longer wrap himself up in Clayton's protective cocoon of field theory and Gestalt exercises.

Hannibal will be applying his own therapy. Will's responses are deeply ingrained, his conditioning is complete and behaviorism trumps field theory. In Hannibal's field theory, Will will most certainly be in touch with his feelings and habits in the here and now, the residue of the past will be smeared all over his fingers. Hannibal sighs with the pleasure rippling through him at the thought of Will's fingers at Luciano's throat.

Hannibal did not witness Will taking on Tier at his home in Wolf Trap that night. He had been pleased Will had brought the young man's broken body to his home, had been pleased at the bloodied evidence of primal superiority lying on his dining room table, had been especially amused that Will had placed Tier's body on the table. But seeing Will kill with his bare hands is a pleasure Hannibal has been looking forward to and he will not be robbed of it this evening.

He turns to the quiet Luciano. Hannibal decides it is not wise to allow Luciano to sit for long stretches without proper stimulation and conversation. He should not be left to think on his own for too long.

"Another twenty minutes, Luciano, we are almost there."

"This is not your car. At least it's not the same car as before. The one you drove to the airport."

Luciano is comfortable enough to talk with Lecter. Luciano has felt good the last couple days. Lifting weights and running agrees with him, makes him feel in control. His arms swell with strength and the wiry Graham will have no chance of winning a fight. Luciano will run him over like a locomotive. But the difference of vehicles has set Luciano to wondering what else this doctor is up to.

"No, it isn't. This vehicle is expendable, the other was not. Does that satisfy you?"

"Okay."

Luciano shrugs and rolls his shoulders into the back of the seat. He flexes and twists, expending excess nervous energy in anticipation of slitting Graham's throat.

Hannibal understands Luciano is nervous. His mind will focus on any detail that seems inexplicable. He is a creature of routines and a different car presents a different routine. He would obsess on the reason for the change to the distraction of his task. Hannibal decides to go over his instructions with Luciano again. They are simple so Luciano does not have to think too much. If he follows them, there should be minimal disruption.

"When I let you out, what are you going to do, Luciano?"

"Ima gonna find the psychiatrist Graham lives with who should be walking his dogs. Ima gonna follow him to his house and make him put the dogs away so they don't attack me. Then Ima gonna have the dottore lead me in the house to Graham."

"Very good. You let the doctor go into the house before you. Let him call for Graham. You wait for Graham to come to you.

"He'll alert Graham. I lose the uh…surprise." Luciano says.

"I want him alive. If you struggle with the doctor, you still lose the surprise. It is doubtful you will surprise Mr. Graham much. He is former FBI, Luciano."

"But, if I have the doctor he will be upset and I can use that."

"You will not upset Mr. Graham. There is a reason Mr. Verger wants him dead."

"You know what the reason is."

"I know Mr. Graham…intimately. Don't let those large soulful eyes fool you, Luciano. Use the dogs to control the doctor. Use the doctor to get in the door. The doctor will be incapacitated with fear."

"If you say so. What about Graham's gun?"

"He likely won't be wearing it around the house. He feels safe there. He won't go for it because he will recognize you and will not want to bring the police into it. He will want to deal with you… quietly. That is why you are taking a knife with you. You prefer knives, don't you?"

"Much more intimate." Luciano agrees.

Hannibal can see Luciano is warming to the idea of killing. It is his nature after all. But Luciano is prideful and he will want to dramatize his encounter with Will. He will invariably offer Will information Will should not have about him. Not yet.

"Luciano, it is important that you do not say too much to Mr. Graham. Before you kill him."

"Why not? Dead men tell no tales." Luciano smiles beneath his blindfold at his literary acumen.

"Because you do not want him to engage you in conversation. He will try to distract you. You need to kill quickly. Do you understand?"

"I understand. Merda! It is not so hard to kill a man."

"Certainly not one as motivated as you are. I'm sure you are poetry in motion, Luciano." Hannibal says as he takes the exit to Fiesole that bypasses Florence.

Clayton should be walking his dogs soon. Will sometimes walks with him, and in that case, Luciano will have to be trusted follow both of them back to Clayton's house and let the dogs out himself. Either way, Will will deal with Luciano. He will protect what is his. Nothing should happen to Clayton. As soon as Will sees Luciano, he will know why Luciano is there and who sent him. Hannibal hopes Will appreciates the irony. Sometimes the best laid plans…

Daniel turns away from the crumbling upper level of the Teatro Romano barely visible at the top of the hill to head back home. He walked the dogs a little longer than usual this evening to choose a site for Lydia's therapy. Dumont had called him at the office pleased to announce Signor Fiore had agreed to send a limo to the Archaeological Museum Saturday afternoon. He even promised a case of wine.

Daniel understands the gesture. Fiore feels the need to be extravagant in his graciousness to remind Daniel of who is really in charge. In Fiore's universe, anyway. Daniel will accept the wine and everybody will be content they are one in charge. Daniel thinks that he thinks too much.

He certainly spends way too much time in other people's universes. This evening he gets to share in Will's, at least in a small way. Will surprised him with dinner plans, a first for him since moving in. Daniel suspects it is Will's way of easing his guilt. Daniel understands he needs to do something to assuage the regret he feels for the injuries he inflicted despite Daniel assuring him that all of it had been with his consent, though perhaps not blessing. He had finally chided Will for requiring a hallucinogenic assault to get him to cut the grass.

The look on Will's face had been worth the price of admission as they say. For dinner, Will had actually made his own gumbo and even took the time to bake a loaf of French bread to go with it. Daniel figures he called out for the groceries, because Daniel knows he doesn't have the ingredients sitting around his kitchen. He wonders if Will charged the FBI for the shrimp, okra, and bottle of single malt Glenlivet whiskey.

The smell of the gumbo simmering on the stove as Daniel had left the house with dogs had been overpowering. The smell of the bread fresh from the oven had filled the entire house. Daniel's stomach rumbles now and he hurries the dogs along, yelling endearments at them as they sniff their way down another hill.

After the day he had at the office, Daniel is more than ready for a quiet and uneventful Friday evening. The dogs pause as they arrive at Via Fra Giovanni Angelico, the winding street that leads to his house. Daniel waits as they sniff the air and begin to cautiously walk toward home.

Luciano stoops to hide behind the stone wall across the street from Dottore Clayton and his dogs. He thinks to approach the dottore just as he steps on his driveway. The dottore looks a lot like Graham. Maybe younger, hard to tell. He has a soft face, like a little boy. He seems athletic, but Luciano knows that being fit will not matter. This dottore is no fighter. He is a professional, an educated type who has never raised a fist, let alone a knife.

Luciano waits until he sees the dogs turn to run across a yard he thinks must be Clayton's front yard. The smell of fresh cut grass fills the air and Luciano can see the garage on the lower terrace is open as is the front door. Through the glass Luciano can see into the living room and kitchen where another figure paces the floor with a dishtowel. Graham.

"Hey…" Luciano calls out, "Mi scuse, Mi scuse…"

"Posso aiutarla?" Daniel says, looking Luciano over.

He wonders what this guy needs besides directions. He is clearly not from around the neighborhood. Daniel thinks it a little late for a wandering tourist. He thinks perhaps he's drunk, separated from his group. It happens.

Luciano takes a step closer, bends down to pet the inquisitive dogs sniffing at his trousers. When he straightens back up he is holding his knife and he flashes it at Daniel.

Daniel freezes. He thinks he is about to be mugged and he has no wallet or even any identification on him. He thinks Will is right inside. He glances toward the house but Will is nowhere in sight.

"You take the dogs to the garage, eh? Nice dogs. We put the dogs in there, okay?"

Daniel nods and walks the confused Bella and Cara to the garage. Where is Will? Daniel feels the press of the knife against his throat as he leads both dogs in the garage, drops the leashes, and closes the door on them. He looks to the man at his side holding the knife and decides he would have a tough time taking him if he didn't have a knife. The young man is broad and stout, barrel chested with arms like pistons. And he has a knife to Daniel's throat.

"Now, we walk up to the house. Front door."

"Who are you?" Daniel manages.

"Door."

Daniel receives a sharp nudge and proceeds to walk up the trail of flagstone to his front porch. He opens the door slowly and looks around. He hears Will in the kitchen. He thinks he might piss himself. He can't think of anything but the coldness of the metal at his throat.

"Call to him." Luciano breathes into his ear.

Luciano braces his body against the young doctor's lithe frame. Graham will not dare charge him. Lecter's advice is cast aside. If Graham is upset, he will make mistakes. Luciano wants Graham out of the kitchen where he might be tempted to grab a knife himself.

"Will! We've got comp…Ow!"

Luciano sinks his fingers into Daniel's arms and twists. "Fottiti! I said to call him, not warn him, pezzo di merda…

Will hears the alarm in Daniel's voice and he recognizes the low rumble of a masculine voice in the slew of Italian curses. He slips a short utility knife in his back pocket hoping it lays flat enough to avoid detection. It's the only place he can hide anything. He's wearing cotton Bermuda shorts and a tee-shirt. He doesn't even have shoes on. His mind spins. Luciano is here…to kill him. For Hannibal.

Dreams prepare us for waking life.

Will breathes deep as he rounds the corner to the living room. Luciano stands in the middle of the room blade angled at Daniel's jugular. Daniel's eyes are huge but he's breathing steady and he's standing perfectly still. That is a good thing. Will hopes Daniel has the presence of mind to trust him and do as he says.

Will moves to stand directly in front of Luciano, hands at his sides. He angles his head to one side and paints his face with a sad pensive expression.

"Hello, Luciano." Will says. "Doctor Lecter sent you?"

Daniel's mouth drops open. He cannot think. He can only watch the horrible nightmare play out in front of him. How did Luciano find him? Shit. Lecter. Shit... Shit… Fuck…

Will waits for Luciano to process his options. Luciano is confused. And terrified. Hannibal has his sister. That must be how Hannibal persuaded him to attempt this. Will sighs as he waits. Luciano had no choice.

Luciano nods slowly. "Yes. He sent me."

“He has Lucia.”

“I’m so sorry Mr. Graham.”

“Why are you sorry? You were going to kill me anyway, weren’t you?”

“No…” Luciano pauses. He wonders how Graham could possibly know that. He thinks Verger has been screwing him. Maybe his whole family…

“The Dottore sent me here to kill you.”

“No, he didn’t.” Will says quietly, taking a step toward Luciano as Daniel’s eyes grow wider.

“He didn’t?” Luciano hugs Daniel closer.

“No. He sent you here to die.”

“You think you can kill me? I have to save my sister…”

“She’s already dead, Luciano. And so are you.”

Luciano remembers what Lecter told him about Graham distracting him. Graham is doing it now. Luciano forces himself to stop looking into Graham’s eyes. He needs to finish this. He should shove the doctor away and lunge at Graham. Blade to belly. Slice up. No more Mr. Graham.

“Your sister is dead weight. Dead weight that Lecter will dispose of.” Will says, edging closer.

Will looks into Daniel’s eyes as he speaks and he sees Daniel’s eyes flicker. Will braces himself.

Daniel hears Will’s message and knows what he has to do but the fear is overwhelming. He tells himself he will get hurt but Will won’t let Luciano kill him. He has to believe that. He feels Luciano tense up, feels the anticipation and the bloodlust radiating from Luciano as he prepares to attack Will or him. Daniel has no more time.

Daniel allows his body to sink in Luciano’s arms, like a bag of bones.

The shift in weight throws Luciano off balance and he slices wildly in the air catching Daniel in the gut. Daniel staggers over to the steps searing pain along his stomach causing him to hug his shirt already dampened with blood.

Will sees the blood spreading along Daniel’s shirt but he doesn’t have time to think about it. It takes him only three strides across the hardwood to reach Luciano, pulling the utility knife from his back pocket as he walks. Luciano stoops to rush him, but Will feigns to one side and slices at Luciano who bursts past him, crashing into the bookcase.

Will caught him across the face and though blood trickles over one eye Luciano is unfazed. Like a maddened bull, he turns from the bookcase to lunge at Will, hand outstretched, hilt in his fist and blade horizontal, its edges catching the light as Luciano leaps off the floor at Will. Will remembers Luciano slicing fruit with the same knife.

Luciano has no thought in his head but to sink his knife into Graham anywhere he can. The man is quick and Luciano has to at least injure him to slow him down. Arms outstretched, Luciano shoves a chair out of his way and lunges at the smaller man. But Graham eludes him again.

Will drops to the floor, knees hitting hard but he avoids the blade. Luciano turns and brings the knife up and prepares to lunge again. Will climbs to his feet, sweaty now and slipping along the humid wood. He allows Luciano to get closer. Will knows he has to get that knife from him.

As Luciano raises his hand, Will grabs at Luciano's wrist, pivots and slams Luciano's hand into the wall. Luciano screams in pain as his damaged hand releases the blade from his grasp. Will kicks the knife away.

Luciano swings at Will with his left arm and Will takes the hit to the jaw. He takes another before he can field the punches and return a couple of his own to Luciano's face. Luciano has the better position against the wall. He braces himself and pushes off the wall, his weight and momentum sending Will tumbling backward.

They struggle on the floor, and taking advantage of lessons learned from all those wrestling matches with Hannibal, Will pins Luciano on the hardwood. Without his knife, Luciano holds no advantage over Will. And Will does not require a knife to finish the job.

Will takes a breath before slamming his palm into Luciano's face, effectively driving his nose into his brain. The cracking of bone stifles the cry that erupts and Will feels…exhilarated, euphoric as he looks down at the ruined face of Luciano.

Hannibal stands in the shadows of the backyard. He can see through the lovely French doors that frame the patio. Luciano has served his purpose. Will, his beautiful infuriating Will kneels over his kill, hair a tousled mess, clothes and hands bloodied, but barely out of breath. Hannibal feels a surge of pride swell in his chest and the warm caress of affection alights upon the wound he carries there and he revels in the sweetness of it.

The elegance, the sheer predatory elegance Will had displayed against the heavier and armed Luciano had been thrilling to watch. Hannibal is encouraged by this performance. He is eager to see if Will is up for the encore. Time to find out.

Hannibal takes out Luciano's phone from his pocket. He scrolls through until he finds Will's number. His thumb hovers over the phone as he savors the moment. The moment before he gives Will what he wants.

Will turns his head to glance at Daniel as he kneels over the still body. Daniel is rocking on the steps, arms wrapped around his stomach, shirt stained with blood. Will realizes he is going into shock. He rises slowly from Luciano's body and begins to cross the room.

Before he reaches Daniel his phone rings. Will stops. His phone has not rung in days. He swallows and looks once at Daniel before crossing back to the coffee table where his phone beeps and vibrates along the wood. He picks it up and reads the caller id. He looks to the body on the floor. Luciano is not calling him.

He presses down, puts the phone to his ear and listens.

"Hello, Will." Hannibal says.

Chapter End Notes

A very Happy Easter to all. A reminder that there will be no new chapter Easter Sunday. But the following weekend...YES! Thanks for reading as always.

Chapter 59

Hannibal and Will finish their long awaited phone call. Will’s inferno has followed him out of his dreams. But dreams prepare us for waking life, don’t they? Daniel has some choices to make. Jack arrives in Florence.

Gerrit van Honthorst, Saint Sebastian, detail, ca.1623.

“Hello, Will.” Hannibal says.

Will turns to Daniel and he knows Daniel trembles not only from his own trauma but from every flicker of emotion that courses through Will. Daniel’s eyes grow wide and Will knows that he knows who is on the phone, but Daniel says nothing. Will imagines he is in mild shock, but at least he is responsive and the wound is not gushing blood. Daniel is alright for the moment. Will has to deal with Hannibal first.

Will turns back to the body sprawled beneath him. He hears Daniel move to the kitchen, hears a chair scrape along the floor and water running in the sink. He listens to Daniel hiss softly as he cleans his wound.

Will exhales slowly as he holds the phone to his ear. The voice he has not heard in over a year except in his dreams holds every one of his senses captive. Though memory and imagination recreate it perfectly for him so that he hears every nuance, every syllable pronounced in its peculiar accent and cadence, he hears it now with such clarity, that the voice may as well be his own.

The universe contracts. Will can almost feel the room shrink, vibrations of molecules, every conversation they ever had…

As he moves to stand over Luciano, whose body has ceased its involuntary twitching, the familiar greeting resonates as though nothing has changed, and yet everything has changed. Hannibal's words tumble until they settle in his consciousness as his body tingles with adrenaline, the rush of raw power pulses through veins thick and fast. Will is inebriated with sensation.

Will breathes into the phone he presses to his ear as his thoughts whirl. The memories of his drug induced hallucinations twist around his head, insidiously seeping into the now to straddle the surreal. This is truly madness he thinks, to wonder if he stands over a hallucination or a body. It is madness to grieve the loss of the monster that set his mind on fire. It is madness to want him back.

"Hannibal."

Will waits, uncertain that the phone call is even real but knowing Hannibal will hang on his every breath regardless. His skin tingles all over agitated with the knowledge that Hannibal is nearby. He would have to be. How else could he have timed his call so perfectly? He pictures Daniel's property as the rustling of feathers teases images of his tortured inferno and a talon curved and black scrapes along his stomach. Will's nightmares have once again followed him out of his dreams.

Blonde hairs prickle along his neck and Hannibal is surprised at the sensation. The way Will says his name retains the power to send ripples of electricity under his skin. He thinks too of lips once pressed against his flesh, and is pained that they must now press to plastic instead. To be separated by a few yards of grass and a panel of glass is merely geography. Bridging the chasm between them will take much more than removing physical barriers. Hannibal's heart wrenches and it is as though Will has reached inside his chest to yank yet another piece and rip it from him. Strains of betrayal pluck dark chords still and yet…

You are obsessed with Will Graham.

I'm intrigued.

Obsessively.

The slim tightly muscled figure he remembers stands over the body on the floor, feet planted firmly on either side, head bowed; the familiar face Hannibal can sketch from memory is in profile. Hannibal imagines Will's gift spinning associations faster than Will can catalogue them, his mind sifting relentlessly as he tries to ground himself in the moment. And Hannibal himself the star in the center, around which Will's universe, their universe, spins.

Hannibal does not expect Will to be a fount of confessions this initial encounter. Predator that he is, wounded and on the mend, he will circle and assess first.

And Will is wounded. Hannibal winces inside at the thought of Will recoiling from his touch. Those pale blue eyes would stare him down before allowing Hannibal to come within an arm's reach of him. But, if Achilles aches, so then does his Patroclus. The time for licking one's wounds is over. Worthy adversary or worthy companion?

He looks magnificent despite the bare feet and tatty attire, always a paradox his Will. Only Will could appear so beautifully vulnerable and so deadly at the same time. The stance is involuntary, Hannibal doubts Will is cognizant that he was prompted by his primal instincts to claim his kill in the presence of the other predator.

“You killed him with your bare hands.”

Will holds his other hand in front of his face, examines the blood drying between his fingers and nails.

“Yes…I did.” The words come soft, flat. “You sound…pleased.”

“I am. How does that make you feel?”

Hannibal’s voice winds seductively serpentine through his limbs, twisting him inside out. Will closes his eyes a moment and thinks of his recent retreat with the Hannibal of his imagination. Will decides to trust his instincts, acknowledge them for what they are and indulge the predator Hannibal has summoned this evening. That is what Hannibal wants.

“Alive.”

And Will does feel alive. More alive than he has felt in months.

Hannibal closes his eyes. A sliver of memory beckons. A bowl of water, fresh linen bandages, and raw bloodied knuckles…Will...

“You sent me gifts.” Hannibal says, eyes still closed. “That betrays intent to manipulate.”

The tone is cool, provocative, evoking entrenched associations with smooth leather chairs and long stemmed glasses of dark red wine and Will’s chest tightens in anticipation of resuming their deadly game of chess once again.

“Or to communicate. You sent one back.” Will responds, just as coolly despite the heat he feels rising at his neck. “I believe that makes you an Indian giver.”

Hannibal’s eyes flutter open and he chuckles softly, “I believe repurposing would be more… accurate.” A pause and then, “Did your heart race when you killed him?”

“No.” The word drifts from the phone, the single syllable conveying much more than perhaps Will intended.

“And no anticipation of regret.”

“Not this time.”

“More blood and breath to fuel your radiance.” Hannibal purrs, his words edged with pride and possessiveness. Words he knows will both annoy and delight.

The perverted praise descends like a blanket around Will until the familiar frustration flares. He hates that he enjoys pleasing Hannibal. He hates that Hannibal knows this. But the predator within growls with satisfaction as Will looks down upon the broken face of the man who would have killed him.

“More evidence to make me complicit…in your design.” Will returns with as much detachment as he can muster.

“You sent an invitation. I accepted and have sent one of my own. It is…our design.”

Will nods in agreement as he steps over Luciano to flip off the light switch on the wall. The only remaining light is from the lamp in the living room. He pulls the throw from the couch and covers Luciano with it. He walks to the French doors and shuts off the porch lights.

“You’re outside.”

“Yes.”

Hannibal stares at Will on the other side of the glass and watches as Will’s fingers absently splay over his shirt to cradle the wound beneath. A circle of intimacy and violence they share. A blade Hannibal fears cut too deeply.

“Tell me, Will, do you think of me every time you touch your wound as you do now?”

Will drops his hand unaware he had been caressing the scar beneath his tattered shirt. He closes his eyes, annoyed with himself and annoyed that Hannibal caught him. Will allows a wicked and bitter smile to spread across his face in the window.

“Every time. As you intended.” Will has to give Hannibal that one.

Hannibal appreciates the honesty, even more, Hannibal appreciates that Will did not seize upon the opportunity to hurl insults. A sign of acceptance…and a shift toward forgiveness?

Will peers through the glass. It is difficult to see into the house from the back. The house sits at the top of the terraced properties that surround it. Hannibal could only be somewhere on the same level as the patio, otherwise the best view is from the café below and that provides a view of only the patio, like the angle from a pit at the back of a theater. If Daniel had not placed his piano directly in front of the French doors, it would not be visible. Hannibal would have to be very close to see anything at all.

Will considers that Hannibal had sent Luciano gift wrapped and had taken a front row seat to watch Will unwrap the gift. A private performance deliberately orchestrated to occur where Will would have optimal cover in a controlled and familiar environment. As he had done with Tier. Hannibal’s design does not include Will getting arrested. Far from it.

Will listens to Hannibal breathing softly into the phone. He hears nothing but breath, no other sounds to indicate where he is. Will decides he needs a better look. Hannibal enjoys working from the shadows too much. The temptation to touch might draw him out of the shadows into the light, but Will thinks it more likely Hannibal prefers to pulls his strings from the darkness. Hannibal does have one weakness Will can exploit to his advantage.

Wherever Will looks for Hannibal he will find only smoke. But Will stands in the light and Hannibal will feast his eyes upon the one thing he covets.

Hannibal watches Will suddenly lift the handle of the French doors with approval. Hannibal imagines pale blue eyes glittering warily beneath a fringe of curls and lashes, as Will scans the backyard for something that doesn’t belong through the glass. The longing in Hannibal’s chest flares as Will flings open the doors, and he walks unknowingly right toward him. To see him standing on the patio flush with the freshness of his kill invigorates.

His hair is a wild tangle about his head, his soiled shirt hangs off one shoulder, and a spattering of dark droplets stains his arms and legs, lean, muscled, and browned by the sun. Will is stunning in the hazy humid moonlight. Will angles his head just so, and soft light from the house falls on curls, nose, and parted lips as he stands to the side, a shameless taunt of his own. Hannibal's breath catches in his throat and he bares his teeth in the darkness. So infuriating…his Will.

Will wipes at his nose and catches blood on his fingers. He pauses before wiping his hand along the plaid shorts that hang about his hips, stretched from grappling with Luciano. He'll have to dispose of the clothes anyway. He shakes stubborn curls out his eyes before peering into the cloak of darkness. The yard is still and quiet. He hears dogs bark in the distance, and the customers seated at the café below seem undisturbed as they drink and eat. Pop music plays loudly from speakers and Will remembers it is Friday. The real night life in Fiesole has not even started yet.

Will begins to pace the periphery of the patio. "You can see me?" Will asks into the night, more a statement of fact than anything else.

"A loaded question." Hannibal says, "I thought I was seeing you before. Did I ever see…you?"

"You saw what you wanted to see."

"I saw what you wanted me to see."

"Same thing?"

"Perhaps they are."

"Then…I gave you what you wanted."

Hannibal's jaw tightens slightly. The words were meant to provoke. And they did. So infuriating…

Will stops pacing and stands still; lifts his head, and Hannibal can smell his sweat, his cologne, and the unmistakable odor of blood on the breeze. Hannibal thinks that Will seems composed and focused; almost as though he had been expecting this, or something like it. His senses are heightened with adrenaline, his instincts alert, and the killer awakened. Hannibal thinks it promising start.

Hannibal knows Will twists in his inferno still. His associations with Mason and Jack may not be as they appear, but the sting of the wound Will inflicted steeps in a poison too concentrated for a simple antidote. Will is too practiced at deception and Hannibal must tread carefully as he enters Will's inferno.

"Is that what you believe you are doing now?" Hannibal taunts gently.

"I didn't…wade into the quiet of my stream. I am…here." Will says evenly.

"And you believe that is what I want?"

"Isn't it? You left plenty of breadcrumbs in your kitchen."

"And the pantry. Plenty of blood and breath in there. How did you know to come to Florence?"

"How did you know about Freddie Lounds?"

“Ah. The fly in your ointment. Both of us have questions that require firmer ground for answers.”

“Agreed.”

“And while we may have to suffer the sins of omission, Will, I want no lies. I will extend to you the same courtesy. Are we agreed, this time?”

“I will answer you honestly.” Will bites at his lip. Honesty can be so costly. He considers that lies are pretty pricey, too.

“You took Mason’s money to find me.”

“Yes.”

“Knowing the twins would have killed you, both of us, once you found me.”

“Yes.”

“Have you come to kill me?”

“No.”

“To lock me away, then?”

“We’ve already had this conversion. It didn’t end well.”

Hannibal pauses, wets his lips. Will often resorts to sarcasm to either deflect or wound, sometimes both. Hannibal thinks this particular occasion invites both. Proof enough Will languishes still in the inferno of his own design. But meaningful that he has invited Hannibal to join him there. And what of Jack?

“Did Jack take you out of protective custody to hunt for me?”

“Yes.”

“In exchange for your testimony and dropped charges?”

“It seemed a no brainer at the time.”

“Where is Jack?”

“On a flight here I’d imagine.”

“You informed him of the twins’ disappearance. And Mason, too?”

“Both of them.”

“Uncle Jack has left you on a long leash. You aren’t supposed to be here, are you?”

“Not officially. I’m not what the FBI would call reliable.”

“You are dispensable. An embarrassment. Or, is that how Jack wants you to appear?”

“My association with you has effectively destroyed any remaining social ties I might have enjoyed, professionally or otherwise.”

“Fool me once, shame on you…but fool me twice…”

“Shame is up for grabs. You saw to that leaving your home intact, the grunts and poetry of life are now smeared across specimen slides.”

“There wasn’t time to arrange a cleaning service between the ambush and the bloodletting.”

“No…I suppose there wasn’t.”

“Jack knew about us, didn’t he?”

“I don’t know what Jack knew before…but he sure has a clear idea now.”

“Jack knew enough not to trust you. He does not trust you now.”

“I know.”

“We are surrounded by Greeks and Trojans. Uncle Jack has sent me his Trojan pony.”

“Yes…his broken Trojan pony.”

“Will you tell Mason or Jack you found me?”

“I haven’t found you. We’re just having a conversation.”

“Are you prepared to place us on firmer ground?”

Will imagines Hannibal crouching somewhere on the ground in the darkness, his muscular frame draped in black, the chiseled features and blonde locks swathed in dark fabric as sweat seeps from every pore. He suffers it without complaint. There are many things about Hannibal that Will has come to admire, his tenacity and capacity to endure discomfort only two.

Will closes his eyes and thinks there are many things he misses about Hannibal, too. Things he should not be thinking about right now. Especially, not now.

Even as Will shoves the thoughts away, the images flash of slamming his body, hard and erect against Hannibal, his mind raging and Hannibal taking every assault, absorbing all of Will’s need and then returning that need, so that Will sobbed against pillows, his fists clenching satin and the scent of sandalwood and spiced leather…

Hannibal watches Will clench his fists and open his eyes to fixate on the café below. He turns his head to gaze about the shrubs to Hannibal’s side, the shrubs that shield him and Hannibal waits, his breathing shallow, barely breath at all until Will speaks.

“I sent the twins to you. You sent Luciano back to me. You have Lucia. Is she dead?” Will says, resuming his pacing.

“Soon.” A long pause and then, “Why did you come to Florence, Will?” Hannibal asks with quiet restraint.

“Why did you accept my invitation?” Will says softly.

Hannibal notes the wistful expression. Will’s question is answer enough.

“There can still be truth between us, obfuscated, buried beneath deceptions and miscommunication, but we deserve to know the truth.”

“I’m listening.”

“You have the capacity to deceive me as I have the capacity to deceive you. But you also have the capacity to transcend the limitations you have placed on yourself.”

“Transcendence through transformation?” Will laughs and imagines himself tumbling through the heavens, scorched black wings and all, to crash upon the rock and rubble of his inferno.

Icarus fell not because he looked up, but because he looked down.

“Before I can be certain of your intentions, you must be certain of your intentions.”

“The twins have presented the opportunity to reveal the truth of my intentions? And what are your intentions?”

“They are as they have always been. Our conversations, Will, were only ever about you opening your eyes to the truth of who you are.”

“Who you want me to be.”

So infuriating, his Will. “Isn’t it possible they are one and the same?” Hannibal says patiently.

Will purses his lips and truth sits like bile upon his tongue. He swallows and offers Hannibal the only morsel of honesty he can. “I don’t want them to be the same thing.”

“That’s not an answer.”

“Then ask me something else.” Will shudders inwardly at the touch of feathers along his back.

“What do Mason and Jack know?”

“There was video of you accosting the twins at da Vinci airport. Luciano was the only positive ID.”

“But you knew. And you confirmed it for Jack.”

“And Mason.”

“The Paolini will want blood when they find out.”

“If they don’t already know from Mason.”

“How many snares have you placed around my neck this time?”

“How many will you allow?”

“Clever. The twins have been the instruments of Fate. I think we owe them a debt for bringing us together, for providing us with opportunity.”

“You would have me place a snare around my own neck.”

“Yes. You see the design. You once said that neither of us was ideal. But I still carry an ideal of you as you carry an ideal of me, ideals we shared for a time. Cherished ideals we might aspire to.”

Will closes his eyes and is momentarily transported to the red and white draped tent from his drugged out dream. Visions of the anguished Achilles bathing the still body of Patroclus fill Will’s head as he listens to Hannibal.

Hannibal wonders at the bowed head and furrowed brow. Wonders where Will’s imagination has taken him. Wonders at the impulse to cradle Will’s head in his hand and draw him close, to thread his fingers through the mane of curls at the nape of his neck, to inhale the scent of him warm and alive…

“We can use these ideals to frame our discussion. Intentions rendered in plain parallels. Simple. Elegant.” Hannibal says while desire rages beneath the stifling black suit he wears.

“Effective. Each of us understands the Iliad, its universal and its…personal connotations.” Will says taking a deep breath as he opens his eyes to scan the darkened yard again to no avail. Hannibal remains secreted among the terraces and flora that dot the hillside.

“To deviate from the ideal can be construed as a deliberate lie, deception, or false representation. Better than using pronouns to convey expectations, don’t you think?”

“Yes.” Will says admitting that Hannibal has found a unique way of keeping their discussion focused and honest. Will thinks this must be a first for him. “So, if we are surrounded by Greeks and Trojans…” Will begins.

“Then, Achilles and Patroclus must clear them away in order to have the honest conversation they desire.”

“Achilles no longer dwells among the Greeks. Why would he want to rejoin them? Achilles can leave anytime he wants.”

“Achilles would not leave his Patroclus. He would deliver him from the Greeks, of course. To destroy the Trojans, together.”

“And if they would survive the Trojans?”

“That would depend on whose armor Patroclus wore.”

“And, for whom he wore it.” Will says, ignoring the tines that seem to erupt along his back.

“Do you know what contrapasso means?”

“A symbolic demonstration of poetic justice. Specifically, the punishments of Dante’s nine circles of hell. The kind of poetic irony that appealed to the Chesapeake Ripper.”

“It did, and still does.” Hannibal agrees.

Will thinks of the circle of prints that hung in Hannibal’s salon. They represented four rounds of traitors in the ninth circle. Will thinks it not incidental that one of the rounds was named for Antenor, the betrayer of Troy. He was despised for his betrayal by both sides. Excluded by the enemy and his own. Hannibal's parallels begin to resonate as Will's perspective shifts and associations spark along the locked forts in his mind.

"Twin assassins. Twin tableaux. A double entrée. Served up at the same time I suppose."

Will rolls his neck along his shoulders and feels the weight of wings at his back. He is almost certain Hannibal can see dark feathers rising above his body as he shifts his feet along the bricks.

"Yes, but how many chefs?" Hannibal says.

"Create contradictory evidence. Misdirection. Hiding and revealing identities. Contrapasso reeks of the Ripper, yet evokes the Devine Comedy. The FBI will be thoroughly confused. And Mason will be…beside himself."

Hannibal smiles in the darkness. Will's dry wit never fails to tickle. The longing erupts anew. Hannibal has missed this so much…

"Mason may have written his own epitaph with that. As for Jack…isn't it the Ripper who Jack is looking for?" Hannibal says.

"You want to give Jack the Ripper?"

"I want to give Jack a Ripper. Twin tableaux, just alike. I will reveal myself. Will you?"

"Patroclus must answer to the Greeks. He'll have to borrow armor from them. You know I will be asked to look and reveal what I see."

"Patroclus need only slip on the armor of Menelaus for a while, just long enough to confuse. As leader of the Greek fleet, he is the only one to be concerned about. I suspect Patroclus and Menelaus enjoy an uneasy alliance anyway."

"That would be an accurate assessment."

"Your revelations need not be actionable. Merely…insightful. Patroclus need only reveal himself to Achilles. You've done it before. They know already, don't they?"

Will's thoughts spin as associations twine around his head. He swears he can see red rimmed eyes peering at him from a clump of shrubs.

They know.

You wanted Jack to come to dinner. You sent him to me so that you would not have to choose. Let Fate decide. Is that what you did, Will?

"The Greeks will be occupied and then the Trojans will strike. Achilles would not rob Patroclus of the honor of joining him. Patroclus cannot summon Fate this time." Hannibal chides.

Will bristles in the moonlight. The wound flares under his shirt. Hannibal knows and it is a relief that he knows. "Fate takes a holiday. The Greek fleet must sink and Troy must be reduced to ashes."

"And then the unveiling of identities can truly begin."

Hannibal watches Will nod, mere yards away from him. The ache to touch him teases at fingertips and twists around his chest. Will is aware of Hannibal's…appetites. It is the reason Will stands where he does, the only place on the patio where the moonlight shines unadulterated, his every movement caught in a luminous glow. If Achilles aches, so then does Patroclus.

"Another battle to test a…" Will hesitates, his tongue stumbling over the words, "a…friendship already frayed and…shattered."

"Fate and circumstance have returned us to a moment when the shattered teacup could be gathered up."

"That teacup would be missing a piece." Will sighs.

"A life without regret would be no life at all. And yet still be a life."

Both of them fall quiet, listening to the other breathe. The wound flinches and invisible talons scrape along his cheek. Will speaks first.

"We would have to synchronize our…efforts. Unassailable ambiguity."

"How much time do you need?"

"I think Sunday morning sufficient. Dawn."

"You already have a concept in mind? I am impressed."

"Can't wait to see yours."

Will's dry retort brings another smile to Hannibal's' lips.

"You'll be working alone. Unless…the doctor?" Hannibal asks, as he knows he must. Clayton is the unknown variable.

"What about him?" Will casts a wary eye toward the house.

"I'll not call on him, unless you give me reason to. How much does he know?"

"Enough not to interfere. At least until this evening. You forced him to be a part of this."

"Tsk. Tsk. I believe you must take responsibility for that. You chose to live with him."

"I was forced to defend myself, again. You have this habit of desecrating my…space."

"A most revealing way to describe your current residence. Very territorial, yet transitory. And you seem to have a peculiar habit of sleeping with your therapists. Does the doctor provide you with an adequate surrogate for me?"

"Your narcissism remains…unrestrained." Will says knowing Hannibal hears the tightness that betrays he has plucked a nerve.

"He looks remarkably like yourself and you think me the narcissist."

"My brand of crazy does not extend to narcissism. His appearance is…incidental."

"Perhaps. I think you are still missing pieces of yourself. Of which pieces of him have you availed yourself?"

Will smiles and hopes Hannibal can see. "I think it rude to ask."

"If it's any comfort, I instructed Luciano to leave the doctor unharmed. He didn't listen."

"I'll be sure to convey that to him." Will pauses, "Why would you tell Luciano that?"

"I'm curious about your association with him. He is neither Greek nor Trojan and his part in the story has yet to be written…by you. I should let you check his injuries. He may require stitches."

"Are you offering your services?"

"Would you prefer to call 911?"

The annoyed look on Will's face indicates he would not. Clayton may not agree. Hannibal will have to miss that conversation.

"I think the cut was superficial. I can see him in the kitchen. He seems…okay, for now."

"Then, I will leave him to you. Once the tableaux are discovered, your movements will be monitored."

"I'm aware of that."

"I have great faith in you, Will. Always have. You will try not to disappoint this time?"

"Everything I have done was only ever about doing what I thought best for both of us."

"And we see where that thinking has gotten us. How did you know to come to Florence, Will?"

Will sighs and paces. How Hannibal loves his quid pro quos.

"Of all the places we talked about, Florence was the only Italian city you never mentioned by name, the only one you never admitted to visiting, and given your interests I found that an odd omission."

Hannibal is taken aback. He doesn't remember consciously doing so, but he must have. Will has managed to surprise him yet again. So wonderfully, infuriatingly unpredictable…his Will.

"That's it?" Hannibal manages.

"I honed in on Hobbs on much less." Will reminds him. "How did you find out about Lounds?"

"I found her the same way I found you."

"That's…not an answer." Will counters, capturing Hannibal's tone and inflection perfectly.

"It is the answer I am prepared to give. I anticipate the topic of one Freddie Lounds to figure prominently in future…conversations. I look forward to our next encounter."

Will imagines those future conversations will provide opportunity for plenty of revelation and recrimination, but he holds his tongue. Hannibal is entitled to a little grousing. He has been generous, more generous than Will had imagined he would be. And every bit as self-serving.

“You won’t be invited to the crime scenes this time. How do you plan on viewing my…monument to Luciano?”

“Leave that to me. Sunday morning you said? I’ll be ready. May I call you again?”

“If you are extending the courtesy, sure.”

Will sighs into the phone, aware he doesn’t want to hang up and he thinks Hannibal is every bit as reluctant as he is. Will is not surprised when Hannibal offers a parting shot before ending the call.

“Of course. And Will?”

“Yes…Hannibal?”

“I am pleased you wear the same cologne. I like it on you. I would know it anywhere.”

Will stands on the patio as the silence fills the concentrated universe of a moment ago, expanding it, so that Will feels lost in the enormity. Whether Hannibal has moved or waits to move does not matter. The event horizon has dipped into chaos. Will has prayed for release from his inferno and Fate has sent him Hannibal.

God is beyond measure in wanton malice and matchless in his irony.

Will stands at the precipice of his inferno looking into the abyss. His mouth tastes metallic, his universe once again stale and sterile until he walks through the French doors into the kitchen.

Daniel stands at the counter and Will smells the ocean, feels the soft inviting mist envelop him, soothing nerves so raw, Will had not realized his senses had become numb to the prickle of a thousand needles along his flesh.

“You were out there for a while.” Daniel says.

Daniel gives Will the once over as he presses the cold facecloth against his stomach. As Daniel contends with his own emotions he is also inundated with the array of disturbing and conflicting emotions from Will. His own feelings are compounded by the added torrent and Daniel feels split in two.

He finds himself looking at Will from without and from within. Without knowing what was said between Hannibal and Will, Daniel knows the balance Will has tried so hard to maintain has shifted…toward Hannibal. The awareness that he remains Will’s anchor weighs heavily and as Daniel dabs more peroxide on his wound he wonders how long before Will snips the fraying tether altogether, to sail unencumbered toward the churning seas of Charon, to traverse Cocytus’ frozen lake, to finally catch the beast that chases him.

The scar under his shirt twinges in sympathy as Will looks at Daniel perched over the sink, dressing his wound. He hasn’t bandaged it up yet, allowing the wound to stop bleeding before wasting fresh gauze that Will knows is in short supply around the house. Daniel does not keep a ready supply of medical gauze on hand on the off chance an assassin comes knocking.

Will’s face falls with thoughts of the dogs.

“Where…are Cara and Bella?’

Daniel looks up and manages a thin smile. Encouraged, Will crosses to him and immediately grasps Daniel’s shoulder.

“They are in the garage. Probably not happy, but safe.”

Will’s entire body relaxes. “How bad is it?” Will asks leaning down to have a look.

“Not as bad as it could have been. Nothing like yours.”

As Will examines the wound, images of the assault register and he recreates the moment of Daniel’s dead drop in his mind. Luciano was flailing on instinct at that moment, aware a fraction of a second too late to adjust his thinking. The impulse to hold onto his bargaining chip remained too long before the instinct to attack the threat kicked in. As Will had hoped.

“Looks like the tip of the blade punctured, but the rest is a graze. You twisted away and the blade didn’t follow through. Lucky.”

“Doesn’t feel lucky.” Daniel says.

“It’s not going to get less dangerous, Daniel. I can’t…protect you. I’d be lying if I said I could.”

“Wouldn’t want you to lie, Will.” Daniel says, and the clipped words strike Will hard like a slap, which, he supposes is exactly what it is.

“You think I knew Luciano was coming here and didn’t tell you.”

“Did you?”

“I considered it, but telling you would have only made you nervous. I’m not surprised I hallucinated about killing at the hospital. What happened here was a possible outcome. What I explained to you, was the hoped for outcome.”

“I’m not following this time. I guess I don’t understand what you are basing the outcomes on.”

“You understand Hannibal pretty well, but you have only just met him. There’s a way we communicate that is…exclusive.”

“By design.”

“By intimacy. We are so far into each other’s heads that…”

“You’ll never really be alone. I know.” Daniel holds out the strip of gauze to Will. “You mind?”

Will nods and begins to wash his hands in the sink. He watches Daniel as he stares at the red stained water run down the drain. Will thinks those green eyes will pop right out of his head when he sees what Will plans on doing with Luciano.

He dries his hands and then sets to work wrapping the gauze around Daniel’s stomach. It should heal well. Daniel’s first aid kit was well stocked and Daniel knows how to use it. Will notes the bottle of Glenlivet on the counter has been opened, a tumbler sits beside it, pale amber residue pooling at the bottom.

Will nods at the bottle and Daniel grins. “Help yourself.”

Will doesn’t even bother to get out another glass. He refills Daniel’s tumbler a couple fingers full and tosses it down relishing the heat as the whiskey paints his throat. The heat radiates and Will is steadied in the moment. He refills the tumbler and hands it to Daniel.

Daniel accepts, but sips at the single malt, having already done a couple shots. He watches Will dress his wound as emotions ebb and flow, rolling waves breaking upon two shores. His, and Will’s.

“Tell me about these outcomes.” Daniel says.

“I told you what could possibly happen, not what might be more likely to happen. I sent the twins hoping Hannibal would find them snooping around. I believed he was in Florence and I had to shake him out because he wasn’t making appearances himself.”

“Sending the twins was like taking out a personal ad. The only kind Hannibal would respond to.”

“Yes. Words only get you so far with Hannibal. I had to know his intentions…about me. If he killed both twins and arranged them in one of his murder tableaux, then he would have been communicating a completely different message than the one he did send.”

“The first outcome, the one you told Jack and Mason about, would have been a taunt to all of you. Like turning his back on you…giving you the finger so to speak.”

“Exactly. My trespass forgiven, but not forgotten. A double tableau from him would mean he considered me the enemy.”

“But that’s not what he did. He wants you back.”

“And he provided the means to deliver to Jack what he wants while providing me the means to accept, if I want. Or, I can tell Jack what is going on and go after him with the FBI at my back.”

“But if you do, you’ll sever the connection between you, forever. And that’s not what you want. Does he know what you want?”

“He isn’t sure. That’s why he returned half the invitation. I can still play along, hook him like I did before, but it would be much more difficult this time. And my hands would be dirty again. If he goes down, so will I.”

“And that is a scenario you’re entertaining, isn’t it?”

“You think I moved past revenge to redemption?

“I think you think you can have both. Make the ultimate sacrifice. Martyr yourself and take him with you.”

“You are very direct. I’m not contemplating suicide, Daniel.”

“Martyrs don’t see their actions as suicide. Suicide sends us to hell. Martyrs go to heaven.”

“I don’t believe in heaven.”

"But you do believe in hell. You're already there."

Will blinks and bites his lip but decides not to comment. He stands back to allow Daniel to check the bandage. Daniel rubs his hand across the gauze wrapping and nods. He points to the amber prescription bottle on the counter and Will hands him the pain killers, noting how nice it must be to be able to prescribe any number of mind numbing opiates for yourself. He thinks it just as well that he didn't go to med school.

"You aren't seeking retribution or a reckoning any more. You want redemption. It's the only way out of your inferno."

"If I betray Hannibal again, if I join him in this joint venture only to turn against him, I will remain in that inferno because I…I don't want to betray him. I…don't even want to bring him in."

"You used Jack and Mason to get here. To find him. For what? For what, Will?"

"To find myself. You've known all along. You guided me here, to this place in my mind."

"So Hannibal is holding out an olive branch. And you think that leading him on in order to trap him isn't a path to redemption? After all he's done?"

"Not the path I need. Hannibal's universe is inverted. So is my inferno. Redemption is a concept. Concepts are malleable in Hannibal's universe, therefore, redemption is also inverted. Hannibal has let me know that betrayal is a cardinal sin for him. He placed that circle of prints in his salon for me. You know he casts himself and me in the lead roles of his own Iliad. It is no coincidence in his thinking that he placed the betrayer of Troy on his wall for me to see."

"Antenor. A signal that you would suffer the fate of Antenor should Patroclus ever betray Achilles. But you already did."

"Yes. And it is uncharacteristic of Hannibal to entertain self-doubt or offer second chances, let alone express that doubt. But he feels responsible for my betrayal. Sees it as a failure on his part."

"He left you alive so you could decide. He recognized how conflicted you were…are."

"And he is curious. Curious about me, but also curious if he made a mistake."

"Did he?"

"I wrestle with that every day."

"You are aware you must be the only person on the planet to rate such…courtesy."

"I am…painfully aware."

"Will, you do understand that you have this…habit…of allowing circumstance and fate make decisions for you. It's like Hannibal keeps tossing you the ball and you toss it up in the air."

"I remain…ever with that ill band of angels mixed, undecided and…indifferent."

"Huh. Well, in the meantime…what are you going to do…with that?" Daniel inclines his head toward the heap of bone and flesh beneath the throw blanket.

A wicked smile tugs at Will's lips as he looks into Daniel's anxiety ridden face.

"Can I use your basement?"

Luciano's body lay in pieces on a fold out picnic table in the makeshift morgue Will has hastily put together in Daniel's basement. The subterranean walls are cool and dry, the environment perfect for preserving the partitioned pieces of the naked corpse. Will's imagination has created a design that Hannibal should find sublime.

Jack will be outraged at the excess, the overkill, and Mason… Will smirks at the thought of Mason seeing the photographs Jack will surely pass on to him. Mason will most certainly be beside himself, and worried if he has not already completely lost his mind.

Will wipes the perspiration from his forehead. The basement may be chilly, but hacking up a body and removing its organs requires strength and precision if one wishes to do it right. And Will does want to do it right.

He had sent Daniel out with a grocery list of sorts and Daniel had been happy to oblige even at the late hour and despite his wound. Gulping down a handful of painkillers had likely helped his mood, but Will knows he will have to face the music with Daniel sooner or later. Sending him out of the house allows Daniel to put some distance between them, gives him time to think.

Will knows Daniel will not seek out the authorities. He knows how Daniel feels about him and Will is fully aware that he is exploiting those feelings to his advantage. He tells himself he did warn Daniel. Daniel is not blind to what Will is dealing with in Hannibal and neither is he mired in misconception about what Will is either. He has remained Will's therapist and much more. Daniel's therapy has been instrumental in Will's efforts to find his answers. Daniel has found ways to make nearly every moment between them at least tangential to therapy.

Will thinks Daniel might be filing recent events, even his grocery run, under therapy as well.

I'm going to need Saran wrap, too. A lot.

Will, it's after nine. There's stuff on this list that…

I'm not fussy and you are resourceful. We'll make it work.

What's this "we" Kimosabe?

Will suspects that Daniel's constant joking is his own coping mechanism kicking in. Will can identify with that. Daniel's wit often mirrors his own, and it has become progressively darker over the last couple weeks. His own feelings and thoughts and his empathy with Will's have become entwined to the point that Will doubts Daniel can discern between them anymore. Sending Daniel out provides some much needed separation, for Daniel's own mental health.

How many consciences devastated?

Despite the repeated cries of we're just alike, Will has not fully digested the mantra Hannibal had drilled into his head with such meticulous deliberation that Will could parrot the phrase back in identical intonation and manufactured accord. He had swallowed the conditioning as he had swallowed other delicacies from Hannibal's menu of madness, debauched indulgences, some tasty, some not so tasty. And Will had knowingly subjected himself to every single one.

Hannibal had, continues to have, an understanding of Will's mind that often eludes Will. He is a master at applying behaviorism because he does not exist within the same universe as everyone else. He has excluded himself from it, and to his thinking, has risen above it. His curiosity is pure, unfettered by conventional morality.

Which is why Will's gift of pure empathy enthralls, intrigues, and seduces him. Will acknowledges that the fact that that his gift comes wrapped in a pretty package seals the deal for Hannibal. Hannibal seeks to experience humanity from Will's perspective, to see and feel the ugliness and the beauty that for him has always been academic.

Hannibal exists in his epic universe of exclusion, but he is alone in it. Only Will and Will alone possesses not only the ability to give him the perspective he desires, but the ability to see him, understand and accept him for who and what he is truly is.

It is consistent with Hannibal's pathology that he cannot see any desire but his own. Typically, he cannot sympathize, let alone empathize with the ensuing carnage left in the wake of indulging his relentless curiosity. Until Will.

As angry, as enraged and wounded as Hannibal was that night in the kitchen, he could not bring himself to kill him. Hannibal did not allow him to live to punish him, leaving Will branded with a perpetual reminder of who gutted him and why was the punishment; to Hannibal's mind he had bestowed mercy, an inversion of his own universe, a cross into Will's universe, so that Will's gift would allow him to interpret the punishment for what it really was. An act of love.

Will remembers Hannibal's random acts of kindness interposed between the manipulations and utter destruction. Caught up in his own web of deceit and lies in his role of lure, Will had not gone beyond patting himself on the back for performing his part well. He had been too focused on his own conflicted emotions and on keeping up appearances to accurately interpret all of his interactions with Hannibal.

As he removes the slippery organs from Luciano's exposed chest cavity to slip one by one into freezer bags he can't imagine will fit in Daniel's fridge, he remembers one particular instance that had begun as manipulation on Will's part, but had turned into something genuine between them. Will thinks that the genuineness they had shared in the sanctity of the salon had started to spill into the embattled arena of wits outside its hallowed walls without Will or Hannibal realizing it.

Hello, Will.

Hannibal's words had punctuated the crisp air as he had stood on Will's front porch one dismal grey morning in Wolf Trap. Words spoken with the same timbre and tone that had spilled from the phone Will had held to his ear only hours ago. Rich. Affectionate. Intimate.

The dogs had been roused from their dozing in front of the fireplace to bark and Will had looked out the front window. Hopping on one leg while slipping the other into a pair of pants, he had wondered at Hannibal's shiny Bentley rolling up his drive. Will had opened his front door, dogs clustered and curious about who had been rapping softly, but insistently on the other side after Will had finished zipping up his fly. As he had opened the heavy wood to peer through the screen at the tall figure silhouetted by the winter sun at his back, Will had noticed the leather handled wood case in his hand and the drawing pads and easel under his arm.

"Hannibal…what…? Come in."

Will had opened the door and Hannibal had stridden inside, deposited his case, easle, and pads on a chair and had leaned over to greet the dogs sniffing at his trousers. He had tossed some treats none too slyly onto the rug causing Will to raise a cautionary brow at him which had sent Hannibal to slipping the plastic bag of indeterminate meat by-products back into his coat.

Hannibal had not worn his customary suit and overcoat that morning. He had stood in leather boots and thick umber colored corduroy trousers, emerald green pullover and thick wool sweater with zipper opened, looking like a country squire on retreat at his hunting lodge and quite at ease with himself. Will had watched him pull his suede jacket from his shoulders to drop it too into the chair. Will's fingers had absently retrieved his tepid coffee from his work table where he had taken his breakfast.

"It was late when you left last night, but I recall you had mentioned you wanted a drawing of a particular place." He had said, glancing at Will's work table adrift in tackle, feathers, and wire and the discarded remains of his breakfast. Bagel, cream cheese, and grapefruit, left largely uneaten on the plate.

"That is, if I'm not interrupting."

Will had stood coffee mug in hand and lips parted, awestruck that Hannibal had taken him up on his open ended invitation so quickly. The night before, he had stayed for Jambalaya and had drunk snifters of brandy in the salon afterward. Will remembers finally stumbling upstairs one hand clutching the bannister, a bottle of French Armagnac in the other. Will had been flipping through Hannibal's sketch pad earlier, before dinner, in the kitchen, while Hannibal had been prepping. Inspired by the artistic talent evident in the charcoals Hannibal had drawn of Will, on a whim, Will had asked him to draw a picture for him.

You should come out to Wolf Trap. Bring your supplies. There's a place less than half a mile from my house that might appeal to your aesthetics.

"Not interrupting at all." Will had said, fishing lures forgotten in the wake of Hannibal's arrival. He'd had plenty of time for Hannibal. He no longer had lectures to prepare for, no papers to grade. He had been unemployed, back in therapy, his only task to reel Hannibal in for Jack. Lounds had been in protective custody and Mason had been recuperating with his eels.

He and Hannibal had been perched precariously on the event horizon of total chaos, the imminent blood bath in Hannibal's kitchen was mere days away, but the two of them had been lost in the universe they had created, in a kind of calm before the storm.

"Coffee?"

"Thank you, no. I had some on the drive over. Left the thermos in the car."

Hannibal had gestured toward a chair, had waited for Will to nod, and had plunked himself down. "I'll wait while you finish getting dressed. You can show me the place you were talking about."

Will had rubbed at whiskers and had felt a smile spread across his face despite himself as he had looked at Hannibal sitting expectantly in the chair, waiting for him to pull on the rest of his clothes. Will often made other people uncomfortable; but never Hannibal. Will cannot remember an awkward moment between them. Their awareness of each other, their acceptance of each other had been complete.

"You could have mentioned coming over last night." Will had said, opening the drawer for socks and grabbing at rumpled flannel from the bottom of the bed.

"One never knows when inspiration will strike. I thought I would surprise you…"

This is the Hannibal Will wants. The one he came to know in the salon, the one who drove out to Wolf Trap to draw a landscape simply because Will had asked him to. Will had seized the moment to endear himself to Hannibal that afternoon while looking at nude sketches of himself, but he had been moved to ask Hannibal to come out and draw an actual landscape he'd had in mind because he had admired the talent and because he had wanted Hannibal's company. Had wanted to share a piece of his world with him, and apparently, Hannibal had been eager to accommodate him.

Will bites at his lip as he drops the large intestines he has just sealed in the bag into the ice filled laundry bucket. His mind burns, thoughts and memory consumed like flame to paper.

He has felt alone without Hannibal. And he does not want to be alone. But the Hannibal he came to know no longer exists.

The Hannibal who had sequestered Abigail for months, who had warmed to the idea of family so much, he had risked his practice, his home, and his life upon Will sharing it with him. A missed opportunity. That Hannibal will never be.

Instead, Will has inspired bitterness and distrust, reaffirmed all of Hannibal's darkest perceptions of humanity. He had believed Will above all that. In Hannibal's exclusionary universe, it is Will who has offended. If Hannibal had let loose the monster growing inside of Will, then Will had surely released a much darker monster in Hannibal.

Will has tried to imagine how the events of that night in the kitchen at 5 Chandal Square have changed Hannibal. Will's betrayal has left its mark; he'd had his reckoning and then some. But, Hannibal had been affected by Will long before that. Forgiveness may have fallen from Hannibal's lips that night, but that forgiveness had come with a terrible price. Wounds are supposed to heal. Uncertainty beats like a drum beneath the melody composed of all those orchestrations of carbon, beneath the grunts and poetry of their lives.

Will thinks if he is uncertain, then so is Hannibal. They are just alike, alone without each other. Hannibal sent Luciano to test him. To problem solve together. Hannibal wants, too. Hannibal is offering an opportunity to repair their fractured friendship. Hannibal will demand Will's actions seek forgiveness while he waits for the words.

Friendship can sometimes involve a breach of individual separateness.

You're not my friend. The light from friendship won't reach us for a million years. That's how far away from friendship we are.

Will laughs inwardly. Apparently, a million years passes quickly in Hannibal's universe.

I wanted to surprise you.

And you…wanted to surprise me…

Will's mind reels with Hannibal's proposal. It is unthinkable that he can wriggle out of it. Even if he packed and left on the next plane to anywhere, there would be consequences. There are always consequences with Hannibal. Will has suffered enough of Hannibal's consequences to know he dares not inflict them on anyone else. And Hannibal would.

Hannibal would eventually find Will, again. In the meantime, he would wreak his vengeance on those left in the wake of Will's departure. Daniel foremost among them.

Will decides to turn his mental efforts to reflect on their phone conversation. A conversation with Hannibal always requires repeated review. Will knows there were things said during the conversation that clicked, that tapped into his subconscious awareness. Hannibal had asked if Will had come to kill him. Or to lock him away.

Did you really feel so bad because killing him felt so good?

I liked killing Hobbs.

Killing must feel good to God, too. He does it all the time. And are we not created in his image?

How would killing me make you feel?

Righteous

I discovered a truth about myself when I tried to have you killed.

That doing bad things to bad people makes you feel good?

Yes.

If Hannibal is so bad, by Will's own admission, it should feel good to do bad things to him. But it wouldn't. Good and evil. Up and down. Dante suffered his journey through hell and escaped by accepting God's absolute divinity without question like any pious Catholic would in the Fourteenth century. He finds redemption for his own sin which, Will thinks it odd that Dante never discloses what it was the entire poem.

Will wipes his brow, sweat trickles beneath his chin and he impatiently wipes at that, too. His anatomy lessons with Hannibal as he had taken Tier apart guide his hands now as he systematically removes the organs in the order Hannibal had taught him. He thinks he will have to buy Daniel a new set of steak knives, however.

The anticipation of regret figures prominently in killing Hannibal, and Will should not anticipate any regret, quite the opposite, but he does. He would feel an overwhelming amount of regret.

Will wants out of his inferno. But he has trapped himself in his own circles of hell without a blueprint. Will's inferno is inverted because Will constructed it as Hannibal's home away from home. The devil is in the details. The answers are in his head, and he will find them.

Will knows the blueprint of Hannibal's thinking is in his head, fractured and scattered through their conversations. If the devil is in the details then Will needs to consider the negative to see the positive. If Hannibal exists in his own universe, then that universe must have its own structure. If Hannibal's universe is exclusionary, then it follows that his rejection of the normative universe would be based on a blanket rejection of its normative values. Values catalogued in the standard guide book normative society professes to revere.

What is the gospel according to Hannibal? Hannibal wants to know why Will hasn't killed him. Hannibal wants to know the gospel according to Will, too.

Daniel sits in his driveway looking at his house and wondering what he will find inside when he goes in. He has managed to find everything on Will's list and spend less than he thought which is a good thing because he is about out of cash. None of his purchases are traceable at least on paper. As for cameras, Daniel is not certain, but he decides that consideration is quite beyond his control as he fumbles with the keys in the ignition.

He lugs a couple bags of Will's supplies out of the trunk and begins hefting them up the walk thinking there is quite a lot beyond his control. He wonders if Will would consider control an illusion or another malleable concept. He sniggers as he drops the bags onto the kitchen table and thinks Will would find control an illusory concept.

The dogs sniff at his sneakers and sweat pants and he digs through the supplies to find the bag of dog treats. The bag proves problematic to open; his fingers can't seem to grip the little ribbon properly to rip the seam, so he tries tearing the bag with his teeth. He hears thumping from the basement steps and turns to see Will climb to the landing just as treats spill from the bag that hangs empty from Daniel's mouth.

"Oops." Daniel manages letting the bag drop from his lips onto the floor.

Will grips his mouth with his hand to keep from smiling. Daniel is swimming in oxycodone. He clearly over medicated, probably on purpose. He heaves a deep sigh and decides this is going to be a long night.

As Will kneels down on the floor to retrieve the treats the dogs have not gulped down, he collects his thoughts and decides on the best way to deal with the spaced out Daniel. How quickly their roles have reversed.

"Are there still bags in the car?"

"Um…yeah. I'll get them. Where did I park?"

"It's ok. I'll get them. Where did you put the med…ah, I see it."

Will gets up and grabs the bottle of pills from the counter, puts them in his pocket. He turns to find Daniel staring at him, a very lit grin spreads across his smooth cheeks and the bruise Will gave him shines beneath the glare of the overhead light. Daniel is a bit of a mess and Will is to blame for it, all of it.

"Will?" Daniel says as he slides into a chair to slump over the kitchen table. "I want to know what you are going to do with all that stuff…in my car."

"You already know."

"No, no. I mean what are you making…exactly?"

“I think you should…maybe take a little nap before we get into all that.”

“I know I’m high…didn’t mean to but, well…oops. But with Luciano…what kind of contrapasso are you planning for a hired assassin?”

Will opens the fridge and takes a bottle of water. He grabs one for Daniel and cracks it open for him. Daniel is high on pain killers, but he’s lucid enough for conversation. Will thinks he might become sleepy with the effort of talking and the steady drone of their voices. Will can use a break from the tedium downstairs. He rubs at his eyes thinking perhaps he must be beyond tired to characterize the nightmare downstairs as tedium.

He pulls up a chair to share his madness with his traumatized and drugged out therapist. Will thinks the number of ways with which one can ruin people’s lives must be endless. And Will isn’t even a psychiatrist.

“I mean,” Daniel starts up again, “…what is all the fucking Saran wrap for?”

“I’ll explain, but are you sure you want to help me? I can do this by myself. I’m already using your house. I have made you complicit in a criminal act.”

“I’m helping you desecrate a corpse. A slap on the wrist.” Daniel says taking a sip of water.

“By the time this is all said and done, I doubt that would be the only charge brought against you. You could lose your license.”

“When I tell them this is therapy I imagine I’ll be out of a job anyway.”

In for a penny, in for a pound.

Will shakes his head. Daniel is as stubborn and as crazy as he is. Will is certain Daniel’s empathy has more to do with the similarities than either of them realized.

“Daniel, you have done enough. Been exposed to enough. If you want to sit this out…”

“You think I don’t know what all this means?”

Daniel waves his arms around the kitchen, gestures toward the basement steps.

“You tell yourself there are reasons you have to do this. That you have no choice, that he could frame you, plant evidence like he did before, even that he threatened you, or me, if you didn’t. But you want to do this, Will. I know you do.”

Will sits quietly listening. He can’t argue with Daniel because it is true.

“You need to free yourself from your inferno. You want redemption, in whatever form that might take.”

“Yes.” Will says simply. “Will you help me?”

Daniel looks into Will’s eyes, and his chest tightens like a rock inside. The ache runs so deep he can barely stand it. He wants what he cannot have and it is own fault he let his feelings for Will go this far. With every touch and taste of Will and his universe, Daniel has sunk so far down in Will’s rabbit hole that he is mired in it up to his neck.

And it is out of this well of love that his desire to help springs. Daniel cannot help who he is any more than Will can help who he is. Daniel's eyes mist up, but tears do not spill. He tells himself he won't let the tide of emotions that are suffocating him spill down his face as he looks at Will.

"I have never hated myself more than I do right now, in this moment, but I will not go quietly into the night, Will. Yes. I will help you."

It takes Will but second to reach across the table and pull Daniel close. He presses his forehead to Daniel's and waits for the knot in his throat to sink to his stomach where it roils with all the other knots coiled like serpents in a pit.

"I'm sorry." He mumbles into soft curls so like his own.

"So am I." Daniel mumbles back.

* * *

Since Daniel's basement is situated deep in the ground at the top of a hill, it's location permitted the architect to design a drainage system that includes a drain in the floor. Will is eternally grateful for such foresight as he scrubs the floor.

Use the organic cleaner, Will. Bleach is much too obvious and it will change the color…

He checks his phone for the time. Almost eleven, but it seems later than that. He glances at the coolers stacked against the wall and at the selectively sectioned corpse on the table and sighs in resignation. He still has a lot of work to do. He thinks he should put on a pot of coffee. Perhaps some of that espresso Daniel keeps in the fridge.

Daniel is asleep on the couch upstairs. He insisted he would only need a nap, no need to go up to third floor where it is at least ten degrees warmer. Will hopes he sacks out for the night. The thought of sleep is appealing but Will knows he has to wrap up the pieces of Luciano on the table and get them chilled and stiff before he can assemble his monument.

He blinks his eyes into focus and places the mop back in the bucket before turning his attentions back to the table and the boxes of Saran wrap. As he begins wrapping Luciano's head with its smashed nasal passages and splintered brow he hears the hum of his phone as it vibrates. He swallows and reaches for it at the other end of the table.

He stifles the temptation to mute the damned thing and picks it up.

"Hello, Jack."

"Hello, Will. Sorry to call so late. I just landed at da Vinci, couldn't get the flight I wanted into Peretola. Am I interrupting anything?"

"Nothing in particular." Will says. "You called to tell me you landed?"

"I called because I thought you might have some concerns about not hearing from me for a couple days. I guess I was wrong about that."

"No…I am concerned, just…tired. It's late. Please…go ahead."

"All right then. Glad we're on the same page."

"Same old page, Jack."

"I take it nothing happening on your end? No news of the twins?"

"No news. No goodies in the trunk of their rental car?"

"Zip. Zee and the crew went over it with a fine toothed comb, but it doesn't seem they even got in the vehicle. Plenty of evidence confirming their identities in the luggage though."

Will frowns remembering the email from Zee. "How is Zee, anyway?"

"Good. They're all good. Some new people you have never met… I should tell you that I've brought Mason back into it, provisionally."

"What do you mean, provisionally? He wants me dead, Jack."

"I didn't tip our hand, but if I don't there won't be anyone to control the Paolini and my sources tell me that they can really fuck up an investigation if they decide to. I'll keep an eye on you, I promise."

Will has no doubt of that.

"What's done is done, then. Where are you staying? Not driving to Florence tonight are you?"

"I'll be in Rome a couple days. I have to meet with the Interpol liaisons and coordinate with them first. I can't work with the local LEOs in Florence until I do."

"And how is Purnell with all of this? Does she know I'm here?"

"That…is the other reason I called, Will."

"That…doesn't sound good."

"It isn't. You are now here very provisionally. I'm going to need your psychiatrist to sign off on you. It will keep you in the country, Will. Can he do that?"

"You mean just rubber stamp me, or…"

"Will. Just get it done or start packing."

"Fine, Jack. I'll have the paperwork by the time you see me. When will that be anyway?" Will says as he tugs at another piece of wrap for the chunk of shoulder he holds in his other hand, phone tucked between ear and neck.

"Not until after the weekend. I'll call when I know more."

"Okay." Will says wondering how much longer Jack is going to take. Will thinks he must have to go claim his baggage or something.

"Before I let you go, I wanted to pick your brain about something." Jack says.

Will glances at the freshly scrubbed head of Luciano, face flattened with a yard of wrapping.

"Pick away. What's on your mind?"

“If Hannibal has both the twins, and I’m sure he does, how do you think he will display them?”

“You mean the logistics or the actual arrangement?”

“The logistics. That’s two bodies. He’s never done a double before.”

“He’s never had two assassins after him before. Two bodies would mean more chances of leaving evidence. He’ll have to be very careful.”

“That’s what I’m talking about. Is it possible he would do them separately?”

“That’s a good question, Jack. But they are twins. He might use that in his design.”

“You know them, know their…habits.”

“Habits won’t matter. They were sent to kill him; that’s enough of an affront right there. But, to punish them, to insult the family, he might separate them. They are, were inseparable. I never saw them apart.”

“Huh…there was a reason for that I think you are aware of.”

“I was. What does Mason think about all this?” Will cracks his neck and gives up trying to wrap and hold the phone at the same time.

“Mason has people scrambling to smooth things over with the Paolini. Like I said, I need him. He just wants Hannibal more than ever. As do I.”

“Well, Jack, I’ll give the twin angle some thought. And read up on Sardinian culture and recipes. You should probably do the same if you haven’t already.”

“Recipes?”

“Which organ meats do Sardinians prefer? Hannibal will celebrate by making an authentic dish.”

“Oh for fuck’s sake… That’s…probably a good idea but I doubt I’ll have the time to do any research. That’s what you get to tag along for. I’ll uh…call you in a couple days then. Thanks for picking up.”

“No problem. Good night, Jack.”

“Good night, Will.”

Will clicks off his phone and rubs at his face as he lifts his head to stare at the rafters. He shakes his head and presses teeth to tongue as he stifles the chuckles that threaten to erupt amidst the anxiety and the fatigue. As he stands staring at the naked bulb overhead, he decides to put on some of that espresso and go splash his face with some cold water a few times.

The thought occurs to him that he hasn’t had any hallucinations since he started working. He can’t decide if that is a good thing, or a bad thing. His entire day has felt surreal. Will's thoughts are drawn to the message from the winged Daniel of his inferno.

All that we see or seem is but a dream within a dream.

Will thinks that about sums up his day.

Chapter 60

Hannibal reflects on his conversation with Will as he drives back to Impruneta and Lucia. Things get a bit hot in the basement between Will and Daniel. Daniel keeps his canine therapy session with Du Maurier. Will receives a call from D'Angelo while Hannibal talks with Robera. And no tableau would be complete without a conversation with Hannibal.

Marriage of Heaven and Hell, Roberto Ferri

Hannibal guides the dark green Volvo off road and parks beneath the canopy of fig trees lining the secluded and dusty asphalt country road that twists around the Tuscan orchards and farms several miles from the main highway. He tugs the plastic liners from between the cushions of the front seats, liners smudged with DNA laden oil and sweat from his body and from Luciano's. He rolls them up tightly, securing them with rubber bands he pulls from the front pocket of his trousers.

He pops the trunk and removes the knapsack that contains the black body suit he had worn in Fiesole and stuffs the plastic inside. He checks the trunk once more out of seasoned habit, eyes trailing along the supplies he leaves for Will should Will desire to avail himself of them.

Hannibal's tongue pokes at the inside of his cheek as the smile provoked by his encounter with Will spreads across his face, refusing to disappear completely. Exchanging and trading in each other's thoughts like mental currency leaves him hungering for more.

Hearing eagerness billeted beneath resignation in Will's words had been gratifying but Hannibal knows lies from Will's lips taste just as sweet as truth. Hannibal has been seduced by those lips before and his mouth still bears the taint of their betrayal.

Betrayal cloaked in ideals, ill-fitting frocks pulled from a closet of despoiled innocence, too ragged and sullied to wear though Will still tries to slip them on and make them fit. So infuriating…

Hannibal begins to wipe down the dash, steering wheel, and doors in his compulsive thoroughness. He had worn gloves the entire time he had been in the car with the doomed Luciano, but to leave the vehicle without giving it a once over would be unthinkable.

Choosing a Volvo had not been incidental on Hannibal's part. Should Will choose to avail himself of Hannibal's largess he will appreciate the sentiment in selecting a vehicle that resembles the one he used to leave ensconced in Hannibal's drive behind the kitchen in Baltimore. The car is at once a token of affection tarnished perhaps, but unparalleled, and the car functions as an extension of erstwhile utility. Hannibal has filled the trunk with rolls of plastic and a well packed tool box filled with an assortment of tapes, measures, and other sundries no discerning killer could do without.

Hannibal glances toward a clearing not far from the Volvo. His black and silver Ducati Monster sits secluded under the fig trees, the chrome barely discernable from this distance. The rest of the ride back to Impruneta should be invigorating.

He will call Will to inquire exactly where he plans on depositing his masterpiece this time. Hannibal will require a brief visit to the location to retrieve the requisite evidence linking the two tableaux before he completes his own. Will cannot and should not be the one to do it. Will's surprise at learning of it should be genuine in front of Uncle Jack. They will most certainly find Hannibal's tableau first unless Will finds an even more public place to place his.

Hannibal imagines teeth raking at tender lips, Will's outward expression thoughtful as Jack gazes at him coldly when the location for the second tableau is revealed in the first. The thought elicits rumbling deep in his throat. Hannibal's breath hitches as he chides himself for the unbidden protectiveness that surfaces still where his fledgling cub is concerned. Will will be surrounded not only by Greeks, but by the well-armed Italians policing the provinces, the Romans and Etruscans as it were. Uncle Jack will not be the only badge with which Will will have to contend.

Patroclus' feet tread foreign soil and there is the viper waiting her chance to strike as well.

The anticipation is palpable; Hannibal's mouth is wet with it. He also relishes his return to Impruneta for the lovely and also doomed Lucia. Hannibal's intentions regarding his own tableau reflect his penchant for the poetic irony Will knows well and this time, the added classical allusion Will should find perfectly apropos.

Hannibal can imagine the consternation painted across what remains of Mason's face as Jack or Will, or both of them, explain to him the tableaux. Hannibal doubts Mason's peculiar proclivities endow him with the inclination to stick the knife any more deeply than to test the thickness of the skin, either actual flesh or corpus of literature. Despite Mason's wealth, he remains vulgar and in Hannibal's estimation bereft of any redeeming value.

Will's tableau should prove equally provocative and Hannibal's blood quickens as he thinks how exhilarating it is to await the unveiling. There is a curious sort of joy, an invocation of the divine in the pure and primal love Will engenders. Purity arising transformed from bitter ashes to shine its incandescent light. Light that Hannibal basks in now.

Hannibal remembers a sonnet from La Vita Nuova, this particular sonnet had played in his head while visiting Will in BSHCI for the first time. The prose sung by ethereal voices had filled his mind as he had walked along the dank corridor toward Will's cell. Looking into Will's eyes as Will had greeted him standing defiant on the other side of the bars; Hannibal had felt like the smitten Dante watching his lover eat his heart.

Hello, Doctor Lecter…

Will could not have known the sacrifice Hannibal had made sending him there, the pagan poet caught in the flames of hell, Hannibal had felt the rending of Will's pure heart as though it had been his own, pierced for Hannibal's sins. Only Will possesses the sensitivity, the empathy, to understand the absolute purity of Hannibal's love.

Certainly for Will, understanding that love had given rise to fear; so much fear that Will had not recognized it for what it was until he had found himself clinging to life on Hannibal's kitchen floor. Then as now, he still fears that love and the shades of death always hovering beside the fear of loss. Will is learning how to manage his anticipation of regret. Regret at his own loss of innocence, and Hannibal imagines, regret over the loss of Clayton's. Because of his gift, fear has always been Will's constant companion

Hannibal has wrestled with regret and finds his opponent a most difficult adversary. He wonders if he should tell Will it was the anticipation of regret that had guided his hands that night in the kitchen. Anticipation of regret so raw it would tighten around his throat and choke him, and Hannibal had feared it would strangle him. The wound Will has left upon his heart is enough.

Perhaps, someday he will tell him.

Impulses can be controlled with restraint and conquered with obedience.

Will has yet to accept his inspirations for what they are. Obeying his nature will free him from his inferno unless Will does not desire to be free. So unpredictable, his Will.

Hannibal understands that there are other emotions; other impulses at war within Will that cry out to be controlled. Affection for Clayton tugs at him, but the thing that truly rivals Hannibal for Will's heart is Will's misplaced sense of right and wrong, good and evil. The mirrors in his mind reflect the beliefs of everyone around him, a relentless river of reinforcement raging through his consciousness.

As Hannibal slips on his jacket for the ride, he replays their conversation, paying close attention to every word exchanged; seeking insight from the inflection in the voice he knows so well, the voice he has heard in his mind every day for the past year. Will had agreed to be honest and Hannibal believes he had been, but sins of omission remain between them. There is meaning in what Will did not say, significance couched in the pauses, and implications buried in the deliberate articulations. Will never says anything he does not mean to say, but his intentions are often compromised by his empathy.

And therein lies the truth.

Everything I have done was only ever about doing what I thought best for both of us.

Hannibal knows Will believes his intentions good, if not imperfectly righteous. The statement is consistent with everything about Will, despite the mocking tone. Will is constantly adjusting and readjusting his thinking to align with his beliefs and as he opens his eyes to who he is, the more difficult it is for him to see himself aligned with his beliefs. If he cannot reconcile these concepts in his mind, he will twist away in his inferno. He will twist until he can bear it no longer and then he will believe the only way out is to sacrifice himself.

Can't wait to see yours.

Of course Will wants to see it. He is thrilled at the very idea. The part of Will that Hannibal awakened did not sink quietly into slumber, nor did it bleed out on his kitchen floor. This design ensures that Will has as much to lose as Hannibal. Unless, Will intends to play them all so he can martyr himself in a singular act of hoped for absolution. Hannibal knows it is within Will to seek redemption for his believed sins. The question remains whether Will intends to seek redemption from Hannibal, the FBI, or himself. He would not put it past Will to embed a design of his own within Hannibal's design. So infuriating…

Sometimes all we can do is watch.

Du Maurier's cynicism will be her undoing. Achilles will have his Patroclus if he must raze Troy a thousand times. He will have him if he must stay Patroclus' own hand to do it. Will has committed no sin except for his betrayal in Baltimore. He has already suffered his punishment for that and been forgiven.

Hannibal peers into the darkened road ahead of him and thinks Will sees only darkness as well. Hannibal knows Will has not forgiven him. Knows it as surely as the wound in his chest throbs with regret. Will cannot forgive Hannibal because he cannot forgive himself. He would rather burn in his inferno, torment himself rather than embrace who he has become.

Will has condemned Hannibal to join him in his inferno. As Will suffers, so does Hannibal. Will's backhanded punishment. Hannibal almost laughs aloud as thoughts collide. Will withholds the forgiveness Hannibal seeks to punish him, knowing that what injures Achilles also injures Patroclus, but the reverse is also true. Hannibal punishes himself as he wallows in his pit of regret, picking at his wound because in sealing it up and allowing it to heal; he would have nothing left of Will at all.

For what sin is Will punishing him for?

Unless they can bridge this chasm between them, Hannibal knows they will never extend their universe beyond the confines of his salon. The salon is gone. Baltimore is gone. Hannibal's thoughts fall like droplets of rain until they form a running stream, a stream Hannibal would like to fill again…with trout.

Will would not be twisting in his inferno if he could accept that body and soul, good and evil, are not separate and God does not torment his creation for indulging one over the other. Often pathetic creature that he is, God's creation punishes himself without any help from his almighty deity. God created good and evil and his creation is free to indulge either and both at his pleasure. Indeed, Hannibal muses as he secures his knapsack to his black Ducati, both Christ and Satan had once sat beside God, and God had loved them both.

For Hannibal, Christ and Satan are interchangeable, archangel and messiah, and which was cast out of heaven depends on one's point of view. Will's fear, his anticipation of regret may impel him to commit an act of redemption rather than accept fear and regret as part of becoming.

Hannibal hopes that Will's radiance this evening holds the portent of comet, not blazing meteor.

Will has placed Clayton in an unenviable and awkward position. As his therapist, Clayton is bound by confidentiality although Hannibal suspects Clayton requires very little, if any, motivation to keep Will's secrets. Will has shared forbidden fruit with him, has sewn seeds in trusted and fertile ground. An act of creation that will have its destructive consequence.

Hannibal considers Clayton's many assets, assets he himself has found agreeable enough. As Hannibal had cared for the unconscious Clayton at Du Maurier's guest house, he had not dreamed the life he held in his hands would be his to bestow or take again so soon. For now, Hannibal is content to leave Will's supports in place though the death knell raps. Faintly, ever so faintly it raps. Until the rapping becomes thunder in Will's chest.

If Will's state of mind after taking Tier apart was any indication, Clayton will have his hands full… of Will. A slight tic twinges at Hannibal's eye as he thinks of the aftermath of Tier and the lost weekend he had shared with Will, and the envy salts a wound sore and ravenous for reconciliation. Clayton will be the one entertaining Will's angelic demon now that he has let it out.

Hannibal does not tarry by the side of the road. He has noted the mile markers so he can relay to Will the location of the vehicle. He thinks Clayton may have some reservation about using his claret colored Mercedes to transport the macabre monument. Will had brought Tier to Hannibal's home in his own car, had been in control of his resources. Watching Will scramble to please him is its own reward, but Hannibal will not have Will's vision compromised by lack of autonomy. Will will want to keep Clayton's hands clean and Hannibal concurs. Will will require a sterling alibi.

Hannibal drops the keys in a small magnetic box and attaches it to the metal underside of the rear bumper. He has another fifteen minutes' ride before reaching his villa having left the Volvo at a nearly half way point between Impruneta and Fiesole. He climbs atop the Ducati and speeds off down the darkened back roads, wind whipping brown locks across his sun kissed face.

He wonders if Will will be able to pick him out among the warm bodies circling his murder tableaux once law enforcement descends upon it. Hannibal's altered appearance affords him some camouflage, some anonymity. Hannibal should be able to navigate his way around the crime scene without drawing much attention. There will be all kinds of people there; the site will be teaming with the local police, the FBI, Interpol, and reporters. Not to mention the curious.

Hannibal already has a bag packed, complete with binoculars.

As he weaves the bike along the road toward the main highway, Hannibal's' thoughts turn to Will, specifically his performance on the phone this evening. Though his hair and clothes had been in disarray from the struggle with Luciano, Will's tone and body language had been perfect. His head had alternately bowed in contrition or shame, or lifted in a show of defiance. Both affectations carefully calibrated to align with equally crafted responses. The intermittent pacing had seemed both predatory and petulant. Will has done this before and done it well. Or, Will's mannerisms had been genuine, accurate reflections of his conflicted soul.

Images of the fight send another tug to his lips. It had been a first to watch Will indulging his instincts; a sight Hannibal looks forward to seeing more of, as Hannibal expects they will. But Will's words and attitude on the patio had hit every note Hannibal had hoped for. The same disconcerting dilemma arises for Hannibal. Had he seen and heard a creation of empathic design or had he seen and heard Will?

Will had admitted to Hannibal after killing Hobbs that imagining someone else killing had become more difficult for him. Killing Hobbs had provided Will with a previously untapped frame of reference. His own experience leaked into his imagination, leaving its own imprint. When Will had resumed his therapy, his intention had been to trap Hannibal and he had used his imagination to create a mirror image of Hannibal in himself.

Hannibal reasons that it must be just as difficult for him to separate the mirror he created from self afterward. Hannibal's act of destruction had disrupted Will's transformation, but he has continued to adapt, evolve, and become. This joint venture will reveal to Hannibal just how much. Becoming Hannibal was part of his becoming. Therefore, it is likely difficult if not impossible for Will to separate the residue of the mirror from the Will who had awakened in the hospital after his baptism of blood in the kitchen.

Despite Uncle Jack's unimpressive grasp of Will's gift, Hannibal thinks Jack understands more than he lets on. Hannibal had certainly explained plenty to him about Will and his gift while staring into Jack's large unblinking brown eyes when Will had been suffering from encephalitis under his exclusive care. Enough for Jack to believe a killer lurked inside his unsociable and testy profiler. Jack is counting on the inner turmoil to make the bait tastier as he throws Will back to Hannibal.

If Hannibal thinks Jack is setting Will up, the thought has also occurred to Will. Jack is already expecting Will's complicity in whatever death tableaux turn up. Will had needed Jack to know Tier's killer. His carefully delivered comments at Tier's crime scene had conveyed that. This time, Will's comments will be deliberate misdirection and Jack will be expecting misdirection. Will knows this. Hannibal wonders if Jack knows that Will knows.

Jack could live with the regret of losing Will to catch Hannibal. He has written Will off before. A second time would be much easier. Will is truly alone. Even his association with Clayton, no matter how intimate, cannot endure the breach of universes that Hannibal's invitation has introduced. And while Will is equipped to handle chaos, Clayton is not. Neither is Jack.

Jack would like to be the man who catches Hannibal. His efforts to catch him so far have seen the loss of his wife and the near ruination of his career. Jack wants vindication. He has nothing left but to catch Hannibal. Hannibal decides that Jack will keep his own counsel. He will listen, but Jack is through with entertaining anyone's ideas other than his own. It is possible then, that Uncle Jack can be convinced to cut his losses and go home should he be presented with an open and shut case for Hannibal's demise.

Will did not come to Florence to kill Hannibal. But dying may be just what Hannibal needs to do.

Hannibal cannot forget that Du Maurier brings her own pieces to the board. She will no doubt press Clayton for information. She expects to see him tomorrow with his therapy dogs. Hannibal may have to set aside some time from his busy weekend for her.

As he pulls up to his villa Hannibal imagines the pug nosed Lucia looking anxiously around the dim confines of the guest room, listening for signs of her brother's return so the family can be contacted to negotiate their release. Fortunately, she will not have to live with her disappointment for long.

Daniel watches Will from the top of the stairs. Cara and Bella yawn at him from where they lay on the rug. The mantle clock reads a little after four and Daniel frowns at its cracked face and consoles himself that at least his heirloom from back home was not completely broken in the fracas. He has tidied up his living room, a necessary if not emotionally taxing activity and the task had occupied his mind, for a little while.

He had awakened from troubling dreams, variations on the reality that had assaulted his home and his person earlier. He has not taken any more medication. He is still somewhat numbed, he can't feel the pain when he moves, not much anyway, and he can't seem to find the meds. He glances beneath his shirt and is relieved to find no seepage along the bandages Will applied as well as any boy scout.

He watches the deceptively sweet looking boy scout below as he chops at the dismembered pieces of their assailant. The picnic table will have to be trashed. Even if it survives Will's battering, he could never use it again without remembering this. Besides, explaining the numerous gashes would require a lot of embellishment. As he glances around the basement from his perch the realization that there is no place in his home left untainted by Will unravels like a ball of string to roll around his mind.

He kicks the ball of string away and descends the stairs after clicking on some music. Will's head turns to the stairs at the sound. Pachelbel's Canon in D queues up. Daniel feels the swell of emotions from Will thrumming in his chest, emotions that collide with his own as the sounds of the soaring violins from above fail to deliver the sought after solace.

"Daniel! You don't want to be down here." Will frowns, "And, you don't need to put on any music. Certainly, not…that."

"Why not?"

Daniel continues to walk down the stairs. He stops at the last step and places both of his bare feet on the cold cement with pointed deliberation.

"Listening to Brandenburg concertos in your head?" Daniel asks.

"Daniel…" Will starts, prickling at the stark insinuation. He prickles not because it is stark, but because it is true.

Daniel hears the warning in Will's voice and ignores it. He knows what killing and creating does to Will. Will has not only told him, Will's emotions are on display every bit as much as the select chunks of raw rigid flesh strewn across the picnic table.

"I'm partial to number four. Which is your favorite, or um…maybe I should ask which one is Hannibal's favorite."

"Is that supposed to be funny?"

Will rubs at his eyes. He does not want to have this, or any conversation with Daniel right now. His mind is aflame with unspoken desires that flare with every breath Daniel takes.

"Not at all." Daniel's green eyes flash, "Your associations are only one of the multifaceted issues being addressed in your therapy."

"I give you permission to stop being my therapist for a little while. In fact, I insist."

"Impossible, I'm afraid. Especially since Hannibal is countering my therapy with his own. And that is what he is doing, isn't it? Offering a second opinion…at least alternate therapy?"

"Stop it. You said you would help. This is helping?"

"Isn't it? You seem to be responding well to Hannibal's field theory. Hannibal is very aware of your awareness. He's relying on behaviorism to supplement your experience in the now by saturating it with the residue of your past."

"It would seem I am immersed in residue…yes."

Will thinks fleetingly that he is saturated with therapy. Dropping paddles and anchor to drift on the open sea suddenly sounds appealing.

“Have you put on your Hannibal suit to make this or is this…you?”

Daniel gestures at Will, eyes drawn to the blade of the cleaver that catches the glare of the bulb hanging overhead.

Will thinks Daniel must still be high to confront him like this, while he is holding…this. Will sets down the cleaver and wipes his hands with the damp towel that hangs over one shoulder. He lets the towel slip onto the table and crosses the room to Daniel. He slams Daniel against the wall, not painfully, but the look on Daniel’s face confirms Will has his complete attention.

“Go back upstairs, Daniel. You aren’t yourself, and this…isn’t the help I need.”

“Do you lie for me, or for you?”

Daniel feels the cool stone at his back as he shifts between the wall and Will. He holds Will in his gaze and grins at him. He licks his lips in response to the heat emanating from the taut and perspiring body pinning him in place as much as the scent of blood in the air. His senses tingle, nerves scream beneath his skin, and his cock thickens inside his boxers, the tightness of the fabric between his legs rubs pleasantly as he grinds against Will.

Will realizes Daniel is mirroring his emotions, his shield unable to function, dulled by the opiates that pulse through Daniel if his dilated pupils are any indication. The tense limbs and erect cock pressing against Will’s legs confirm Daniel’s shield is the only thing dulled by the meds. Seeing Daniel like this is like seeing a reflection.

Daniel wants Will to make new associations, even now, especially now as Will recreates a scene from his past with Hannibal in his basement. While Will relives his experiences in his mind, Daniel wants to impact the present with his own imprint.

…I will not go quietly into the night, Will.

As if reading his thoughts, Daniel leans in to press soft lips into his hair, to hum into an ear attuned to the music above and the beating of the heart against his own.

“I feel what you feel. I know what you want…” Daniel rasps softly, fingers coiling around tempting curls.

“I can’t help the associations…” Will rasps just as softly. Need twists dark and ugly inside, as temptation beckons below.

“…we’ll make new ones.” Daniel says, scraping teeth along Will’s throat.

Daniel spreads his legs wider to catch muscular thighs in an embrace, stubbornly taunting Will and rolls his head back exposing his throat as Will crushes him flush with the wall pressing his lips to Daniel’s jugular. That awful relentless need of Will’s, desperate and hot washes over him. He drags his open mouth across Will’s cheek, draws Will’s tongue inside and flinches with delight as the sucking sends Will trembling, breath warm and moist on his skin.

The terrible aching need wells inside and Will surrenders to it. Daniel tastes so sweet; Will imagines ripened slices of peach, fresh berries on his tongue and the smell of surf and sweat on a summer’s day so real that Will curls his toes in the sand at his feet.

As Will’s whiskers scrape across his face Daniel unbuttons his shorts and unzips the fly. Fingers tug at belt loops and Will’s teeth now hold his tongue as sparks detonate behind his eyes. He grinds against Will, as Will reaches his hand inside his boxers to cup his balls.

“Yessss” Daniel whispers, the single syllable drawn out seductively into a kiss. Tiny hairs rise along Will’s neck as he returns the kiss.

“Not here. We’ll contaminate…the…uh…ohhh…”

Daniel reaches between Will’s legs, grabs the swollen pouch nestled there and squeezes causing Will to yelp in surprise. He wriggles and Will lets him go to stumble up the stairs following right behind him.

In the kitchen, Will straddles him against the basement door, mouth at his neck then collarbone. Daniel grabs a handful of hair and with the other steadies himself, hips rubbing up and down so that fabric pulls maddeningly taut between them.

Will winces as his head is abruptly pushed down Daniel’s chest then stomach. Will’s face slides over the tee and bandages and he fumbles with the shorts to wrest them free, his breath warm against damp boxers as Daniel curls his fingers more tightly around the fistful of hair he uses to shove Will’s face against the rigid flesh concealed under thin cotton.

Will kneels in front, breathing through his mouth, face flushed wickedly, tugging at the boxers so they too lie at Daniel’s feet. Even in the darkness Will looks ravishing on the floor beneath him, a tightly coiled mass of muscle and curls, every breath blows close and hot to tingle upon his excited flesh.

Will wants this. He needs this. To feel Daniel’s tanned and silken skin against his, to feel soft and supple flesh beneath his chilled fingers, to feel Daniel twitch warm and alive in his mouth. To wallow in life so the nightmares that follow him out of his dreams are dispelled for a moment before the pieces of death scattered cold and stiff downstairs become part of him once again.

As Will’s fingers free him from the constraining fabric Daniel hisses at the contact, moans with pleasure as Will draws him in his mouth as both his hands contract compulsively, possessively around the soft curls twining about his fingers. His clothes pool at his feet and Daniel impatiently kicks them out of his way. Will is bobbing his head furiously, taking the length in and out as Daniel braces himself against the door in the predawn light.

He sees the tears leak from wet lashes as Will grunts with every thrust, struggling against the hardened flesh that prods at the back of his throat, and feels his own throat constrict.

“Suck on it.” He pleads between clenched teeth.

Will obliges, deftly stabbing the slit with his tongue as he draws the tip between his lips. The sensation is delicious, and Will feels Daniel’s entire body shudder against the door as the luscious ripple sucking always brings courses through Will’s limbs, his legs like rubber as he sinks into the floor.

Will feels Daniel is close, tastes it salty sweet upon his tongue and he pulls back letting the thick cock slip from his mouth. Daniel flinches as cold air replaces the slick warmth of Will’s throat.

“Finish it…oh fuck…please don’t stop now…”Daniel whines as he looks down into Will’s upturned face.

“I want you to fuck me.” Will says wiping his lips. “Hard…over the table.”

Daniel cannot rip Will’s clothes from him quickly enough. Grabbing a bottle of olive oil from the counter still cluttered with the remains of their forgotten dinner, he bends Will over the kitchen table, shoving everything off with a sweep of his arm, as the dogs scatter off the rug behind them alarmed and curious until Daniel hears them whine and stretch along the kitchen floor. He pours the aromatic oil into his palm and slathers his hands until they shine.

He runs his oiled hands over tense muscle, fingers massaging the knotted flesh as Will flexes and stretches along the length of the table, ass cheeks bumping provocatively as his cock throbs with every bounce. He leans over Will, carelessly smearing bandages with the shiny oil and drizzles more into the crack of Will’s ass smiling as he shudders with the cold.

He shoves two, then three fingers inside in quick succession, knowing Will wants it provided he can hold on long enough to give him what he wants. Will twists with the curling of fingers and gasps as Daniel replaces the fingers with his slicked cock, penetrating slowly until Daniel feels the resistance pop inside and he begins to buck forcefully slamming Will into the table as Will grasps at the table’s edges, knuckles white and face to the side in a beautiful grimace.

“Punishment or reward?” Daniel asks between thrusts.

“For which…deed?” Will hisses into the wood at his lips.

“Can’t decide good or bad?”

“Fuck…Daniel…are we talking about killing?”

The sounds of Paganini swell in Will’s ears, the notes of the cello resonating deep and low as he writhes along the table, pinned in complete surrender to his urges.

“If killing feels good to God…“ Daniel says as he slicks Will’s cock between his slippery fingers, “…can you imagine what fucking must feel like?”

Will groans. He can’t even manage a response; his attention is focused on the fingers mercilessly teasing his foreskin.

Daniel clenches his fist in Will’s hair, painful tugs that cause Will to cry out. Daniel remembers whining in similar pain and delight as he had writhed beneath Will during his hallucinations face down in a pillow to smother his sobs, and he twists the curls between his fingers more tightly so Will has to lift his head from the table, still rasping and groaning. The friction builds warm and wet, Daniel’s panting comes ragged and shallow as his cock dives deeper ripping wildly into bowels that quiver, slick with heat and want.

“Doing bad things to bad people does feel good.” He hums into Will’s ear.

“Are we having…therapy…” Will grunts as Daniel’s balls slap against his ass, “…or sex?”

“Yes.”

Daniel pounds into Will for all he's worth, hands gripping hips as he drills and twists, pummeling Will into the table so he can't move except to receive the pounding Daniel is dishing out. His arms are stretched across the table, marring the polished wood with streaks of sweat and his fingers are cramped around the table's edge but he dares not let go.

Will's cock bounces between his legs, thumping against flesh pressed to wood and the throbbing pressure mounts deliciously as he squirms beneath Daniel's weight. His body trembles with the gush of fluid erupting inside and he feels warm slender fingers wrap around his cock, tip angry red as his body convulses with the touch, spurting hot into the hand that cradles it.

Daniel collapses on top for a moment, lost in the near incapacitating shudders that follow, his mind spinning as his body absorbs the tingles of pleasure exploding throughout his body. Will shakes beneath him as pleasure cascades through nerves jangling with sensation until, finally, Daniel slides off and he can draw himself up from the table.

Will pushes himself up and off the table, wipes at the drool that glistens all over his face. Awareness of shame quickly follows and Will bites at trembling lips as heat consumes him, and cheeks flush uncomfortably warm beneath Daniel's steady gaze.

Daniel stares into the blissed out blue eyes, notes the lank curls plastered against his head, and the limp smile that spreads helpless across Will's reddened face. He wipes sticky fingers across his bandage, and grimaces as pain registers faintly. He points to the bandages.

"Too bad I stopped billing Mason. I should get hazard pay."

"So should I. That was um…some really unconventional therapy." Will looks down at his feet, at the smattering of red droplets staining toes and ankles. Blood splatter clings to hair and skin all the way up his legs. Will shrugs it off, feels his composure returning. He feels the predator stretching inside him, primal and possessive as he looks at Daniel. Mine…

"Aren't you reinforcing the wrong associations?" Will says ignoring Hannibal's voice in his head.

"Associations are only part of it. I'm aware that I'm affected by you and there's not much I can do about that except to leave, but it's my house and I'm not going to throw you out, so…" Daniel pauses, leaves the thought unfinished and ruffles fingers through his damp locks, "but you…still wrestle with labels."

"Labels?"

"Good and evil. What happened between us just now? Was that good or evil? Right or wrong?"

"That's not a fair comparison."

"Just as fair as smoking or any other metaphor I've used along the way. What you aren't seeing, or aren't accepting in your universe, in your inferno…is that both are always present."

"Good and evil define heaven and hell."

"In Dante's Inferno; not yours. Yours and Hannibal's. He sees good and evil as seasoning, shakes them like salt and pepper over the pot, stirs it around and serves it up without a second thought."

“Speaking of metaphors, yours are getting worse” Will says, becoming vaguely uncomfortable standing around nude in the kitchen.

“Think so? I thought cooking and Hannibal…” Daniel shrugs as Will waves him off.

“Hannibal doesn’t see good or evil. He insists God doesn’t either.” Will says.

“Did God create man, or did man create God? Either way, Hannibal wins. Religion is a means to an end for him. Like the concept of God, Hannibal is beyond comprehension.”

Will blinks as associations fire off quickly. Hannibal does not believe in God. He appreciates the concept and his understanding of the concept has caused him to question the accepted notions of deity held by normative society, the society that excludes him and which he in turn, excludes. Hannibal has gone beyond questioning straight to outright rejection.

Hannibal does not measure his deeds on a yardstick of good and evil, rather he takes the concept of creation very literally.

Killing must feel good to God too - he does it all the time. And are we not created in his image?

If God created man in his own image; therein lies the expectation, Hannibal’s expectation, that his creation…become as God is. Hannibal does win. Doesn’t he always? Will thinks as he looks around the kitchen for his clothes. Spies them on the floor and decides maybe a shower would be a good idea before returning to the depths of hell downstairs.

“I have recognized my inspirations for what they are. Made them flesh and blood, haven’t I?” Will says, walking over to the fridge. He grabs a bottle of water and tosses one to Daniel.

“Are you angry at yourself for indulging your instincts?” Daniel catches the bottle and cracks it open.

Will doesn’t answer, he merely gazes back, and Daniel watches pale blue eyes turn to steel. He takes a gulp of water.

“Are you going to stop?” Daniel asks.

Will shakes his head ever so slightly.

“Associations come quickly, don’t they?”

So did forts. Will thinks, But not anymore…

Daniel gestures at the basement door. “How much longer are you going to be down there? You still haven’t told me exactly what you are going to do.”

Will thinks of up and down. Body and spirit. Heaven and hell. He imagines a misted horizon at the far edge of a churning sea, the point where ocean meets sky indistinguishable, obscured in a sfumato-like haze that descends around him like…smoke. Like the horizon in his imagination, Hannibal has married the concepts of good and evil, heaven and hell. He blinks away the smoldering landscape that threatens to crash through the wall of Daniel’s kitchen.

“I said I’d explain, but maybe it would be better that you don’t know. Oh, and um…Jack is going to need you to sign off on me.”

“Sign off on you? As in write a letter attesting to your mental stability?”

“Something like that. You remember who Purnell is?”

“Shit. She knows you are here and wants Crawford to cover her ass.”

“Yeah. She really doesn’t like me.”

“She just doesn’t know you.” Daniel scratches at his chin and gives Will a taunting raise of a brow, “Sure, I’ll compose something that confirms you are relatively…sane. When does Crawford need it?”

“When he gets here…which he thinks will be early next week. I think maybe sooner.”

The dry tone is accompanied by lips drawn in a thin line and a roll of tired pale blue eyes. It is an expression Will wears often and the dull expression is usually amusing but not today.

“Shit!” Daniel says as he remembers his session with Lydia for tomorrow. He corrects himself. It is already Saturday. As if he needed one more thing on his plate. Daniel rubs at his neck, tension already collecting at the thought of therapy, Lydia, and the perplexing Dumont.

“What?”

“I’ll have to cancel my canine therapy session today. It’s not until later in the afternoon, I have time.”

“I think you should keep it. Keep up appearances.”

“Will, I can’t. This is…almost too much.”

“All the more reason to get out and do something normal. For you. And for me. Your behavior will reflect on me. What reason would you give to cancel? It would have to be pretty compelling. You can’t appear to be erratic or upset if Jack or anyone else wants to talk to you.”

Daniel takes a shaky breath. Will is right. The FBI will check him out if they haven’t already. Good thing he has no skeletons in his closet. Yet.

“Okay. I see your point. This is surreal.”

“Tell me about it.”

“So, what’s the fish tank for?”

Will sighs and purses his lips. “It’s not a fish tank. It’s a terrarium.”

“Tomato – tomah..to.” Daniel says as he tilts the bottle to his lips.

“You like Picasso?” Will says as Daniel spews water like a fountain.

The Teatro Romano looms in the distance, its uppermost tier visible along the crest of the hill above her and Du Maurier thinks she has never actually walked down the other side of the hill to place even one well-heeled shoe upon its ancient stones. How easily one can take for granted those things one sees every day. Du Maurier thinks perhaps she might persuade Clayton to walk with her once the chauffeur returns to the Museum's parking lot for Lydia.

He wears a button down short sleeved shirt with pressed trousers and he has smoothed the unruly curls with a smattering of gel. His appearance is sleek and professional but there is something off about him she thinks as she observes him standing with arms folded across his chest.

She had thought he might bring Graham to tag along since Clayton lives but a short distance from the park, but Graham is evidently either indisposed or disinclined to join his therapist in the park. Then again, Clayton may desire to keep the rest of his professional life separated from his personal life despite mixing them up by his association with Graham.

An association that has perhaps soured. They may look alike, but Du Maurier thinks their association like oil and vinegar, an uneasy blend of ingredients too disparate in nature to remain in close contact indefinitely.

She watches Clayton with Lydia and the dogs. He has been trying to engage her in a game the dogs know and enjoy. Lydia's attention span can be measured in fractions of seconds. The barking of the dogs snaps Clayton to action and he draws another ball from the bag lying at his feet. Lydia has apparently managed to lose the first. He tosses the bright yellow ball to Lydia, who promptly moves aside to let it fall into the lush grass. The dogs lie down among the blades of green as Clayton explains, again, the game they are to play.

He is attentive as always, but the smiles are not genuine today she thinks; rather they are practiced smiles passed off to reassure, a mask that moves but conceals nonetheless. Du Maurier recognizes a mask when she sees one. She looks at one every morning in the mirror.

She wonders what Clayton could be concealing today.

She smiles warmly at him as he leaves Lydia to play with the dogs on her own a while. Clayton's patience seems in short supply. Lydia tosses a Frisbee now, not well, but the dogs faithfully retrieve it for her and she coos over them. She turns to wave at Du Maurier as she throws the neon blue disc into the grass again. Du Maurier had been surprised to learn dogs are color blind to red and green, and often run right over a red toy in green grass.

She waves back at Lydia, smiling encouragement.

"She really enjoys this, Daniel." Du Maurier says his name with affection and, seeing no discernable reproach from him, is encouraged. "Looking forward to it motivates her to stay sober during the week."

"You made the therapy conditional?" Daniel says, clearly piqued.

"Of course. She self-medicates. She abuses any substance she can get her hands on."

"Extrinsic motivation doesn't last. It is usually linked to something temporary or that something the patient will eventually lose interest in."

"Perhaps. Perhaps, not. Extrinsic motivation can become intrinsic. Isn't that the idea here?"

“Yes and no. You’ve altered the application, undermined it. The bond with the animal is intrinsic, rooted in the empathy that develops between them. Once that is established, the motivation comes naturally; at least that’s the idea.”

“Perhaps that approach is better suited to patients with grief issues. Lydia is an addict.”

Daniel shrugs and cracks his neck as he looks up at the sky. Judging by the sun, he thinks it about five and his thoughts turn to the nearly assembled monstrosity sitting in his basement and its creator napping in his bed. He doesn’t want to be here, but he sighs and turns to Dumont.

She squints in the bright sunlight, and though she has discarded the sunglasses, her face is cast in perpetual shadow by the huge hat she wears. She has been thankfully quiet most of the afternoon and Daniel has not missed the usual chatter. He thinks his head might explode with the effort of actual conversation. He feels like a ticking time bomb with the banter between them now.

He decides to let Du Maurier have her way on this one. The misapplication of his therapy will, in all likelihood, not make any difference one way or another. Not because Lydia is a hopeless drug addict and substance abuser. Daniel doubts he will remain in Fiesole much longer.

Chances are he will either be arrested for something or lose his license to practice; or both. There is a third option: lose his mind in the process. Will worries about protecting him, and although the danger exists, Daniel thinks that once the tableaux are revealed, his house will be under FBI surveillance. Crawford will almost certainly put eyes on Will’s residence in the event that his cannibal boyfriend pays him a visit.

Another visit, Daniel thinks with a shudder.

“Well, let’s hope you are right about Lydia’s motivation. You know her best.” Daniel says.

Du Maurier is convinced Clayton is mentally someplace else. He should be arguing with her right now. She knew exactly what Clayton’s therapy entailed and she knew what his expectations were. He had rattled off the outline of his proposed therapy for her making it abundantly clear what he wanted.

Du Maurier touches his arm and he jumps slightly at the contact of her fingers along his skin.

“You are distracted today. Do you want to talk about it?”

She allows her gaze to wander about his face, letting him know she is inquiring about the abrasions. They are minor, but obvious. His brows furrow and he bites his lip looking ever more like Graham except for the lack of facial hair. Du Maurier had been taken aback at the sight him as he had greeted her in the parking lot.

A bit of scruff lines his jaw and lips where there had been thick finely trimmed whiskers before. She wonders what had prompted him to shave it off. It is possible whatever it was caused the abrasions as well.

“I’m not comfortable discussing it here.” Daniel says simply. “It’s just personal stuff.”

“If someone is hurting you…”

“He’s not…”Daniel catches himself too late. He is distracted and he bites at his cheek, rolls his eyes. He wants to punch something. He knew this was a bad idea.

Du Maurier retains her aura of concern as she smiles inwardly at the slip. Graham. Isn’t it always?

Daniel scrambles to deliver damage control. “It wasn’t intentional. Sometimes I get in my own way.”

He smiles quickly and watches Dumont’s face melt in sympathy. He doesn’t feel any sympathy from her and that troubles him. He’s not sure what he feels from her. She poses quite the enigma. He has never met anyone like her.

Daniel thinks he has very quickly become surrounded by quite a few people unlike anyone else and the idea that it is Will who attracts them persists.

“Is this he you are referring to your roommate?”

“And if he is?”

“Then, it would appear you run the risk of getting in your own way again. How can I help?”

“I don’t think you can though I appreciate the offer.”

“Sometimes just talking through it can help. Without telling me anything, what words spring to mind when you think of him?”

Daniel looks out over the park at the dogs and Lydia as images of Will spill into his mind accompanied by a vast and contradictory slew of adjectives. He turns back to Dumont.

“Cesca…I don’t really want…”

“Do you find yourself making excuses for him, for his behavior? We often rationalize our efforts to help when in fact we enable the very behaviors we seek to address.”

“I didn’t say he was in therapy.”

Du Maurier smiles and Daniel sighs. Psychiatrists are always engaged in therapy. They can’t help themselves. The compulsive analyzing and interference never stops, even when they aren’t at the office. Whether or not his roommate is also his patient does not concern Dumont. She knows it is Daniel’s nature to help, or at least believe he is helping.

“No, but we all have our issues that vary by degree. If he has issues he may or may not be aware of how they are affecting you but the traumatized are often unaware that they are damaged.”

“In this instance, I think he is aware.”

“I was not referring to him.”

Daniel raises a brow but remains quiet. Dumont is provocative, but she makes a good point.

Du Maurier looks into the tired green eyes and knows she has pricked a nerve. Graham is wearing on him, and Clayton’s neck chafes at the noose Graham has hung around it.

“Perhaps it is better to save one’s self when one’s actions - no matter how well intended - can save neither. An awful choice, but sometimes all we can do is watch.”

Daniel stuffs his hands in his pockets as he stares into the distance at nothing in particular. His thoughts are interrupted by the beeping of Dumont’s cell phone. She glances at it and seems surprised. She holds up her index finger and begins to turn away.

“I have to take this. Are you…”

“I’m fine. Go ahead.” Daniel says and walks back toward Lydia and the dogs, grateful for the interruption. His bandages need changing and his head throbs with the persistence of a loud and clanging bell.

Du Maurier waits and then lifts the phone to her lips. “Hannibal. How nice to hear from you.”

“And you as well.” Comes the cheery reply, “Am I interrupting?”

“Canine therapy in the park in Fiesole.”

“Oh? Beautiful day for it. And how is our good doctor this afternoon?”

“Delightful as always, but distracted today.”

“Perhaps you are the distraction.” Hannibal offers, managing to keep the sarcasm to a minimum.

“A compliment?”

“Of course.”

“Hmm. I would like to take the credit but I believe something else, something less innocuous occupies his thoughts. He has suffered a little tumble I’m afraid. There are some minor injuries.”

“Did you inquire about them?”

“In a manner of speaking.”

“Inquiries are often more effective when phrased directly, my dear.”

“Often, but not always. Insight becomes elusive if responses to direct inquiry are limited to lies and half-truths.” She chides.

“Those too offer insight. If anything, my conversations with him suggest an admirable tendency toward professionalism and an ability to compartmentalize.”

“I concur. His injuries and distraction are uncharacteristic of what we know of him.”

“Still, he is very emotional isn’t he? Given to impulses and carnal urges. Perhaps his roommate is to blame. Always consider proximity first. I get the sense they are…intimate.”

“I am inclined to agree. Whatever did you talk about your last session with him, to draw that conclusion?”

“Nothing untoward, I assure you. Well, he kept his appointment with you today. It’s probably nothing to worry about.”

“You expect to see him, your usual time Wednesday?”

“Unless something calamitous comes up.”

“Ah…well then, the reason for your delightful call?”

“I was thinking of dinner.”

“Tonight?”

“Not tonight. But soon. Perhaps tomorrow or Monday?”

“Your place or mine?”

“I was hoping to dine out.”

Du Maurier considers this. Dining out for Hannibal means his fridge is empty and it does not matter from where he takes sustenance, excepting the cuisine is exquisite, or he has had his fill of his own cuisine and seeks to clear his palate. There is also the possibility that Hannibal means to appeal to her better nature meaning that he has news to deliver and desires to either celebrate or appease.

Du Maurier thinks Hannibal’s invitation an indication of the latter. She suppresses the urge to inquire about the transfer, satisfied that the transfer is precisely the topic Hannibal intends to introduce at dinner.

“Thoughtful.” She purrs.

Hannibal can well imagine the tasty thoughts running around her head. Du Maurier is predictable, but superbly seductive as she applies her craft. She remains as ever the gift that keeps on giving.

“Do you have a place in mind?” She asks.

“My therapist has encouraged me to get out more. Someplace away from Impruneta or Fiesole would be a refreshing change.”

“If you are leaving the selection to me, I will endeavor to look for a place neither of us has visited.”

“Perfect. You’ll decide on an evening?”

“I’m leaning toward Monday. My weekends are consumed by Lydia here in Fiesole. There are some restaurants in Siena I have been meaning to try.”

“Then I will leave you to your therapy.”

“Ciao, Hannibal.”

Du Maurier checks her watch. Their session is almost over. The seeds she has planted in Clayton’s mind need space and time to sprout. She imagines the sprouts might grow to overtake and choke the blooms already wilting in the soil Graham appears to have poisoned with his acidic personality.

Time to return to the estate. She lifts her gaze from the gold timepiece on her slender wrist to look across the swath of green at Lydia and considers it is also time for a bottle of wine.

Hannibal smiles at the phone before tucking it back in his pocket. He glances across the expanse of his garden and resigns himself to the task that awaits unfinished downstairs. Will expects him to deliver his tableau by dawn tomorrow and Hannibal will not disappoint him.

He remembers lying in bed with Will waiting on Jack's call about Tier. He remembers watching Will awaken in that bed for the first time, well, the first time Will could remember waking in it. Hannibal had always greeted Will with a smile in the morning. Not that greeting him any other way would have been possible. A simple pleasure to look at him twisted up in sheets, pale blue eyes still heavy with sleep. These are stolen moments he cradles as the keepsakes they are.

Will had never returned those smiles. Perhaps someday…

The time for the unveiling of intentions draws near and Hannibal returns inside and gathers his thoughts as he descends the stairs back to the guest room. His conversation with Du Maurier went well. Miraculously, she refrained from inquiring about the transfer. She expects to resume a discussion of that topic over dinner.

Dinner is very likely off the table. Hannibal merely made the suggestion without any intention of actually dining with Du Maurier. The possibility remains should events at the imminent crime scenes drag or the discoveries are made too late to make the evening news. Hannibal had called seeking information on Clayton which Du Maurier was happy to provide.

And why not? She believes him her pawn, not Hannibal's. Clayton seems to be holding his own and Hannibal is impressed with the young doctor's apparent coping skills. Coping with Will is no easy thing. Hannibal does wonder for how much longer Clayton can continue to keep his head above water as Will continues to tie weights to limbs already tired from swimming in Will's sea of madness.

Hannibal switches on the light and commences his work upon the remains of blood and breath that will fuel Will's radiance.

Will shakes himself awake and throws off the sheet, momentarily disoriented. The bright sunlight streaming through the windows jars him fully awake and he glances at the clock on the bureau. He breathes a sigh of relief that he has not slept too long. The relief also comes from knowing the time he spent asleep can be accounted for.

Though his thoughts are saturated with images from his dreamscape, their intrusions are ghosts in his consciousness, disturbances faint like wind upon chimes.

He rolls out of bed and stretches sore muscles that scream for attention after hours of concentrated labor bent over the picnic table in the basement. Except for a couple of short breaks Will has worked non-stop until the one rather satisfying lull. Will smiles at this.

Will thinks he should not be smiling. He exists in a dark place filled with nightmares and mind bending hallucinations. The darkness spills into every aspect of his waking life, a life that feels more dreamlike and surreal than even Will thought possible. His universe is small, dense – a minefield of self-destruction that he has shared with Daniel. He knows Daniel should not be in his universe, but he smiles because he is grateful for the company.

He begins to pull on fresh clothes before going downstairs to raid the fridge. His stomach grumbles as he thinks about reheating the gumbo he put away but never tasted last evening. He reminds himself that it has not even been twenty four hours since Luciano had burst the fragile bubble surrounding the little oasis he had created here.

Before he can take to the stairs his phone rings. He reads the call is not from Daniel who should be returning any time now. Will tries not to unduly rattle himself. The call will probably be disconcerting enough.

"Det…Alia? Hello."

"Ciao, Will. Already calling me detective again?"

"Sorry, force of habit. How are you?"

"Buona, good… I haven't heard from you. It's uh…good to hear your voice."

Will cringes at the small talk and wishes she would get to the point, if there is a point beyond checking up on him as way of assessing her status. As if the lack of contact was not an indication. Will sighs inwardly at his dismissiveness but her timing is really lousy.

"And yours, too. It hasn't been that long since we uh, had dinner."

"No, but life gets in the way and before you know it, things get awkward. Are they awkward, Will?"

"A little, but that's on me. I'm…not very good at this."

Alia laughs and the sound of her soft laughter seems to brighten the room a little more.

"What do you mean by this? Picking up a phone once in a while?"

"By this, I mean following up on random acts of intimacy."

Will speaks with more affection than he intended, even so, a smile tugs at lips that press together with uncertainty. The petite dark haired detective has a way of unsettling Will in a way he likes a little too much for his own good. And hers.

"Ah…" she breathes, "Then maybe I overlook your bad habit, eh?"

"I am relieved." Will says.

He is. He is going to see her soon whether he wants to or not. Will begins to walk downstairs as he speaks. He still needs to fix something to eat.

"Well, I did call for a reason. Two reasons actually. Guess who I found?"

Will halts on the steps. "Who?"

"Hercules."

“The cat? From the fire? How did you locate him?”

“Well, none of the shelters had him though plenty of orange tabbies to choose from in those places. So, I had an afternoon off and drove back over to the wreckage. They still have not started on rebuilding and it looks bad there. Invites trouble…abandoned places.”

“Yes, they do.” Will thinks of the destination for Luciano’s tableau and frowns as he listens to Alia.

“Anyway, I see this cat wandering around the burned out palazzo and don’t you know, it’s the Signora’s lost cat. His collar and nametag are still around his neck. Good thing you noticed what his name was, eh?”

“Yeah. So that means he did get out somehow. Before the fire.”

“Are you sure she wouldn’t just let him out to play?”

“He was her constant companion. She never let him out as far as I could tell. What kind of shape was he in?”

“Not good. Thin. Dirty. He ate like a horse when I brought him home.”

“You took him in?”

Will grins. She takes in strays, too. The grin fades and Will bites his lip. No wonder she’s attracted to him.

“Oh, he’s a good boy. I think I’ll keep him. Get him nice and fat. He sleeps with me.”

“Sounds like you’ve traded up.”

“There’s still room for you. He won’t mind.” Alia teases.

Will decides to change the subject before she is no longer teasing. He doubts she is teasing as it is. Hercules’ existence causes Will to reject the idea that the blaze that consumed his former residence was accidental. He knows it is not much to go on, but the feeling in his gut persists.

“What’s the other reason you called?”

“Oh, this reason is not such a happy one.”

“What’s wrong?”

“You know I asked you about the Paolini? Well, I mentioned they had fallen off the radar?”

“Yes. I know. They are still missing.”

“You haven’t heard from them?”

“Nope.”

“Isn’t that odd since they work for you?”

“It’s not good that’s for sure. The FBI now know they were helping me look for the Ripper.”

"And you think they found him?"

"Or he found them."

"Well, their family is looking for you. They know the twins worked for you."

"This is talk at the precinct?"

"It's the rumor floating around. I never told anyone the connection between you. The Paolini have been wagging their tongues. The twins worked for you, but you worked for Mason Verger."

"That's right. I kept his name out of it for several reasons."

"Smart thing to do. Well, this Verger must have shaken the hornets' nest. They want this Ripper, this Lecter you look for and they want you to find him."

"Me?"

"Whatever Verger told them has them convinced you and this Lecter have some history and that if Lecter has the twins, he will come looking for you."

"So use me to get to Lecter," Will rubs his fingers against his lips and thinks everybody wants to join the screw Will Graham party. "Lecter…who they want to kill anyway."

"Verger wants him dead, too. Why?"

"They have some history together. It is an ugly and complicated relationship."

"And you are part of it."

"Yes. I am."

Alia sighs deeply into the phone. "Well, this thing with the twins has the family out for blood. They have hinted at breaking with Verger, you know fuck the business, fuck whatever deal they have."

"But that may be a lie." Roberta says. "Hannibal, my information is only as good as the source and the source is not Paolini. They keep family business close to the vest."

Hannibal sits on his veranda as he speaks with his cousin. The fragrances of the varied vegetable plants and flowers float on the breeze and Hannibal breathes deeply the odors of life from his garden, to replace the odors of death that have filled his nostrils for the last several hours.

"I understand. Mason has been flapping his jaws, or what is left of them."

"Oui, bien sûr, they want Graham because Mason has told them you do. They intend to use him to bring you out in the open."

"The FBI is already using Will to bait me. Mason knows only whatever Jack Crawford chose to tell him. Either way, the Paolini and the FBI think the murder of the twins will lead them to me."

“Hannibal, the Paolini will let the FBI do what they do. They are not content to sit back and allow Graham to play FBI agent again. They mean to use Graham to bring you to them.”

Hannibal sits up straighter in his chair. “How? They do not know where he resides.”

“The Paolini have learned the value of Graham. To you. It would seem Mason has had enough exposure to the both of you to draw his conclusions without any help from the FBI.”

“Will is in danger. This is personal. Once the investigation starts, the FBI will lead the Paolini to Will. The Paolini will use him to lure me, just like the FBI, but they will kill him.”

“They will kill you both. You first.”

Hannibal thinks Mason very unimaginative to resort to repeating history. He expected something less…mediocre.

“Mason has become a very serious problem.”

“Mason’s leash on the Paolini has snapped.”

“Evidently. He will tell the FBI differently. Otherwise, they have no reason to talk to him.”

Hannibal considers the mess that Mason has served up. Margot would never disclose the details of her brother’s unfortunate accident to him. Mason inferred what he thinks he knows through the haze of his hallucination at Will’s house. Dribbles of dialogue and snatches of images were remembered and cataloged in Mason’s drug soaked mind.

Even so, Mason has remembered enough to understand there is a bond he can exploit. Jack would not have told Mason anything. No one in the FBI would even consider offering classified information to someone like Mason. They might sacrifice Will, but they would not suffer the likes of Mason to interfere with their prime asset.

“Your…Mr. Graham can infer, deduce perhaps, but he cannot know. You cannot know if he knows. Mais, oui, I have brought you unhappy news. Je suis désolé.”

“You are only the messenger. I can only be grateful you learned of this. On what was their loyalty to Verger based?”

“Verger money of course. The Paolini served the father. Mason inherited them. As I told you, they can be bought for a price. A fact they seem to believe no one knows.”

“Honor for sale. I suppose not.”

“They are ruthless and relentless.”

“As am I.”

“I don’t have the available assets to negotiate with the Paolini, Hannibal.”

“No. But I do.”

Hannibal leans his head against the back of the chair and a wide smile breaks along his lips as the threads of the design he weaves come together. A perfect convergence of destinies flying and swimming in blood. He pours a glass of dark red wine from the bottle left to breathe on the table and closes his eyes as he sniffs the bouquet pressing his lips to the phone.

“Roberta?”

“Oui, Hannibal?”

“Would you be willing to negotiate with the Paolini on my behalf?”

“I would be happy to assist in any way I can. And what of your…très cher William?”

Hannibal finds Roberta’s penchant for proper names a quaint habit, most old world. He thinks he has never heard anyone refer to Will using his full name. Roberta has become rather attached to Will considering the way she has come to speak of him. Hannibal’s endorsements notwithstanding, she has no doubt done her own sleuthing and found him compelling if not captivating.

“My…William is not alone. Not anymore.”

There is nothing as relaxing as a soak in the bathtub Daniel decides as he pulls himself out of the water to dry off. He almost feels normal. He almost feels sane.

By the time he had walked Dumont and Lydia back to the parking lot and dropped off the dogs at the kennel it had been nearly seven. He had surprised himself by actually having an appetite and had sunk into a kitchen chair to eat a bowl of gumbo and thick slices of French bread that Will had left out for him. The meal had satisfied, and Daniel had practically inhaled the spicy dish. The bread had been pretty tasty, too. Will knows his way around a kitchen, especially a Cajun kitchen.

It was when Daniel had opened up the fridge to refill his bowl with Will’s delicious gumbo that he realized the reason Will had left his dinner sitting out in the first place. Bag after bag of bloody organs and entrails had been stacked on two of the four shelves. Will had made room by clearing out leftovers and assorted other items Daniel could not even recall as he had stood with his mouth dangling open for several seconds before closing the door to fridge, the second bowl of gumbo forgotten. He had intended to see what Will was up to in the basement, but the zip-lock bags pink and purple had sent him upstairs instead, to pull off sweaty clothes and soak in a tub until his fingers had become waterlogged.

He stands in front of the mirror and does not like what he sees. Aside from the abrasions and the lack of whiskers that still surprises every time he glances at himself, he looks strung out. There is a wildness about his features that was not there before. He thinks he does not look so much like a predator as he does prey.

…the traumatized are often not aware they are damaged.

His relationship with Will is changing him. He knew that he would be affected. His empathy has always presented the challenge of separating his emotions from the emotions of everyone else. He has used his gift to help people. His entire life, his profession has been dedicated to using his gift for the benefit of his patients and plenty of others who have crossed his path.

He thinks of that day at the beach when he almost took that final swim. He thinks of how Will associates him with the ocean, how he senses him as a mist, and how that mist is a comfort.

Will has not mentioned his mist in a long time. Though he uses his gift to gage Will's emotions, Will's gift of empathy works very differently. Will can assume anyone's perspective, essentially become that person. His gift allows him to enter the minds of killers just as easily as anyone else. It occurs to Daniel that if Will wanted to he could just as easily become Daniel, or a version of him. He has done so on occasion already. Their little concerts come to mind.

Daniel may not be feeling Will's actual emotions as often as he thinks he is. He may be feeling his own, magnified and reflected back to him. Not all the time, but anytime Will does not want his true feelings known. Daniel looks away from the mirror and rubs his face. The thought stings.

He is tired and stressed out. He cannot let himself believe Will could be so dishonest with him, so manipulative. That sounds like Hannibal. Daniel swallows the lump in his throat as he wonders just how alike they truly are.

He hears banging around downstairs and then a string of obscenities as Will's voice carries up the stairs. The dogs are barking loudly and Daniel makes his way down the stairs taking two at a time while sliding hands along the bannister. He reaches the bottom to find Will seated on the arm of the couch examining his left elbow.

"What happened?"

"Nearly dropped some…stuff. Didn't break anything but I twisted my arm. I'll be okay in a minute."

"Want some ice?" Daniel checks himself. He has no idea what's in his freezer. He grinds his teeth as looks at Will.

"No." Will says, fatigue evident in every crease in his face. "I'm good. Just have to lug the non-perishables to…your car."

"This sucks more every minute. You know where the keys are." Daniel snaps.

Will looks up at him from beneath arched brows and a tangled fringe of curls. Daniel knows he has to use his car, but he doesn't have to like it. He waves his hand through the air in dismissal.

"You have no choice, I know. We already talked about it. I already looked through my rolodex for lawyers." Daniel sighs, frustrated with himself as much as with Will.

"Funny. I'll be back before you know it."

"I don't suppose you'll let me help you load it up."

"Between your injury and the risk of leaving evidence…that would be a no."

"It's still light outside. You aren't loading the car now."

"No, just setting it all in one place. I think…"

Will's phone vibrates and beeps in his pocket. Daniel raises his brows as Will checks the caller id.

"It's Hannibal." Will says simply.

Daniel moves to sit on the couch. He had to miss the first conversation. He is not going to miss this one.

Will nods at Daniel. He doesn't mind if Daniel remains in the room. Daniel deserves to know what he is dealing with. With both of them.

"Hello." Will says.

"Hello, Will. Busy?"

"The usual. What's on your mind?"

"I'll be direct. First, I have taken the liberty of procuring a vehicle for you if you are interested."

"Very generous. Why?"

"We are agreed that the doctor should remain above suspicion?"

"As much as possible."

"Then you now have alternate means of transportation if you want it. I'll send you the location."

"Done. And…thank you."

"Second." Hannibal says, enjoying himself immensely. "I require advance notice of the location of your...tableau."

"For what reason? To set up camp?"

"Yes, actually. I will need to scout a location from which to view the festivities."

Will sighs and thinks he will have enough to occupy his fractured mind besides wondering where Hannibal is while he stands around drinking coffee with Jack. He looks at Daniel who is riveted to the edge of the couch, eyes wide and hanging on every word.

"Okay. I'll text the address to you if you need it. I chose the Paolini slaughter house. It's been abandoned since the family went into business with the Vergers. You've been here longer than I, do you know it?"

"I think I know the place. About ten miles or so north of Florence?"

"That would be the one. And where are you placing your tableau?"

"A much more accessible and public place. I would tell you but your imagination is formidable. I wouldn't want to ruin the surprise."

"Can't blame me for asking."

"Not at all. Your curiosity is appreciated."

"Anything else?"

Will thinks he will have to destroy his phone at some point. If Jack ever asks to see it…

“It has come to my attention that there is bitterness among the ranks of the Trojans.”

“I have heard the same. A civil war.”

“Do the Greeks know?’

“Menelaus is operating under the impression that all is well among the Trojans. At least their leader…we never came up with an alias for Mason.” Will says.

“Why Antenor, of course.”

“Of course. Well, Antenor has convinced Menelaus that he has the Trojans in his pocket. At least that’s what Menelaus says.”

“The Trojans may not wait for the Greeks to attack. They seek Patroclus.”

“Patroclus is aware. His eyes are sharp.”

“Yes, they are.” Hannibal pauses, wanting to say more but refrains from indulging himself. “They will learn where you live once the FBI sends a security detail to keep an eye on you.”

“And the Trojans will follow them. I don’t think they will cross that particular line. Do you?” Will says, looking at Daniel.

“No, but that will depend on how desperate they become. It does seem more likely they will go after you alone to avoid the bad press that would follow should they make a casualty of one of the local esteemed citizens. They are criminals, but they do have a sense of honor such as it is.”

“Or a sense of public relations. If there is nothing else?”

“No.”

“Then I suppose we wait for the circus to come to town.”

“I’ll see you around, Will.”

Will slips the phone back into his pocket. Hannibal is enjoying this. Will runs his fingers through his hair and stares at the ceiling while he kneads his temples. He thinks the Excedrin is still sitting on the night stand.

“Well?” Daniel says from the couch, unable to keep quiet any longer. The suspense is killing him. He can’t keep his feet still.

Will stretches his arms over his head and cracks his sore neck. “Um…the good news is that I don’t have to use your car…much.”

“I’m sure you’ll explain that in a minute. And the bad?”

“Hannibal is going to screw with the crime scenes. And I don’t know how…yet.”

Chapter End Notes

Vide Cor Meum is the music referred to here and is from the movie Hannibal. It is the supposed opera Hannibal attends where he meets Pazzi and his lovely wife. The lyrics are taken from Dante's La Vita Nuova, a sonnet from Chapter 3. It is also the piece of music Hannibal listens to in his head S1E13 when he visits Will for the first time in BSHCI.

Updated note: It is also known as Dante's first sonnet in the Vita Nuova and is the verse quoted by Hannibal in S3E1 at the gala. The Vita Nuova combines prose with verse.

To every captive soul and gentle heart into whose sight this present speech may come,
so that they might write its meaning for me,
greetings, in their lord’s name, who is Love.
Already a third of the hours were almost past
of the time when all the stars were shining,
when Amor suddenly appeared to me whose memory fills me with terror.
Joyfully Amor seemed to me to hold my heart in his hand, and held in his arms
my lady wrapped in a cloth sleeping.
Then he woke her, and that burning heart
he fed to her reverently, she fearing, afterwards he went not to be seen weeping.

Chapter Summary

> The murder tableaux are revealed. Dante and misdirection are on the menu. Some old friends join Will at the crime scenes.
>
> He imagines himself as Hannibal, sees Lucia nude, alive and squirming on a table, wrists and ankles bound to the metal as he leans over her. She screams only in her head because she is too drugged to speak. But she is not too drugged to listen or appreciate what is being done to her.
>
> I want her awake so she can see me; hear me, before I take her apart. As I press the blade into her throat and slide it across, slicing effortlessly nearly painlessly through esophagus and carotid as I would bleed any pig for slaughter, I tell her –
>
> This is for what you would do to me…
>
> As I slice her open from sternum to pelvis, slitting her long and wide to gut her like the swine she is, I whisper into her ear -

Chapter 61

The murder tableaux are revealed. Dante and misdirection are on the menu. Some old friends join Will at the crime scenes.

Illustration of the Calydonian Boar Hunt, Tanglewood Tales, 1920

Hannibal shifts in his seat and takes a long drink from the bottle of local spring water that glistens wet in his hand. With the other he grips the steering wheel of the work van he drives along, the road a gaping mouth so dark that the beams are swallowed up. He drives away from the abandoned slaughter house of the Paolini towards the lights of Florence.

The graceful light that was Lucia has gone out. Lucia is derived from the Latin word for light. The grace derives from the martyred fourth century saint, and if Hannibal remembers correctly, she had her eyes gouged out thus becoming the patron saint of eye diseases. Hannibal thinks there must be a saint for nearly every condition of humankind. This Lucia was no saint, but her death had not been pointless and the display of her mortal vessel should rival that of any martyr. And her light should guide Will out of his inferno.

So too, should the display of her brother. Luciano also alludes to light, and Will's tableau should prove equally illuminating.

He had seen headlights approaching from the opposite direction, and given the hour, had known who it was. He had left Will to his creation, though memories of sharing that first kill with him had followed him all the way to Florence.

Shadows of Tier would be following Will, too.

He understands Will's design in placing Luciano at the old slaughter house. The connection to Mason will be clear enough. The security around Mason's new slaughter house and plant is much too formidable for Will to manage. Even Hannibal would not take the risk when an abandoned site would do just as well. He has what he needs from the slaughter house and had left Will to proceed on to the city of Florence, for the unveiling of own his tableau.

He cannot sleep. He functions now at the peak of his awareness; the early morning finds him ever the shark circling in shallow water around its prey. Limbs agitate with a delicious restlessness and thoughts swim in a single current, no longer plunged into murky depths to swirl unceasingly in a purposeless sea. He has not felt this focused, this alive in a long time. It is the prospect of death that drives us to greatness and, Hannibal thinks with a smile as he savors another sip, it does not have to be one's own.

His conversation with Roberta swims in his sea as he drives. Always a pleasure to speak with her, her laughter sparkles brightly in Hannibal's ears like the clinking of crystal at one of his dinner parties. And she is ever sharp with her insights. Insightful enough to see past Hannibal's dodging of certain realities he had not wanted to share with her. In hindsight, had she not playfully pricked Hannibal to explain further, he might not have enjoyed a rather invaluable and timely epiphany.

But Hannibal is used to his mind making the odd leaps and jumps that it does. A mark of brilliance that he shares with no one else except his precious Will, or William as Roberta insists on calling him. It was an inquiry about Will that had prompted Hannibal's thoughts along a different path.

Hannibal takes great comfort in the bond he shares with his cousin. And though they have never had the fortune to meet, it is a bond he shares with no one else, but hope springs... Despite being separated by distance, not confined to the physical miles placed between them by his uncle, they share the ancestral traits deep and dark coursing through their veins.

Lone creatures they are; and contact is infrequent between them, but the cry for companionship eventually surfaces. Companionship worthy of the blood they share.

He had listened to the sing song quality of Roberta's voice as she had endeavored to solicit his inner most thoughts regarding the one thing he guards as jealously as his secrets.

"If I am to negotiate with the Paolini on your behalf, Hannibal, I think it…prudent that I understand the nature of the request."

"I would think that obvious. Currency in exchange for a forgotten vendetta against me."

"The vendetta may be for you. But, if the Paolini sought only you, we would not be having this conversation. You desire to keep your treasure safe. And William is your treasure. I have never known you to hold anything quite so dear, trop cher, peut-être?"

"C'est vrai." Hannibal had sighed, feeling vaguely childish about his transparent slip. "I had hoped you would interpret my subterfuge for what it was. It is not because I wish to deceive, force of habit to reveal no more than necessary."

"Tsk Tsk, Hannibal." Roberta had chided gently, "Your deflections reveal the depths of the wounds you have suffered at the hands of your former associates. It is in opposition we find true friendship and no one has been more opposed to you than your William, non?

"No one. It is out of the opposition that understanding comes, kicking and screaming, but it does come." Hannibal had said, visions of wild curls and petulant puckered lips filling his head.

"Then lay out all the cards face up upon the table for me." Roberta had purred over the phone, "Kings, Jack… and the joker, too."

Hannibal had smiled into the phone. If nothing else, Roberta had paid attention and had sifted through everything Hannibal had ever said to her as they had talked. He had quickly identified the phrases that had plucked the dissonant chords.

The FBI is already using Will to bait me. Mason knows only whatever Jack Crawford chose to tell him. Either way, the Paolini and the FBI think the murder of the twins will lead them to me.

“Mason knows much more than what Jack Crawford told him.” Roberta had said adopting a tone reminiscent of a grammar school teacher, “Mason tried to kill you, you punished him for that. There was nothing actionable for Agent Crawford to act upon. Your William was involved but did not ever disclose to Agent Crawford what happened either. Therefore, Mason knows more than Jack Crawford.”

“What I said is true.” Hannibal had countered, prickling a little at the poke to his integrity, “Mason does not know more than what Jack Crawford has told him, but he does have a different perspective than Agent Crawford. Both of them think the murder of the twins will lead them to me, because Will is here, and he will be asked to profile the crime scenes. The FBI will monitor Will and the Paolini will shadow the investigation.”

“And they are aware of your…attachment to him. But you did not think the Paolini meant to use him as live bait, removed from the safety net of the FBI.”

“I had not considered it until now. Will would not willingly walk into a trap of Mason’s design. Mason could not know my mind, or Will’s. Mason does not understand the dynamic between Will and me. What he witnessed and experienced must seem contradictory at best.”

“And yet, Mason is under the impression that you would risk exposure to…attempt a rescue?”

“Apparently…”

At that point in their conversation, the nature of Mason’s vision of revenge and the form it would take had bloomed in his consciousness much like he imagined similar revelations occurred to Will. The more he had thought about it since, the more he had become convinced of it.

He had thanked Roberta for her unwitting gift of clarity. It is impossible to overestimate the impact a like mind can have on one’s thinking. That would be only one of the reasons he misses his conversations with Will so much.

Hannibal had informed Roberta of the intricacies of their history with Mason, to provide her with the necessary framework from which to negotiate with the Paolini. He is satisfied that Roberta’s interaction will be every bit as ruthless as his own. She is the perfect agent to represent his interests, well, his only interest. Roberta now understands the nature of his relationship with Will. He supposes she always has.

But, the negotiations will take time and the Paolini may rather quench their thirst for blood than accept payment to ignore this particular affront. They will wait, watch the investigation from the sidelines, and look for weaknesses to exploit. The Trojans may only want to appear fractious.

Will remains a target unless they agree to Roberta’s proposal; leaving the traitorous Antenor at the mercy of the Greeks. He will find none with Achilles or Patroclus.

Will may not have killed the Paolini, but he did have a part in Mason’s disfigurement. Mason has obviously made it clear to the Paolini that Will is something of a wild card, and that Hannibal regards him with something more than passing curiosity.

What Mason is experiencing is an altered reality, expressions of his own latent desires. Aren't you, Mason?

Latent desires…oh! Summer camp, yes… I don't have any candy…

The rumor of the Paolini breaking ties with Mason may simply be misdirection. Misdirection that smells of Uncle Jack. Innuendo leaked among the players, insinuations that would serve to deflect accusations later, to further cloud the circumstances surrounding the unfortunate demise of the broken Trojan pony Jack has tasked to bring him in.

Hannibal traces his finger around the lip of the bottle as he considers the scenarios that might prompt Jack to sacrifice his pony. The pony would have to wander too far from the stable. Jack would have to leave the gate open for that.

Hannibal can only hope that Paolini greed will win out over pride. Hannibal knows the pitfalls of pride first hand.

So you each twist in an inferno of the other's making. Sins against each other. He, for his treachery.

And I, for my pride.

He understands your universe Hannibal. So few people can see us, and fewer still who can look without turning away. Too much pride in your cunning and orchestrations, too much pride in your creation to see with his eyes. You forgot what motivates him, didn't you?

For a moment…

What is his nature? What would you say drives your William if I were to seek his nature?

His fear.

Then his inferno is shaped by that fear. Fear of becoming and his act of betrayal…

Yes, Roberta, he was trying to stop it, in the only way he knew how.

Careful then that you do not become too prideful this time. Before you destroy the very thing you love.

Only the gods can commit hubris against each other. Only forgiveness from the other will free Hannibal from his pit of regret. Acceptance will free Will from the tortuous confines of his own pit.

He glances in the rearview mirror into the dark space at his back; the windowless van holds the crates and cargo he must deposit under the guise of a city worker, specifically a worker for the Firenze Dipartimento Lavori Pubblici. Hannibal has even borrowed a uniform, though its former owner had been reluctant to give it up, and Hannibal had taken a rather dim view of his attitude. Perception, sharp tool that it is, had indeed pierced the city worker.

The Mercato Nuovo usually opens at nine on Sunday morning, but Hannibal thinks there will be no market today. The Fates sit at the feet of Zeus and they will bend to his Will.

“Oh, Signor…look at this.” The stylist had said running her tapered fingers through the rumpled locks of hair.

“It’s been awhile.” Will had agreed.

“Nice and thick, though.”

She had stood behind him, looking at him in the mirror, scissors and comb in hand. “Shame to cut if off.”

Will had gazed into the mirror and had silently agreed with her. To cut off one his prime assets would be unthinkable. Will learned a long time ago how his appearance affects people. To alter it too much would put him at a disadvantage. Expectations must always be considered when one intends to utilize those expectations.

“Just off my neck.”

As she had snipped and Will had watched tufts of brown fall to the floor he had added, “But not too much.”

The cut had not taken long and Will had sat through the trimming of his beard feeling a little awkward with the attention. Accustomed to always grooming himself, allowing the stylist to do it felt oddly personal, an invasion of his space. Her careful ministrations had reminded him of his time in the hospital. He had blushed with the nurses there, too.

As Will sits in the stylist’s chair, he thinks how the plastic apron draped over him, is not unlike the clear plastic he had worn a few hours ago and had burned up in the Volvo he had set aflame in a field before walking a couple miles in the pre-dawn light to call for a taxi. The trunk had been full of presents from Hannibal, a killer’s Christmas in July, including a gallon of gasoline for torching the evidence.

Hannibal’s efficiency had struck Will as starkly brutal, but Will had found himself feeling grateful nonetheless. And had found himself feeling angry for feeling grateful. A barrage of emotions had cascaded through him all night. He feels them still as the stylist adjusts the seat back and arranges a very warm and aromatic towel on his face.

“Trust me.” She says, “you will thank me for this.”

His thoughts drift as the warmth of the steamed towel sinks into his face, opening pores filled with the sweat and dirt of where he has just been. Daniel had suggested the trip to the hair salon before meeting up with Jack. As Will had looked into the mirror back at Daniel’s’ house after taking a shower, he had expressed his concern over how ragged he appeared. He’d had very little sleep the last couple days and he looked like it.

Since sleep was a remedy beyond his reach, Daniel had told the taxi driver to let them off at his regular salon on the way to the crime scene. Since it would not do to show up looking as he had upon his release from BSHCI, Will has to admit that Daniel’s idea of a facial and a haircut was a good one. As Will’s eyes succumb to the heat and drowsiness, he begins to don the other pieces of armor he needs to wear for Jack. Appearing rested and sane is only part of the costume he must create.

Daniel had reluctantly dropped him off at the edge of the back road where the Volvo had been parked. Will had bit his lip upon seeing it. The model, even the color had been the same as his old car, impounded in the lot of the FBI. Either touching sentimentality or blatant mockery, Will could not decide which.

Will had told Daniel to fight the urge to clean his own car after returning home since washing and vacuuming his Mercedes before dawn might seem a little odd to his neighbors. There would be plenty of time to take care of it later. All he had to do was park in the garage, lock it up, and try and get some sleep.

When he had returned to Fiesole and dragged himself inside Daniel's' house, he had found Daniel asleep and had envied him for it. It had been around six or so that Alia had called with news that it appeared Lucia had been found, and the scene was so grisly that they had to shut down the entire market to wait for Interpol and the FBI to arrive from Rome. Even she had not been permitted to enter the crime scene yet. Will had refused Alia's invitation to join her saying he would wait for Jack and the FBI instead. She couldn't very well announce to her captain she had called him.

Alia had been forced to agree that Will's appearance without the FBI would raise questions better left unasked about her relationship with him. It had not taken long for Jack to call.

Morning, Will. Are you up?

I am now. It's a little early for a social call.

It isn't. I'm on my way to Florence as we speak. Hannibal has displayed one of the twins. I'm looking at a picture sent by Firenze PD and it looks like Lucia.

Where?

At the Piazza del Mercato Nuovo. She's a fucking fountain, Will.

Il Porcellino?

Yeah, a pig fountain. It's total mayhem. I'll call again when I get there, clear the way for you to come. Do you have the letter from your psychiatrist?

Yes.

Good. Bring him along.

Why?

He understands the pathologies involved. I want his psychological input.

On Hannibal?

And you. Don't show up without him. Gotta go…

Daniel had had mixed feelings about coming along. Hanging around his house all day waiting for news wasn't ideal, but exposing himself to Jack's inquisition was not going to be much fun, either. Being surrounded by a throng of emotional people for the next several hours would pose its own set of challenges. Daniel had brought along his iPod to help buffer the onslaught waiting for him.

Will had his own demons to contend with. He had not mentioned to Daniel his reprieve from the unbidden hallucinations stalking him had been fleeting. His inferno had followed him into of the depths of Daniel's basement. His attentions had been only momentarily monopolized by memories of preparing Tier with Hannibal as he had similarly rinsed, exsanguinated, and sectioned Luciano. All their destinies flying and swimming in blood and emptiness. Pools of it.

Don't go inside, Will. You'll want to retreat. You'll want it as the glint of the rail tempts us when we hear the approaching train. Stay with me.

But absent Hannibal's company, Will had retreated. Upon returning to his workstation after the interlude with Daniel in the kitchen, Will had become acutely aware of the swarm of darkness collecting at the bottom of the stairs as the winged creature of his inferno had descended from the smoky clouds obscuring the rafters above his head. The scraping across his stomach and the rustling of feathers at his side had sparked another inner dialogue. The weight of heavy wings had tugged along his back each time he had lugged up the stairs, impossible to ignore and feeling as real as the caresses settling soft as silk along his neck as he had talked to Hannibal on the phone.

Will had conjured up an incarnation of Hannibal…to fill that void of loneliness that Daniel does not fill, cannot fill.

Where else would I go?

You have everywhere to go.

Even now, the creature keeps him company. If Will would open his eyes, he would see the creature seated beside Daniel, preening slick feathers as its serpentine tail coiled about the feet of the chair. He supposes he prefers the company of Hannibal's feathery counterpart rather than the reassembled corpse of Luciano talking to him from the backseat of the Mercedes as Daniel had driven them to the location of Hannibal's largesse.

Will, are you okay?

Daniel, we both know I'm not okay.

I just…are you sure you know what you're doing? Accepting the car from Hannibal?

He wouldn't have offered the car with any intention other than what he said.

> I know what you are now; I can see you with his eyes.

How can you be sure?

> Did you feel what coils inside you as you crushed my face?

It's hard to explain but to offer me the car under false pretenses would be rude.

But messing with your crime scene isn't?

> I know the monster inside you squirmed. And you liked it.

No. That's part of the design. You and your car are not part of the design. This is between me and him. The offer of the car is genuine.

He wouldn't offer you a broken ladder.

Exactly.

I see your becoming. Can you see it?

When did you know the Paolini were related to Matteo and Carlo?

I knew not to trust Mason from the beginning. But I did not know the family ties or that their crime family was so extensive, nor did I know that Lucia and Luciano were twins until I talked to Alia. Mason's contacts here in Italy are well below my radar.

You knew… You didn't want to look too closely.

They were content to use you until the twins went missing.

They had no reason to interrupt the hunt. Mason must have turned up the volume on my involvement or importance after the disappearance. Had he told the Paolini sooner, the twins would certainly have dragged me off a while ago. Mason must have withheld my involvement until just recently.

You think Mason is taking a hit from the Paolini for not telling them sooner? The family must hold him partially to blame.

I don't doubt it. Mason has quickly pointed the finger at me.

Maybe you will you share a nice meal over a bottle of chianti… What does mockery taste like?

Luciano had kept him company as he had driven the Volvo to the slaughter house. Once Will had set about arranging his tableau, Luciano had receded like vapor into the monstrous montage of flesh and Will had once again been alone with his thoughts though not completely alone. Hannibal's feathery incarnation had kept him cradled in its embrace, an embrace Will finds increasingly difficult to resist.

Will feels the towel, now quite cool, slip from his face. He blinks open his eyes to the bright lights of the salon and looks up the face of the stylist. She smiles at him, all large brown eyes and pink lipstick and she readjusts the chair, spins it so Will can have a look in the mirror.

Will can't help but grin at his reflection. He looks good, healthy. The dark circles under his eyes are diminished and his skin is refreshed and almost glowing. The trimmed up curls and whiskers makes a big difference. He thinks it amazing what half an hour in this chair has done for his appearance.

"Not bad, eh?"

"Not bad at all. Thanks."

"You come back anytime." She turns to Daniel. "And you! You're next?"

"Oh no. Not today. But, I'll be back soon."

"Bene. And you bring him with you, make my day."

Daniel grins and stands up while Will takes care of business at the register. Will looks a hundred percent better. Showing up at a crime scene looking like he just got out of rehab would have been a huge mistake. Daniel decides Will cleans up really well. The suit he chose seems made for him. The light unlined blazer hugs his shoulders and the trousers gather snugly in all the right places. And the dark indigo of the suit paired with the faded cornflower of the shirt accentuates those pale blue eyes perfectly.

He looks outside through the huge panes of glass before he stares too long, and waves at the taxi driver.

Daniel instructs the driver and they are soon headed toward the Piazza del Mercato Nuovo, the city's famous farmer's market although Daniel knows that nowadays it is more a maze of souvenir shops for tourists. It's not far from the Palazzo Vecchio and the Fountain of Neptune which Daniel thinks is fortunate since traffic becomes a parking lot by the time they reach the cobbled square containing replicas of the statues once commissioned by the Medici.

They get out of the taxi and take a moment to orient themselves among the throngs of tourists and street artists crammed into the piazza. Will cranes his head to look around and marvels at the wonders of the Renaissance on display and thinks he is an idiot for not making the time to take a tour of the Uffizi since he has been here.

Daniel points across the piazza and Will falls in step beside him. Daniel watches Will as they walk briskly as they can and he realizes Will is adjusting his mindset as they walk. There are subtle changes in his face, and especially his eyes. Still disarmingly blue in the sunlight, but guarded and quite closed off. Daniel figures he must be preparing himself for Jack. And the battalion of FBI and local PD who have been informed he's on the way.

Daniel senses the intense self-consciousness that Will feels with every step. Knowing that many of the people he is about to meet have heard varying accounts of what transpired at Lecter's house that night in Baltimore, and have heard plenty of other things about him clearly bothers him. Daniel thinks all of that must pale in comparison to the voices in his head. Daniel knows Will's dreams are always hovering, punching holes into his awareness without notice. He thinks it a good idea that he is here with Will. He will know if Will is becoming overwhelmed. He has not profiled a scene in a while, not with Jack Crawford. And not one of Hannibal's.

Since Will already knows the victim and the murderer, Daniel tries to imagine what Will's imagination will show him when he absorbs the evidence and recreates the crime in his mind. Hannibal knows how Will's mind works. He has an idea of what Will might see in his tableau. His nerves vibrate inside, strings pulled too tightly across fractured frets, discordant and dread filled.

Rather than acknowledge Will's inner distress by making a deal out of it, he decides to engage Will in conversation hoping that the mental exercise will help ground him, ease the stress he knows Will is feeling as they approach the piazza and the crime scene. He has some questions of his own he hopes Will is in the mood to entertain.

"You'll be profiling his work again. You'll be profiling your own work, too."

"I've done it before."

"He's counting on you to provide misdirection."

"I've done that before, too."

“Jack is aware, isn’t he?”

“Jack is very aware and he will be playing all sides of this. He has to. It’s his job.”

“It used to be your job, too.”

“And I’m counting on Jack to remember that.”

il porcellino

Il Porcellino, Piazza del Mercato Nuovo

“Over here!”

Will hears Jack’s voice, loud and abrasive over the din of the crowd gathered around the Mercato Nuovo. He and Daniel had had to get out of the taxi blocks away and walk only to be stopped and frisked by local PD while waiting for clearance from Jack.

“Let them through” Jack’s voice crackles over the walkie talkie as he waves from atop the steps from the other side of the colonnade to the officers standing at the barrier of familiar yellow tape.

Will ducks and holds up the tape for Daniel to follow. Daniel’s face is pinched with anxiety, his green eyes glitter as they dart here and there, absorbing everything as the scene unfolds around him. Will weaves his way around the marble pillars that line the Piazza, feeling the scalding heat of eyes upon him as he walks to the other side, to find Jack standing before a circle of stained curtains, drawn around the fountain statue and the dramatically staged corpse he knows is there. Will thinks of an operating theatre and decides this is exactly what Hannibal intended. Jack stands feet typically apart, arms folded over his chest as he watches Will’s approach.

His tired brown eyes flicker over Will, taking in the suit he borrowed from Daniel and the freshly cut hair and finely trimmed beard. Will does not miss the approval in his eyes. He remembers standing in Hannibal’s waiting room to resume his therapy, freshly groomed and splashed with new cologne chosen with deliberation and purpose. He remembers the satisfaction at turning to Hannibal as the door to his office had opened and Hannibal’s look of surprised delight, followed quickly by an appraising gaze that had trailed him clear across the room. Two predators circling one another amidst the civility of teak, leather, and Isfahan carpets.

He doubts Jack will nuzzle his neck as Hannibal had done, though. They had taken up their usual adversarial positions on the chrome and leather chairs but as the session had progressed and Hannibal had opened his liquor cabinet to pour two tumblers three fingers full of thick velvety whiskey, he had not returned to his chair, preferring instead to devour Will with his eyes up close and inhale him from behind, fingers rifling gently through the edges of blunted curls at his neck. Fingers Will feels upon his skin beneath his collar as the scar tugs along his stomach.

He allows Jack to assess him, gives him time to adjust his expectations as Will does the same.

His gaze shifts to Daniel, probably noting the abrasions first and foremost, but his eyes linger upon the same haircut, same stubble, similarly cut and color suit, though with a crisp white shirt instead of Will's cornflower. Jack's gaze pauses at the sight of the lime green iPod clipped to the blazer's pocket. Jack frowns and shifts his gaze back to Will. A thin smile graces the heavy grey whiskered jowls.

"Glad you could make it. Ever look at a clock?"

"I've had some issues with … clocks." Will says, not smiling. "Not a pleasant morning I take it."

"No." Jack pauses and holds out a hand. "But good to see you."

Will takes it, feels the warmth in the grip and smiles into Jack's face as he pumps his hand with equal steadiness. "You too, Jack."

The scar Jack bears from Hannibal raises pale and thick from his neck. His collar is open and loose, and Will decides he wears his wound like a banner, the battle scarred Menelaus reminding the troops he has faced the enemy and survived.

Jack turns to Daniel. "Doctor Clayton. Nice to finally meet you face to face."

As Daniel takes his hand, Jack glances at Will and back to Daniel but still makes no comment though Will knows a remark lurks behind the tightly pressed lips. Jack's scrutiny does not cause Will to wilt inside, but he adjusts his posture to give the impression that it does. Jack is more comfortable when he feels empowered. Will needs Jack to feel comfortable with him.

Will looks at the curtains drawn across the crime scene with dismay. He notes the sign from the city's Public Works Department and the pool of pale red water beneath the white curtains smeared with stains from bloodied gloves.

"Did you put up the curtain, or was it already here?"

"Already here. Kept people away for a little while. Best we can figure is that he pulled up here sometime during the night, set it up and left. Probably used an actual city utility van. Some witnesses already said they'd seen one parked here in the wee hours. And, one of their night crew has not reported in yet."

Will knows they will never find the city worker. He looks around at all the people milling about and the crowd pressing close to the barriers. He sees a few photographers and notes several news vans parked further up the street. A sleek black FBI van is parked at the curb and Will wonders if Zee and Price are inside. He looks again at the photographers and their cameras, lenses aimed directly at them.

"I'm going to end up in some pictures, Jack. Am I correct in assuming you want him to know I'm here?"

"Here as in at the crime scene here? Because he has to know you are in Florence. The twins must have told him all about you once he grabbed them."

"They must have had all the information they collected on him on them,too. He made the connections to Mason and me pretty quickly I'd imagine."

“Well, it can’t be helped if your face gets in the paper. But, no interviews, not yet anyway. Who knows, might turn out to be beneficial to the investigation.”

Will raises his brows at the remark but says nothing, just tucks it away for later.

Daniel’s attentions shift between the bloody curtains and the conversation between Jack and Will. Will has reverted into what Daniel can only figure is his usual or former working dynamic with Jack. He stands at his side, his stance deferential. He also stands a little behind Jack so that Jack has to turn his head to look at him, providing Will a brief warning should he need to alter his expression. His thoughts are interrupted by the approach of the local PD. He sees Alia among them, then Ruggerio, and who can only be their captain walking beside him.

“Local PD.” Jack murmurs.

“Where’s Interpol?”

“Getting coffee.”

“All of them?”

“There’s only two. I think they went off to confer.” Jack lifts his hand to take the outstretched hand in front of him. “Detectives… Captain Pazzi. This is Will Graham.”

“Mr. Graham. Your reputation precedes you as they say.”

Pazzi smiles broadly so that the creases lining his bearded face crack along his weathered cheeks. In the bright sunlight even his tanned skin cannot conceal the dark circles under his eyes. The crow’s feet at his eyes and the wrinkles between his brows speak to the burdens of his position. The lines of worry and responsibility etched into his face are lines Will can relate to.

“And who’s this?” Pazzi looks to Clayton who steps away from the curtain and raises his head and actually avoids looking like a deer in headlights.

“Doctor Clayton!” Ruggerio says brushing past his captain to take Daniel’s hand. “He’s one of ours, Capitano.”

Alia looks professional in her grey slacks and pink blouse. Her hair is pinned up in a bun and her clear unadulterated skin shines with perspiration. She stands quietly beside him though she and Will exchange looks. Daniel does not miss the spark in the large brown eyes or the curve of her lips as she gazes at him. Will manages to offer a wistful smile and a slight nod before turning back to Ruggerio. Daniel pumps the warm hand firmly and accepts the embrace.

“He plays calcio with Alonso. You remember my brother, eh?”

Pazzi nods and waits for Ruggerio to let Daniel go before extending his hand as well. “You play with the local boys, eh? Is that how you got these?” He points to Daniel’s face.

“Oh no. Not this time. Playing with the dogs. Though I have received much worse during a match.”

Daniel laughs as he lets go of Pazzi’s hand. Pazzi is feeling him out with more than his hand. He searches Daniel’s face with the seasoned scrutiny cops seem to possess, and Daniel can feel reservation behind the practiced smile.

“He’s Graham’s psychiatrist. I told you about that other crime scene.” Ruggerio offers, nudging Daniel as if he needed a reminder not mention the crisp Euros he had pressed into Ruggerio’s hands the night he had rescued Will from a trip to the precinct. Daniel thinks that night seems a century ago as he looks at Will, brooding and silent at the top of the steps.

“Other crime scene?” Jack says as Will closes his eyes to keep them from rolling them in frustration.

Jack turns to look at Will and Will returns his gaze, his expression blank. Alia shifts uncomfortably beside Ruggerio. Pazzi looks from Will to Alia and back to Will.

“Unrelated case.” Ruggerio says quickly.

“Maybe we’ll get back to that later. Doctor Clayton is familiar with what we are dealing with here. I asked him to come.” Jack says.

“What we’re dealing with…is still to be determined, isn’t it, Agent Crawford?” Without taking his eyes off Will, Pazzi points his index finger at Daniel, “You still his doctor, Clayton? What for?”

“Still working through some trauma issues. Very much like the therapy cops receive after an especially violent encounter.” Daniel says. “Will had an extremely violent encounter.”

“Yes.” Pazzi says eyes still riveted to Will’s. “I understand he got very close.”

Pazzi drops his hand and moves towards Will, until he stands in front of him, the difference in height between them obvious. He draws his lithe frame erect, angles his head slightly downward. Will has to gaze up at him so he can maintain eye contact.

“How did you survive it?”

“I let him kill me.” Will says evenly, pale blue eyes drilling into Pazzi with a quiet ferocity.

Daniel feels the shifting of emotions in Pazzi. Looks can be deceiving and Daniel imagines that Pazzi has figured there is much more to Will than the pretty face and tailored suit that hovers behind Crawford. Daniel thinks too that Pazzi did not miss the implications in Will’s answer. Judging by the twist of Crawford’s head, neither did he.

“Doctor Clayton is here as a consultant.” Jack slices through the tension by moving slightly in front of Will, “Since he is familiar with the case from talking to Will, I can use his psychiatric expertise, especially since we’re dealing with a psychopathic psychiatrist. I’ve got a badge for him.”

Daniel can feel Will simmering from where he stands. But characteristically, Will’s face remains slack, a mask of impassivity save for the flickering of blue. The emotional currents between the three men rush around Daniel and he feels like he is caught in a riptide.

Daniel knows that when you are caught in a riptide you can’t escape it straight on. He moves to the side, taking up beside Ruggerio who is lighting a cigarette. The aroma of the tobacco fills the air and Daniel nods towards the rumpled pack of Marlboro’s.

“I thought you gave them up.” Ruggerio says holding out the package.

Daniel takes one and inclines his head as Ruggerio lights it for him. He takes a much needed drag on it before he responds, “I thought I was going to spend the day cutting the grass and watching tv.”

"Tell me about it. Haven't had a day off in over a week. And now this… Ima never gonna get home now."

"Go ahead. Give him a temporary badge." Pazzi says, "Him, too." He nods at Will. "So, Agent Crawford brought you here to uh…do your thing?"

"Yeah," Will breathes softly, "Do my thing."

Will refrains from grinding his jaw. As if keeping Daniel around as a consultant weren't bad enough. Jack has now put Daniel in the awkward position of balancing his professional responsibility to his patient with the potentially compromising designation of co-profiler. Actually, Will thinks it a brilliant play on Jack's part. Too bad Jack isn't fucking Daniel.

"Well, to do his thing, he needs some space. Can he go inside alone?" Jack asks politely, clearly not expecting the response Pazzi offers.

"Of course, but I want the curtain at his back open."

"He's not going to touch anything…" Jack frowns at Pazzi like he is a child.

"I want to watch him…" Pazzi says, "…do his thing."

Will tugs at Jack's sleeve and pulls him close, turns his face aside to speak into Jack's ear. "I'm not performing a freak show for the natives, Jack. Get rid of them, or I am gone."

As Jack looks into Will's face, something of the simpatico they once shared softens the deep creases that saddle his mouth. He sighs and nods once at Will. Will lets go of his sleeve. Jack turns to Pazzi.

"He does it the way he wants. It that's not okay with you, we'll wait for Interpol to get back from their coffee run and discuss it." Jack folds his burly arms over his chest and waits.

Pazzi smacks his lips and smiles. "Ah…no reason to halt the wheels of justice. Has he seen it, yet?"

Will knows Pazzi intended to let him work all along. He wanted to know the power structure between him and Jack. Pazzi is smart, but he is way out of his league. He is but a little fish swimming among the sharks. Will thinks he will be lucky to swim away alive.

"He just got here." Jack is saying, "I'd like to finish prepping him first. Standard procedure. He gets all the available information before he takes a look."

"You think it's the Chesapeake Ripper did this?" Pazzi looks to Will.

"I think the man who was known as the Ripper did this. We are not dealing with the Ripper anymore." Will says as he walks down the steps to follow Jack toward the FBI van. "This is somebody…new."

Will ducks as steps into the back of the FBI van where Zeller and Price are hunched over vials and evidence bags. Daniel waits outside, earbuds tucked in tight as he gazes at the crowd and clusters of forensic personnel examining the sidewalk.

“Hey, Will.”

Both Zeller and Price speak at the same time and then look at each other. Will finds himself pleased to see them again. Not overjoyed, but pleased. Will knows he walks among them with a dark cloud hanging directly over him. Talons, maybe antlers scrape along his skin as he remembers cold metal tables and rows of numbered refrigerated cadaver chambers lining the walls of the FBI crime lab they had once gathered around. He will never be welcomed there again. Not that he ever was.

“Hey. Not exactly a vacation, is it.” Will says and smiles. To be sociable.

Zeller rolls his eyes. “I don’t even know what time it is.” He says. “If I ordered something to eat, I wouldn’t know to order pancakes or pizza.”

“You’re in Italy. Always go with the pizza.” Will says.

“Did they draw the curtain for you, yet?” Price says.

“Not yet. What have we got?”

“Well, it’s still pending an official ID, but I don’t think there’s any doubt, it’s the sister. Time of death is inconclusive. Uh, not all of her can be accounted for.”

“She’s missing organs?”

“She’s missing a lot of pieces. You’ll have to see it. I can’t…really explain…” Price’s words trail off as Jack steps inside.

“Give him what you’ve got in a nutshell. I want him to take a look before it gets really hot out there.”

“We’re thinking she’s been dead a couple days at least. Blood drained out, flesh chilled, nearly frozen. At least it was.”

“Easier to slice through.” Will says.

“Oh yeah, much cleaner.” Price says, “And, the storage makes it impossible to know the time of death. The uh, disassembly and animal parts, not to mention the missing pieces. She’s not all there if you know what I mean.”

“Animal parts? With what?” Will looks to Jack but Jack’s lips remain pursed tight.

“Obscures the cause of death.” Price continues, “I mean, this truly horrific display was a methodical deconstruction of means, motive, and opportunity. There’s almost too much here to analyze.”

“The obscurity may look to a new signature.” Jack says. “He can kill with impunity, the actual cause of death shrouded in mystery.”

“Like smoke.” Will says. “But you don’t need the smoke to find the fire when it is already burning.”

“Well,” says Jack, “time to view the BBQ. Looks like Hannibal is serving pork today.”

“No sign of Luciano I take it.” Will says.

“Hopefully, there are some clues in the evidence.”

“You did consider separate tableaux.”

“I find it odd that you didn’t.”

“I never said I didn’t consider it. I said it was an interesting theory. And there could be any number of reasons for doing so.”

“I agree.” Jack says. “Guess we’ll have to wait for the other shoe to drop.”

Will is acutely aware of the change in atmosphere inside the van. Zee and Price have dropped their heads, very immersed in what Will decides is nothing much. Jack has apparently been thinking aloud.

“Talk to Mason yet?” Will says as he steps out the van, Jack behind him.

“A little while ago. He had a photo.”

“Where did he get it so quickly?”

“Internet. Tattle Crime International.”

Will’s jaw tightens with undisguised disgust. Jack’s lips twist into a sardonic smile that captures Will’s mood perfectly. “Lounds.”

“She’s around here someplace.”

“Probably dyed her hair.” Will says.

“If she weren’t so vain, I’d agree with you.”

“This just keeps getting better and better.” Will says.

Will stands in front of Il Porcellino, the famous boar fountain statue that tourists seek out to photograph and to rub its nose. The Renaissance original by PietroTocca sits in the Bardini Museum so that the identical replica that replaced it is the one subjected to the touch of tourists’ fingers along its shiny bronze snout to ensure, as superstition would have it, a safe return to Florence.

Both sculptures are fountains. Il Porcellino’s fountain is connected by tubing to the grisly sculpture fashioned of raw pink exposed flesh, meticulously skinned and superbly attached to what Will figures is an actual pig skeleton, looking very much like his monument to Tier.

Except that it isn’t a monument. Lucia’s body parts have been interspersed with those of a pig, its carcass gleams white in the diffused light of the enclosure. A hose connects the fountains together so that Il Porcellino supplies the water for the fountain inside of Lucia who sits directly in front but at the bottom of the steps so that gravity assists the inner workings of the fountain apparatus

Hannibal has placed inside her. Since Il Porcillino's mouth drips rivulets of water slowly into the pool beneath it, Hannibal thoughtfully installed a pump.

It is an arresting visual. Although Lucia has been posed in the nude, there is nothing erotic about the sculpture of flesh and bone. Her body is skinless, revealing sinew and muscle, even to showing the marbling of the meat. Only her face is recognizable, but the upturned eyes are not hers. Hannibal has stuffed two brown porcine eyes into the sockets. The long tresses of black hair are matted against her head, and her mouth is opened in a grotesque parody of Il Porcellino behind her, clear plastic tubing poking through colorless lips as water dribbles pink into the overflowing trough in front of her.

It is the ghastly face of Lucia he focuses on as he closes his eyes and allows the crime scene to unfold for him as his imagination takes him backward through the entire process, back to what he imagines is Hannibal's current workroom situated beneath whatever fine residence conceals it from above.
